Excellentibus ingeniis citius defuerit ars, quâ vivem regant, quàm quâ hostem superent. Tit. Liv. lib. 2. D. of a prudent knowledge, to embelliſh it with virtues, diverſifie it with beauties, and ſettle it in the center of repoſe.

God maketh ſo much account of an honeſt man, recommended to the government of others, that have choſen Noah to command over only ſeven ſouls, ſhut up in the Ark as in a moving priſon, he calleth him his Heart: for to ſay truly, we muſt having the heart of God, to bring forth counſels ſufficiently able to ſave men, and to be in the ſame inſtant the mouth of God, to pronounce the Oracles of truth. God asketh Job, who is the man on earth that ſhall make the muſick of Heaven? To which I would willingly anſwer, It is a good Juſticier. For in what conſiſteth this harmony of Heaven? We are not in my opinion to imagine it according to the dotages of ſome Philoſophers, who of it have made unto themſelves a celeſtial muſick compoſed of voyces and ſounds, formed by the mutual encounter of thoſe admirable Globes. The harmony of Heaven is nought elſe, but the good order of the Sun, the Moon, Stars, day, and night, and ſeaſons, which daily progreſs along with a regular pace, and meaſured motion, not erring in the leaſt point.

Geneſ. 8. v. 17. according to the Hebrew Text.

Job 2. 12. Ordinem Cœli.

This order which is ſo excellent and divine in Heaven, is introduced upon earth by the means of juſtice, which guideth and governeth all the actions of men within the circuit and limits of duty, ſo ſagely and divinely, that he who would obſerve ſo many ſingular laws which books recommended unto us, ſhould quickly make earth become a little Heaven. For the ſame reaſon Origen interpreting this paſſage of Iſay, where God ſaith, Heaven is his Throne, ſheweth, that the Paradiſe and Heaven of God upon earth, is juſtice: from whence it cometh to paſs, that ſuch as uſe it, as they ought, are wholly celeſtiall in Science, life, and converſation. Was it not this conſideration which drew the Babylonians to build the Palace, where judgments were given, in the form of Heaven; for the very ſtone-work was of Saphirs, which are of celeſtial colour, and in the Seelings, clouds were counterfeited, and in thoſe clouds certain birds, reputed as meſſengers of juſtice, as if they had been delegated to ſee the deportments of men in diſcharge of their offices, and to adviſe them, that giving judgment on earth, they muſt ever have an eye and an ear in Heaven.

I alſo diſcover this by another obſervation of Scripture, for it teacheth me, that the brave Princes Debora, ſurnamed the Bee, judged the people, and held her Aſſizes under a Palm: or as it is probable, after the reaſon both of the one and other were heard, ſhe took a leaf of this tree, and gave it to him who had the right. And from this practiſe is derived the cuſtom to plant Palms at the gates of great Advocates and Juſticiers, which was likewiſe obſerved in ancient Rome.

Jud. 4. 5.

Exornique foro plurima palma fores. Martial.

Now why, think you, would God have the firſt Seſſions of juſtice to be held under Palms, but to ſignifie that which Philo ſpeaketh of, that as the Palm beareth his heart and ſtrength in the top, ſo good Judges direct their whole underſtanding and affections to heaven, living perpetually as in the preſence of the Divinity, or elſe, that as the virtues of the Palm are innumerable, ſo the excellencies of juſtice are infinite?

Add alſo hereunto a paſſage in a Caldaick Commentary upon Eccleſiaſtes, which telleth how Solomon, that great King, under whoſe principality, peace and juſtice mutually embraced as ſiſters, to ſhew what account he made of thoſe who well managed matters of right, cauſed a moſt ſumptuous Palace to be erected for them of moſt exquiſite workmanſhip called the Houſe of Judgment, and through excels of favour, ordained they ſhould partake of the wine of Offerings, which was preſented on the Altars of the living God, and which came from a Vine planted and manured by the hand of Solomon himſelf. Is it not to place juſtice in heaven, to admit it to the communication of the honours and offerings of God? So the people of Iſrael ſuppoſing one day that Moſes was loſt, inſtantly asked of Aaron gods to govern them, as thinking there muſt be ſome divinity to ſupply the loſs of this great States-man. Why then do you wonder if Saint Auguſtine in the book he compoſed of Order, praiſeth the practiſe of Pythagoras who never taught politick Science to his Diſciples, till they had paſſed through many long tryals, eſteeming the other Arts were apt to debauch the minde, but that this applied lively colours, and as it is ſaid, varniſhed and perfected up the Table.

Exod. 32.

It is not very hard at this time to conclude, what the excellency of a brave States-man is, but the diſcovery of him is very rare. And I will tell you, that conſidering well the Tables which Delbrunus hath made upon Ariſtotle his Philoſophy, and comparing them with other exquiſite pieces; I have ſeen two Cities very different, both which bare the title of Policy, but the one in effect was falſe Policy, and the other the City of Verity. I will preſent them unto you plainly and ſincerely, according to the like deſign of S. Auguſtine in his City of God, and according to the Idæa's of ancient Sages, not glancing at our times, which I will neither praiſe nor condemn, my nature and profeſſion having diſpoſed me to much ignorance of worldly affairs.

The ſecond SECTION.

WE then have beheld the City of wicked Policy in thoſe ancient paintings, to be built upon ruines, in a land of Quick-ſilver, wholly cemented with blood; Earth-quakes are there very frequent, and I know not what kinde of outragious winds blow ſo dangerouſly, as if they would tear all in pieces.

The waters were there infected, the air filled thoſe which breathed in it, the Viands produced death under a falſe appearance of life: the inhabitants ſaw nothing but Wolves and Foxes by their ſides, Ravens and Owls on their houſes, Comets over their heads, Serpents and Scorpions at their feet, which were there ſeen as abundantly ſtrewed, as flowers in the enamel of the Spring. The gates reſembled thoſe fatal Portals, whereof Hiſtories make mention, that were never opened, but to paſs away carrion and ordure: and withal this, the Citizens were ſo powerfully charmed, that they eſteemed themſelves moſt happy, ſuppoſing to ſleep on thorns, was to live among Violets and Roſes.

Plutarch. de curioſit. Ἀνεφγότα μόλις.

It is verily a wonder, that without, there were ſome ſhadows of piety, but within not ſo much as a Temple. For in truth the Burgeſſes of this City never looked up to heaven but to blaſpheme it, and all of them greedily ſought for earth covered with a veil of ſky-colour.

I ſaw no other Gods there, but Honour, Gain, and Pleaſures, to which ſouls and bodies were ſacrificed in much greater number then Solomon ſlaughtered Oxen in the ſolemnity of his moſt magnificent Sacrifices. I ſaw huge Caves, where there were all sorts of beasts, and likewise many monsters, that much resembled the Harpyes, Gorgons, and Chymæra's of Antiquity.

all

I perceived also some solitary Dens, where I was certified great Sacriledges were committed, of power to make darkness, which served them for a cover, to blush for shame, being unable to deceive the eys of God.

The men which walked in the streets appeared like Centaures, and were clothed with an habit spotted over like the skin of a Panther. The Chirurgians who dissected some of them newly dead, gave assurance they had found two hearts in them. Howsoever it is certain they shewed, as it is said, marvellous cunning in their words, and had no other pastime all the day, but to lay snares, not sparing their greatest friends: for indeed they were extremely treacherous and cruel in all which concerned their own interests.

As I more attentively considered their orders and distinctions, I saw there were three Labyrinths very different. In the first, which was at the very entrance, stood the least wicked, who were not as yet practised in black mischiefs, contenting themselves to exercise some slight tricks of wit, for they in good earnest deceived one another, and took much pleasure in mutual cousenage, and called this kind of sport, legier-demain; I saw there many creatures that served their masters not forgetting their own affairs, and who mowed the Meadow, whilest it was plenty. I saw Merchants some of which foisted in false wares, others disguised them, others over prized them, others sware without end, and some likewise swallowed up perjuries, as sweetly as the most delicate Viand. I saw Artificers who used many deceits in their manufactures, and better understood the trade of lying, then any other. I also saw some who sold wind, silence, and time, and had excellent inventions to get money. Some by certain influences drew it out, as doth lightning, not touching the purse. Others had inventions of quintessences: others trafficked about Stars, and sold good fortune in little boxes of smoak. Others had shops of the secrets of Arts, and made themselves able to give beauty, youth, health and immortality, to those that would buy them. Others made Dice and Mathematical Cards. Others lead Bears; others extracted infamous Coin from the Planet of Venus: others in the quality of Mercenaries made Odes and Love-sonnets for the Pandora's of the time; and which was most ridiculous, certain young wits among all these were seen, who laboured to patch up together rimes, or prose very little to the purpose, to whom Gold and Incense was given, with which they were so puffed up, that they esteemed the most solid wisdom of the world to be but meer ignorance, in comparison of their works. One cannot tell all the tricks of this imposture, and how many sleights the spirit, watchful for its own interests, found to come to the end of its intentions. Conscience checked some: but they answered, one could not live in the world without these tricks, and that they were as necessary as to breath.

In the second Labyrinth, I saw the corruptions of justice described by S. Cyprian in the Epistle he addresseth to his friend Donatus, when he speaketh of Rome the Idolatress. All was replenished (saith this Prelate) with goodly Precepts, excellent Laws, and sage Ordinances. But in the midst of so many lights, God and men were offended with so much impudence, as if these laws were made to no other end, but to be transgressed. Never is innocency so ill entreated, as in the place where profession is made to defend it. The Serpents of the Desert have less gall and spleen then those pleaders whom I saw turmoiled with a spirit of giddiness, and dissevered with the Sword of division. Their clamours were so loud that they made the whole house of Justice to eccho again, as are the waves heard to rore on the shore of the Ægean Sea. I saw Gibbets, Wheels, and boyling Caldrons prepared for some miserable criminals, because they were yet, as it is said, but little thieves; but were they much greater, their crimes had rather been crowned, then chastised.

From thence I viewed fields weeping, filled with standing waters, which were said to be gathered together from the tears of Widows, Orphans, and an infinite number of other persons, who live under great oppression. I saw some who were in the water up to the neck, and some who lifted up an arm with all their strength to offer up some papers, wherein were the laws of Charlemaign & Lewis the twelfth, which expresly command the causes of the poor may be handled before any other business: but it was replyed, such Ordinances were quite out of use. These miserable creatures solicited their Attorneys, and they betrayed them; complained to their advocates and they perplexed them: implored the assistance of Judges, and they sold them, notwithstanding were esteemed honest men, and still enemies to these corruptions.

I saw two great Registers, whereof the one was called the Cabal of favour, and the other the Cabal of money, where it is said, there were mischiefs as black as the spirits of the abyss, but they must not be divulged. There was also a very great quantity of Pleaders, who fought to stretch out Suits, as Shoomakers a piece of leather with their teeth, and mutter out propositions of errours, reviews, incompetencies, rejections, oppositions, and compulsory causes, with so many other hideous words, that I asked whether these men spake the language of the Canadas or Chinois.

Old Pettifoggers appeared, all over worm-eaten with mischiefs, who could scarce breath from their lips, yet had strong apprehensions of death, through fear to leave the exercise of suits. The like was found in souls already half damned, who were very solicitous in manner of treachery; one bare false witness, another invented a contract, another forged a Will, another supposed a crime, another had a shop of all sorts of slanders and diabolical falsifications: the audacious sale of a word prostituted to sin, flew between Heaven and Earth about twilight with the wings of an Owl. And to consummate the sublimity of mischief, Right yielded to Iniquity: It was to do wrong to the wicked, not to imitate those. Crimes, said they, were already sufficiently authorised by the great multitude of Complices.

In the third Labyrinth, I saw men who had little Rixellions else of man in them, but shape and skin. They were near to an inchanted River, which must be passed and repassed over seven times, as it is said, to become absolute in craft. There were likewise others seen already transformed into unknown Monsters, and others who had no more but the little finger, or tip of the nose of men. I saw some who were like little Aples, which pushed and scratched one another, and brake through the throng with all their force to climb up to the top of a tree, which was said to be the tree of Honour.

At the entrance there was I know not what kind Lilius Gyraldus. of fantasm of Divinity, called Worldly favour. It in picturis favoris. seemed in appearance to have a body and consistence, but was in effect a true ſpectre of ſmoak clothed with a Mantle tiſſued with clouds and wind.

There ſtood about it Philoſophers, who would undertake to derive the Genealogy, and ſet the Horoſcope of it. One ſaid, ſhe was the daughter of beauty, the other of hazard, the other of babble:
that Fortune was her nurſing-mother, and that if ſhe had her exaltation in the ſign of the Ram, ſhe ſhould finde her declination in the Ballance. Howſoever, ſhe then appeared very frightful and ſpruce.
Flattery failed not to court her, throwing Roſes and Flower-deluces upon her. But at the ſame time envy ſlily ſtealing into the throng, gnawed the borders of her garment. Riches, diſdain, preſump-tion, and boldneſs, did nothing but cry round about her. Make place, make place; and to raiſe her the higher, they ſought to lay the great God of Ju-ſtinian under her feet. She was ſo diſdainful of knowledges, ſhe had formerly acquired, that nothing was ſo cold as her diſcourſe; and if ſhe had eys, they were for no uſe but to behold her own in-tereſts. When I ſaw ſhe paced along in a way all ſhining with ice, and that ſhe danced on a rope, I loſt ſight of her, not troubling my ſelf any further to follow this ſpirit: but I underſtood that all thoſe who promiſed themſelves the ſeven wonders of the world, had been paid in coin of leaves.

Aquila Anſerina. Stapl.

There likewiſe I viewed men whom you would have taken for Geeſe, ſo ſimple of countenance were they, but they ſwam in Pactolus, having but one foot only of a Gooſe; for the other hidden under feathers was the tallon of a Harpy, which did only attend to catch golden fiſh. I ſaw alſo ſome plunged in a huge heap of Piſtolets, ſo that neither heads nor bodies appeared, but only one tip of a toe made like the paw of a Griphon, as a notable Painter not long ſince delineated covetouſneſs. Going ſomewhat further, I diſcovered the Den of Bacchus, where I ſaw Fifes, Timbrels, Ivy, and Goats-skins, huge ſmoak of roſts, feaſts, and men buried in wine and good cheer. Beyond it they paſſed to the grots of luſt, where crimes were done, which would make the moſt innocent pens guilty in writing them: for as there muſt be an extreme impudence to commit them, ſo ought much ſhamefac'dneſs be uſed to conceal them. Nothing ſo much aſtoniſhed me, as to ſee Eccleſiaſticks without Religion, Ladies without ſhame, young Maids tainted, who knew ſo much of that whereof they ſhould be ignorant, that the moſt proſtituted could teach them nothing.

Afterward the ſport turning into blood, I ſaw ſtrange treacheries, horrible circumventions, execrable treaſons, which ſpake of nothing but of tying halters, and mingling poyſons. I alſo ſaw ſome who made it their practice to kill men openly, and ſaid, there was no ſafety for them in innocency, but much rather in the enormities of Sacriledges.

I thought I had ſeen all, when I afterwards perceived a chamber hideouſly black, ſaid to be the ſtudy of Lucifer, and that the brave ſpirits of this time ſtudied there, under the regency of Herod, Tiberius, and Pilate, to finde out the way how to believe in God no longer, and to know all the refined policy of former ages.

I ſhould be tedious and troubleſome to decipher all the particulars of this prodigious City. The painting hath told much of it, but the greateſt unhappineſs which I ſaw there, is, that it is more true then I could wiſh. For not to touch upon the honour of ſo many good men, which are yet both in the body of juſtice, and in all other companies, I muſt tell you that among the ſons of Seth, there are many Children of Cain, which make up this Babylon.

The third SECTION.

The deſtruction of Babylon, and the government of the Divine Providence over the Eſtates of the World,

I Courteouſly beſeech you, O ingenious Politician, to run your eys over theſe lines, which I have traced, to ſtay a little your haſt, and to conſider with me the knot of all this policy, the ſource, progreſs, iſſue, and remedy of all theſe diſorders, perhaps you may find more reaſon in my diſcourſes then your paſſion can expect. Conſult awhile with your heart, ſound your ſoul, go to the bottom of your conſcience, I fear there may be ſome pits of the Abyſs, and Graſhoppers of the Apocalyps, which are thoſe black vapours that have hitherto eclipſed all the lights of your underſtanding. I will not conceale from you that there are three ſorts of ſouls, one virginal, another already changed and ſomewhat corrupted, the reſt ſhameleſs, ſuch as thoſe which are called in Scripture, vaſt and giant-like ſouls. I do not think, to finde by your proceedings, that you have a Virgin ſoul, nor will I likewiſe perſwade my ſelf you have the ſoul of a Giant, which expecteth no other remedy but thunder: I ſhould rather believe you have a ſtomach depraved by ſome wicked principles, whereinto either the unhappineſs of your education, the preſumption of your ability, or tickling hope of good ſucceſs in worldly affairs hath thrown you. Will you that I touch with a finger the beginning of your diſorder? You have been too much flattered upon the excellency of your wit, which is not, to ſpeak truly, one of the ſhalloweſt of the time: but there is much wanting of the ſingularity you imagine. You have inſenſibly retired your ſelf from that great judgment which S. Denys calleth the eternal barth of all the moſt purified lights, and moſt chaſt affections, and by withdrawing your ſelf have taken a great quantity of falſe lights into your corrupt underſtanding, and much coldneſs into your heart, which have brought upon you a remiſneſs in good manners, and a notable diſorder in all the parts of your ſoul. You have ſeen Heaven, and all the hopes of the other life, as Mathematicians make us to behold in a dark chamber, whatſoever paſſeth abroad, through a little cranny, in ſuch manner, that all things we ſee, appear like ſhadows and landskips turned topſie-turvy.

Dionyſ. c. 1. de divinis nominibus

Behold what happeneth after you have ſtopped up all the windows and exceſſes of heavenly light: you have made a little hole for the Moon, and all the bleſſings of the other life have ſeemed very ſlender to your diſtruſtful ſpirit; you have put on a reſolu-tion to make a fortune at what price ſoever, and to build on earth like Cain, after you have almoſt renounced the hopes of heaven. In doing this you have played the unruly Aſs, thinking to eſcape from the bands of the dependance you have on God: you have made your ſelf your bleſſing, your end your (a) God. Thereupon you have thought of the means you are to hold, to arrive at this ſcope already framed in your imagination.
It ſeemeth to you all things ſucceeded according to your wit, travel, and induſtry uſed therein, with ſome ſmall help of fortune, God no whit at all intermedling with Affaires here below. You have drawn abſurd conſequences of the proſperity of ſome ſubtile ſpirits, not looking into the bottom of the buſineſs. The ſucceſs of your affairs, which ſeemed to you moſt proſperous, notwithfinding your crimes and unlawful proceedings have emboldned you, mischievous spirits, which daily converse with you, have confirmed you. In the end, behold your self reduced as it were to this point, as to suppose, you are to hold on a course in all affairs and governments of the world, which may be crafty, captious, worldly, and independent of divine lawes, if not for some popular apparence.

Vide Lipsium in notis ad 3. lib. politic. c. 4. p. 135.

O If this be so, I demand of you, why then in the judgement of that great Politician Thucidides, and all other well understanding men, it is observed, that these curious wits dispoiled of the fear of God, have always been most turbulent and unhappy in the manage both of their owa affairs and the publick also; as on the contrary those who had not so much knowledge and invention, but pursued the general instinct of God, have held their estates better governed in simplicity, more prosperous in the ignorance of evil, and much more firm in the lasting of their felicity?

Never was there a more refined wit then Achitophel of whom the Scripture said, men consulted with him as with a God: yet never was there any more unhappy in his practise. For having disposed of the affaires of the Kingdom, and those of his own house, there remaining none to be provided for but his own person, he took a halter and strangled himself, because they approved not one of his counsels.

When we behold in histories a large list of these most curious Politicians, who have had so ill successe either in their own persons, or in their posterity, as I presently will produce very many; we must undoubtedly say, this kinde of way is ever dangerous in its enterprises, but not infallible in the successes thereof. If you become as wicked as a little Polipheme, it would be very hard to deny a first cause of all the creatures which are in the world, of it self absolute, independent, & eternal. For were the world ful of wheels and revolutions even from earth to Heaven, still must we necessarily come to the last wheel, to the last revolution, which is to give motion to all the other, and to take it of no other; and that is God. Were you as brutish as a Lestrigon, you could not deny an eternal Verity. For in what time will you say there hath not been a verity? Should you assign the space of ten millions of years, and all that may be imagined beyond it, you would ever find this verity: and should you say, it was not then, and that in saying so, you were sincere, which cannot be; yet would you speak a truth even in denying a truth, so much is her essence necessary: and this eternal verity which serves as a basis for all other verities, is that which we cal God. Were you as unnatural as a monster, you knew not how to deny there were a soveraign Being in the world, which holdeth the first degree of all excellencies, in such sort that we cannot imagine any thing more excellent, and that is God.

Ratio Anselmi dialog. de veritate c. 1.

Besides, it is necessary to infer what S. Thomas hath most divinely said, that all things, which are by borrowing and participation have relation of necessity to that, which is by essence and nature. So the Stars, the precious stones, have relation to the Sun, and things hot to the fire, as the scope of their excellency. Now it is certain that men, Cities, and Kingdoms, have but a borrowed being, because they are not made by themselves, and therefore it is necessary to affirm there is an intellectual power in a supreme degree, whereunto all these intelligences, even of men which constituted these States and Republicks do relate, and this relation is nothing else but providence.

D. Thom. opuscul 2. cap. 22. Quæ sunt per participationem, reducuntur in id quod est per essentiã.

Verily if you should behold on a Theater about ten thousand white beards that were come to decide a matter by a common consent, would you take your self to be wise to enter into Council not called, and to reject the opinions of all those who have delivered their sentences, publishing an opinion absolutely new, and directly contrary to so many good judgments?

And I ask of you, that were now so many excellent Magistrates raised again, as have governed all sorts of Kingdoms and Common-wealths in the Ages past, should we not see more then a million of men most accomplished in knowledg, virtue, and experience, who had manniged the world in the fear, and under the laws of this divine Providence? It would then be a notable spectacle, to see you enter into the Hall of such a Council with a downy chin, to give all this assembly the ly, and say, there is nothing but humane policy, dissimulation, and the tricks of flattery to be valued in affairs, without the expectation of any thing from God, would you not be ridiculous? Yet this is it which you do, so much hath sin stupified you. If you have the least spark of the understanding of a man, when you foster such thoughts in your minds, do you think it were fit to prefer some mouldy reasons of a carnal spirit, and the caprichio's of your sensual imaginations before the voice of nature, and the states of the whole world assembled together to condemn your brutishnes? If there be no Providence to chastise the perverse, and recompence the just, conclude, we must live in the world like a sparrow-hawk, or Pike, called the Tyrant of the water, and to have no other measure of virtue, but your tallon and throat. Is it not to open the gate to all injustices, perjuries, treacheries, and all possible abominations? For what monster will not that soul be capable of, which conceiveth nothing of God? I have some reason, say you, and for this cause you are of opinion, this belief should be entertained to amuse the people.

In saying this, you discover a great weakness of judgement; for it must be concluded, according to your proposition, that all what ever was in the world either of justice, temperance, modesty, courtesie, patience, honesty, peace, and tranquility, were derived from an imaginary belief, touching Providence; from an errour, a folly, an illusion: which is as absurd, as to say grapes grow upon thistles, and roses spring from the ice of winter. And tell me not, I pray, that a false belief seeks to procure good effects, as it appeareth in the virtues of Pagans. For I hold, that what good the Pagans have done, they have not acted it with relation to the adulteries of Jupiter, nor the murders of bloudy Mars: but in honour of a Divinity, which they thought avenged iniquity, and rewarded virtue. In this general belief, which was the true root of their moral virtues, there happened no abuse, although they in particular were deceived in their judgement.

Your goodly objections of aw- proceed from an infamous Diagoras, or Pliny, who thought to have found a great secret in saying, The belief of a Divine Providence was a jolly invention because it kept the world in aw. Deserved he not well to be cursed, as a Traytour to all mankind? Deserved not he well to be broiled alive in the throat of hell, as indeed he was loosing his life in the flames of Vesuvius, since he vaunteth himself to have discovered a secret, which would be able, were it true, to let loose the bridle to all profanations and bruitishnes of a life the most savage that might be imagined? Ever would it be more to the purpose to tolerate an evil well conferred, then to introduce a good ill digested, say the wise: and what crime is it then to invent false secrets, the ignorance whereof is so wholesom, and the verity whereof would be so prodigiously hurtful? Why do you not rather take into your consideration the sage discourse of the Philosopher Simplicius, who said: When I imagine a God unto my self, I figure a great Master, whom I know of necessity to be endowed with a most stable fortune, and a most excellent will. And for this cause I conclude, he cannot be ignorant of the things he hath produced, seeing this ignorance falleth not even upon beasts most stupid; and I say, that in governing them, governeth them without pain, Omnipotent though he be; there being no greatness nor multitude of burthens, which can weaken the forces and vigour of this infinite Spirit: nor is there in nature any thing too great for his sovereign cattle, so is there nothing too little for his bountie. Nothing escapeth his Paternal Providence, nor doth he think it a matter unworthy of his care to govern a butter-flie, since he esteemed it a thing consonant to his bountie, to create a butter-flie. Now for us to think that he, knowing, who, and willing to govern the world, is diverted from it through pleasures and contentments he taketh for his own delights, is a most gross imagination; for why should we attribute to God apprehensions and affections, which we would be ashamed to give to men, if they made not profession to be of the number of the altogether idle?

Behold how this singular wit discourseth: and verily it is to be wholly ignorant of God, to have any conceit of him less then infinite. Independent Soveraignty cannot admit a companion; and the inexhaustible force of a Creator, who made all, sufficeth to govern all. An Angel cost him no more in the making then a silk-worm, and a silk-worm cost him no less to produce it then an Angel. Why do you not judge that which is to be made, by it which is already made? When you entred into the world, the Divine Providence, as a harbinger, prepared your lodging for you, it was not in your power to make your self then either rich or poor, Master or servant, King or subject; your affairs were dispatched, and your counsel not asked. God also in silence draweth out the web of your life, if you desire to be happy, you have nothing to do, but to contribute your free-will to his work. But if you have set up your rest to become a Politician, contrary to the decrees of Providence, and to bend the byas to your pretended interests, is it not to do the same thing, which a frog should, if she sought to swim against the current of Rhodanus or Danubius? Would not it be as ridiculous, as if a fly should seek to soar up to heaven, and fix her little feet, to stay the course of the primum mobile? You say, I press you, and if you can prosper well in the affairs of the world by these ways of piety and honesty which are ever annexed to a firm belief of a divine providence, you would rather take this same then any other. To it I answer that which Laertius speaketh of the Philosopher Bion, who having before been an atheist and afterward by chance disposing himself to invoke the false gods, became most superstitious in their service, under hope of some temporal commodities, which he thought to gain. O great fool (saith this Author) who could not propose gods to himself, unless he made them mercenary, and would needs have the belief of a Divinity depend on the successes of his person and house. God (saith S. Augustine) engageth not his promise to make us happy according to the world, so soon as we become honest men. If you say unto him: O God, where is your justice, to suffer the wicked so to flourish, and good men to be afflicted? He will answer, where is your faith? where is that promise I have made you? Have you made your self a Christian to be happy in the world? This were to make a virtue beggarly, wanton, and interessed, which must ever be paied with prosperities: we may well say, it resigned it self to God for good morsels, and not for honesty. It is much to be feared, lest the pleasures of the present, may make it loose the tast of the recompence promised in Heaven, as it is said the dogs, which hunted among the flowers of Mount Gibel, lost heretofore the tracks of the hare.

Aug. Enar. 2. in Psal. 25. Acies Dei, Mat. of Justitia tua ut mali fiorent, boni laborent: & Deus tibi respondet, Hac est fides tua? Hoccine tibi promisi? & ad hoc Christianus factus es, ut in seculo floreres?

If following good Policy, we should be unhappy towards the world, we might ever comfort the captivity of our body by the liberty of our minde, and guild our chains of glory with our virtues. We should enter into the community of great spirits, who have done all good, to endure all evil. We should much more rejoyce to be in the bottom of the prison with S. Paul, then in the heaven or earth, which Cosroes the Persian King caused to be built. But God is not so harsh to a good conscience, that he delireth to hold it still in the incommodities of present life: but much otherwise, if you will well discourse, there will be found an infinite number of good Princes, excellent Magistrates, and all sorts of persons qualified, who pursuing the way of honesty, have been most prosperous in the mannage of affairs. And if you consider your Politicians who make profession to refine all the world, either you have seen but the first station of their plaistred felicity, or have ever found great labyrinths, horrible confusions, fortunes little lasting, dejection in their posterity, hatred, and the execration of Ages.

I think, I have fully illustrated these truths in the histories which I have written of Herod, Theodosius, Maximus, Eugenius, Constantine, Diocletian, Constans, Julian, and divers others.

And if you yet desire to behold with a ready eye, how there is no policie powerful against God, and how he surprizeth the most subtile, making snares of their greatest cunning to captive them, behold Joseph, sold by his wicked brothers, for fear he should be honoured, and yet see him honoured because he was sold. Behold Haman, who practised the ruin of the Hebrews, to raise himself, and see him raised on a gibbet of fifty cubits high, to humble him. Behold Jonas, who would also be a Politician contrary to the counsels of his Master, yet tempests pursued him, the lot served him for an arrest, the sea for a Mistres of constancy, the belly of a Whale, which should be his sepulcher, for a Palace. He came to the haven by ship-wrack, much more safe in the entrails of a fish, then in a ship. Behold Pharaoh, who becomes crafty, and thinketh by ruinating the Israelites, his Scepter is throughly established: God surprizeth him in subtilty and makes him know the oppression of this poor people, is the instrument of his ruin. A little child, which lieth floating on the waters of Nilus in a cradle of bulrushes, as a worm hidden in straw, and whose afflicted mother measureth his tomb with her eyes in every billow of this faithless element, is delivered from peril by the very bloud of Pharaoh, to turn the Diadem of Pharaoh into dust, and bury him all enflamed in a gulf of the Red-sea. Behold Jeroboam, who revolting against his Prince, raised a State by ambition, and a Religion out of fantasie, having seen the Altars crack with the horrour of his crime, yet his heart still remaining more obdurate then stone, in the end he is so chastised by the hand of God, that there was not left so much as one handful of dust of his house upon the face of the earth. Behold Absalom, who thought the means to mount up to a Throne, was to make a foot-stool by force of Arms of the crowned head of his father: yet see him entangled in a tree, transfixed with three spears, and thrown into a deep pit, which left nothing of him alive, but the memory of his misery. Behold Saul, who makes shew punctually to obey the law of God under the direction of Samuel,

Domus Jeroboam everso ob. & delata de super. persitæ tyranni. 1. Reg. 15.

Samuel, he afterwards learns to become cunning, plotting designs, and seeking in all points his own petty interests, but in the end David, whose life he judged incompatible with his own estate, dismounted him, using no other Police but by making himself an honest man.

Behold the Monarchies of the world so much disputed on, behold Scepters hanging on a silken thread, the Empires and lives of Otho, Vitellius, Galba, Pius Balbinus, Florianus, Basilius, Silvanus, Tacitus, Quintilius, Maximus, Michael Calopheres: Behold the fall of Parmenio under Alexander, Sejanus under Tyberius, Cleander under Commodus, Ablavius under Constantine, Eutropius under Arcadius, Virginius under Frederick, Brocas under Philip, Cabrera under Peter, and so many of the like kind.

Either you shall make your self wholly insensible or must affirm, that to raise a State, and build a fortune, you are to proceed securely therein, with a very great ty upon the maxims of faith, religion, and honesty, unless you will expect in the course of an uncertain life a most certain ruin. And yet you still doubt to enter into the City of good Policy. Oh, had you once tasted of those delights, you would become wholly enamoured of them, but I see it is fit, I make a piece of painting for you, to oppose that wicked policy

The fourth SECTION.

The Table of the City of God, otherwise called the City of honest men; drawn out of many excellent conceits of ancient Authours, and things practised in some former Common-Wealths.

I will tell you then, that I have seen in the idæa's of Plato his Divine Agathopolis, and that my mind is still much pleased with the remembrance of this spectacle. Expect not I should describe unto you the Country nor City with curiosity of language; for I leave that to poets and Oratours, who have more leisure then I. Onely I entreat you to beleive that all which delicate pens of antiquity have written of Elysian fields, and the fortunate Islands, are in it to be found, with many advantages, which we may much better conceive then express. The Heavens are there smiling, the air wholesom, the waters good, the seasons temperate, the winds calm, the ground fertile, the abode delightful, the hills and valleys watered with goodly fountains, shadowed with many trees, covered with vines, enamelled with flowers, tapistred with meadows, bristled with ears of corn; on what side soever you turn, it seemeth the Providence of God hath taken much pleasure to embellish this territory with his own hands.

I will not speak to you at all of the walls, Towers, Bulwarks, Bastions, Theaters, Amphitheaters, Colossusses, Edifices, and other the like; for herein this fortunate City hath not grounded its greatness, although there were to be seen buildings as admirable as if the Angels of heaven were come down on earth to undertake the direction thereof. I took it for a good presage, when I saw at the entrance of the City a great number of minds, modest, stout, and resolved, who went to the fountains to draw water, and bare the pitcher on their shoulders, as that ancient Rebecca, of whom it is spoken in Scripture, labouring like bees in a bright summers day. I saw over the gate of the City a great statue of the Sun in the sign of Libra, which made me suppose, that all was managed within it, as are the daies and the nights in the Equinoctial. I was nor deceived in the judgement I made upon it, for there were not so much as clocks out of order, in such sort, that they struck altogether, and mutually met at every hour of the day.

It was a contentment to me to walk on a pavement, even and smooth, and to behold streets very fair, where there was neither stench, dirt, channels, coachmen, caroch, nor lash of whips, smoak of roasts, criers, much tattle, running up and down, sinks, perfumes of Carpet-knights, waggish tricks, of lackeys, nor slights of cut-purses, proud gates of Rodomonts, nor leaders of Bears, nor Mountebanks, nor pettyfoggers, quarrellers, drunkards, ale-houses, nor any of those which draw tribute from humane flesh. The whole world there was busied, and there was not an idle boy: onely you might see children very yong, who played at a most innocent game, and bare in their childish faces the goodness of fathers and mothers, imprinted with an excellent character.

I learned, the principal scope of their great felicity was a most genuine simplicity, which reigned amongst all the inhabitants; not that they were stupid or witless, for according them, I soon perceived they had spirits clear-sighted, and well purified; but all their study was to make a harmony between their heart and tongue, and to proceed in all things they undertook with marvellous freedom: they were infinitely amazed when it was told them, there were in other countrys counterfeit men, who spake contrary to their knowledge, and thinking one thing in their hearts, affirmed the contrary with their tongues. They thought it impossible, and used comparisons of their clocks, where the wheel and the hand went ever a like pace. And when I insisted, and grounded my self upon experience of what I had seen and heard, they concluded it may well then be said, those men there are Spiritual Centaurs, composed of two natures.

And it being told them, there were Ladies and Gentlewomen in other Provinces, which wore sumptuous apparel, plaited, bumbasted, slashed, loaden with precious stones and chains, which had the spoils of the dead upon their heads, draw-bridges tyed to their feet, and that they bestowed a quarter of their lives in combing, and plaistering their faces: the women of this Country had much compassion hereof, and spake with tears in their eyes: Alass poor creatures! we may well say they have committed enormous sins, to carry them selves so. And when it was answered, the greatest ambition which these Ladies had in the world, was to use this custom, they made many signs of the Cross, asking whether they were innocents, they would not absolutely say, fools?

Hereunto was added a tale, that in the year of an universal peace, there was a Lady, who travelling with her husband into some other Province, had learned a certain manner how to beautifie her face, which she very curiously made use of, the rest perceiving it, caused her to play at King and Queen, which was a pastime, where the Lady, who became Empress by the custom of the game, commanded the rest what she thought good, and all yeilded obedience to her. The Empress chosen, imposed upon all her train to wash their faces, which this counterfeit woman being inforced to do, as the water dissolved the painting, and that she appeared as she was, the confusion of her forehead was so excessive, that she as it were died with grief, not daring afterward to undertake the like. Their attire, port, gate, countenance, words, houses, moveables, tables, recreations, were carried with simplicity, yet accompanied with majesty, civility, decorum, and seasoned with as true pleasures, as humane life may afford.

I saw many old men of an hundred years and upward, ward, who were yet very fresh, whereat I was much amazed; and one of them looking on me: Why, (said he) do you wonder? We live here in innocent mean, whereby it cometh to pass, that we do not so much as know the names of diseases, of which (it is said) you have by experience, which are the purchasers of your intemperance. We have here no desire to drive up our calculs, and shorten our days; we are altogether to be obedient to the Law, all rich in the contentment of our desires, and all pleased to have happiness one of another. We have no passion to tear our hearts, nor cares to prejudice our lives, nor avarice to burn up us alive in our houses, nor ambition to make our wings fastened on with wax, so to fly up to the Clouds, and make both Land and Sea famous by our fall. We have an excellent Law, which is never to proceed against the law of Nature; and to tell you the truth, the ignorance of sin, wherein we live, serves us better then all the precepts of virtue do others.

There is no war among us but against vices, which we labor desire to vanquish, then all sorts of monsters. We know not what Plagues mean, because we neither infect the Air nor Land with blasphemies, or blood. The seasons of the year have with us the same equality which our spirits enjoy, and the sun smileth on us in all his manners, as we endeavour to be in a charity perpetually smiling, and the bowels of compassion towards our like. When we would behold goodly Theaters, we retire into our memory the vanities of men, to bewail them so much as they are frivolous. We see but great spectacle of the world, which it is very hard to imitate, or to scorn it, in a crime.

The greatest eloquence among us, is truth, and the first science we teach our children, is that which instructeth them not to tell a lie. Above all, we endeavour piously to honour and serve God, uniting us to his Spirit, and submitting our ways to the mainstream of his Providence.

I stood very attentive to hear this old man speak: for I was in a good place; yet not contenting my selfe simply with what he had said, I needs would see their Churches, their devotions, their laws, and their justice, their commerce, and their policy. I saw the places dedicated to the service of God, were exceedingly well governed, observed, and frequented, and that their devotion was not a slight rote of apish tricks, nor affected countenances, but a solid belief of the Divinity with most pure affections. They had no great store of bells, nor took any pride to ring them, nor to publish festivals with much noise, nor to set up Fairs at the entrance into Churches, nor to sell jewels, nor wear rich apparel, nor to glory in their kitchins. Their great solemnities were better known by silence and devotion, then by any other exteriour ostent. It was a blessing to behold, that heresie had altered nothing, either in their doctrine or manners; for they had ever declared themselves enemies of all innovation: and as it is said that fishes are silent, and draw near to the source of waters; so they banishing frō their City all those contentious disputations, set their mouths to the fountains of verity.

Thither came at the time whilest I was there, an able man, who thought to preach Controversies to them, and difficult distinctions of School-divinity; but the better sort of French-men demanded whether he preached in Hebrew or no. They could not endure any one should perplex their consciences, by vehemently raising up an infinite number of too subtile arguments, and many times unhoneſt; so much they feared to bring any mixture upon their innocency, finding more assistance in the lights of good nature, then the subtilties of men.

I considered how at their going from Church, they went to visit goodly great Hospitals, which were excellently well founded, and administred for the help of the poor, as well forreigners as domesticks: and I saw the most curious Ladies went confidently into them with charity in their hands, humbling themselves to the services of the most indigent. This made me so enamoured of their government, that I judged it the quintessence of the same Theology.

And verily, when I sought to informe my selfe of their laws, I found they had as few, as their soundest men had medicines. They were all grounded on the doctrine of the Saviour of the world, namely on that word, which forbiddeth us to do that to others, which we would not to be done to our selves. Their state was Monarchal under the government of a good King, whom they honoured as a visible Divinity. This King had a Counsel composed of the prime men of the world, who lived like Angels, and spake as Oracles; so much reverence they bare them, that when they appeared in the streets, they were seen to pass along with a certain silence mingled with veneration, as if they had been animated Reliques.

I likewise saw old Captains grown white in forreign wars, under the shadow of Palm-trees, and a flourishing warlike troup, readily disposed to do bravely upon occasion. The obedience was there so great, that if a Souldier had his arm ready up to strike upon the first sound of retreat, he would withhold the blow. All rewards were for virtues, and Fortune much complained, that she in this Countrey had neither Altar nor credit. Very rarely should you see a man advanced, but by long and faithful trials of his merit: so that honours there were fastened, as it is said, with lime and cement, because they sought for nothing more honourable from great actions, then the contentment to have done them.

All was there so peaceable, that it seemed this whole City was the nest of Halcyons, which calmeth the brow of Heaven and appeaseth tempests. The Citizens entertained one another, as the fingers on the hand, every one taking part of the good of his fellow: and it was a matter as rare to see a quarrel, as a monster brought from the utmost limits of Africk.

Needs must I confess I took a singular content, when one day passing through a street, I heard two old men, who discoursed in their language of forreign Countreys, and the one said to his companion, that duels and quarrels were used there: the other would not believe him at all, thinking that two men who bare one and the same figure, could not contend one with another: but he persisted, and said he knew it to be true, and that the source of all their debates, was to say: It is mine, It is not: It is so, Yea, No. This narration so enkindled them, that they resolved to imitate those of whom they spake, and to have at least once in their lives a quarrel. But what endeavour soever they used, they would never confidently say, Yea, No. For as soon as one had pronounced, Yea, and began to make shew of contestation, the other said, Take it, I yield it. I leave you to think, whether any thing might be seen more pure then these souls.

This narration is found in the lives of the holy Anchorets.

In their commerces they so much feared to wrong their neighbours, that you would have said, they studied to deceive themselves, for fear to get from another; and if any one had gained ought by some mis-reckoning, he was halfe dead, and rose oftentimes at midnight to hasten to make restitution, it being otherwise impossible for him to enjoy any repose.

I saw their Palace, which was a very beautifull piece, but the manner of suits and processes were there very rare; yet had I notwithstanding a vehement desire to hear them plead, at which time it was told me, that the next day a notable cause was to come to a hearing.

I failed not to be present thereat, and saw two men of the same condition, like those of whom S. Chrysostom wrote the history, who pleaded for a treasure. The matter was, the one had sold his land, and the other had bought it. The seller quickly laid hold of his money, and the buyer being entred into poſſeſſion, had begun to till the field, to have corn from thence: but not thinking thereof, he found gold in it; for coming to plow the land, he made diſcovery of a great treaſure. But he, as much aſtoniſhed as if he had found ſome venomous creature, or ſome miſchievous piece of witch-craft, went directly to the ſeller to advertiſe him of what had paſſed, and wiſhed him to take his gold again: but the other being unwilling to underſtand him in that kind, caused him to be called before the Judges. This was a buſineſs then handled with ſo much concourſe of people, that never have I ſeen a cauſe ſo notorious. I had much ado to underſtand any thing of it, but certain broken words The plaintiff ſpake, How? Muſt men be uſed thus? You have ſold me a field, and not given me notice there was a treaſure hidden in it, why have you deceived me, why have you uſed ſuch foul play with me? The defendant lifted up his hands to Heaven, and ſaid: I ſwear and proteſt unto you by the faith of an honeſt man, that I did not this purpoſely. I ſold you my land in all ſimplicity, not having the leaſt ſuſpition that there was any treaſure. Well Sir, if you ſold it with a ſincere intention (ſaith the other to him) God pardon you, but I pray you come and take away your treaſure. He again: Why ſhould I take it? It belongs to you. The other: To me? What injuſtice is this! I bought land, and not gold. You purchaſed the land, anſwered the defendant, and all the appurtenances, it is reaſon that you poſſeſs all. The poor plaintiff replied, ſighing: Would you uſe me in this faſhion, and charge me with ſuch unhappineſs? Rather take your land again. I will not, ſaid his adverſary: it belongeth to you. Good God deliver me from ſuch an unfortunate chance, I will have care how I engage my ſelf in the like. In the end, the treaſure was adjudged to him that bought the land, whereat he was much troubled, ſo that his friends had buſineſs enough to comfort him.

Oh Age! Oh goodneſs! Oh golden povertie! How much art thou now eſtranged from our manners! I ſaw not there the Tornielle nor criminal proceſs; for crimes were baniſhed from thence, both by great ſeverity of laws, and the excellent diſpoſition of the people.

Every one was made to render an account very exactly of the means he had to live on. And there was a certain girdle, as that of which Nicholas Damaſcene ſpeaketh in his Policie, wherewith the juſt wideneſs of the waſt was meaſured; and if any one were grown too groſs, he had much ado to eſcape, unleſs he brought good witneſs that this happened not to him through idleneſs or exceſs of diet.

If a detractour were found, all his teeth were knocked out one after another: If a thief, melted gold was poured down his throat: If an homicide, he was put to be fed on by vulturs in an iron cage: If a blaſphemer, his lips were ſeared with a hot iron, and his mouth ſowed up: If a drunkard, he was put into a ſack and thrown into the water: If one unchaſte, he was burnt with a ſoft fire, ſuch horrour had they of vice.

Great volumes would be neceſſary to recount all the wonders of this celeſtial Agathopolis, which require ſome other ſcope then that which I have undertaken. I will content my ſelf to tell you for concluſion, that I ſaw in the middeſt of the Citie a great Pyramis of white marble, on which was ſet the ſtatue of Juſtice, cloathed with a robe all embroidered with ſtars, holding in one hand a book of laws, and in the other an ear of corn; about her were alſo pourtrayed in emboſſed work, truth, wiſdom, and the arts; and ſomewhat lower were beheld the ſtatues of all the great States-men, with certain excellent precepts of Policie, engraven in braſs; ſome copies whereof I have drawn out, which I, my Politician, deſire to impart unto you.

The fifth SECTION.

Sage Precepts drawn out of the Monuments of the divine Agathopolis.

HE is the greateſt States-man, who to himſelf ſeemeth the leaſt. Imagine not your greatneſs conſiſteth wholly to ſet up the Commonwealth of Plato and Xenophon in your own imagination, nor to lay together a huge heap of precepts, nor to know Cabals or myſteries, nor to make profeſſion of great ſubtleties and ſtratagems: we have ſeen by the experience of all Ages, that in affairs there is a certain ſtroke of the Divine Providence, which dazeleth all the wiſe, diſarmeth the ſtrong, and blindeth all the moſt politick, with their own proper lights.

Ordinarily the moſt unhappy in States have been thoſe, who have made the greateſt ſhew of knowledge, to deceive under humane Policie. That is it which ruined Jeroboam, which undid Saul, which overthrew the Common-wealth of the Athenians, and which made Machiavel with his great liſt of precepts to be diſaſterous in all his underſtandings. Theſe kind of ſubtile men better underſtand the myſterie of diſputation, then how to live, to diſcourſe then to counſel, and to ſpeak, then to do. They all have as it were three things much oppoſite to good counſels.

The firſt is, that they are variable, fickle, and uncapable of repoſe; which is the cauſe, that as the Sun ſometimes draweth up a great quantitie of vapours which he cannot diſſipate, ſo they likewiſe, by this vivacitie perpetually active, do amaſs together a great heap of affairs, which their judgment can never diſſolve. The ſecond is, that they ſwim in an infinite confuſion of reaſons and inventions, reſembling oftentimes bodies charged with too great abundance of blood, who through a notable exceſs finde death in the treaſure of life. The third is, that ſeeking to withdraw themſelves from common underſtanding, they figure to themſelves ſubtleties, and chymæraes, which are as the Towers of the Lamia (as Tertullian ſpeaks) on which no man hath thought or ever will; which is the cauſe that their ſpirit floating in this great tyde of thoughts, ſeldom meeteth with the diſpatch of an affair.

Add likewiſe to this, that God is pleaſed to ſtupifie all theſe great profeſſors of knowledge, and make them drink in the cup of errour, in ſuch ſort, that we coming to diſcourſe concerning their judgment, finde they have committed many faults in the government of Common-wealths, which the ſimpleſt peaſants would not have done in the direction of their own houſes.

This hath been well obſerved by the Prophet Iſaiah, when he ſaid of the Counſellours of Pharaoh: The Princes of Tanis are become fools, the Princes of Memphis are withered away, they have deceived Egypt with all the ſtrength and beautie of her people: God hath ſent amongſt them a ſpirit of giddineſs, and made them reel up and down in all their actions like drunken men. The holy Job hath ſaid the ſame in theſe terms: God ſuffereth theſe wiſe Counſellours to fall into the hazards of ſenſeleſs men. God maketh the Judges ſtupid, taketh away the Iſaiah 19. Job 12.

sword and belt from Kings, to engirt their reins with a cord: God maketh the Priests to appear infamous, supplanteth the principle of the people, changeth the lips of truth-speakers, taketh away the doctrine of old men, and poureth out contempt upon Princes.

Behold the menaces which the Sovereign Master pronounceth against those who wander from the true way; and therefore, my Politician, without perplexing your spirit with an infinity of precepts, which have been touched by a great diversity of pens, I affirm, that all which you may here expect, consisteth in four things, which are as foure elements of your perfection, to wit, Conscience, Capacity, Discretion, and Courage.

The first and most necessary instruments of all arts, and namely of this profession, is Conscience; which verily is the most ancient Governess of the soul, and the most holy Mistress of life.

It is that, which will instantly dispose you to the end, whereunto you are to pretend in the exercise of an office. It is that which will tell you, that having given your selfe to the publick, you are taken away from your selfe: that you must not enter into this Sanctuary of justice with a beggarly, base, or mercenary intention, but to aim sincerely at God, and the good of the Common-wealth. It is that, which will discover unto you those three wicked gulfs of ambition, avarice, and impurity, which have swallowed all spirits dis-united from God. It is that which will teach you, that what is done in Heaven, is proportionably acted in a Mathematical circle; and that which is done in the great Regiment of Angels, ought to be done in the Government of men. It is that, which will firmly support you on the basis of the Eternal Providence. It is that, which will render you next unto God, by often thinking on God, and will make you speak what you think, and do what you speak.

It is that, which will instruct you, that the spirit of man is like a Sun-dyal, which is of no use but when the Sun reflecteth on it; and that you likewise expect not your understanding may have any true light and direction for the Government of people, if not enlightned with a ray of God.

Besides, it will give you means to enter into a holy list of piety and justice, which are the two fundamental pillars of all great estates. Piety will assign you too sorts of devotion, the one common, the other singular.

Insuspicabilis secreti, reverendaque majestatis cognitio est, Deum non nosse, nisi Deum. S. Zeno serm de Nativitat.

The common will cause you piously to honour and serve God, you first having most pure and chast beliefs in that which concerneth true faith, without any mixture of curiosities and strange opinions: for it is a very great secret in matter of Religion, not to believe of God but what he is; and that man ever knows him sufficiently, who is holily ignorant of him, esteeming him infinitly to transcend his knowledges. Secondly, it will apply you to divine Worship and publick ceremonies, in a manner free, cordial, and Religious, for the satisfaction of your interiour, and the example of the publick.

Singular devotion will move you to consider, how being a publick person, and charged with affairs which expect the motion of the Divine Providence, you have a great dependance on Heaven, and that it therefore will shew you according to the proportion of your time and leisure, some hour of retirement to negotiate particularly with God, in imitation of Moses, that great States-man, who had so familiar a recourse to the Tabernacle. For if that be true which S. Gregory Nazianzen saith, that we ought to have God in minde, as often as we breath, it is so much the more suitable to States-men, as they have most need to suck in this life-giving spirit, as from the fountain of the Word, by the means of prayer.

Saint John Damascene in a Dialogue he made against the Manichees, holdeth this opinion, That the greatest Angels are as clocks, which come in the end to languish and faint, if God do not continually draw them upward by the breath of his spirit: so must we say, that the goodliest Spirits, and strongest Intelligences lessen and wax old every moment, if they resume not vigour in the intellectual source, by the virtue of devotion.

When you shall be instructed in these principles, this wise Mistress, whom I call your conscience, will make you finde in a right course the perfection of justice, which consisteth in four principal things.

The first is, neither to act, nor shew to your subjects the least suspition of evil or sin. For you must begin your government by your own example; and since your spirit is the first wheel whereunto all the other are fastened, it is necessary to give it a good motion. It is held, when the Sun stood still in the time of Josuah, the Moon and all the Stars made the like pause. Governours and Masters have this proper to themselves, that in all they do, they pour forth their spirits into such of their subjects, who are for the most part neither good nor bad, but by the relation they have to the life of those, on whom their fortunes depend.

Peccare & non obstare peccanti, summa astima. Dositheus. l. Italicorum.

The second is, not to suffer an evill, since, as said Agapetus to the Emperour Justinian, to commit and permit crimes, when one hath full power to hinder them, is as at were one and the same thing. There are no flatteries so charming, nor importunities so forcible, which should ever make a well composed spirit to bend to the permission of a sin, which he knoweth to be against the honour of God, and the tranquility of his conscience. Fabricianus a Roman Captain, in ruining a Fortress of the Samnites, kept their Venus, which he sent to Rome, for the beauty of the workmanship, and it is thought the aspect of this statue was the first occasion of making his wife an adultéress, and caused him afterward to serve as a victim to the loves of this unchaste woman by horrible massacre. It happeneth oftentimes, that Masters of families, who seem very innocent in their persons, retain scandals in their houses, through a certain pusillanimity and dissimulation, which draw upon them the chastisements of God, and disasters very extraordinary. The Scripture saith, the High Priest Eli was the lamp of God, before he was extinguished by a wicked toleration of the excesses of his children, which rent his house, and buried him in publick ruins. Take good heed there be not some houshold servant raised by your indulgence, who rendereth your favours odious, and liberalities criminal, by abuse of the power which you have put into his hands. Alkabicius the Astrologer observeth, there are stars of their own nature benign, and which would ever behold us favourably, were it not the neighbourhood of some others malign altered their sweet inclinations. And there are many Masters and Mistresses to be found in the world, endued with a humour exceedingly good, if the near approaches which bad servants make to their persons, did not destroy this temper.

1 Reg. 12. juxta 70 ὁ λιχνος αὐτ.

That man is truly stout and happy, who findeth or maketh men of honour well disposed, faithfully affected, industrious, vigilant, laborious, indefatigable, sober in speech, prompt in execution, patient and able in their charges; for good souldiers make glorious Captains, and good Officers, great States-men.

The third condition of the zeal of Justice is, that you never be pleased an ill act be done under the shadow that you were not of counsel thereunto, or that it never came to your knowledge. You may very well rejoyce not to have at all contributed to evil, yea, not to the birth of evil; for this were otherwise to betray your conscience, which ought to have the same capacity to abhor all vices, and embrace all virtues, as faith inclineth to believe all verities revealed unto it. I leave you to think, what conscience Sextus Pompeius of elder time had, to whom, as he entertained Augustus and Mark Anthony in his Ship, and being in the heat of his feast, a servant came to tell him, if so he pleased, he quickly would put these two Princes into his power, thereby to make him Monarch of the World: He a little while thinking on this matter, said to him who brought the news, Thou shouldst have done it, and never told me of it. This well shewed he bare some respect to fidelity, but was very far from that perfection which hateth evil, yea, even that which is out of the compass of one's own knowledge.

The fourth is, that you must correct disorders, as much as you possibly may, declaring you have a natural horrour against all sins, which resist laws both divine and humane, and that the love of honesty hath made you to pass, as it were, into your nature. I do not see where the virtue of a great States-man may shew it self with more lustre, then in the exercise of justice. S. Gregory the Great saith, A mixture of oyl and wine must be made to heal the wounds of men in such sort, that mindes may not be ulcered with too much severity, nor grow remiss by an excess of indulgence. The Rod must be used to touch, and the staff to support: love should not soften, nor rigour transport matters into despair. Moses the first States-man, burned inwardly with the fire of charity, and was outwardly wholly enkindled with the flames of the zeal of justice. As a loving father he offered his soul to God, even to the wish to be blotted out of the book of life to save his people: as a Judge he took the Sword and bathed it in the blood of Idolaters. He was in all kindes both a couragious Ambassadour, and an admirable Mediatour, pleading before God the cause of his people with prayers, and before his people the cause of God with the Sword.

Greg. in Job 29. Justitiâ firmatur solium. Prov. 16.

Evellus in excelsum unde magis vitia despiciat. Cassiod.

It is to do all, to execute good justice; God hath set you on high for no other cause, but to behold vices beneath: if you exalt them, they will trample you under foot, you shall perpetually drink the greatest part of the poyson you mingled for others; and when you shall break down the hedge, the Snake (as the Scripture threatneth) will sting you the first. When a good conscience hath accommodated you with this condition, so that you have no other intention but to advance goodness in your own person, and in those who belong to you, you are not a little advanced in the perfections of a great States-man; yet it is fit, Conscience, Science, and Capacity be had for the discharge of great employments, and especially by him, who makes profession to govern men sometimes as untractable as Hydra's of many heads.

Eccles. 30. 8.

Campanus Interamnensis Episcop.

Campanus Bishop of Terni, of whom we have some Works in the Bibliotheca Patrum, in the book which he composed of Magistracy, requireth four conditions in him: A wit vigorous, a carriage neither dejected nor unpleasing, a prudence full of maturity when there is occasion to consult upon an affair, and a promptness to take time in the instant, to execute that which hath once been well resolved on.

He saith a vigorous wit, for it is very fit the soul should be full of lights and flames which is to serve others for a guide: and as there is no wit so great which hath not many defects, so it is very necessary it be polished by good letters, which unite and incorporate in one sole man the faculties of many others, and by the conference of the wise, which taketh away all that which excellent natures do as yet retain of terrestrial, to make them appear in their best lustre.

A man, saith this Authour, who thinketh to know all, and do all, without having any need of the counsel of others, is necessarily of two things the one, either a God amongst mortals, or a beast among men. The Scripture speaking of the great Sea of brass, which Solomon made in the Temple, saith in the book of Paralipomenon, that it contained three thousand measures, and the third book of Kings affords it but two thousand. This seemeth to involve some contradiction, which Tostatus cleareth in saying, This great Vessel in truth amounted to three thousand measures, but that there was never poured out any more thereof then two thousand. So is it with the wits of men how capable soever, we are not to cloy them with charges and affairs so far as to exhaust them, but to divide but them in proportion, since there is none but God alone of ability for all. The presumption of those who will undertake above their forces, so to leave nothing for others to do, much more hurteth then would stupidity.

2 Parol. 15. 3 Reg. 7. 16.

He addeth, to wit, the shape of body, which is not a little recommendable in the stature, figure, port, gate, age, countenance, speech, and even in the very habit. All this when it is eminent, surpriseth mindes, and striketh its stroke to give estimation to a man before we enter into his interiour: but if the house answer not to the frontispiece, what may we else say, but that Nature hath built up a goodly Mansion to lodge therein a handsom beast?

Nigredo sanguinem regnantem discernit, & præstat humanæ genesi, ni de affectu Principi possit errari. Cassiod. Var. l. 1. Ep. 2.

What he hath said in the third and fourth place of prudence natural, and acquired, which some have to deliberate and well resolve on an affair, accompanied with a stout resolution and a very strict execution, is verily most necessary in a great States-man.

There are ordinarily two great Rocks in this Sea of affairs, which have in them oppositions very contrary in negotiation of things important. The one is irresolution, and the other obstinacy in opinion. Irresolution ever holds men suspended in the air, and tormenteth subjects who expect their dispatches and directions from the counsel of those who deliberate. Obstinacy through a false presumption of ability, will never forgo what hath been once proposed, and resembleth a rude Portress, which driveth all good advice from the house. One would not believe the hurt this last plague draweth upon all good counsels, and how hard it is to be cured. Verily it is a prodigy, that God, who discovereth from the superiour Vaults of Heaven to the bottom of the Abyss, the least Atoms of the World, and who is so clear-sighted, that Hell hath not darkness thick enough to hide it self before him; notwithstanding all-wise as he is, to dissolve our pride, he feigneth some repentance in his actions: but we, whose thoughts are timerous, sore-sights uncertain, actions confused, ostentimes have so much arrogance, as to be desirous to make good our faults, for fear to confess our errours.

minish authority, to do that which must be undone; for ever it is better to stifle a Monster in his birth which one hath begot, then shortly after to foment and nourish it with humane blood. Ahasuerus revoking the cruel Edict, which he made concerning the massacre of the Hebrews, yieldeth a pertinent reason thereof, saying, This diversity of decrees proceeded not from the levity of his spirit, but from the alterations of times, which make way for affairs that are treated.

As for execution which followeth deliberation, it is verily the hardest piece: for there are many to be found who deliberate, as the Rat in the Fable, to hang a little bell about the Cat's neck, to fortifie their Common-wealth against surprizes. Counsel is received by all with applause; but when they come to execution, every one turns his back. It is not to be imagined, how much a man who executeth affairs prudently resolved on, either of himself, or by such as are very trusty, hath eminence above others in matter of government. King Antigonus said, his warfare was rather a warfare of times and occasions, then Arms: and Polybius writeth, that the least things, which are done in war, are those which are handled with sword and violence; but the most eminent are executed by the knowledge, how fitly to manage an occasion.

Polyb. lib. 9.

Behold in a nearer degree the qualities which form the capacity of a States-man, not enlarging my self to speak here of others, especially of those that are put into the number of blessings, which the common sort attribute to fortune.

But a man may have all possible inclinations, and might notwithstanding be ever like those Musicians, who performed all their musick inwardly, no man hearing any of it outwardly, if he produced not himself in direction, which is the application of all the gifts of grace and nature, that a man can have for the practise and course of affairs.

Nil ille, nil cupidum Judices decet. Claras suas maculas reddunt, si illi, ad quos multi respiciunt, aliquâ reprehensione sordescunt. Cassiodorus.

This direction will teach you a marvellous secret, which is to proportion your self to time, place, persons, affairs treated, and to measure your self in such manner, that your actions may be profitable for all the world. It will bring you forth from behinde the Curtain, and advance you on the Theater, to see and to be seen reciprocally by all those who have eys. There it is, where you are not to present any thing that is sordid, dejected, proud, furious, light, fearful, nor passionate: for great fortunes have this property, to extrude all the blemishes of the heart into the forehead, and although much art may be used to hide one's self, they make a man appear naked, who never is well cloathed with habiliments of fortune, if he have not true ornaments of virtue.

What think you, if men be now adays so curious as to vaunt to see spots in the Sun, where will they not finde fault, especially if they have a subject given them? Great excuses serve for no other purpose, but to cover vice, which truth discovereth, and fame publisheth, with as many Trumpets as men have mouthes.

This sage advice will tell you, that it is not necessary you shewing your self in publick, must therefore make all your defects appear, and what ever you bear upon your heart, as if you had a breast of christal; but also that the way well to cover your passions, is to have none. I say not, you ought to be without resentments and inclinations: for as those places, where there is neither sound nor motion, savour ill; so souls thus deafned are not always the most purified: but I pronounce, you must so repress all motions which combat against reason, that they sparkle not in publick, both to your own disadvantage, and the ill example of those who behold you.

Philosophers have noted, that thunders which stir about break of day, are the most dangerous, and you shall observe if a man in the first rays of his dignity early discover covetousnes, love, hatred, revenge, avarice, and other passions, which much hasten to the prejudice of the publick, and that the voice of the people be raised up, as the roaring of thunder, he loseth as much reputation, as if he were already corrupted in minde.

Discretion will also shew you the way how to manage your dignity in a manner neither too harsh, arrogant, nor haughty, but sweet, affable, and communicative: and with it to retain an honest and temperate gravity, thereby to vilifie the character which God hath imprinted on those, whom he calleth to charges and commands.

It was a pleasant mockery to behold those Kings of Ægypt appear daily in new habits, with the figures of beasts, birds, and fishes, to put terrour upon the people, and give subject to Poets to make fables of Proteus. This affected gravity, is not in the manners of great men, who naturally love nothing of singularity above others, but the eminence of their excellent qualities. Our spirits are not so base and childish, as to be satisfied with semblances: they desire some thing more solid, and he is ever best esteemed among the wise, who is more respected for the interjour, then the outward seeming.

Discretion will discover unto you the conditions, manners, inclinations, abilities, and wants of those whom you are to govern, and with a finger shew you the bent, which way you must incline, to lay hold of men. It is at this day no small matter, to manage humours, which are as different as they are incompatible. The Problem of the Wolf, the Goat, and the Colewort, is daily renewed. If a Ferry-man finde himself much troubled to pass these three things severally from one side of the River to the other, that the wolf may do no hurt to the goat, nor the goat to the colewort in his absence: what prudence think you must a States-man have, to accord so many dogs and hares, hawks, and doves? Saint Gregory saith, Paradise hath nothing in it but blessed souls, and Hell is filled with miserable; but the world wherein we live, containeth Merchants very different. You shall behold under your government a great number of simple, innocent, poor, and afflicted creatures. Think God hath principally created you for them, open your heart with an amorous compassion, extend to them the bowels of your charity, stretch out affectionately to them your helpful hands, take their requests, lend ear to their cries, cause their affairs to be speedily dispatched, not drawing them along in delays which may devour them, strengthen your arm against those that oppress them, redeem the prey out of the Lion's throat, and the Harpies talons.

A notable practice given by King Theodorick to Cassiodorus.

Proprio vero su negotio fine invidiâ lucri, morum divitiis: ac retusisti: Et unde vix foles reportari patientia silentium, vero militavesunt tibi laudantium.

For this it is, that Kings, Princes, States, and Officers are made. To actions of this kinde is it that God promiseth all the blessings of Heaven, and admirations of earth. For this sort of processes are crowns of glory prepared. By this means a man diveth into the bottom of the heart and good opinion of people. This is the cause, that one hath so many souls and lives at command, as there are men, who the more sweetly breath air by the liberality wherwith they are obliged. The greatness of man before God, is not to replenish earth with Armies, & make Rivers of blood, and to raise up mountains of dead bodies, but to do justice to a poor Orphan, to wipe away away the tears of a forlorn widow, to steep in oyl (as the Scripture speaketh) the yoke of people which live on gall and worm-wood. For, not touching here any thing in particular, we know, that in all Realms of Christendom, there are very many persons, who sigh under necessities almost intolerable to the most savage, and who daily charge ears with complaints, and Altars with vows for their deliverance.

Now that we have a King so well disposed to justice, and near his person so sage a Counsel, a Parliament so zealous for the publick good, so many honourable men endowed with so sincere intentions, when may we reasonably expect the comfort of people, if not at this hour, when miseries are eminent, clamours piercing, and dispositions very good? Alas, if there be any thing in the world, wherein a great States-man may be seen to oblige the present, and replenish the future times with admiration of his virtues, it is in procuring the advancement of so holy an affair, for which Heaven is in expectation, and the hands of so many thousands of people are daily lifted up on Altars.

Such and so many Officers, for not having had any other aim in charges, but the accommodation of their own affairs, have passed away like phantasms, leaving nothing here behind them but ordure, nor bearing ought with them into the other world but crimes. They have found, that the souls of the wounded have cried to Heaven against them, and that God hath not let it pass without revenge, as speaketh holy Job in the four and twentieth Chapter, where he at large explicateth both the calamity of the poor, and the chastisement of the rich, who persecute them. But all those who have constantly addicted themselves to the maintenance of justice, and the consolation of afflicted persons, besides the Crowns which they enjoy in Heaven, live gloriously in the memory of men. Their mouthes, which are opened for justice, after they are shut up as Temples, are truly worthy to have lillies and roses strewed on the marble which encloseth them, and that their posterity may also reap the good odour of the virtues of their noble ancestours, which hath made it march with uprear'd head before the face of the people.

Animæ vulneratorum clamavêrunt, & Deus multum abire non patitur.

Regnanti facultas tunc sit ditior, cum remittit, & acquirit non illas thesauros fama, neglectâ vilitate pecuniæ Cassiod. l. 1. Epist. 16.

You on the other part shall behold travels and laudable actions, which good judgement will invite you to recompence; wherein you must shew your selfe generous and liberal. For, although virtue be always well enough payed with its own merit, yet must we affirm it to be one of the greatest disorders which may happen in a State, when in sowing benefits, nought else is reaped but ingratitude, and that to be capable of rewards, one must become remarkable in crimes.

On the other side, there will be many defects presented, that must be corrected, which are either of persons very well conditioned, fallen into some slight offence by surprize, and such as these ought to be handled with much sweetnes and clemency; or they are covert vices of some wicked consciences, which you neither ought, nor may as yet manifest; and here much industry and wisdom must be used to dislodge sin, and draw the winding serpent out of his den, as by the hand of the wise woman spoken of in Scripture: or they are publick sins of men resolved, who sin without hope of amendment to the infection of a Common-wealth, and here is it, you are to strengthen your self with all your power, to take away the evil, and evil men.

These are the precepts which S. Bonaventure giveth in his Treatise of the Wings of the Seraphin.

This discretion whereof I speak, will shew you the manner of proceeding in affairs, for it much importeth to lay hold of them by a certain handle which rendereth them much more easie. We see by experience, that those who make them spectacles of chrystal cut into diamond points, for one pistolet on a table, think they see a huge treasure, in such sort their eyes are filled with illusions, and yet their hand if they know not the secret, will be much troubled to finde out the piece of gold they seek for.

This daily happeneth in the course of the world: affairs have an infinity of faces, which present themselves to our thoughts even then, when they are most subtile; but they are hollow imaginations, and he is really an able man, who knoweth how to lay his finger upon the point of a business, and grasp it, as it said, at the right end.

You expect not here I should speak to you of the mannage of revenues, artillery, arms, sea-affairs, fortifications, petitions, and decrees, they being matters much alienated from my profession, from whence I can derive no glory but by the confession of mine own ignorance. Every one must look into the substance, extent, and the quality of affairs he treateth, must learn what is profitable to be known for the discharge of his place, inform himself of that which he cannot of himself fore know, willingly hearken to advices, examine and weigh them with maturity. Avoid above all, six obstacles of good affairs, which are, Disorder, Confusion, Passion, Sollicitude, Irresolution, Precipitation; to do all things warily, and peaceably, so that no anxiety be shewed, like unto Sejanus, a man who had more spirit then conscience, and of whom it is said, that in the middest of his greatest employments, he seemed ever idle.

Actu otiosus simillimus. Velleius.

There are some who give out many precepts upon every office, and do, as if one should make a large discourse to a man by teaching him to go. Experience, which is a wise Mistres, so soon as she encountereth with a man endowed with some capacity, sheweth him much more then books.

Finally, your last livery is Courage, which is exceedingly necessary for men of your profession. Callisthenes a disciple of Aristotle observeth, that the earthquake of the Isle of Delos, was an unlucky presage to the Cities of Buris and Helice, which were swallowed up in a gulf. So when the bodies of States-men, which are as this Island of the Sun, tremble and bow to favour, what may we expect, but an absolute desolation of Provinces? It is necessary to have a great courage to strengthen the arm against so great authority of iniquities, and violences of men of quality, who will confound elements, and mix stars with the dust of the earth to come to the end of their exorbitant pretensions.

A great courage, say I, to resist the secret allurements, which occur on the part of allies and friends, especially of powerfull women, to whom nature hath afforded such dangerous attractives, that it is many times much easier to defend ones self from the horns of bulls, the tusks of bores, and the throat of Lions, then from the cunning practises of such creatures.

A great courage in the manage of affairs, and words, that are to be used with certain persons, who are quickly angry and heated in their harnes: what a brave virtue is it to endure and temper them with a mildnes of spirit, peaceable, and charitable, as it is said, that with a honey-comb fountains of troubled water are cleansed and purified. An Ancient said, that he who can well ſuffer an injury is worthy of an Empire: his only ſilence will diſarm a paſſionate man, and throw proſtrate at his feet the ſame, who ſeemed to roar over his head.

See La journée.

A great courage alſo to tolerate the ingrateful, who often caſt ſtones againſt thoſe, who gave them honey: like unto thoſe Atlantes, who ſhot Arrows againſt the Sun.

A great courage likewiſe in the bad ſucceſs of affairs, which cannot always proſper according to the meaſure of our travel and good deſires. And to tell you it in a word, a very able courage, when a man is ready to ſuffer the loſs of office, diſgrace, baniſhment, poverty, impriſonment, and permit rather to have the heart turned out of your belly, then any good reſolution to be pulled from you, which may be conceived for the Weal-publick.

If you deſire to arrive at theſe precious endowments, let the Scripture be ever repreſented before your eys as the pillar of clouds and flames, which conducted the Army of the living God. There it is, where you ſhall learn Maxims of State, ſcored out with moſt vigorous reflections of the wiſdom of God, and where you ſhall trample under foot with a generous contempt ſo many illuſions, which wretched ſouls ſeek for in the mouth of Pythoniſſes and Sorcerers. Read the books of Wiſdom, the Prophets, the book of holy Job, and the divine Pſalms of the King, choſen out according to Gods own heart. Conſider the ſtream of ſo many Hiſtories written in this Theater of wonders, which are characters of fire, wherewith the Divine Providence is pleaſed to be figured to mortal eys, that we may learn the puniſhment of crimes, and the crowns of virtues.

Repreſent unto your ſelves often in your Idæa's thoſe great States-men, who have flouriſhed in the courſe of all Ages, and derive light and fire from their examples, to illuminate and inflame you in the ſelf ſame liſt. Behold him who had been refined above all others in the Schole of God, I mean Moſes. Who hath there been more humble in refuſing charges, more obedient in accepting them, more faithful in exerciſing them, more induſtrious in executing the commandments of God, more vigilant in government of the people, more ſevere in the correction of vices, more patient in ſufferance of the infirmities of ſubjects, and more zealous in the cordial love he bare to the whole world?

Moſes Dei de proximo arbiter. Tertul. de Monogamia. Auguſt. l. 22. contr. Fauſt. cap. 69.

With theſe gifts he became the God of Monarchs, he ruined the ſtate of his enemies, he unlooſed the chains of an infinite number of ſlaves, he opened Seas, he manured Wilderneſſes, he marched in the front of ſix hundred thouſand men at Arms, he lived laborious amongſt Shepherds, chaſt in the Courts of Kings, temperate in government, a companion of Angels in his retirement, and, as it were, a Cabinet-friend of God, having continually Heaven for object, and all greatneſs in contempt. He had blotted out all that which was man in him, by the purity of a converſation wholly celeſtial. The fleſh was in him under ſuch ſubjection, and the ſpirit in ſuch Empire, that he merited the name of God, in the reſemblance of whom he was transformed by the ſuperabundance of his virtues.

Omnem iſtam ſecundum corpus habitationem, cæleſtis puritate converſationis obduxerat, mentem regens, carnem ſubjiciens, nomine Dei vocatus eſt, ad cujus ſimilitudinem ſe perfecta virtutis ubertate formaverit. Amboſ. l. 2. de Cain & Abel.

Behold that great Diſciple of Moſes, Joſhuah: what piety in the ſervice of the Omnipotent, what ſweetneſs in government, what greatneſs of ſpirit in noble enterprizes, what patience in difficulties, what prudence in direction, what diſpatch in expeditions? It is no wonder if at the ſight of theſe eminent qualities, Walls and Cities fell, Giants waxed pale, Rivers retired back, the Sun ſtood ſtill, and one and thirty Kings under-went the yoke.

Behold Samuel, the Father, Maſter, and Judge of two Kings, the Doctour of Prophets, the Sanctuary of the poor, the pillar of the Church. Is it not a magnificent ſpectacle to ſee him go out of charge after ſo long a government, and ſo great a diverſity of affairs, with a heart ſo untainted, and hands undefiled, as if he had perpetually converſed with Angels? Is it not a moſt heroical action which he did in the firſt of Kings, when after the election of Saul, having voluntarily reſigned his dignity, he ſhewed himſelf with up-rear'd head in the midſt of the people, and gave liberty to all the world, from the leaſt to the greateſt, to complain and make information againſt him before the King newly choſen? If it may be found, that in his magiſtracy, he ever did the leaſt wrong to any man, he is there ready to afford all ſatisfaction that may be thought fit. But as he had lived moſt innocently, at this word was lifted up a loud cry, proceeding from a general conſent of the people, which highly proclaimed the integrity of his juſtice. Is not this a praiſe of more value, then millions of Gold and Empires?

1 Reg. 12. Loquimini de me coram Domino, & coram Chriſto ejus.

But above all, reflect often on the Wiſdom of God Incarnate, Jeſus Chriſt, the Saviour of the World, as the prime model of all States-men, which the Prophet Iſaiah hath exactly repreſented in the eleventh Chapter of his Propheſie, where he figureth the Redeemer unto us in quality of a Judge, to ſerve for an inſtruction and an example to all poſterity. Firſt, foraſmuch as concerneth his perfections, he gave him ſeven ſorts of ſpirits very conſonant to a true Politician, to wit, the ſpirit of Wiſdom and Underſtanding, the ſpirit of Counſel and Strength, the ſpirit of Science or Piety, and the Fear of God, wherewith he was wholly repleniſhed. Then deſcribing his manner of proceeding, he ſaith; He ſhall not judge according to humane appearances, by the inconſiderate views of carnal eys, and the relation of a raſh tongue: but he ſhall do juſtice to the poor, and fortifie himſelf with all kinde of vigour, for the defence of ſo many gentle ſouls, as are oppreſſed in the world.

To this purpoſe he ſhall ſtrike the earth with the words of his mouth, uſing his tongue as a rod of correction, and ſhall overthrow the wicked with the breath of his lips.

Juſtice ſhall be ſo familiar to him, that he ſhall make uſe of it, as of a girdle of honour, or a rich bawdrick which Captains were. The effects of his government ſhall be ſo eminent, that the Wolf under his reign ſhall be ſeen to cohabit with the Lamb, the Leopard with the Goat, the Calf with the Lion, and little children to play with Baſilisks and Aſpicks; willing in theſe Allegories to ſignifie, that he ſhall mollifie the moſt ſavage humours by his laws, to reduce them to the temper of reaſon.

Behold ſomewhat near, how this divine Writer deſcribeth the Policy of the King of Monarchs.

All thoſe who have inſiſted in his ſteps, have been glorious in the memory of men: and he that would number up through all Ages ſo many great States-men, ſhould make a large Volume.

I will not at this time produce Melon Injurioſus, Carmerus, Robert, Ansbert ſurnamed the Man of God, Oenus, Godegrandus, Ledwardus, Eginardus, Raoul, Fulbertus, Hildwinus, Monſieur Stephen of France, Guarinus, William of Mountaigne, Henry Arnaudus of Corgues, Rochfort, and the moſt famous Thomas More: not ſpeaking of ſo many other lights of Ages, which have illuſtrated us much nearer, where we may finde a large liſt of uncorrupted men.

Many

Many have so worthily filled the chairs of Justice, that they have deserved to pass forward to Altars, there to possess the prime places of Prelacies.

I satisfie my self to draw out of Marcianus, Cassiodorius, Baronius, and ancient Manuscripts, the life of Boetius, where you may observe the body of History sufficiently replenished with matters very considerable.

BOETIUS.

The first SECTION.

His great Nobility.

BEhold here how I make a great Statesman to walk along in his rank, the honour of the Gown, and the singular Ornament of the Purple Garment, who hath had the priviledge to revive Learning in his life, and at his death to bury all the Roman Greatness in his Tomb.

It is the most illustrious Boetius, whom I have selected almost in the first Ages of Christianity, as the most accomplished personage, that hath flourished in the quality of a man of the long Robe throughout Christendom. For if you consider his extraction, it was the noblest of his time: if you regard his means, he was of the most honestly rich; if you reflect on his wit, he dazeled the eys of the most Learned: if you behold his innocency, his life was as a Pearl without blemish; if you weigh his dignity, he had been three times Consul of Rome: if you enquire after his Negotiations and Government, you shall finde he lived in the greatest revolutions of the Roman Empire, when affairs were most thorny. If you will observe his constancy, you shall see a pillar of Diamond not to be shaken with all the counterbuffs of iniquity: and if a brave death may set a seal upon a good life, you will be enforced to admire him, beholding him to dye on a Scaffold, for the defence of piety and justice, which are the two Poles that support all the great Policy of this Universe.

The unhappiness is, there hath not been some Authour found in that Iron Age, to have written the acts of this great man in a stile suitable to his merit; we should have discovered marvellous treasures: but since I must make my way through so great a scarcity of Writers, who have handled this subject, I will endeavour to render it as little irksom in stile, as it is profitable in matter.

As for the first quality I have observed in him, which is his great Nobility, it is certain he summed up a thousand years, since his Ancestours began to be resplendent with singular lustre in the City of Rome, which is no small space, to say, that ten Ages which wast Rocks, and wear Elements, had not altered the honour of this great Family.

He was descended from the house of those great Manlii, whose hearts extended as far as the Roman Empire. The most celebrated amongst them, named Marcus Manlius, defended the Capitol against the Gauls in the extreme necessity of the Romans, & redeemed, as it were, from the abyss of the City, which God had chosen to command over so many nations. He was a man truly valorous, who wanted nothing but to have been born in an ample Kingdom, and not in a Republick jealous of the greatnes of its subjects: For, he having too much courted the people to the prejudice of Magistrates, was accused to have sought a change of government, and was precipitated from the Capitol which he had defended, to the end the theater of his glory might be turned into the scaffold of his punishment.

Never could any thing be seen more deplorable then this brave Captain, when pleading his cause, where he was upon question of his last unhappines, having produced about four hundred Citizens, delivered from great necessities by his means, then thirty spoils of noble enemies, whom he had slain with his own hand, then ten Crowns, then fourty other prizes of valour; as he beheld the incensed Judges much enclining to his ruin, he shewed his naked breast, as yet covered over with honourable scars received in so many great battels for his Countrey; and then turning his eyes and his up-rear'd hands to heaven towards the Capitol, he prayed the Gods to give the people of Rome the same understanding for the preservation of his person, that they had afforded him for the safety of the Weal-publick, in defence of the City of Rome.

This spectacle was so ravishing that it was impossible to condemn him in sight of this noble fortress, which subsisted not but by his valour: but his enemies causing him to be carried into another place, exercised a heavy judgement, and an act odious to posterity, which was attended by great sterilities and pestilencies, attributed to the death of this noble personage. The other Manlius very eminent, was he, who slew in single combat the Captain of the Gaules in sight of both the armies. For this man advancing himself on a bridge, assailed, and defended by both parts, challenged aloud the most valorous among the Romans to combat man to man; which being understood, Manlius slowly came forth with the leave of his Dictatour, and having well observed his adversary, who immeasurably braved it, he struck him so nimbly, that he fel down stark dead in the list: then taking his chain off all bloudy, he hung it about his own neck, from whence he was surnamed Torquatus; which Title did afterward likewise remain unto his whole posterity.

The third of this race much renowned in histories by an act, one of the severest ever exercised, was that Torquatus, who caused his sons head to be cut off, for having charged and vanquished his enemy without leave. The young man tickled with the honour of his Ancestours, seeing a fair occasion to fight, took the opportunity. And not expecting the permission of his father, overth ew the enemies of the Roman people, in killing with his own hands a man of note in single combat, whereupon ful of joy, he returneth with the applause of the souldiers, and hasteneth to seek out his father, who commanded the Army, bearing in his hands the spoils of his enemies, and saying aloud: Father, behold the cause why I may be esteemed your son. But the father turning his eyes away, caused the trumpet to be sounded to gather all the souldiers together, and in the middest of a great Assembly, as General, he pronounced sentence against his son, and said unto him: Son, Since without any respect, either of the dignity of a Consul wherewith the Common wealth hath honoured me, or the majesty of the title of a father, which nature hath afforded me over you, you have fought contrary to my edict, dissolving the sacred knot of military discipline, which hath hitherto maintained the greatnesse of the Roman State: I will see you have reduced affairs to such necessity, that either I must forget the Common-wealth, or my self and mine. But God forbid the publick suffer for our faults, and that we must expiate the temerity of one young man, by the disasters of so many innocent persons. Here an act of State must be performed, which is for the present somewhat odious, but shall be profitable for youth through all posterity. My son, I have sense of nature, as a father, and as a Captain I resent also the flashes of this youthful virtue, which is so charming in its illusion: but since I must either by your impunity annul, or by your bloud seal the commandment of the Consuls; you being of my bloud, I cannot think you so degenerate, as to deny to re-establish by your punishment the Laws of arms, which you by your errour have destroyed.

Thereupon he commanded the executioner to bind him, and lead him to the place of punishment, to be beheaded, wherewith the Assembly was so astonished, as if all the Captains had their heads under the same sword. For every one was drenched in a deep silence, until the bloud of this young prince was seen to gush forth; for then the souldiers spared neither sorrow nor execrations, taking the body by main force to cover it with its spoils, and interre it with all honour.

I had a desire to touch this particularly, thereby to teach the Reader, that the great constancy which Boetius witnessed in the whole course of his life, and especially at his death, was in him hereditary.

It were a long piece of work for him, who would prosecute all the acts of the Ancestours of Boetius; since by the report of Saint Hierom, this family hath been so illustrious, that scarcely can one man be found therein, which hath not enjoyed or deserved the Consulship.

Wherefore I may well say, it was a very particular Providence of God upon this admirable man, which being pleased to raise him to the condition of a great States-man, hath caused him to be nobly born. For although it cannot be denied, but that many descended from very mean extraction, have sometimes exceedingly well improved in the mannage of States; yet must we affirm, they have stood in much need of time, diligence, and eminent virtues to give a counterpoise to this defect of bloud. Ordinarily those who arise from these degrees, being derived from base birth, are many times envied, and little respected, whereby finding themselves offended, they often take harsh ways, to become powerful in the minds of subjects by strong hand: whereas such as are of race noble and illustrious, cannot have so few other parts, but that they may easily enter into hearts, as into a house, which the virtue of Ancestours hath beforehand wholly purchased for them. And though this seem expedient in all places, yet it is much more necessary in a State, where is a great number of noble men and generous spirits, and where every one thinks himself sufficient enough to perform that which another doth.

Presumption equalleth them all in ability, at the least according to their imaginations, were it not that the uncontroulable supereminency of houses makes them yield to reason. And although base nobility be very shameful, yet is it much more tolerable then a servile spirit, which hath power in its hands without any moderation,

There are four things, saith the Wise-man, which cause earth-quakes here below, A servant imperious, a rich fool, a woman scornful when she is married, and a maid-servant become the heir of her Mistres: that is, saith he, the fourth thing which the world cannot endure. Education maketh manners, and Prov. 30.

every one is readily that which he hath learned in youth, were it not, that through a great ſtrength of courage ill inclinations are reſiſted.

Boetius, who in his excellent Nobility was endowed with ſo ſweet a temper of ſpirit, ſeemed to be created of God to govern men. On the other part his family, which was rich and powerful, gave alſo much encreaſe to his command, as that which alienated him from the corruptions, that eaſily faſten on a neceſſitous fortune. A man who feareth poverty, is ever to be feared, and a rich innocent cannot meet with any thing more dangerous then a hungry Judge.

Saint Thomas hath ſaid very well, that a poverty virtuous and free from all covetouſneſs, is an admirable quality for a States-man: but where ſhall we now adays find ſuch a poverty, in a time, when riot is ſo exorbitant, that the greateſt houſes are therewith impeached? The innocent riches of our great Conſul fell out to be much to the purpoſe, ſo that they might be employed for aid of the poor, in a time which happened in one of the ſickleſt Ages of the world, ruined by ſo many incurſions of Barbarians, not naming the other ſcourges, which then fought againſt the ſins of men.

Lib 4 cap. 1 de regim Princip.

The ſecond SECTION.

The eminent wiſdom and learning of Boetius.

EXperience, the wiſeſt Miſtreſs of the world, hath ſometimes cauſed the ſaying of Plato to be queſtioned, who thought Common-Wealths happy when they fell into the hands of Philoſophers, or of men who fought to become Philoſophers. For in effect it is obſerved, that thoſe ſo knowing men meet not always with the bent of common underſtanding, having their ſpirits more eſtranged from civil life. They pleaſe themſelves with great Idea's as if they converſed in the Common-wealth of Plato with demy-gods, not at all yeilding to infirmities of nature. And although they uſe ſome endeavour to render themſelves converſable, yet doth the ſweetneſs of repoſe inebriate and withdraw them from affairs: but if they force themſelves to attend them, noiſe amazeth them, diverſity of humours not always ſuitable to their underſtanding diſtaſteth them, labour ſomewhat painful overwhelmeth them, and the heap of ſo many incident occaſions confoundeth them.

Add hereunto, that there is much malice in the manners of men, not found in books; and that their actions being very innocent, when they come to meaſure others by their own level, they find themſelves deceived. Beſides, the ſedentary and retired life ſpent in the entertainment of their books, rendereth them very timorous, & ſofteneth their brow, which ſhould always be as it were of braſs, to endure the ſhock of ſtrong impudencies, which may inſinuate themſelves into the corruptions of the times.

This may be confirmed by the example of Theodates King of the Goths, who with all the Philoſophy of Plato, wherein he was exceedingly ſtudious, very ill managed his affairs.

As alſo by Michael the Emperour, ſurnamed of the Grecians, Parapanicius, as who would ſay, The Schollar: for he perpetually had table books and pens in his hand, to compoſe Orations, Verſes, and Hiſtories, reſigning the whole government of his affairs to an Eunuch, named Nicephorus, who through his inſatiable avarice drew much hatred upon the head of this Emperour.

I verily affirm, if you take learning in theſe exceſſes, one may very well ſay, that it would not only become unprofitable, but alſo dangerous to principality. It is not my intention to prove learned men are capable of the manage of great affairs for the onely conſideration of the advantage they have in letters, for then Governours of Provinces were to be taken out of the Regencies of ſcholes; but I ſay, that ſciences well managed, add a marvellous luſtre to one in government. For firſt, they vindicate him from ſtupidity and a ſavage life, which maketh a man without ſight or knowledge of virtue, to be in a State, as was Poliphemus, made blind by Ulyſſes, in his den. Beſides, they cleanſe, refine, and ſtore the ſoul, made to know great and divine lights. Afterwards, they open the underſtanding by the reading of ſo many excellent books, and even unlooſe the tongue, which is an inſtrument very neceſſary to manage hearts. Finally, they make a man more mild, civil, and courteous, and I could ſay alſo more awful and worthy of credit.

For if ſome unhappy Princes were produced, who being unfurniſhed of other talents, have made ill uſe of letters, by abuſing them through want of judgement, as one may all the beſt things in the world; this nothing at all in ſubſtance leſſeneth the truth of our propoſition, ſince we may oppoſe againſt them a large liſt of Law-makers, Princes, and governours, who have exceedingly well made uſe of the knowledge of learning. For if we make account of the policy of God, which is ever the moſt aſſured, know we not, that he having choſen Moſes to conſtitute him the Governour of ſo great a State, was willing he might have a good taſt of all the ſciences then in requeſt among the Ægyptians? And Philo ſaith, that he there learned Arithmetick, Geometry, Muſick, and all the greateſt ſecrets of their Philoſophy, contained in their Hieroglyphicks. Know we not that Solomon had a heart as large as the ſea, wherein God lodged ſo many knowledges of things both divine and humane, that he penetrated whatſoever the underſtanding of man, enlightened with rays from God, might comprehend?

Are we ſo little verſed in Hiſtory, that we cannot reckon up the names of all the greateſt Princes, who have been very learned, as Alexander, Julius Ceſar, Auguſtus, Adrian, Antoninus, Conſtantine, Theodoſius, Gratian, Charlemaigne, Alphonſus, yea even Solyman the great Turk? What a cloud of witneſſes ſhould we have, did we now collect all the names and hiſtories of learned States-men? For if letters give ornament to ſuch as are wholly eminent in military profeſſion, by a much ſtronger reaſon we are to think they are able to advance the luſtre of an excellent Governour, vowed to the Robe, and to a life peaceable, as Seneca and Cicero.

I have been the more willing purpoſely to uſe this Preface, to the end that coming preſently to ſpeak of the great learning of our Boetius, it might not diminiſh the credit we ought to have of his ability in ſtate-affairs. It is ſometimes ſo dangerous to be learned among groſs ſpirits, that the tenth Age, which was very dul, made as it were the good Pope Silveſter the ſecond, paſs for a Magician, becauſe he underſtood Geometry. And it is not above foureſcore years ago, that to know Greek and Negromancy, were as it were one and the ſame thing in the opinion of the ignorant.

Vide Baron. Anno 999.

He that proceedeth by ſuch brutiſh ways, would take Boetius for a Devil, ſuch knowledge had he; for it muſt be confeſſed, that in the revolution of ſo many ages, there hath not been many ſeen, who arrived rived to such a degree of science. As our spirits are limited, so every one freely taketh his share, according as his inclination leadeth him, his aim moveth him, his understanding transporteth him, his labour supporteth him: and he that cannot prevail in one science, applieth himself to another, since the diversity of arts is so great, that it is able to satisfie the most curious, allure the most nice, and encourage the weakest. But as for our Boetius, he entred into the secrets of all sciences, and as there was nothing too holy for his great virtue, so might not any thing be found so elate, as to exempt it self from the vivacity of his spirit.

Scalig in Hypercritico.

Julius Scaliger hath very well given testimony of him according to his merit, when he said, the wit, learning, industry, and wisdom of Severinus Boetius, challenged all the Authors of the world as well Grecians as Latines, not excepting any. He addeth, that all which he composed in Poesie was divine, and that nothing might be found either more elegant or grave; in such manner, that the abundance of supereminent conceits choacked not the grace, nor curiositie took any think from the propriety thereof.

And whereas he writeth, that his prose seemed not equal to the verse, but retained somewhat of the barbarisme of that Age, I assure my self Scaliger may have taken some works falsly attributed to Boetius, as there are in the great Mass compiled under his name, which have likewise deceived Cardinal Baronius, who imputeth the book of the Discipline of Schollars to him, which is one of the most silly pieces that could come from a man alienated from common sense.

Among other things this Author saith, that he hath been in the City of Julius Cæsar, called Paris to take the air, and that he there hath seen many bad schollers, discoursing of Nations, and giving a face to the University, as it had in later times; which will seem ridiculous to every one who shall consider the life of Boetius, and the times wherein he flourished. It is no wonder, if those who have admitted such works for pieces of Boetius, not through want of judgment, which hath been in these two personages, whom I mention, very great, but for fault of giving time to examine them, they there have found matters, which with them have lessened the opinion of such an Author.

But this is very certain, that all which is extant of this brave Writer, hath in it vigour, grace, purity, spirit, and excellent good consequence: as appeareth in the books of Consolation. As for the rest he hath not so confined himself in this great eloquence, but that he entreth into the most profound questions of Philosophy and Theologie: and should he have no other honour, but to make Aristotle first speak Latine, who was unknown in the West, I should make much more account of him, then if he had raised Orpheus up again with his Harp. The great knowledge he had of Geography, Arithmetick, Musick, and all which concern the Mathematicks, was the cause when any one stood in need of some piece of wit, they went presently to Boetius, as the onely man of the Empire, who was esteemed a true Liberary, animated with the spirit of all Arts. It is a pleasant thing to read what the King Theodorick wrote to him in requiring a dial of him, to present it to the King of Burgundy. Behold the words of his great Secretary Cassiodorus.

It is not reasonable to contemn the requests which Kings our neighbours with all confidence make unto us, and especially when they require some slight things, which they account in the number of great treasures, it happeneth often times that the dalliances and conceits of wit obtain that by sweetness, which arms cannot gain by force. If we needs must play, let us so use the matter our sports may be made for the good of the publick, and let us search for things serious even in pleasures. The King of Burgundy intreateth of me with much instance two dials, the one circumvolved with water, the other with the sun, and he prayeth me to send skilfull masters to shew him this invention. Let us afford entertainment to this Nation, to the end they may hold those things for miracles, which we here dayly use for recreation. I understand the report which their Embassadours have made of these and the like workmanships, which hath much amazed them, as a thing very extraordinary. Now I know you are so accomplished in all sorts of sciences, that you have tasted in the fountain of all the industries, what others seek to practise by rote. For you, for this purpose, remained in the University of Athens, and have so fairly allied together the Romane robe with the Grecian mantle, that their doctrine by your means is become wholly Latine. You are ignorant of nothing that is in the speculative, nothing which is in the practick, and all that, which the Athenians would attribute to themselves of singularity, you have transported into our City of Rome. Your translations have made Ptolomy the Astrologian, Nichomachus the Arithmetician, Euclid the Geometrician, Plato the divine, Aristotle the Logician, Archimedes the Mathematician, to speak Latine. All sciences dispersed among so many men, and so many wits, through all ages, are in you altogether united: you have interpreted them all with such perspicuity of discourse, retaining the propriety of language, that should these Authours return to life again they would prefer your translation before their own originals.

Afterward he enlargeth himself upon the praise of the Mathematicks, then returning to his diall, he saith, it is an admirable thing to see, that a little immoveable steel every day performeth as much way as the sun, and that if the stars had understanding, they would envy dials, and return back again, for fear to be surprized by this pretty sport of men, the hours would be ashamed, that being the daughters of the day and night, they were painted with shadows. In the end, having given full scope to his wit, he concludes, and saith: I pray you send us two dials so soon as you can, to the end you may be known by the figures of your spirit, in a Country, where no man shall see the print of your foot-steps. I would have them understand that our Senatours here are as learned as Doctours, that they may admire your inventions, and esteem them as dreams, so that being awakened, they may confess they have nothing comparable to us.

Fugam solis aquipparat, quod motum semper ignorat, Invideret tabellis, si astra sentirent. Vbi est illud horarum de lumine venientium singulare miraculum, si has & umbra demonstrat? Cassiodorus, l. variar. Epist. 45.

Cassiodorus amassed together all the strength of his wit, when he was to dispatch letters to Boetius in the behalfe of his King. Witness whereof yet is that other excellent Epistle of Musick, where we learn that our great King Clodovæus, having demanded a singular Player on the Lute of Theodorick, who then reigned in Italy, address was presently made to Boetius to chuse him, with a magnificent letter, which still retaineth a notable testimony of his ability.

Cassiodorus variarum 16. Epist. 40.

Angelus Politianus, who had throughly read him, holdeth opinion, that there is nothing to be found more sharp then He in Logick, more subtile in the Mathematicks, more rich in Philosophy, nor more sublime in Theology, adding the judgment of Albertus Magnus, and of S. Thomas, who have commented upon his works, and assuring us that his sentences were all as it were without appeal. Laurentius Valla calleth him the last of the learned, thereby willing to say, that all the glory of the excellent wits of antiquity, was buried with him.

But why go we about to search out the testimonies of Authours, since we have still some of his true works in our hands, which are the mirrours, wherein the wit of Boetius makes it self to be seen with more advantage to all posterity? It may be said, he had too much Philosophy for a States-man, but the bird is not burdened with her feathers, no more then the tree with his leaves and flowers.

What

What wrong hath he done to the City of Rome, if when he saw himselfe to be taken from the Common-wealth, and in tearmes where he could not assist it with his counsels, he honoured it with the riches of his wit, charming the sharpnesse of troubles with the sweetnes of his retirement, and giving an account to posterity of the time which he husbanded for it?

The third SECTION.

His entrance into the government of the State.

I Will willingly leave all digression to come to my project, & seeing the life of Boetius furnisheth us, not with many slight matters, wherewith ordinarily volumes are stuffed, when men desire to distend them beyond their merit, I rest on negotiations of government, which shew a man as well as doth the needle the-hours upon a true clock.

Boetius happened in a time, which gave him an admirable list to combat in, with firm footing against vices the most applauded, and to place his virtues in the bright splendour of light, not holding them still imprisoned within the precincts of a library.

Behold here a strong adversary, that fortune put upon him, which exercised his constancy in rough affairs, and caused him in the end to pass by the dint of sword, ending a brave life by a Tragedy very bloudy, no whit abating his noble courage.

This is a history which verily hath given occasion of much horrour to spirits the most strong, and execration to mouths the most innocent, to detest the tyranny of a barbarous sword, purpled with the bloud of an honourable old man, by whose mouth all learning, and the best maxims of State did speak. It is necessary, my Reader, well to deduce this narration, you first understand the humour, qualities, fortune, beginnings, progress, and the end also of this Persecutour.

You must therefore understand, that the City of Rome, which counteth its age, and continued before the Cæsars seven hundred years, and after Augustus, who was the first Emperour, about five hundred twenty three, and generally from the foundation thereof, one thousand two hundred twenty nine, was at that time involved in very great perplexities, the Emperours living then the age of flowers, and driving one another, as waves, to be broken against the rocks.

One Nepos elected to the Empire, chose for his Constable a man called Orestes, who sought to take the Purple from his Master, to give it to his son, and verily he caused him aloud to be saluted Cæsar, and set the Diadem on his head, surnaming him Augustus, though afterward for contempt, the name of Augustulus was given unto him.

It is a fatal blow from the providence of God, that the Empire of the West, which begun by an Augustus, must receive end by an Augustulus: as that of the East, having commenced under Constantine the Great, concluded afterward in the person of Constantinus Dragosus, vanquished by Mahomet.

Nepos seeing himself betrayed by him in whom he most confided, sent for Odoacer King of the Heruli to his aid, who like the wolf in the fable reconciled the dogs that worried one another, by eating them. For he defeated these two contesting Princes, and seeing himself march in the fair fields of Italy with sword in hand, attended by strong Legions, the great weakness of the Empire, so many times overwhelmed by civil wars, being unable to oppose his designs, he being entreated to help a friend, payeth himself by his own hands, and makes himself Master of his possessions: experience ever teaching us, that forrain charities, have fingers some-what crooked to lay hold on that, which they make shew to succour.

The Emperour Zeno, who reigned in Constantinople, understanding all this goodly business, dispatcheth Theodorick into the West, to make head against this usurper: whether he had a purpose to throw the apple of discord between those two strangers, who in too near a degree closely courted his estate, to make them devour one another, or whether that he cordially loved this man, and that to oblige him, not hurting himself, he freely gave him a matter desperate, he armed, and supported him with gold and strength, to raise him to that throne, not having at that time any will thereunto.

This Theodorick was bastard-son of Theodomire King of the Goths, born of a concubine called Aureliana. His father who sought for land, which is very easily found out for a tomb, had much afflicted the Eastern Empire, oft-times making inrodes even to the gates of Constantinople; whereat Leo the Emperour, who then reigned being somewhat amazed, endeavoured to gain him by some honest composition, which was done: and the more firmly to bind this accord, Theodomire sent his little son Theodorick, who was not above eight or nine years of age, in hostage to Constantinople. The Emperour beholding him to be of a good disposition and a brave courage, very heartily loved him; and afterward Zeno, who succeeeded both to the Empire and affections of Leo his father-in-law, much esteemed this young man, who arrived to maturity of age, served him most couragiously in brave expeditions of war against the Gepides and Bulgarians, sworn enemies of the Empire.

This occasion whereof we speak being offered, Theodorick flyeth like a Merlin to his prey, and leaving the Court of Constantinople came into Italy, attended by gallant troups, to decide the matter of Empire and life with Odoacer. He being ful of fire, handled his adversary very roughly, and defeated him in three battails, making him forsake the field, and inforcing him to immure himself in Ravenna, where he beseged him, for the space of three years resolved either to loose his head in Italy, or encircle it with a Crown at Rome.

The father Theodomire being already deceased, his mother the fair Aureliana, who had reigned in affections, entertained an insatiable desire to command over the most important part of the world, and being then in the field, she spared not to excite the souldiers, and advance a spur of fire very far into the heart of her son: whereupon it is recounted that Odoacer, after so long a siege, being reduced to an extream scarcity of victuals, and seeing he could not any longer subsist, resolved to seek in the hazard of arms, the remedy which he could not finde in his languishment. He espied a time, when the assailants tired out with so long a resistance, seemed now to relent, so that by the benefit of a fair night he made a sally with his whole army, composed of people hungry as wolfs, and resolved to conquer or dy in this last battel. Their sally was so furious and unexpected, that Theodorick, who was otherwise a great Captain, seeing the astonishment and disorder of his souldiers, betook himself timely to flight, when this Aureliana his mother, moved with an ardent ambition, which gave her courage above her sex, came before him, and taking him by the hand had confidence to say: My Son whither go you? you must of two things do out, either fight, or return into the womb of your mother. You have, as far as I can perceive, the enemy at your back, and fear on your forehead: turn your head against the one, and you shall chase away the other: If you persist in this flight, I will rather make a wall of my body to stay you, then render my selfe a confederate of such an obloquie.

It is a strange thing, that the words of a woman were stronger then the sound of trumpets, arms, flight, and the black apprehensions of death. This young Prince, changing his fear into a generous shame, speedily rallyeth the troups that were best resolved, and hasteneth to fall upon his enemy, with such violence, that his souldiers seemed so many flying Dragons, who handled their matter so well, that the valiant Odoacer, notwithstanding his best endeavour, was constrained to retire into Ravenna.

Some time after, seeing his enemy was invincible, he caused him to be sought unto for peace, on such condition, that they should between them, divide the Kingdom of Italy, to which Theodorick, whether that he was wearied out with so long a war, or that he hoped the more easily to joyn the skin of the fox to that of the Lion, willingly consented to this counterfeit peace. The agreement signed, he entered into Ravenna, and these Princes, who were both very brave souldiers, embraced before the face of two armies, mutually preventing each other with all manner of courtesie.

But, oh good God! what cement was ever found able enough to entertain ambition and amity in one constant state? and what world hath at any time been wide enough to lodge two ambitious men without a quarrel? Their conversation too frequent, first sowed contempts and insolencies among souldiers of different Nations, afterward jealousie crept into the hearts of the Captains, and distrust into the souls of the Sovereigns, who beheld and observed one another, as expecting who should first begin.

Theodorick, whether he sought for some pretext, which ever is soon enough found out to colour the greatest mischiefs, or whether he understood of a design intended on the part of his enemy, imagined the earth was not large enough to give elbow-room to his ambition, whilest Odoacer shared the Throne with him; that there was but one sun necessary in heaven, and one King in a Countrey; that he could not endure a Crown made crescent-wise, but that it was very fit, he should furnish out the roundness of its circle; and for the rest that man would sooner be King, who first prevented his adversary.

Hereupon he resolved on a horrible assassinate: for feigning all friendship and affection, he invited Odoacer to a magnificent feast which he had prepared for him to be the last of his life. It is a great matter, that there must be a bait alwayes to surprize men and birds, and that the greatest disasters ordinarily happen in the sports and banquets, when sensuality predominateth, and reason is ecclipsed. This miserable King of the Heruli, made it well appear by his over-much confidence, that he had not so much mischief in him, as was afterward imputed to his ashes; for he very joyfully went to this banquet, accompanied with his son, and all the principal of his Kingdom, and walked along with great alacrity, having no other intention but to make war against dishes, and nothing less then at that time to entertain purposes of blood and murder. The resolution notwithstanding is taken to make them all pass by the dint of swords, in a place the most delightfull, where pleasures seem to make men as it were newly born. They entered into a great hall most magnificently furnished, and sat down at the table; there was no speech in the beginning, but of mirth; the spirit disbanded, thinketh on nothing but objects of pleasure, when instantly the signal was given, and the Goths drew swords purposely out to offend the most sober patience of the Heruli. They answered again what choller and wine suggested: Theodorick stood up, and taking his sword slew Odoacer with his own hand; the rest fell upon his son, and the Princes of the Kingdom. Never was there seen banquet of Centaures and Lapithes more unfortunately expressed. Tables and men were overwhelmed, wine ran mixt with blood, the dreadfull cries of the dying made those tremble who were far enough out of danger, and gave matter of pity even to hang-men; yet for all this not a man was spared; the bodies mangled and bloody were cast one upon another, and the poor souls issued forth in the midst of massacres and surfets to yield an account in the Court-hall of Heaven.

Sigonius l. 5. Occidentali de imperio in fine.

So an ancient manuscript observeth it, found in a library at Rome.

What horrours of the abyss, and furies of Devils see you here? I would know, whether there be any beast in the world that had heaped together in one sole body, the enraged hunger of wolves, the subtlety of foxes, the strength of Lions, the cruelty of Tigers and Panthers, the poison of Basilisks, whether it may be more dangerous to man, then himselfe, when he is possessed with a mischievous ambition.

Oh how happy would the lives of men be, were they not infected with these venemous passions, which transform reasonable nature into more hideous monsters, then those which Poets have set over the gates of hell. We shall see in the sequel of this history, how wickedness never escapeth the eye of God, and that if he come with feet of lead to chastise it, he notwithstanding hath an arm of iron, to cut up treacheries by the root.

This murder divulged, the Heruli took arms to revenge their Prince, but the Centinels disposed in many places of the City, hewed those in pieces who shewed themselves most forward.

Theodorick made a declaration very ample, wherein he expressed, that that which caused him to resolve on such an action, was nothing but the security of his person, against which Odoacer had a most evident design, which would instantly have appeared in the deprivation of his life and estate, had he not with all diligence prevented his enemy. That he did, what the law of nature ordained, in so manifest a danger, but that he will hence forward witness all manner of clemency to such as would throw themselves into his arms, indifferently stretched out to accept the obedience of all the world.

The great distast of war every one had at that time, the little hope the most mutinous conceived to revenge their quarrell, and the authority of Zeno the Eastern Emperour, who ceased not to support Theodorick, caused a great silence in arms, and afforded full liberty to this ambitious King of the Goths, to become Master of Italy.

As for the rest, he seeing Rome was then as it were like a great oake overthrown, where every one hasteneth on all sides to get the spoil, and that the French, Visigoths, and Burgundians might aspire, as he, to the conquest of Italy; he made alliances with all those Princes, and especially with Clodovaeus, who at that time reigned, whose sister he took in marriage. Besides, the Emperour Zeno, that had ever upheld him, happening to die, as Anastasius his successour sour made shew to cause an alteration in affairs, and would render himself absolute in the West, this man knew so well how to play his part, that he diverted his ambitions another way.

There is also a letter to be found in Cassiodorus, which he wrote to this Anastasius, deputing a solemn Embassage to him for the obtaining of peace, where among other things he saith: That it is good reason they should seek for peace, who have no cause to make war, and that the man wadeth far into wrong, who giveth no testimony of any disposition to receive conditions suitable to justice. As for himself, he acknowledged the Emperour, as the prime dignity raised above all other Kingdoms, and to be the support of the whole world, and that one of the greatest favours from God, which he hath at any time received, was to have learned in the Court of Constantinople, how he ought to govern the Romans. That he knows the authority of the Emperour is the onely modell of all the policy in the world, and that so much as God hath exalted him above other Princes, so much would he humble himself under this Monarch, from whom he requireth most glorious amity, that he may hereafter apply himself to all that which may appertain to his honour and service.

The Emperour Anastasius, who according to the humours of his turbulent spirit cut himself work enough out in the East, not going to seek for it in the West, seeing that he set himself into the conditions of a suppliant, when his fortune might already put into his mouth words armed for command, suffered him to gnaw his bone in secure peace. The Romans considering, that besides force of arms he had the consent of two Emperours of the East, willingly received him, under hope they had to see some tranquility succeed after so many storms, which had afflicted their State.

Behold how from a Knight of fortune he arrived to the dignity of an Emperour: he being notwithstanding resolved never to take upon him the Title of Emperour, but contenting himself with the name of King, thereby to decline the jealousie of those, who were very capable of it. He that would consider the qualities of his person, which contributed to enthrone him in a place so eminent, shall find, that besides military virtue, he had other parts very worthy to govern, were it not that his spirit was drenched both in humane policy and long prosperities, which served as disloyal nurses to sin.

It seemeth that Sidonius Apollinaris had studied him, and summed him up even to the haires of his head, when in the second Epistle of his first book he so curiously describeth him, and saith among other things: He had a body exceedingly well proportioned, the top of his head well circled, his eye-brows thick, his hair long, his nose hooked, his lips soft, his teeth of ivory, his complexion white mingled with vermillion, which quickly blushed, more through shamefac'dness then choller, his body very comely, his arms strong, his hands slender, his breasts full, his leg plump, his feet small to support a great body.

He addeth, that concerning his manners, he ordinarily prayed before break of day in the presence of his Bishops, who were Arians, without noise or attendance, and that afterward he applied himself to affairs, and gave audience to Embassages and petitions, where he heard much and spake little, ever shewing himselfe very intentive in resolutions, and most prompt in the expedition of that which he had resolved on. From thence he went to survey his Arsenal, his Magazins, his Stables, and his Treasures; or he went on hunting, being naturally so dexterous in shooting, that infallibly he would not miss the mark. After exercises he took his repast; where he loved to be entertained with serious things, and as for that which concerned his table, there might be seen (saith he) The nativeness of Grecians, the plenty of French, the promptness of Italians, and a discipline truly Royall. If after dinner he played at dice, his custom was to be silent when he won, to laugh when he lost, and never to be angry, but rather to take occasion to speak some good words, and ever handled dice as manly as arms.

For the rest, he was so good a gamester, that not disquieting himself at all, he rejoyced to see his subjects in humour against him; and so despoiled himself in game of affected gravity, that he seemed to have no other fear, but to be feared. It did him good then to be asked some favour, and such a one oftentimes lost in game with him, who won his suit.

About three of the clock the burden of affairs of the Kingdom had their turn, wherein he tendered himselfe very serious till the time of supper.

Ennodius in his Panegyrick saith, that he honoured the Royal purple with the rays of his countenance, and that there was not in the world a habit so beautifull, which he made not more lustrous by wearing it on his body: that his eyes had the serenity of the spring, and that his hands were worthy to give death to rebels, and matter of vowes to his subjects: That all which Diadems perform in the person of other Emperours, nature had done in him; and that nothing in him was wanting but an heir: for the truth is, he dyed, not leaving any son to succeed him.

Reader, I have been willing to present unto you succinctly the great revolution of the Empire into which our Boetius fell; and the qualities of his Persecutour, who degenerated afterward into so much barbarism. But let us now behold, what he did by the counsell of our great Boetius in the manage of his Kingdom; to the end you may have so much the more horrour of his wicked ingratitude, who slew this holy man, that was as the Intelligence and Angel Guardian of his State.

The fourth SECTION.

The entrance of Theodorick into Rome and his happy government by the counsel of Boetius.

THeodorick having pacified the City of Ravenna, and made himself Master of the most important places of his Kingdom, went to Rome with the most flourishing troops of Italy, where he was received in the manner of ancient triumphs; which exceedingly pleased the people, who at that time resembled the earth, which ariseth from the snows of winter, as from a tomb, to becom young again with the sweet breath of the spring.

So many years were slipt away wherein they had not seen any thing but divisions, troubles, famine, and blood; when this Prince came to appear upon the triumphant Chariot, with his golden arms, which gave him a marvellous majesty, besides the graces he had from nature, they thought they beheld a star newly descended from Heaven, and followed him with infinite acclamations in witness of affection.

He being alighted at the Palace, Boetius, who was the principal man of the world in nobility, wit, and learning, was chosen out from all the State to make him an Oration: In which, being then in full vigour of eloquence, he most divinely acquitted himself. It is a great loss, that posterity hath not preserved ſerved ſo brave a monument of this rare ſpirit, to enchaſe it now preſently in this work. From thence the King paſſed to the Circus, which was a large place appointed for Jouſts and Tournaments, and ſtaying himſelf at a place called the Palm of gold, he cauſed his throne to be magnificently ſeated in a place very high raiſed, and round about him benches for the Senatours, who appeared all of them cloathed with robes of their order.

There he made an Oration ful of ſweetneſs in preſence of all the people, whereby he declared he had a purpoſe to revive the ancient magnificence of Rome, and vehemently to deſire to conform himſelf to the faſhions of thoſe Emperours, who had been the moſt zealous for the Weal-publick: which made the whole world conceive moſt excellent hopes of his government.

All the City was then in pomp, like to a noble Lady, who having laid aſide ſorrow, ſuddenly appeareth in the bravery of a bright habit. Never day ſeemed to ſhine more reſplendently to an afflicted people.

It was in the ſame time that S. Fulgentius coming from Africk to Rome, after he had viſited the Churches of the Martyrs, paſſed along by the Circus at the inſtant, when all theſe gallant ceremonies were performed, where he was ſo raviſhed, beholding the majeſty of the Emperour, the glory of his Senate, the luſtre of his nobility, the magnificence of the place, and the throng of innumerable people, that he cried out: Oh how beautiful is Jeruſalem the celeſtial, ſince Rome the terreſtrial at this day appeareth with ſuch ſplendour! Good God! if you allow ſo much honour on earth, to thoſe who follow vanity, what glory will you give in heaven to your Saints, who ſhall behold verity?

Quàm ſpecioſa debes eſſe Hieruſalem illa cœleſtis, ſi ſic fulget Roma terreſtris! Et ſi in hoc ſæculo datur tanti honoris dignitas diligentibus vanitatem, qualis honor et gloria tribuetur ſanctis contemplantibus veritatem?

The ceremony being ended, the King entertained all the Senate in a feaſt worthy of his greatneſs, and diſtributed liberalities to the people, which ſeemed to renew the face of ancient Rome. He diſpoſed himſelf, preſently to viſit all the places of the City, to know the condition of his Senatours, to inform himſelf of the humour of the people, to obſerve the ſtate of affairs, and to conſtitute the government.

It is moſt certain, he was indowed with a natural wit good enough, but he had withall ſo little experience in civil affairs, that he had much ado to ſign ordinary diſpatches.

Anonymus Author in ejus vita.

Behold the cauſe why a nameleſs Authour, who wrote his life in a very low ſtile, witneſſeth, that he uſually ſigning with four letters, cauſed them to be cut in copper, and clapping them on the paper, fetched the draught of his pen round about, to ſerve as a model, to the end that by this means he might give ſomewhat the better form to his writing. This want of experience cauſed him to tye himſelf conſtantly to two great States men, whereof the firſt was our Boetius, whom he made Maſter of Offices, and ſuperintendent of his houſe, in ſuch ſort, that all paſſed by his counſel: the other was Caſſiodorus, of whom he made uſe, as of a moſt able and faithful Secretary to dictate all the letters and proceeding of the Kingdom.

Boetius, whom he in the beginning loved as the apple of his eye, and honoured as his father, gave him the forms and maxims of all that excellent policy, which we behold ſo reſplendent in his government. I will here couch ſome of them, that Politicians may ſee the happineſs, which commonly waiteth on States guided by the ways of conſcience The firſt maxim was, that King Theodorick, being an Arian, ſhould not onely abſtain from perſecuting and afflicting the Catholick Church in any kind whatſoever, either of himſelf or by any of his, but on the contrary ſhould cheriſh, honour, protect, and maintain it with all the extent of his authority, becauſe the experience of Ages had made it appear, that thoſe who were intereſſed in the perplexities of Religions contrary to the Catholick, had proſpered very ill: and that not going any further, the deportments of the Emperour Anaſtaſius, who then reigned in Conſtantinople, made it manifeſt enough, ſince he had involved himſelf in the hatred of the Clergy and people, to ſupport with paſſion certain novelties: and how on the contrary, ordinary practiſe had diſcovered, that all Monarchs, who had entertained good correſpondence and reſpect with Eccleſiaſticks, were evermore honoured in their government, and much happier in the ſucceſs of their affairs.

Theodorus Anagnoſtes Οτι τῷ Θεῷ μίσιν ἐπίλαξας, πῶς ἀνθρώπῳ φύλαξης συνείδησιν ὑγιαίνειν.

Theodorick ſo well obſerved this maxim, that to witneſs the zeal he bare to our Religion, he cauſed the head of one of his officers to be cut off, who having been bred in the Catholick Church, became an Arian, thinking by this means to be advanced into the good favour of his Maſter. But this brave King, My friend, ſaith he, ſince thou haſt been diſloyal to God, I can never think thou wilt be faithful to thy Prince. Thou ſhalt waſh away the ſtain of thy treachery with thy blood, to teach poſterity, thou muſt not mingle the intereſts of God with the profane pretences of thy fortunes.

He ſhewed himſelf very zealous to preſerve peace in the Church in a moſt dangerous ſchiſm raiſed in his time. For Pope Anaſtaſius being deceaſed, and they proceeding lawfully to the election of Symmachus, there was a Senatour of an unquiet ſpirit, who deſirous to make a Pope at the devotion of the Emperour of Conſtantinople, ſo to countenance his Extravagancies, banded Altar againſt altar: and cauſed an Antipope to be choſen, named Laurentius, which rent both Senate and Clergy into great partialities. But Theodorick very ſpeedily quenched the fire, and being well informed of the buſineſs, ſeeing Symmachus was firſt elected, and ſupported by the ſoundeſt part, he maintained him with a ſtrong hand againſt all the enterpriſes of adverſaries, who durſt not in the end reſiſt his authority.

Beſides, having publiſhed an Edict againſt the favourers of the Heruli, who perplexed the Province of Genoa and Milan whither they were retired, that fell out to be the cauſe of very many miſeries, and tears among the poor people, who having no ſupport ſo helpful unto them as the Biſhops, threw themſelves into the arms of Epiphanes and Laurentius, both great Saints and great Prelates, the one of Pania, the other of Milan. Epiphanes undertook to ſpeak and ſaid to the King:

Sir, Should I here reckon up all the favours which you have received from God, I might make you appear more ſparing in your deſires, then he hath been in his liberalities; ſince you have asked nothing of heaven which hath not ever ſurmounted your vows and hopes. But not to ſpeak at this time of ſo many prodigies, is it not a very great wonder to ſee you do juſtice in the th one of your enemy, and to behold us pleading the cauſe of your ſervants, with ſuch a confidence, in a place, which the terrour of arms had heretofore rendered ſo deadful?

Sir, It is the Saviour of the world, who hath given into your hand his people, which hath charged us with their requeſts. Take good heed, how you offend him by ill uſing the gift he hath offered you. Know how an inviſible power hath led you by the hand into ſo many encounters and battels, that the air, rain, and ſeaſons have favoured your ſtandards, as if they had been to you engaged. Now is the time you muſt acknowledg ſo many benefits by your piety, not deſpiſing the tears of the afflicted, which are the ſacrifices of ſupplians. The examples of your Predeceſſours, who have been caſt out of the throne for their iniquity upon this consideration, your Country prostrate at your feet, most humbly beggeth, you would be pleased to sweeten the rigour of your laws, not only by doing good to the innocent, but by pardoning the culpable. For very little would our clemency be, if we did onely abstain to strike those who have given offence to none, not considering mercy is not made for any but the miserable. In revenging your injuries you shall do like men of the earth, and by pardoning, share in glory with that great Monarch of heaven, who daily maketh his sun to shine on criminal heads, as well as the most innocent.

The King made a most courteous answer, saying: There was no reason that earthly powers should resist the prayers of Bishops, who made heaven propitious: and that he remitted to all in general the punishments of death ordained by laws: but in so much that the ulcer must be purged, least by shewing himself too indulgent to vices, he might make them pass into example for posterity, the consideration of his state required the Authours of sedition should be removed, to the end their presence might not foment the evil.

Vitia transmittit ad posteros qui præsentibus culpis ignoscit.

The reply was found very reasonable, and letters of grace instantly dispatched by Vrbicus, who was one of the chiefest officers in the Court for expeditions.

He satisfied not himself with this favour: but calling the good Bishop into his cabinet, having highly commended him, sent him among the Gauls to redeem the Italian prisoners there, by reason the Burgundians in certain incursions had taken away very many: and others over-whelmed with the miseries, which proceed from civil wars, were voluntarily stept aside. The King gave commission to the Bishops to rally them to their troups, liberally defraying the charges that were necessary.

Cassiodor. l.2.c.1.29. There is also found one amongst his letters addressed to Count Adela, wherein he witnesseth, that though he had a great desire to preserve his people in full peace and repose, because the glory of a Prince consisteth in the tranquility of his subjects, yet that he principally intended the Churches should enjoy this favour, since in obliging them, the mercies and blessings of God were drawn on his kingdom and pursuing this course, he commanded Duke Ida to cause all the Ecclesiastical possessions to be restored, which some had usurped in Languedoc, after the death of Alarick. Observe the good foundations of piety which he laid by the counsel of Boetius.

The second Maxim was, to bend all his endeavours, and imploy his best thoughts for the comfort of the people, because there is not any way more powerful to gain the hearts of all the world, then by sweetning the sharpness of the times present, or the burdens of the passed. We have seen (said he) by experience, that those who are desirous to possess gold without the love of the people, have been very unsafe; that Kings differ not from other men, but in being powerful to do good, and that the common sort measure their greatness onely by their bounty: that is it, which heretofore made the Gods of Gentiles, and which maintaineth Monarchies on the firm rock of constancy.

Cassiodor. l.4.ep.16. Theodorick imbraced this care most particularly, for he punctually enquired after the losses of his poor subjects, and if he found any molested by the passage of some troups, or other like, he released them of taxes and ordinary subsidies, as it may yet be seen in his letters, and namely in one which he wrot to President Faustus, wherein he commanded him to hold his hand in this business, Because (saith he) a body over-burdened sinketh to the ground, and that it were better to despise a slight gain, then to deprive himself of pretious things received from the love of subjects. The river which glideth along (said he) though it do no other spoil, still worketh out its channel, so companies of souldiers, which pass through towns and villages, though military discipline be there observed, fail not to bring thither with them much damage, and therefore it was his pleasure, the places should be recompenced which had been overcharged.

Lib.4.Epist. 1.

For the same reason, he appointed fifteen hundred crowns of alms to be delivered to the venerable Bishop S. Severinus, to distribute them among the peasants, which he knew had been vexed with the harbouring of certain warlick companies. Verily, as it is no small temerity in particular men, who have neither any charge nor knowledge of affairs, to argue great men upon tributes, and the husbanding of their treasures; so would it be a neglect to conceal from them upon occasions the moderation they ought to use herein, since it is so exactly recommended by the law of God, and published in all histories.

If a stranger raised from the bottom of barbarism, shewed himself so Religious in matters of subsidies towards men, whom his arms had newly made tributary; Princes, and Lords of Christendom have good cause to consider what they owe to a people, which is given them as to Fathers and Protectours of the publick. There is no doubt, but the exorbitancies committed in such like affairs, are most important charges of conscience, which much clog a soul in the agonies of death, and in the dreadful judgement of Almighty God.

There is also to be seen an Edict of the same Prince, where having understood that in the payment of taxes, the rich made the heaviest part of the burden to fall upon the shoulders of the meaner, and that the undertakers of this business ill behaved themselves therein; he detesteth all these abuses, as injuries done to his own person, and gave full liberty to those who had been wronged to complain to him, that such order might be taken, as he should judge reasonable. This manner of proceeding made him so beloved, that other Princes having passed away like dreams of one night, he reigned thirty years in a most supereminent degre of respect which those, even of the religion contrary to his own, bare him.

The third Maxim given him by Boetius, was to make himself most exact in the exercise of justice, because it is the basis of thrones, and the spirit which animateth all government: and he so deeply impressed this in his heart, that the desire he had to render every one what was his, was changed in him to a most ardent thirst, and a continual hunger. He selected out the most untainted and uncorrupted Governours he could find, and spake these words unto them, related by Cassiodorus:

Use the matters so, that Judges of Provinces may be very careful in the observation of laws; that Tribunals spare not to thunder out sentences against ill manners; that theeves may fear the gates of your Palaces; that the adulterer may tremble before a chaste Officer; that the forger may feel horrour at the voice of a Herauld; and that all crimes may be banished from our territory; that no man oppress the poor; that persecutours be apprehended and pursued as disturbers of publick repose. You shall make a general peace when you have beaten down the authours of mischiefs which are committed. Let Captains contain their souldiers in all manner of discipline, in such sort that the labourer, the merchant, the sailer, and the artificer, may understand arms are not made, but for their defence. I will not likewise that my nearest allies be pardoned in any case of justice; since I have taken the Common-wealth into my charge, I have despoiled my self of my proper interests. I wish well to mine, but in the generality.

Cassiodor. var.l.12. Mihi propria cura dilapsa est, postquam generalem capi cogitavi, in custodia. Optavi meis bene, sed quod possit esse commune.

Pursuing the maxims I will recount an admirable passage, which he used among others, to make his justice remarkable. A Roman Lady left widow by the death of her husband had lost a son born of this marriage, who was secretly stoln from her, and in servitude bred up in another Province. This childe grown up a young man, received notice from a good hand, that he was of free extraction, and son of a Lady, whose name was given him, her aboad, and all circumstances, which caused him to undertake a voyage to Rome with intention to make himself known unto her. He came directly to his mother, who was much perplexed with certain love-affairs, having betroathed her self to a man, who often promised her marriage, yet never accomplished it. This lover then absent, and detained by urgent affairs very far from Rome; the Lady had the space of about thirty days free, wherein she kept this young man in her house, acknowledging him, and particularly avowing him for her son, throughly convinced by evident tokens, so that then her charity was so great towards him, that she ceased not to weep for joy, in the recovery of her loss.

The thirty days expired, the Lover returned, and seeing this guest newly come to her house, demandeth of the Lady what man he was, and from whence he came. She freely answered, he was her son. He, whether moved by jealousie, thinking this might be but a colour, or that pretending the marriage of the widow, he would not have a charge of children, plainly told her, if she sent not away this found child from her lodging, never should she have any share in his affection. The unhappy creature surprized with love, to serve his passion, renounceth her own entrals, and readily banisheth from her house this son, over whom she had so many tears. The young man seeing himself as between the Hammer, and the Anvil, in so great a necessity of his affairs, hastneth to require justice of the King, who most willingly heard him, and commanded the Lady should be brought before him to be confronted by him. She stoutly denied all the pretensions of this young man, saying; He was an Impostor and ungrateful, who not contenting himself to have received the charities of a poor creature in her house, needs would challenge the inheritance of children. The son on the other side wept bitterly, and gave assurance, she had acknowledged him for her own, very lively representing all the proofs which passion and interest put into his mouth.

The King sounded all passages to enter into the heart of the Lady, and asked her whether she were not resolved to marry again. She answered, If she met with a man suitable to her, she would do what God should inspire her. The King replyed: Behold him here, since you have lodged this guest thirty days in your house, and have acknowledged him so freely, what is the cause why you may not marry him? The Lady answered: He had not any means, which ever is necessary for houshold expence. And to what may your state truly amount, saith the King? The Lady replyed, She was very well worth a thousand crowns, which was great riches at that time. Well (saith Theodorick) I will give as much to this young man for his marriage, on this condition that you shall marry him. She much amazed, began to wax pale, blush, tremble, and to shew all the countenances of a perplexed woman, who sought to excuse her self, but faltered in her speech. The King yet to affright her more, swore deeply she should marry him presently, or tell lawful causes of impediment. The poor woman condemned by the voice of nature which cried in her heart, and having horrour of the crime proposed unto her, cast her self at the feet of the King, with much profusion of tears, confessing her loves dissimulation and mishap. Then this great Prince taking the word from her: Are not you a miserable woman (saith he) to renounce your own blood for a villain who hath deceived you; get you to your house, forsake these fond affections, and live in the conditions of a good widow, taking unto you such support from your son, as he by nature ought to afford you. I leave to relate a singular example, upon the same subject, which I drew from the Chronicles of Alexandria, and cited in the third Book & one and twentieth Section of my first Tome.

The fourth Maxime, which Theodorick received from our Oracle, was to place deserving men in offices, and to ground his State upon rewards and punishments, which the ancient Democritus said, were the Divinities of Common-wealths.

The King laied this counsel upon his heart, and presently made Boetius Superintendent of Offices and Dignities, to the end his judgment might be as the character of the excellent qualities of such as should have principal Commissions. There was no speech at all either of favour, flesh, blood, or nation; all rewards were for men of judgment and virtue: when any one was designed for some office, long and serious inquiry was made of his condition, which being throughly known, the King gave approbation of him by writing to the Senate, or forgot not to put into account all his services and laudable actions, to the end, the sincerity of his proceedings might be known, and that he might cast a double lustre upon him, who received so great a benefit from his hands.

We may behold the practice hereof in many letters, which are to be found upon this subject, and namely, upon the advancement of Cassiodorus to the dignity of a Patrician, where the King writing unto him letters full of respect, makes a narration of his life and functions, wherein he had very well served his Majesty; and then said unto him: Enjoy now the recompence of your travel, and doubly take the interests which you have contemned for the publick, for there are no riches more glorious, then to see your virtues crowned both by the testimony of the Prince, and by the praises which proceed from the mouth of all the world. It is a great happiness to oblige a King to confess, that a subject hath that already by his merit, which he grants him by his liberality. Epist. 1. lib. 4.

This gave so great encouragement to the Nobility to dispose themselves to honour, by the degrees of honesty, that in few years the Court was replenished with persons qualified with parts of Science, & conscience, which are the two sources of good affairs.

The fifth Maxime was, the good husbanding of treasures which are not only the sinews, but the soul, blood, and life of the people.

It must be confessed, that the States of the world, are subject to great maladies: one while there is a drowsiness in affairs, that is the lethargy: sometimes a humour peccant and malign, composed of passions and errours which besiege the understanding, that is the Epilepsie; sometimes obstacles which hinder the light of good counsel, and they are Cataracts, which grow upon the eys: sometimes obdurations against good advice, that is hardness in the ears. sometimes a malicious silence of truth, that is the squinancy: sometimes oppressions, that is shortness of breath; sometimes want of courage, and those are the evils of the heart: sometimes: there is raised an exorbitant avarice, that is the bulimy, or dog-hunger: sometimes coldness and remisness to unlock Coffers for necessary uses, that is, the gout in the hand: sometimes negligences opportunely to take occasions, & that is the gout in the feet: sometimes fiery ambitions and enraged avarice, and they are feavers:

sometimes you may observe malignities and inteſtine wars, which may be called the ſtone, and nephretick pains; ſometimes bloody agonies termed diſſenteries; ſometimes great corruptions of manners, that is the cachochymy: ſometimes ſuddain diſturbances, they are Eryſipela's: ſometimes ſtenches of hidden crimes, and that is an infection of the noſe, which the Grecians call Lozena: ſometimes there are diſcovered ſpots of impiety, that is the Leproſie: ſometimes an impotency in all the members, that is the Palſie; ſometimes a faintneſs over all the vital parts, that is the Ptiſick.

Never ſhould he have done, who would keep an account of all the maladies, which are ever dangerous in their ſources, and mortal in their iſſues: but this Ptiſick which drieth up the body, and maketh of a living man a kinde of ſpectre or anatomy, is one of the leaſt accidents: and this happeneth to a State through the ill manage of treaſures, contrary to the loyalty due to the ſacred perſons of Kings. That is it which maketh ſouldiers to mutiny, which offendeth the great, and giveth matter of indignation to the moſt reaſonable, and of murmure to all the world: whiles the one account in ſubſtance the gold and ſilver which they have purloined, and the other reckon in Idæa that which is ſpent, entertaining their thoughts with the deſire of a thing afar off, as if one would warm himſelf with the memory of fire.

This is it which bringeth contempt of a Common-wealth abroad, weakneſs at home, and miſery on all ſides: which maketh the people hungry, and a Prince neceſſitous in his own houſe. The effects of this diſeaſe are better known then the remedies thereof practiſed; for there are ordinarily in all States many Reformers, who have verily notable deſigns upon Treaſures; but there is the like uſe made of them, as of Tooth-picks before Dinner.

Theophraſt. de plantis. Ζωον πάνυ ἀργυροῦν. Money is of the ſect of inviſibles, no man knows what becomes of it in ſo many hands; thoſe who abuſe it, have ſo many kinds of jugling-tricks, which dazle eys, whileſt they fill their purſes. It is a goodly plant, as that which is called the Aſſodil, or Scepter-royal, which breeds bad little worms, that gnaw all the ſubſtance thereof, and hide themſelves under the leaves, till ſuch time that getting wings, they become Butterflies all ſpeckled over with flowers, and brave it over men in the air, whom they durſt not behold upon the earth.

The State of Great-ones is alſo an admirable tree, but it oftentimes covereth under its fair verdure, colour, and beauty, men which gnaw like worms, and who frame themſelves wings all enameled with glory at the charge of the publick, to take their flight over the heads of ſo many mortals, whom they look upon with a ſcornful eye, as if they had no further memory of the earth which bare them.

A Prince cannot more oblige his State, then to have an eye open to all theſe diſorders, and to make his money diſtil like blood through all the veins of the body, reſerving ever good Treaſures to render himſelf helpful to his ſubjects, terrible to his enemies, honourable to his Allies, and neceſſary to all the world.

Theodorick became ſo well verſed in this Maxime, that he let not, as it were, a day paſs, wherein he caſt not his eys upon the treaſure of his Exchequer, and that he took not the pains himſelf to ſum up his revenews and expences, to conform his undertakings to his coin. He was moſt exact to draw into his Coffers all innocent gains, and honeſt emoluments as much as he could, preſerving them very charitably for the neceſſities of the Realm. We may ſee this in many of his letters, and eſpecially in that which he wrote to Saturninus and Verbuſius, where he recommendeth unto them to have a great care of that, which is the beſt part of his Treaſures: and that as he deſireth not to burthen his people, ſo would he not have lawful monies to be loſt. He giveth a reaſon hereof which is very notable: I have reaſon to avoid poverty (ſaith he) becauſe it is the mother of exceſs, and that there is nothing more pernicious then to be poor in Empire. The inquiry which I make after my rights, is the profeſſion of my innocency, and that as I would not avarice and extortions ſhould reign in my Palace, ſo will I from thence baniſh neceſſity. Caſſiod. l. 1 Ep. 19. Indigentiã juſtè fugimus quã ſuadet exceſſus, dum pernicioſa res eſt in imperante tenuitas

The ſixth Maxime was that, which the ſeventy Sages gave among many other to King Ptolomy, when he asked of them the means how to govern well. It was their counſel to have, even in time of peace, warlike troops well entertained and guided, to add Majeſty to his State, and terrour to his enemies. That is it, which Auguſtus Cæſar did, to conſtitute his Empire, when he appointed certain revenues which he would not have employed on any other thing, but the entertainment of ſouldiers. That is it, which the Common-wealth did before him, ever holding in neceſſary places ſouldiers well diſciplined. That is it, which by the report of Valerius Maximus gave Cities, Provinces, and Kingdoms to the people of Rome. And Theodorick well acquitted himſelf upon this counſel when he ſaid: War was never better made, then in time of Peace. Ex ep. 24, l. 5. Res prælio-rum bene diſponitur, quoties in pace tractatur.

The ſeventh was well, to fortifie the Frontiers, whereof he was very careful, as he witneſſeth in an Epiſtle, which he wrote to the Goths and the Romans inhabiting at Tortona, giving them commandment to ſtrengthen this place, and not to expect the incurſions of the enemy at unawares. For (ſaith he) all ſuddain things are inconſiderate, and it is too late to build up a Fort, when one is already in danger. To that he added alſo the forces on the Sea, which are very neceſſary to unite the places of his Territory, to diſſolve the deſigns of his enemies, and to make himſelf great and awful; for the experience of the Athenian Wars with the Spartans ſufficiently diſcovereth in the Hiſtory of Thucydides, that they ever have moſt advantage who command the Sea-coaſt. One may ſee by the letters, that King Theodorick wrote to his Lievtenant Abundantius, with what vehemency he ſought to make himſelf able in this point, giving out ſtrait Commiſſions to build and rigg out great ſtore of Ships, wherein he thrived ſo well, that he vaunted the Grecians and Africans, had nothing to condemn in him. Caſſiod. l. 1, ep. 17. Lib. 5. ep. 16.

The eighth recommended unto him, notwithſtanding his great forces, to entertain peace and good intelligence with his neighbours, to the end, that being leſs buſied in forrein wars, he might have full leiſure to manure his Kingdom with good government, which he did, as we may behold in his Epiſtles, entertaining thoſe Princes with teſtimonies of affection, congratulation in their proſperities, conſolations in their adverſities, embaſſages, and preſents, which were more witty then coſtly. His letter to our Clodoveus well ſheweth, that he highly valued above all, the Alliance of France, when he proteſteth the ſafety of the Kingdom is his own proper glory, and that he ſhareth in all the proſperities which happened to this great King. Ep ſt 41. l. 3

The ninth counſelled him to love letters, cheriſh learned men, who are the Trumpets of the glory of Princes, and make them lead a pleaſing and happy life in the eſtimation of poſterity; and conſequently to cheriſh Arts, invite brave Maſters, maintain

Merchants,

Merchants, discourse even with Labourers with much sweetness, by the example of Augustus Cæsar, which he so exactly did, that he rendred himself very amiable to all the world, in such manner humbling himself to the meanest, that he disdained not to be among Peasants to talk with them in their trades, and for their honour, till the earth with his own hands.

The tenth was to take away the riot of particulars, and shew himself magnificent in publick matters, as in buildings, theaters, necessities, and recreations of the people, still undertaking something great for the majesty of the Kingdom, and commodity of the Common-wealth. Towards which he was transported with much fervour and reason, rasing many goodly Fabricks, and repairing the honour of places of consideration, even to the equalling of ancient Rome. For he saith in an Epistle which he wrote to one Agapitus, Governour of the City, that he would not subscribe in ornaments to the Ancients, since he paralelled them in the happiness of his age. As in effect, whilest he observed these excellent Maximes, his Kingdom was indeed a Realm of justice, peace, and plenty, beheld by all as the miracle of the world.

The fifth SECTION.

The honours of Boetius, and alteration of Theodorick.

Boetius was honoured with so great respect for the many excellent qualities resplendent in his person, that from the foundation of Rome, scarcely might a man be found of the long Robe mounted to such an eminency of honour, by the degree of civil prudence, learning, and virtue.

It is a very notable thing, that not only the King made him three times Consul, but needs he would through abundance of his love, that his sons, who were yet very young, should be advanced to the Consulship. A matter not ordinary, but titular and of favour, and very rarely given, but to those who were singularly to be gratified.

Himself confesseth, that if joy were to be derived from frail honours of the world, he had cause enough to rejoyce on that day, when he saw his two sons carried in Pomp through the City in a triumphant Chariot, accompanied with the whole Senate, and attended by an infinite concourse of people, who ceased not to congratulate the father and the children, as the off-spring of a race, born for the good of the Common-wealth.

The same day he made in full Senate an Oration of thanksgiving to Theodorick, for the large liberalities extended towards his house, which was delivered with such a grace, that in conclusion they presented him a Crown, as to the King of eloquence. He likewise gave notable largesses to all the people, and appeared in the great Court of the Circus, sitting in the middest of his two Consuls in presence of the whole City, having his heart repleniſhed with content, and tears of joy in his eys for the affections which the people witnessed.

To crown all those blessings of fortune, he had married a wife, held one of the most accomplished Ladies under Heaven. For, which is very rare, she enjoyed a great spirit, a singular modesty, and an excellent chastity, of whom Boetius sufficiently to praise her, said in one word; She was the image of her father Symmachus, who had given her to him in a most chast and happy marriage.

Now this Symmachus called the pearl and pretious ornament of the whole world, was a Senatour, who seemed to be composed of nothing but wisdom and virtue, for which cause he then lived in much reputation: and all this family of Boetius was in such sort esteemed, that Ennodius writeth, it was a vein of purple, signifying thereby it contained therein all great dignities, no otherwise then as veins inclose the blood. He notwithstanding addeth, those purples encreased by the lustre of Boetius, who possessed them: and after when Rome became the prize of those who subdued it, it being no longer lawful for Consuls to reap Palms in the fields of battels, he equalled the ancient triumphs by the greatness of his judgment.

a Ennodius in epist. ad Boetium, l. 1. epist. 1. Vena purpurarum. Purpura possessoribus cre-scentes.

Gerebert, an Authour who wrote of those times, calleth this Boetius the father and light of his Country, who managing the reins of the Empire in the quality of a Consul, spared not to diffuse by the force of his ability in good letters, all the lustre they had, equalling them with the wits of Greece.

Tu Pater, & Patriæ lumen, Severine Boeti,
Consulis officio, rerum dispone habenas,
Infundis lumen studiis, & cedere nescis
Græcorum ingeniis.
Boetius, thou Father and Countries-light,
Dispos'st Consuls office, common right,
Giv'st studies radiant lustre; and no whit,
In any thing submit'st to Grecian wit.

Gerbertus l. 1. Epigr. Pithæ.

Verily, we may see by that which followeth in this History, the little assurance may be had either in men, or favours. If men be vessels who do nothing all their life-time but play with the winds; favours are waves of glass, which fail not to shiver themselves against the Rocks. We would think the Moon much greater then all the Stars, were it not that the shadow of the earth, which we make use of to measure it, causeth the contrary to appear; and we might have some opinion, these great dignities of the world, had much eminency above all that which is here below; were it not, that they daily fall into shadows and phantasms of nothing, which well approve, we have much illusion in our eys, since these greatnesses have taken such estimation in our hearts.

Jealousie a bad daughter born of a good house, which is that of love and honour, divideth beds, and Empires, and hath ever eys so bleared, that it cannot endure a ray of the virtue or prosperity of another. And for that cause, the lustre which proceeded from the house of Boetius in such manner, as day progresseth from the gates of the East, failed not at all to give suspicions to King Theodorick, who seeing himself a stranger, and ignorant among Romans, & men of so great counsel, being not able to derive any other recommendation to himself, but what the sword gave him, envied so many heavenly riches as were contributed to the happiness of his Empire.

The change, which then succeeded at Constantinople greatly fortified his distrusts: for it is written that Anastasius an Emperour, who had done nothing in the Throne but create Schisms, beholding the Laurels of Cæsar wholly withered on his head, had some distast both of life, which he had passionately loved, and of the Scepter possessed with so much ambition. It is certain, that being one day in the Circus, as he espied a furious sedition whispered against him, he voluntarily laid down his Crown, and let the people know by his Heralds he was willing to be rid of the Empire, which for some time appeased the most passionate: notwithstanding, being greatly hated, and foreseeing he could not make much longer aboad in the world, he began to reflect on on his Successors, desiring to transfer to the Throne one of his three Nephews, whom he had bred up, having no male issue to succeed him. There was difficulty in the choice, and he having a soul very superstitious, put that to lot, which he could not resolve by reason: for he caused three beds to be prepared in the royal chamber, and made his Crown to be hanged within the Tester of one of these beds, called the Realm, being resolved to give it to him who by lot should place himself under it. This done, he sent for his Nephews, and after he had magnificently entertained them, commanded them to repose themselves, each one chusing one of the beds prepared for them. The eldest accommodated himself according to his fancie, and hit upon nothing: the second did the same. He then expected the youngest should go directly to the crowned bed, but he prayed the Emperour he might be permitted to lie with one of his brothers, and by this means not any of the three took the way of the Empire, which was so easie to be had, that it was not above a pace distant. Anastasius, much amazed, well saw God would transfer the Diadem from his race; and it is also added, that he likewise knew by revelation, that it was Justine who should succeed, for he having determined to kill him, with Justinian, heard a voice which spake in his heart, and said: He should take good heed to touch these two personages, because they should do, each one in their turn, good services to God.

Zacharias and M. S. Sirmundi.

Afterward as this Justine being ever near the person of the Emperour, one day by chance set his foot on the train of his robe, the Emperour looking back, Thou holdest me (said he) by the gown, and shalt follow me; but stay a while, your time is not yet come: which much amazed all there present, who thought him to speak like a man distracted, not conceiving what he would say.

In a few days this Anastasius, who so much feared thunder, that he fled into a Cave so soon as at any time he heard the least notice thereof, was slain by a thunder-stroke upon the very stairs of the place which he had chosen for a sanctuary. Justine derived from base birth, and mounted through all the degrees of War to the dignity of the Captain of the Guard, was chosen Emperour; of whom, he being a valiant man and wel beloved, Theodorick began to conceive a great jealousie, stil fearing he might take out of his hands the Empire he had usurped.

The beginning of the storm was, that Justine an Emperour most Catholick, treated the Arians of Constantinople, who had been tolerated under Anastasius, with the severity ordained by laws, despoilingthem of Churches, which they had boldly usurped. They failed not to address their complaints, and offer up their grievances to the ears of Theodorick: who interpreting the disgrace of his sect to the contempt of his person, entred into violences more fit for a Barbarian then a King, who had been trained up to civility by such good counsels, for he threatned to turn all Rome into fire and blood, if the Emperour Justine did him not right, and for this purpose he sent Pope John, commanding him to go speedily to Constantinople to cause the Churches to be rendred to the Arians, supposing his dignity would procure him full power with the Emperour. The Pope answered, he had made very ill choice of him for such an Embassage, that the rank he held in the Church permitted him not to be a provider of Churches for the Arians, and that if he had any bad design upon his person, he was ready to stretch out his neck for the defence of the Church, there being no need for him to pass the seas for this, and undertake the voyage.

This made him enter into much greater extravagancy, threatning the City with a deluge of blood if it were not remedied: Behold the cause, why the Pope was intreated to go to Constantinople, and to find some way how to sweeteen affairs, yet to let nothing pass to the prejudice of his conscience. He yielded to the tears of the people, and undertook the voyage of Constantinople, accompanied with some of the principal Senatours, where the Emperour Justine received him with much submission, and unspeakable magnificence.

Theodorick expecting the issue of this great Embassage, which was not so soon ended, entred further and further into a vast labyrinth of suspicions and jealousies; beginning to distrust Roman Senatours, and to monopolize all affairs with his Goths, which was the beginning of his ruine. He at that time did four things which infinitely grieved all good men.

The first was, he advanced two, who appeared like two comets over the heads of mortals: The one was called Gongiastus, and the other Trigilla, both men of rapine & concussions, who by their evil deportment did much disgrace the authority of their Prince.

The second was, that he who heretofore used great moderation in matter of subsidies, bare himselfe therein most inordinately, by the perswasion of those two Goths, who were prodigiously covetous, and insatiable in their avarice.

The third was, that in a great scarcity of victuals, he caused all the corn to be taken out of the fields near Rome, enforcing every one by an expres Edict to sell that little which he had upon a very low price for the Kings own granaries, and the entertainment of souldiers; which gave occasion of many tears, the poor entering into despair, if the force of this Edict should be of long continuance.

In the end, for a fourth violence, he fell upon the most eminent Senatours, dispoiling them of their goods, and threatning them banishment and death under suspicions of treasons.

Boetius endeavoured to cure Theodorick by all the sweetest wayes: but seeing his spirit was become very dark, and much altered in all that which might be said reasonable, not to loose honour and good conscience in the generall shipwrack he foresaw, he began to roar like a Lion against the corruptions of this mercenary Court.

He stoutly set upon these two powerful favourites, and resisted them in the greatest vigour of their credit, with such liberty and constancy, that it wel from that time forward appeared this man had his soul in his hand, being ever ready to resign it for the defence of justice. Trigilla, who was the Superintendent of the whole government of the Empire, and the instrument of King Theodorick, would fain seem an able man, and to give colour of wisdom and reason to actions disproportionable, namely in that Edict published concerning the great heaps of corn, amassed together in the magazine of the Prince, in the sharp wants and indigencies of the people. Boetius lowdly blamed this manner of proceeding, and ceased not to declare the miseries of Provinces in words very effectual, demanding audience of the King, for the good of his State.

Theodorick, whether he had not as yet altogether renounced the reputation of a righteous Prince, or that he thought his great favourite Trigilla was grounded upon most pertinent reasons, and strong encounters of affairs, which made him stir up these novelties, would needs in his cabinet hear a conference between Boetius and Trigilla concerning the Decrees; where Boetius defended the cause of the poor, with such weight of reasons, prudence, and courage, that he hindered the battery of Trigilla, and prevailed so far with the Prince, that he procured him to revoke his Edicts: whereupon these two favourites with all the faction which followed them, finding themselves immeasurably offended, began more and more to cast into the soul of Theodorick, already much changed, infinite distrust against Boetius, and the whole Senate. And then Paulinus and Albinus, two personages the best qualified in Rome, who had run through all the most honourable charges of the Common-wealth, were very ill intreated by suggestions and suspitions, which these men had raised against them. Boetius, seeing the affairs reduced to such a pass, where dissimulation could not repair them, spake in the end to Theodorick, in full Senate with all the libertie which his conscience dictated unto him, saying:

SIR, I am not ignorant that we are in a time, wherein it is as it were much easier to flie then to speak of the State of this Empire without offence to any, and that all discourse, which at this present may be framed, will ever be suspected by those, who have made even our thoughts criminal to your Majestie.

Yet must I needs say, it is a matter very hard to be silent in so great revolutions of affairs, since nature hath not created us like Crocodiles, who are said to have eys to weep and not a tongue to complain. I perceive we loose as it were all that which we have of Romane in us, and that in this universal disaster, where all the world should strengthen their arms against violence, men are contented to do, as in a thunder, every one prays the thunder-bolt may not fall upon his own house, and very little regards the danger of his neighbour: So likewise we see many Senatours, whose dignity ought to put into their mouthes good and forcible words for the defence of justice, satisfying themselves to avoid the blow, and expecting safety in common ruines.

As for my self I freely protest, that being born of blood, which never learned to flatter any man, and seeing my self in a rank where my silence may prove injurious to the publick, since I cannot uphold liberty already too much leaning to its ruin, I will at least support the image of it, and in so general a servitude, speak something, wherein I will either discharge my conscience for the present, or comfort my ashes for the time to come.

Alas Sir, when I behold you sitting upon the Throne of glory, whereunto the hand of God seemeth to have raised you by miracle, fortified you by discretion, and blessed you with so many prosperities; I cannot chuse but remember with the most tender resentments of my heart, the calms of the first years, when you took into your hand the stern of this large Empire. Who ever saw divers mettals so happily commixed, as we then beheld different Nations united in one entire body, under your authority? What consint in affections? What correspondence in all orders? What vigour in laws? What obedience in subjects? What agreement in the Senate? What applause among the people? What policie in Cities? What good fortune in arms? What blessing in all the success of your affairs.

Seemed it not, that God had affixed to your Standards and Edicts some secret virtue, which made the one triumph in war, and the other becom prosperous in peace; with so much terrour and reputation, that even things opposite of their own nature, knit themselves firmly together for your benefit?

O Sir, what is become of that golden face of your government? Who hath Metamorphosed it into this leaden visage? Perhaps you thought it was a part of the greatness of your Majestie, to hold a Senate under, to whom all the good Emperours have so much ascribed, that they esteem them as necessary for their greatness, as leaves about the Rose to set out its beautie.

Justin. Germany. hist. l. 6. I could tell you Sir, how much these Counsels are pernicious, were it not that the experience of the years of your reign hath taught you more, then all the malignity of men can deface. If you will be pleased to call as yet to counsel your wit & understanding, which God hath replenished with so many fair and noble lights, believe me you should finde this people in as the beard Basil, which rendereth a good savour, as it is said, when gently handled, and createth scorpions when rudely chafed. Hold us in the estimation and condition, wherein you hitherto have retained us, and you shall see nothing more tractable then the Romane people: but if you proceed with those violences, by which some daily pervert your good nature, it is to be feared, least this severity produce not rather poison, even for those who hope out of it to derive sweetness.

Our enemies cease not to exasperate you, upon want of respect due to your Majesty, and yet God knows we have so regarded royal authority, that seeing it in most unjust hands, where it lost its lustre, we suffered it not to loose the fruit of our obedience.

Allow Sir, the liberty, which ever hath been the most pretious inheritance of this Empire, you have placed men over our heads, who to become great and unwilling to seem any thing less then what they are, seek to smother in our miseries, the baseness of their own birth, and believe the means to justifie their own carriage, is to take away eys from those, who have them, and to render tongues mute, least they may learn a truth. Now adays to be born rich is to become a prey, and to arrive at government with some supereminences of wit, is to raise enemies; all great actions are suspected; and it seemeth that to find safety, we must seek it either in ignorance or idleness,

We have so learned to obey, that we would not hitherto so much as inter into consideration of the distribution you made of your favours, leaving them more free unto you then are in the Sun his rays, and conteating us to honour the character of your Majestie as well on Rocks, as Marbles and Silver. But now when we see the pretious interests of the Kingdom, in hands less pure then we wish, what else can we do in so publick a calamity, but here most humbly remonstrate, that which the subtile dissemble, the miserable suffer, the good deplore, and even the very stones relate.

Where is the time, Sir, when we heard those noble words to proceed from your mouth, That the flock may be sheared, not flayed; that a body overcharged, sunk to the ground; that there was no tribute comparable to the precious commodities derived from the love of Subjects? And now all the Cities and Countries, bewail the rigorous contussions they feel, to satisfy with their sweat and blood, the avarice of some particulars, who are notwithstanding, as greedy as fire, and more unsatiable then the abyss.

I exasperate not here our miseries, by an amplification of words: I have, Sir, made you to set, when you pleased to hear me in your Cabinet, the tears of Provinces, which softened your heart to compassion, and opened your hands to liberality, so that if your good affections be not altered by some, you are capable enough to discharge heaven of all promises, which it hath made unto us by the happiness of your Empire.

Unseal those eys which you so oft have opened for the comfort of your poor subjects, and in what part soever you turn them, you shall behold nought but miseries. Is it not a strange thing, that slaves being sometimes sold to courteous Masters, sweeten the sharpness of their condition by some gentle usage, and that there should be none, but the people of Rome, who yearly buy out their bondage? None but the people of Rome, who were made accountable for the goods pulled from them, and tributary for the ship-wrack of their poverty?

From thence the way is taken to the oppression of Magistrates, and some are perswaded, that throughly to mow the Meadow, you must humble the heads of plants most eminent, Paulinus is despoiled, Albinus is guilty of Treason, they be culpable enough since they are rich and powerful. It is said, there can be no safety found, but in their disgrace. And who seeth not, that these proceedings tend to the ruine of that most noble body, which almost thirty years maintained your royal Crown?

Out alas, Sir, if we exclaim against Witches, who poison Fountains, how can we be silent, seeing endeavour is used to invenom the soul of the Prince, who is the source of all counsels, to the end we may hereafter find poison, where we hoped for remedie?

Sir, onely behold and imitate your self; re-assume that spirit which made you reign in our hearts, as well as in our Provinces: distinguish flatterers from true friends; hearken to those, whose loyalty you have known in the succes of so many prosperities.

Remember your self, that you were made to reign over men, not as a man, but as the law: to bear your subjects in your bosom, and not trample them under-foot; to teach by example and not constrain by force, to be a Father of Citizens, and not a Master of Slaves.

Remember your self, Kings are given by Heaven for the use of people, and that they ought not to have so much regard to the extent of their power, as not to consider the measure of their obligations. Handle the matter so, that the greatness of your Majestie may appear in its goodness, and that this word which you heretofore had in your mouth, may stick eternally in your heart, when you said: A good Prince ought not to fear any thing so much, as to be too much feared.

This oration greatly enkindled minds, and King Theodorick was so much amazed at this liberty, that he seemed not wel setled in his countenance, he onely said in few words, he would give all satisfaction to the Senate, when time had cleared this business, whereof he would inform himself, that it might be treated at the next Session.

Trigilla

Trigilla, Conigastus, and Cyprianus the principal of the faction of the Goths, seeing themselves touched to the quick, resolved the time was now come, wherein either they must be lost, or Boetius undone; so that after this assembly, they ceased not to besiege the soul of the King, who was become jealous, melancholy, and timorous, with a thousand objects of distrust upon the practice of Boetius, assuring him the conspiracie was wholy contrived and plotted at Constantinople by Pope John and his Complices, at Rome by Boetius, Paulinus and Albinus, who had marvellous correspondencies. Not content with this, they gained some mercenarie people, they practised with false witnesses, they counterfeited letters, forged and sealed in the name of Boetius, and said all that which their passion suggested.

This is it which gave the most dangerous assault upon the mind of the Prince, for he having read their papers, and heard some depositions, which they gave him notice of, would have no further information to be resolved, but speedily assembling the Senate, entred with his papers in hand, shewing in his countenance the trouble of his thoughts, and spake in these terms:

This last Oration, which Boetius made in this place, was the Trumpet of a conspiracie plotted against my State. I wonder not a whit that he made it his task to disgrace our government with so great ornament of eloquence, to transport your minds into rebellion: but I marvel much how he would promise himself to draw to his partie, complices from a bodie so innocent as yours. All my officers displease him, as an enemy of the good offices are done me; and all the favours which I allot to the merit of mine, are so many crimes in mine own person with this man, who draweth poison from all that which serveth others for nourishment. He, whom the Prince raiseth, serves as an object for his envy, and it hath ever been an injury to appoint him a companion in his honours. He deploreth the miseries of the publick, as if he were father thereof; and it seemeth to him all is lost, which justice putteth into any other hands then his own.

Had the Gepides and Bulgarians forraged over all Italy, he would not frame any other complaints, then he doth of the State of our Kingdom; where thanks be to God, there is nothing so grievous, but it may seem a silver Age, if we compare it to the Empire of those who have gone before us. Besides, our good subjects esteem not themselves so unhappy under me, but that they think my preservation is the source of their felicities. But needs must he have pretext of piety to colour his design, and to take upon him a title of Protectour of the people, to make himself usurper of mine Empire. Verily would ambition be satisfied, I have performed for this man all that, which may be done to such as are the most greedie of honour, raising him to all eminent charges, and given even to his children almost in their infancie, dignities, which have been reputed in this Commonwealth, as prodigies. But in doing this, I sought bottom in an abyss, where it was not to be found.

I have suffered all these extravagancies so long as I could possible, ever thinking to complain of him, was to draw convulsions upon mine own proper entrails: but since forgetting all respect of dutie, he cannot be unmindful of his own nature, which is to do evil to those who wish him well, I demand of you in the quality of a King, that justice which you would afford to the meanest of my Kingdom.

I have not his eloquence to amplify Impostours, but I enjoy some strength of understanding to judge of a truth. Behold here, most loyal subjects, those who will depose the conspiracie he hath plotted against my state. Behold here letters signed with his own hand, which were dispatched to the Emperour Justine, to call him to my ruin. You may judge hereupon, and ordain what shall be reasonable, it being not my intention to pretend here any other satisfaction, then what the laws afford me.

As soon as he had spoken this, he caused his witnesses to come in, who were one Basilius, Opilion, Gaudentius, men of lost conscience and reputation. Theodorick notwithstanding caused them to be openly heard, and without exception, against the innocent. Then he began to produce that goodly letter, addressed to the Emperour of the East, which was wholy counterfeited by the damnable impostures of one named Cyprian.

The poor Boetius found himself at the instant like the just Naboth in the midst of these perverse creatures, & what industrie soever he used for the declaration of his innocency, it was oppressed by a powerful faction, which transported minds either through corruption or weakness, to the ruin of virtue.

The King pressed the Senatours to deliver their opinion thereupon: they, who were desirous not to appear suspected, confidently cast the stone against the accused, and thought his condemnation would be their freedom; others who were enemies, bare themselves in it with much animositie, there remained some few feeble souls who followed the course of violence: so that banishment was decreed against Boetius, according to the intention of Theodorick.

Verily, if there be any thing worthy of commiseration in the world, it is to behold offenders sit as Judges upon the blood of an innocent, and to consider that afflicting a man with all extremitie, they also deprive him of the precious jewel of reputation, which maketh us live in the estimation of honest men, a pleasing and spiritual life, as do many great ones in the memory of all ages.

The wise Boetius after he had wasted himself with love and travel for his Country, is taken out of the bosom thereof, as a man treacherous, and put into the hands of the Guard to lead him to Pavia, the place of his imprisonment.

He was not suffered to speak with his father-in-law Symmachus, for all those who were honoured with his friendship are sequestred; scarcely had he the means to give the last adieu to his wife Rusticiana, who seeing her husband suddenly fallen from so eminent a dignity into such disaster, could not contain from saying unto him with scalding tears:

Sir, is this then it, which your innocencie hath deserved? If the King be resolved to put you to death, why suffereth he still a piece of your selfe to live, which hath ever been so dear unto you? I have courage enough to follow you either in exile, imprisonment, or death. But Boetius replied again in few words, that he might not any further increase her grief: Madam, the hour is not yet come, trouble not your self to see me suffer for justice. It is a title of honour which God hath reserved for his children. The education which you have derived from your good father, and the instructions you have received from me, give me occasion to hope you will bear this accident with a Christian resolution. My daughter, it is not fit that our tears, which fall from so much a higher place as we have been bred in greatness, may shew any dejection in the estimation of men. Support your self a little under your burthen, and open your heart to the consolations of heaven, since those of earth are mingled with so much acerbities. Then turning to his children all dissolved into tears: My children, (saith he) God hereafter will become your father. Make provision of great virtues, which have ever been the inheritance of our house, for all other blessings are but dust and wind. This is the lesson which God giveth you in the change of my fortune. Comfort your good mother by the dutie of faithful obedience, and live in hope: Perhaps you shall see me again, if it please God, sooner then you imagine.

These words were arrows that pierced these faithful hearts with most just resentments of nature, which could not quickly end, notwithstanding all the lenitives that might be applied.

The sixth SECTION.

The imprisonment of Boetius.

THe great changes of fortune, which suddenly happen, have this property in them, that they strike our souls as waves not foreseen, and give us the blow before we have leisure to understand our selves. The poor Boetius seeing himself between four walls, sequestered from the City, which had served as a theater of glory for all his house, taken away from the love of his own, bereft of his Library, and all the most precious accommodations of life, shut up as a victim destined for a bloody sacrifice, found himself in the beginning surprized with an overwhelming sadness, as he hath left expressed in writing. He bewailed with broken sighs his innocency unworthily handled; he traced in his thoughts the marks of his former fortune; he cast his eys upon his forsaken family, which seemed to him in the Lyons throat; he called into memory the unworthiness of his accusers who had been heard against him, the ingratitude of the Senate that had condemned him for being faithful unto them, the cruelty with which this sentence was executed, the wrack of his means, the loss of his reputation, and all the black horrours which a man declared criminal of treason, figureth to himself.

Then I can dure misfortuns averteris à te, Et flentes oculos claudere fœva negas. Lib. 1. Metr. 1.

In this abyss of disturbances, he was displeased as it were with death, which layeth hold on so many young men that desire nothing but to live, and deigned not so much as to shut up his eys, which he perpetually moistened with his tears. Hereupon we may see, that the most couragious spirits, in these accidents so strange and unexpected, ever pay some tribute to the natural passions of men. But likewise on the other side, we shall observe the power which a well rectified judgment hath over it self, when we behold it to dissipate all the troubles and agitations of the heart by the vivacity of reason, and use of precepts of wisdom, which he most exactly practised in this his captivity.

We have also the book of his Consolation, composed in this prison: which is verily in the judgment of learn'd men, one of the most excellent pieces of work that may be framed on this subject; where he introduceth Philosophie, who visiting and awakening him from this dead sleep of sadness.

What Boetius (saith she) are you be then, whom I have fed with my milk, whom I have cherished with so good nutriments, and bred up until you arrived to the strength of mans estate? Verily I have given you arms, which would strengthen you against all the strokes of fortune, were it not that you have forsaken them. Know you me no longer? From whence proceedeth this silence? Tell me, is it out of shame or stupidity? I had rather it were derived from a just bashfulness, but as far as I can perceive, you are become wholly senseless. Will you say nothing to me? Ah poor man, he is not absolutely lost, but so neer as I can guess, he hath a Lethargie, a common disease with those, who suffer themselves to be transported with illusions of the mind. He hath forgot himself, but he will recover, when he shall know me. Let us onely wipe his eys surcharged with terrestrial humours, and covered with a thick cloud of the world.

This done, Boetius came to himself, and framed an admirable Dialogue with this Queen of spirits, to which I remit the Reader, contenting my self to observe here the principal arguments, which served him for his Consolation, to the end we may learn with him in our afflictions, to fix our resolutions on the will of God, and suck honey from the Rock, as the Scripture speaketh.

Lib. 1. prof. 6. Maximus fomes salutis, vera de mundi gubernatione sententia.

The first reason proposed to him by this Wisdom descended from Heaven, was to ask of him, what opinion he had of the Providence of God, and whether he thought the world moved by chance, or were governed by reason? God forbid (saith Boetius) that I ever come to th s degree of folly, to think that all here below is casually done. I know God ruleth in the world, as in an house built by his own hands, and that nothing happeneth in the affairs of men, but either by his command or permission. Thereupon Philosophie crieth out. Just God! it is verily marvellous, that a man who hath such an understanding of the Divine Providence can be sick of the disease, wherewith I see you surprized. My friend, you entred into the world, as into a list or circle, whereof this Providence hath made the circuit with his own hands. It is fit you patiently Lib. 1. prof. 1. & alibi. suffer all that happeneth to you, within these limits, as an ordinance of God, to which you have submitted your self. It is he who governeth our lives, our conditions, our fortunes. If you be resolved to give law to the policie of the Omnipotent, from whom you ever ought to receive it, what else will you gain, but to make your self mutinous, and to render your condition more troublesom by your impatience?

I pray you think with your self, if you were embarqued in a vessel, you must go according to the impulsion of winds, and not the motion of your affections. If you till and sow, you shall have fruitful and barren years, according to the diversity of seasons; and you would have a fortune ever equal and perpetually stable? you would hold back by force of arms its chariot incessantly circumvolving? Are not you very simple not to know, that if she were not inconstant, she could no longer be fortune?

Go not about here to question with me upon the afflictions of good men, and the prosperities of evil. What injurie doth God to an innocent, if he allot him the share of all those great souls, whom he will not entertain in the pleasures of an idle life, but in the exercise of vertue? Know you not there are fishes that die in standing waters, and are delighted in the bubling of sluces? Great spirits go all that way, they no more loose themselves in tribulation, then the sun in his eclipse, which onely serveth to make him more resplendent.

And what advantage, think you, do the wicked derive from the benefits of this life? Is there any thing more miserable then to be transformed into a beast by the enormities of vices, and to add impunitie to so many crimes? You say, they do whatsoever they list; and I say they are thereby so much the more miserable: for if it be an unhappiness to desire an evil, it is a double misery to have the power to execute it,

If all offenders were punished according to their demerit, they should have some benefit which they have not, to wit, the punishment of their misdeeds, which being a work of justice cannot but be good; they should have some bridle to stay their exorbitancy, some apprehension of the judgments of God; which being stole from them by long prosperities, what else remaineth for them but to pass to extremity of punishments by the extremity of crimes? For my part, if I should throughly punish a depraved man, I would ordain for him neither wheels, flames, nor tortures, but I would burst him with honours, gold, silver, and riches; and when he were full up to the throat, I would draw aside the curtain, to let him see virtue and Paradise, of which he had betrayed the one and lost the other, by the disaster of his carriage.

Lib 3. Met. 2. Quid dignè flebilibus mentibus imprecer, &c.

The second question which Philosophie asked him, was, if he knew well who himself was? And Boetius, answering, He was a man of honour, reviving the memory of the great riches and dignities he had enjoyed heretofore. Verily (saith she to him) I well see there is much forgetfulness of your condition, and niceness in your complaints. If God had put gold as well as blood into your veins, and given you leave to be born full stuffed with precious stones, or laden with honours and dignities from your mothers womb, you had some cause to deplore, that the inheritances of your birth were taken from you: but who are you, or from whence come you? I could tell you how many years it is since you were born a little infant, all naked, creeping on the earth, and having a mouth open to cries and hunger, which had not so much as one little hair on the body to cover it; and now you take upon you the spirit of a Monarch, and think you have nothing, if you possess not all? Verily are you not one of the most miserable, if you do not know how to take contentment in that which is left you, and not still to tie your selfe to sorrows for that which you have lost? You have a father-in-law which is Symmachus, one of the most excellent men in the world, you have a wife, the pearl of her sex, you have children of great hope. How many things would you buy at the price of your life, if you had lost them? And yet you think you are miserable when you possess them, and when they are employed with all their endeavour for your deliverance.

vide Tem. Lib. 2. de Consideratione cap. 19.

Your vessel doth yet lie at anchor, and is not altogether broken: I see comfort in something for the present, and hope for the future; and happen what soever will, I will save you by swimming. But needs must I freely confess, that I find a little niceness in this your act, when you deplore with so much bitterness and affliction the petty wants of your condition. Tell me, I pray you is there any man in the world, who possesseth a felicitie so full and free, as not to dispute with his fortunes, to make his estate more happie? The condition of worldly goods, findeth every where thorns; prosperities never come all together, and although they arrived in heaps, they ever would have a slippery place.

Lib. 2. Pros. 4.

One is accommodated with honest means, but is of base extraction, which maketh him to blush in good companie. Another is very Noble, but is so poor in his estate, that it were much fitter for him to be unknown. Another is born of good rank, and hath no want of riches, but he bewaileth that part which he hath lost, consecrating himself to retirement with wilful tears. Another hath met with a good marriage, but his barrenness maketh him amass riches for a stranger. Another hath children, to have cause of great miseries: and to speak in a word, you shall finde very few, who well agree with their condition. Through all, there are evils, which give happiness to those who are ignorant of them, & horrour to such as have tried them.

Add also a reason, that these men, very fortunate, are extreamly sensible upon the touch, and as there needs not any thing but a pegg to stay a piece of artillerie upon the way, so the least accident hindereth the glory of their greatnes. How many think you are there, who would touch Heaven with a finger, if they had but onely the surplusage of your fortune? This place, which you call your banishment, is the country of so many honest men as inhabit it, and if you reason well, you shall finde, that there is as it were nothing miserable, if not made so by opinion.

Finally I ask you, whether ever you have had any thing in the world more precious then your self? If you answer truly, you will protest unto me, assuredly no: and yet notwithstanding, behold you, thanks be to God, if you will, to have so much and more for your self, then ever you had, and that neither prison nor fetters may prejudice the liberty of your spirit.

The third reason, which is very much at large deduted in this divine work, is drawn from the vanity of all temporal goods, where wisdom proveth by very good reasons, that if the sorrows we have for the world, might be measured at the rate of the things which contristate us, as there is nothing great in this vale of tears, so should there not be any thing capable of much disquiet. Mourn we for mettals, which are the nest of rust, and the tinder of concupiscence? for attires, which are the nourishment of mothes? for bodies, which are the food of worms? for houses which are the bones of the earth, piled one upon another with cement and morter? for precious stones, which are the excrements of an enraged sea, borrowing their worth from our illusion? for honours, which are golden masks and weather-cocks of inconstancie?

What a folly is it to hold retirement for a punishment, which so many brave spirits have taken for a Paradise, and to think our selves sharpely punished, when we no longer behold behind us great trains of servitours, who burden us with their crimes, and make us become answerable for their souls.

What an errour is it to desire to hold riches locked up, which never are what they ought to be, but when they are distributed? For they resemble a dung hil, which stinketh when it is together heaped, and fatteneth the fields when it is spread abroad. We move Heaven and Earth to flie from povertie, and finde it in our riches; for great fortunes are now adays so hungrie, and have so much ado to maintain themselves, that although the needie are ever the most poor, yet is there nothing more beggerly then the rich, who have a thousand dependances, and a thousand necessities, whereunto their felicitie is fastened, as with a chain.

What a charm is it to think then to be happie, when you manage the affairs of Great-ones; where never is any thing done to please them, if you make not your self a slave to all their passions, where favours are granted of feathers, and disgraces inflicted of lead? Where your sleep, your life, and your faith is sold for a pleasing fantasm, which lasteth no longer then the dream of one night?

Deserveth not a man to be strucken down as an enemy of reason, when unloosened from this slaverie, he withereth, languisheth, and sighs for his fetters, ready prest a thousand times to kiss the hands of him, who again would enchain him.

What a mockerie is it to affect greatnes among men? as if a rat would make himself a Lord among mice, and to feed himself with glory, which is nothing but a swelling of the ear. Oh Boetius, Seneca desired under Nero, and Papinian under Antoninus, the solitude which thou now enjoyest; but whilst they endeavoured to break their bands, and leaned to a ruinous wall, the mass of their greatnes transported and buried them. Behold thy self retired from affairs, into a chamber of Pavia: behold thy self in repose, and among books, the first entertainment of thy young days; why dost thou not now presently make a virtus of the happiness, which the providence of God offereth thee?

Prof. 6. l. 3. O gloria, gloria! mille libus hominum mortalium nihil aliud nisi auricum in statio magna. Dum vaiturus moles ipsa trahit.

For a third point, he considered the fruits that might be derived from tribulation, when it is well managed. Prosperitie (saith this wisdom unto him) is windie, open, slipperie, and inconsiderate. Adversitie quite otherwise, is sober, reserved, prudent, and circumspect; the one under appearences of felicities, bringeth unto us an infinite of lies; the other, is ever grave and sincere; the one deceiveth us, the other instructeth us; the one blindeth us, the other enlighteneth us; the one polluteth us, the other purifieth us; the one charmeth us, and tieth up our understanding, the other enfranchiseth us; the one separateth us from our soveraign good, and maketh us fall into a thousand sorts of vanities, the other draweth us back, as with a hook, to the consideration of eternitie; the one createth for us many flatteries, the other discovereth unto us many true friends. Let us suffer a little, Boetius, and if this seem troublesome, think, that as thy prosperities have passed away, so shall thy adversities. The last day of thy life, which cannot be far off, will ever be the last of thy ill fortunes, if thou leave not it, it will forsake thee: it is an ordinance of God, that favours and disgraces cannot be of long continuance, and that for mortals there is no evil immortal.

Finally, for the last reason, the holy man, who had composed so learned books of the mysteries of our faith, forsaking all the comforts of humane things, drenched himself very far into the consideration of blessings in the other life, of eternity, and the excellency of God. He considered it, as an infinite sea of essence, bounty, beatitude, which encloseth in it self all being, all good, all verity. He saw the whole. Universe in this immensity of God, as a spunge would be in the midst of the Ocean, an atome in the air, and a little globe of glass, enchased in the first Heaven. He saw in his bosome all glory, all dignities, all riches, all treasurs, all pleasures, all consolations, all delight, all joys, and all beatitudes; he walked at ease in those fourteen abysses of greatnes, which are in God, to wit, infinity, immensity, immutability, eternity, omnipotency, wisdom, perfection, sanctity, benignity, power, providence, mercy, justice, and the end whereunto all things tend. This is insetted in my Journey.

From thence he beheld the Word Incarnate, the true King of the afflicted, and all the Saints laden with crosses and persecutions, thinking himself very happy to mingle his tears with the bloud of so many brave courages, who had gained Heaven with violence.

This consolation overflowing his heart, drowned all his acerbities, and infinitely sweetned the sharpness of his captivity.

Behold the fruits, which the wise Boetius gathered in his prison; well shewing, that virtue is an hostess tractable in every lodging, and who looseth no part of her liberty in chains. It onely appertaineth to huge mountains, to bear snow and verdure at one and the same time, and to great souls to retain a holy vigour in the strength of afflictions.

The seventh SECTION.

The death of Boetius.

IT is a loss, that the Authours which have written of this death, have cut off so short the last act of a life so eminent. There is not any thing, saith one, so curious in a statue, nor so hard to polish, as the nails; and nothing which more clearly maketh the perfection of a man accomplished in virtues to be seen, as a good death. I will here speak that, which I have drawn from the most probable authours, touching the death of Boetius.

It is certain he was very long in this prison, since he complaineth in this Preface of a book, which he composed during the time of his captivity, that his spirit was in declination, his body being worn with the torments he endured by the rigour of a King of the Goths. Death in the end came to unloose his fetters, by an act very barbarous, exercised by Theodorick on this admirable man.

He seeing Pope John had done nothing in his favour at Constantinople, but in stead of causing the Temples of the Arians to be restored, had purified and changed them into Catholick Churches, entred into a fury more exorbitant then ever, and kept this good Pope in prison at Ravenna, until he was wasted with diseases, yielding up his most blessed soul in fetters, to hasten to enjoy the liberty of the elect.

Cyprian and Basilius, accusers of Boetius, failed not to kindle the fire with all their power, to ruin him whom they already had wounded. There was sent unto him a Commissary, who was Governour of Pavia, to interrogate him upon matters, wherewith with he had been charged. The King promising him by this instrument a reasonable usage, if he would confess all the process of this imaginary conspiracy, Boetius having heard what his commission imported, replieth:

Tell the King your master, that my conscience and age have reduced me to those terms, wherein neither menaces nor allurements can work any thing upon me to the prejudice of reason. To require the proceeding of my conspiracy, is to demand a Chymera, which hath never been nor ever shall. Is the distrust of his witnesses so great, that needs he must exact from my mouth the articles of my condemnation? Verily he hath as much cause to doubt my accusers, as I matter of glory to be accused by mouths so impure, that they would as it were justifie the greatest delinquents by their depositions. One Basilius chased from the Court, and charged with debt, hath been bought to sell my blood, and having lost credit in all things, finds more then enough for my ruin. Opilion and Gaudentius condemned to banishment, for an infinite number of wicked practises, they being fled to Altars, the King redoubleth an Edict, by which he ordained, if they instantly went not out of Ravenna, they should be branded in the forehead with an hot iron. What may be added to such an infamy? Yet notwithstanding the same day they were received and heard against me. Arrows are made of all wood to transfix me, and the most criminal are freed in my accusation. Some being not ashamed to employ against the life of a Senatour those, who would scarcely have been set to confront very slaves.

This makes me say my condemnation is premeditated, and my death already vowed, and that this search is made for petty formalities, to disguise an injustice.

King Theodorick playeth too much the Politician for a man, who hath full liberty to do ill. What need is there to use so many tricks? Tell him boldly from me, that I submitt to his condemnation. I was willing to save the Senate, though little grateful for the sincerity of my affections: I wished the repose of the Catholick Church: I have sought the liberty of the Romane people: Here is all that I can say. As I am not in condition to tell a lie; so am I not on terms to conceal a truth. Had I known the means to reduce the Empire into better order he should never have understood it. Finally, if he be resolved to put me to death thereupon, let him hasten his blow. It is long since I have had death in desire, and life in patience.

The Commissary much amazed at this constancy, made his relation to the King in very sharp words, which put oyl afresh into the flame, to thrust affairs into extremities. The poor Rusticiana wife of Boetius, knowing the point whereunto the safety of her husband was reduced, made use of all the attractives she could, to mitigate the fury of the Prince: and observing Amalazunta, the daughter of Theodorick, to be an honourable Lady, and endowed with a singular bounty, she recommended her petitions and tears to her. This Lady gave her access to the King, to whom she with her children presented her self in a most deplorable State, able to soften obdurate rocks.

Alas, Sir Said she, if you once more deign to behold from the throne of your glory the dust of the earth, cast your eys upon a poor afflicted creature, which is but the shadow of what she hath been. I no longer am Rusticiana, who saw palms and honours grow in her house, as flowers in meadows: Disaster having taken him from me, by whom I subsisted, hath left me nothing but the image of my former fortune, the sorrows of the passed, the grief of the present, and horrour of the time to come.

I would swear upon Altars, that my husband hath never failed in the duty which he oweth to your Majesty; but calumny hath depainted his innocency unto you with a coal, to inflame you with choler against a man, who ever held your interests as dear unto him as his own. I know what he hath so many times said unto me thereof, and how he hath bred his children, whom your Majestie now beholdeth at your feet. If we no longer shall take benefit of justice, Sir, I implore your mercy. Look on a woman, worthy of compassion, tossed in the storm, and who beholdeth in the haven the Olives of peace, which you always have desired to equal with your laurels. Suffer me, I may embrace them: The world already hath cause enough to dread your power; give us cause to love it proportionably to your bounty. Alas, Sir, on whom will you bestow it? Fire, which consumeth all, burneth not ashes, and behold us here covered with ashes before your eys: what more desire you of us? A miserable creature is a sacred thing; the God of the afflicted taketh it into his protection, and will no more have it touched then his Altars. If my unhappiness have set me in that rank, and my sex made me a just object of your pity, Sir, render that to me, which I in this world do hold most precious; and think not we ever will retain any resentment of what is past, when we shall see our selves re-established in our former fortune. It is in you to command, and for us to obey your ordinances, and even to kiss the thunder-bolt that striketh us.

It is to much purpose to present musick to the ears of Tygers, it hath no other effect but to enrage them the more. The cruel Tyrant presently commanded the Lady to withdraw; adding he would do her justice. And they ceasing not still to multiply suspitions with him upon this pretended conspiracy, as if Boetius had now been presently with sword in hand with the Emperour Justine at the gates of Rome or Ravenna, he fell into such fear, gall, and choller, that without any other formal proceeding of justice, he dispatched the afore-mentioned Commissary with a Tribune, to put him to death, whose life was so precious to the Romane Empire.

Boetius, who had a long time been prepared both by prayers and the sacraments of the Church, for this last hour, knowing the cause wherefore they came, beheld them with a confident countenance, and said: Performe your commission boldly: It is long since I knew, that death alone must open the gates of this prison for me. And having spoken this, he contained himself some while in a deep silence, recommending to God this last act of his life, and consigning to him his soul, which during this imprisonment he had so often whitened with his tears, and purified as in a precious limbeck of eternal charities, wherein all great souls are deified.

This done, he went forward with a settled pace to the place of execution, which the King would have very secret, not to excite the people; where seeing himself, Behold here (saith he) the Theater which I have so long desired. I protest before the face of the living God, and his holy Saints, that I have ever had most sincere intentions for the good of the State, nor am I culpable of any of these crimes objected against me. If my innocency be now oppress, there shall come a better posterity, which shall draw aside the curtain, and entertain the rays of truth.

O Rome, O Rome, would to God thou mightest be purified by my blood, and I to be the last victim sacrificed for publick safety! I will not now accuse him who condemned me, desiring God rather may open his eys to see the justice of my cause, and the plots practised upon his own soul. Behold the recompence I gain, for becoming hoarie in his service; but God is the faithful witness of all my actions, and in his bosom is it now, where I lay down my life, my body, my soul, and all my interests.

There was but one poore gentleman-waiter, that accompanied him in this passage: who, as he poured out tears near unto him, Boetius earnestly beholding him, said: where is your resolution, leave these tears for the miserable, and tell my father-in-law, my wife, and children, that I have done nothing here unworthy of their honour, and that they act nothing unworthy of me, by bewailing me with plaints, which would be little honourable for the condition of my death, but that they rather take this accident as a gift from Heaven. They well know I have ever told them, it is not here, where he should expect repose, but in the place, where I hope to prepare them a room. These words spoken, they proceeded to execution by the barbarous commandment given by Theodorick.

I have read in a very antient manuscript, from whence I have drawn som particulars couched therein, that a cruel torture was inflicted on this holy man, long time strayning a cord about his forehead, in such sort, that his eys started out of his head, and that in the end they knocked him down with a leaver: which I cannot think to be probable, seeing all other constantly affirm his head was cut off by the hand of a hangman: and Martianus, who most eloquently wrote his life, addeth, that by miracle he some space of time held his head in his own hands, like another S. Denis, until he gave up the ghost before the Altar of a Chappel very near to the place of his execution.

His

His body was interred in the Church of S. Auguſtine, to whom he had a particular devotion, and his name put among the Martyrs, as Baronius obſerveth, becauſe he died partly for the defence of the Catholick Church againſt the Arians. The place of his impriſonment hath been preſerved as a great monument of piety, his Tomb honoured with Verſes, ſuch as that time could afford, where among other things this title is given him:

BOETIVS IN COELO MAGNVS, ET OMNI PERSPECTVS MVNDO.

The King ſtayed not a whit after this to put Symmachus his father-in-law to death, and to confiſcate all the goods both of the one and other, which was a very lamentable thing; yet notwithſtanding the courageous Ruſticiana bare the death of her father and huſband with ſo great conſtancy, that ſhe deſerved to draw all ſucceeding Ages into admiration; for ſhe ſpake moſt freely to the King reproaching him with his diſloyalty, and honoured theſe two eminent ſouls as Saints, much offended with her ſelf, if at any time nature won tears from her eye, as judging them too baſe to be ſacrificed to ſo flouriſhing a memory.

Procop. l. 1. The vengeance of God ſlakened not long to fall upon the guilty head of Theodorick; for few days after this act, as he continually lived in the repreſentations of his crime, his imagination was ſo troubled, that being at the table, when they came to ſerve up the great head of a fiſh, he figured to himſelf it was the head of Symmachus, the laſt of all butchered, and although much endeavour was uſed to remove this fantaſie from him, it was impoſſible to give remedy, but he roſe from the table like a man affrighted, crying out murther, and felt inſtantly ſuch a quaking over all his body, and beſides ſuch convulſions in all his members, that he muſt needs preſently be carried to his bed; where he was viſited by his Phiſician, to whom he complained with much horrour, that he had ſhed blood which would perpetually bleed againſt him. The feaver and frenzie carried him hence into the other world, where he had a marvellous account to make; of whom we know no more particulars: yet Saint Gregory witneſſeth that he learned from the mouth of a man worthy of credit, that the ſame day he died at Rome, certain honourable perſons being at Lipari, a little Iſland of Sicilie, in the Cell of an Hermit, who lived in the reputation of great ſanctity, he ſaid unto them: Know ye, that King Theodorick is no more? They replying, Nay not ſo, we left him alive, and in health. Notwithſtanding (ſaith he) I can well aſſure you he died to day in Rome, and which is more, is judged, condemned, and thrown into the ſtore-houſes of ſubterranean fire, which we here call the Cauldron of Vulcan. And it was a ſtrange thing, that they being returned to Rome, underſtood the death of this wretched King to have been at that very time, told by the Hermit; which was held for a moſt manifeſt judgment of God, and made all thoſe to tremble, who heard the relation thereof. Greg. l. 4. & 30. Olla Vulcani.

Athalaricus his grand-child by his daughter, although an infant, ſucceeded to his eſtates, under the regency of his mother Amalazunta, who reſtored all the goods had been confiſcated to the Widow, that lived afterward, until Juſtinian got the Empire from the Goths, by the means of Beliſarius: at which time ſhe made all the Images and Statues of Theodorick to be broken, cauſing alſo another proceſs to be framed againſt him after his death.

Alas, great God, who governeſt the ſtate of this Univerſe, and makeſt the pillars of Heaven to ſhake under thy foot-ſteps! what is man who will practiſe wiles in a matter of policie, contrary to thy eternal Maxims? How hath this wretch ended, looſing ſoul, Empire, and ſalvation, to purſue a phantaſm? He roared like thunder in the clouds, on the theater of humane things, and then paſt away, leaving nothing behind but ſtorms, dirt, and morter: at which time thy good ſervant Boetius, walking in the ways which thou preſcribedſt him, is mounted to the glory of the elect, leaving here behind him the precious memory of his name to all poſterity.

THE LADIE TO LADIES

LADIES,

I Should do an injurie to Sanctity, even in the Holy Court, if having undertaken to ſpeak of Piety of Great-ones in theſe Treatiſes, I ſhould paſs Ladies under ſilence, who in all times have contributed to the glory of Chriſtianity ſo much force beyond their ſex, as virtue's above nature. God hath employed them in the great affairs of all Ages, ſince the Word, which from all eternity acknowledged but one Father in Heaven, hath been pleaſed to acknowledge in latter times, one Mother upon earth: and that he who is able to cloath the Meadows with the enamel of Flowers, and Heaven with the beautie of Lights, took fleſh and blood of a Virgin, to make himſelf a garment, and frame to himſelf a body. And as the chaſte womb of a woman ſerved him for a lodging at his firſt entrance into the world: ſo when he would iſſue out amongſt ſo many horrours, puniſhments, and images of death, when ſtones were rent aſunder for grief under his feet, and Heaven diſtended it ſelf with ſorrow over his head, women were alſo found near to the Croſs, as witneſſes of his laſt words, and ſurvivers of his blood.

Here, O Ladies, are eternal alliances, which you have contracted with devotion; and he who would bereave you the ſweetneſs of its repoſe, ſhould baniſh you from your own houſes. So many men as ſtir up quarrels, ſeem now adays to have no other profeſſion, but to kill and die upon credit. Thoſe, who are converſant with books, waſte themſelves in the pleaſing tortures of the mind. Others, who are involved in the turmoils of publick affairs, oftentimes gain nought elſe but ſmoak and noiſe. But when I behold you under the title of the Devout Sex, which is given you by the Church, I hope your bleſſing is in the dew of Heaven, and that you reſemble Bees, which are born in honey, or rather thoſe birds of the fortunate Iſlands, nouriſhed with perfumes.

Believe me, thoſe of your Sex who have not true piety, had they a world of greatneſs and beauties, and were it that all the riches of this world had rendered it ſelf tributary to their intemperance, would be no more eſteemed before God, then the flower of graſs, or ſcum of earth. But ſuch as take the way of holy and ſolid virtues, enter into a life wholly Angelical, which forgetting Sex and natural imperfections, furniſheth it ſelf with the moſt perfect idea's of the Divinity.

Behold hereof a model, which I preſent unto you in this Treatiſe, where, after I have obſerved, rather by ſpeculation then practice, ſome blemiſhes, which might varniſh the luſtre of ſo many celeſtial beauties, I reduce the piety of Ladies into ſuch bright ſplendour of day-light, that it were to have no eys, not to admire the merit thereof.

I have been willing to make this ſervice ſuitable to my habit, and not unworthy of your conſiderations, thereunto invited by Ladies, who have happily allied virtue to the moſt eminent qualities of the Kingdom, and who might ſerve me for a Model, were they in a much better Age then my ſelf. If God, who hath inſpired me with theſe contemplations, grant your performance, I ſhall have the Crown of my vows, and you, that of your perfections.

THE LADIE.

The first SECTION.

That the HOLY COURT cannot subsist without the virtue of Ladies, and of their Piety in the advancement of Christianity.

BEhold where I purpose to shut up this Work of the HOLY COURT, which I have brought thus far with labour enough. And since God after those great works of the Creation, reposed, so soon as he had made woman, he thereby shews me an example to give some rest to my pen, when I shall have represented unto you the perfections of a Lady, such as I would wish her, to serve as an ornament for Christianity, and a model of virtue.

Yet Reader, I must needs tell you, I feared this haven, whereunto I see my self arrive of necessity, as well for that I learned of the great Martyr S. Justin, that a singular discretion must be had to treat with women, and that he doth very much, who can love their virtues without danger: besides, being naturally disposed to brevity, I somewhat doubted least they might insensibly communicate by my discourse some touches of those great delays, which they use in attiring themselves: & verily I see there are many things may be said both of the one side and other: But as it is an act somewhat uncivil to run inconsiderately into invectives against the sex, so it is an unworthy servitude of mind to be too obsequious to them, and render vices incorrigible, by a false presumption of virtues.

Justin. ad Zenam. Serenum. Τὸ δὲ ὅπως ἀγαπᾶν μὲν τὸ μὴ κακῶς δυμένων.

I am much bound to my profession, that it sequestreth me from these two rocks, where so many vessels suffer shipwrack. If I must blame you, I will do as he who slew the serpent, not touching the body of his son twined up in his folds; I will strike vice without slandering the sex, and if they must be praised, I look on them as the idæa's of Plato, which have nothing in them common with matter.

Alcon of Creet.

I begin to verifie my first proposition, and say, the good life of women is a piece so necessary for Christianity, that it cannot be cut off without introducing a notable disorder: and this I say, because there are many uncollected spirits in the world, who make it their glory to act all against the hair, to oppose the most sound opinions, to give the lie to nature, and do that in the world, which Momus did in fables. Sometimes they set themselves to censure the State, and find somewhat to say of military matters, treasures, laws, and offices: sometimes they frame Common-wealths of Plato in their empty brains, and constitute new forms of government, which never will have being but in their chymæra's. When they have touched upon the Purple and Diadem, they busie themselves to controle God upon the masterpieces of nature, and among other things, that he hath done ill to create a woman.

Si mundus absque mulieribus esset, conversatio nostra non esset absque Dii.

Cato the Censor said in his time, That if the world were without women, the conversation of men would not be exempt from the company of Gods. And a Doctor of the Jews yielding a reason why the Eternal Word had so long time deferred its Incarnation, said nothing else, but that the world was then replenished with bad women, and that four thousand years were not able to furnish out one good one, to serve as an instrument suitable to the greatness of this Mystery. Another having lived free from the bands of marriage, caused to be set on his tomb: Vixit sine impedimento, He lived without hinderance, which was a phrase very obscure to express what he would say: Notwithstanding it was found this hinderance, whereof he spake, was a woman. This may well happen through the vice and misery wherein the state of this present life hath confined us: but to speak generally, we must affirm, had it been the best way to frame the world without a woman, God had done it, never expecting the advise of these brave Cato's; and whosoever endeavoureth to condemn marriage, as a thing not approved by God, sheweth, that he is either out of his wits, or a publick enemy to mankinde.

S. Zeno homil. de continent. Aut hostis publicus, aut insanus.

The great S. Peter, in whose heart God locked up the Maxims of the best policy of the world, was of another opinion, when he judged the good and laudable conversation of women, rendered it self so necessary for Christianity, that it was a singular mean to gain those to God, who would not submit themselves to the Gospel. Whereupon he affordeth an incomparable honour to the virtue of holy women, disposing it in some sort into a much higher degree of force and utility, then the Preaching of the word of God: and in effect it seemeth this glorious Apostle, by a spirit of prophesie, foresaw an admirable thing, which afterward appeared in the revolution of many Ages, which is, that God hath made such use of the piety of Ladies for the advancement of Christianity, that in all the most flourishing Kingdoms of Christendom, there are observed still some Queens or Princesses, who have the very first of all advanced the Standard of the Cross upon the ruins of Infidelity. Helena planted true Religion in the Roman Empire, Cæsar in Persia, Theodelinda in Italy, Clotilda in France, Indegundis in Spain, Margerite in England, Gysellis in Hungary, Dambruca in Poland, Olga in Russia, Ethelberga in Germany, not speaking of an infinite number of others, who have happily maintained and encreased that, which was couragiously established.

1 Pet. 3. Ut qui non credunt Verbo, per conversationem mulierum sine verbo lucrifiant.

Reason also favoureth my proposition; for we must necessarily confess, there is nothing so powerfull to perswade what ever it be, as complacence and flattery; since it was the smoothest attractive, which the evil spirit made use of in the terrestrial Paradise to overthrow the first man, setting before him the alluring pleasures of an Eve, very newly issued out of the hands of God.

Now every one knows nature hath imparted to woman a very good portion of these innocent charms: and if many by these priviledges are also powerfull in actions so wicked, why should not so many many virtuous ſouls generouſly employ'd in the ſervice of the great God, bear as much ſway, ſince he accuſtometh to communicate a grace wholly new to the good qualities, that are aimed to his honour?

I conjure all Women and Ladies, who ſhall read this Treatiſe, to take from hence a generous ſpirit, and never permit vice and curioſity may derive tribute from ſuch ornaments, as God hath conferred on them, it being unfit to ſtuff Babylon with the gold and marbles of Sion.

The ſecond SECTION.

That women are capable of good lights and ſolid inſtruments.

SInce I ſee my ſelf obliged by my deſign to make a brief model of principal perfections, which may be deſired for the compliſhment of an excellent Ladie, and that this diſcourſe cannot be throughly perfected without obſerving vicious qualities, which are blemiſhes oppoſite to the virtues we endeavour to eſtabliſh; I will make uſe of the clew of ſome notable invention in ſo great a labyrinth of thoughts, the better to facilitate the way.

I remember to have heretofore read a very rare manuſcript of Theodoſius of Malta, a Greek Authour, touching the nuptials of Theophilus Emperour of Conſtantinople, and his wife Theodora, which will furniſh us with a ſingular entrance into that, which we now ſeek for; ſo that we add the embelliſhment of ſo many Oracles of wiſdom to the foundations, which this Hiſtorian hath layed.

Anno 830. Zonaras ſaith, that ſhe was onely ſtepmother, and relateth it ſomewhat otherwiſe, but let us follow our Authour.

He recounteth, that this Theophilus being on the point to diſpoſe himſelf for marriage, the Empreſs his mother, named Euphroſina, who paſſionately deſired the contentment of her ſon in an affair of ſo great importance, diſpatched her Embaſſadours through all the Provinces of the Empire, to draw together the moſt accompliſhed maidens which might be found in the whole circuit of his Kingdom. And for that purpoſe ſhe ſhut up within the walls of Conſtantinople, the rareſt beauties of the whole world, aſſembling a great number of Virgins into a chamber of his Palace, called for curioſity, The Pearl. The day being come, wherein the Emperour was to make choice of her to whom he would give his heart with the Crown of the Empire, the Empreſs his mother ſpake to him in theſe terms:

MY LORD AND SON, Needs muſt I confeſs, that ſince the day nature bound me ſo ſtreightly to your perſon, next after God, I neither have love, fear, care, hope, nor contentment, but for you. The day yieldeth up all my thoughts to you, and the night, which ſeemeth made to reſt the agitations of our ſpirit, never raiſeth the remembrance of you from my heart. I acknowledge my ſelf doubly obliged to procure with all my endeavours what ere concerneth your good, becauſe I am your mother, and that I ſee you charged with an Empire, which is no ſmall burthen to them who have the diſcretion to underſtand what they undertake.

It ſeems to me ſince the death of the Emperour your father, my moſt honoured Lord, I have ſo many times newly been delivered of you, as I have ſeen thorny affairs in the manage of your State. And at this time, when I behold you upon terms to take a wife, and that I know by experience to meet with one who is accompliſhed with all perfections neceſſary for your State, is no leſs rare then the acquiſition of a large Empire; the care I have ever uſed in all, concerns your glory and contentment, is therefore now more ſenſible with me, then at any other time heretofore.

It is true, O moſt dear Son, that the praiſe-worthy inclinations which I have obſerved in your Majeſtie, give me as much hope as may reaſonably be conceived in the courſe of humane things: yet notwithſtanding the accidents we ſee to happen ſo contrary to their proceedings, do alſo entertain my mind in ſome uncertainty.

That you may take ſome reſolution upon this matter, behold in the Pearl of Conſtantinople, I have made choice of the moſt exquiſite maidens of your empire, to the end your Majeſtie may chuſe her, whom you ſhall judge moſt worthy of your choſt affections. I beſeech God, who is Authour of Marriage, to direct your ſpirit in this choice, & diſpoſe it to that which ſhall be to his greater glory, wherein you ſhall ever find your contentments.

When ſhe had ſpoken this, ſhe drew out of a box a golden apple, enameled with precious ſtones, which ſhe had purpoſely cauſed to be made, that it might be preſented to her, who ſhould be choſen out for the bed of her ſon, and putting it into the Emperours hand:

Behold (ſaith he) the golden apple, which I leave to your diſcretion, to give it to the moſt abſolute. You have the Commiſſion of Paris in your hands, but you ſhall do well to diſpoſe of it more diſcretely then he.

The Emperour, after he had moſt affectionately given thanks to his mother for ſo many excellent proofs of her affection, asked of her by what note might one know a wife truly virtuous, and ſo accompliſhed as ſhe wiſhed.

Euphroſina replied: It is no ſleight demand, O Emperour, nor can that ſo readily be reſolved; yet by your good favour, I will roughly delineate this diſcourſe with ſo much ſincerity, as not to attribute any thing to my ſex, to the prejudice of truth.

There are three ſorts of men, who cannot ſpeak well of us: whereof the firſt are certain ſcoffers, who to put themſelves into an humour, and to give ſcope to their wits, have no diſcourſe more familiar in their mouthes, then the condemnation of women: and God forbid, theſe ſhould be any other then Poets or Philoſophers; for they frame diſcourſes of our nature, and extravagancies to no purpoſe.

I revenge my ſelf commonly upon theſe kind of men by ſilence: for it is to caſt water on coals, to hear them without reply, and to puniſh their tattle by contempt.

Others are men wounded in ſport, and who have not well digeſted ſome diſgraces they have received from women, to whom either vice, folly, or malice hath engaged them more then was expedient for their quiet. Theſe are, as if a dog hurt with a ſtone, ſhould run up and down to bite all the ſtones he findes in his way; yea, thoſe which are laid by work-men in the buildings of Churches and houſes. They fall upon all women for having been deceived, as they ſay by a woman; and ceaſe not to ſcratch the wound, to renew the ſmart of it. But who ſees not it is a metr paſſion, to blame the general for the deſerts of particulars?

In the third rank, are certain melancholly furious creatures; or ſuch as have ſomething worſe in them then fury, who have not ſo much proclaimed war againſt our ſex, as denounced it againſt total nature, which covereth us with its arms in this point, and confirmeth us in our right by their ſilence.

Some of theſe, who are ſtrong in paſſion, and diſcover their revenge with pretext of learning, would perſwade us, that the meaneſt ſpirit of all the men in the world, is more eminent then that of the moſt capable woman.

Verily, I will not raiſe my ſex above the merit thereof, thinking we ſhall ever be high enough, if we abide in the rank which God hath given us.

But whether we conſider reaſon, or whether we regard experience, they very pertinently make void this Chymera of conceit which hath taken birth from ſelf-love and folly, as from its two moſt ſuitable elements.

I would willingly demand of theſe diſcourſers, whether they hold ſouls to have a ſex? Never will they avow this opinion, unleſs they mean to renounce faith and reaſon. And if our ſouls be indifferently created by God, why do they thereupon go about to forge diſtinctions, which have not any ſubſiſtence, but in their depraved imaginations. Tertul. l. de anima. Anima non habent ſexum.

If ſome ſay this diverſitie proceedeth from the bodies; who knoweth not, that the diſpoſition of Organs, from which it is thought the goodneſs of wit proceedeth, is as advantagious in women as men? See we not even at this day in all ſorts of conditions, men ſometimes ſo abject in wit and capacitie, that if one degree ſhould be taken from them, it ſeems they would have but ſufficient to become beaſts? And have we not ſeen in all times women intelligent and capable, ſome whereof have made themſelves appear as miracles in arts, and others ſhewed, that if they were ignorant, we could attribute it to no cauſe, but to the modeſtie of their condition.

I ſhould be to copious if I now went about to enlarge my ſelf upon the goodly works of Sophina, Erinna, Soſipatris, Cleobulina, Theoniſtoclea, Teleſilla, Zenobia, and Eudoxia. Thoſe who condemn in us the want of wit, oſtentimes wiſh we had leſs, and would ſettle a good part of their contentment in our ſtupiditie.

We hold for an undoubted truth, that God having created us with this equalitie of ſouls, we have as much right in knowledges neceſſarie, for us in matter of grace, virtues, and glory, as men can have. One thing I may well say, that the complexion of feminine bodies, may distil into our souls inconstancies, infirmities, and passions, which perhaps would take an irregular flight, were they not repressed by pitty and reason.

For my part, I think Simonides hath not very ill expressed the ten Orders, wherein he hath made of the humours of women, and that will much help you in the choice you are to make, if your Majesty will take so much pain as to be informed thereof.

In saying this, she caused her Virgins to draw near; and as heretofore those of Sparta shewed drunken men to their children, to make them to abhor drunkenness, so framed she a description of the bad natures of women, to procure a detestation thereof, and exalt the merit of the virtuous, by the counterpoize of their contrary.

The third Section.

The ten Orders of women, and the vitious qualities which Ladyes ought especially to avoid.

BEhold Maidens (saith she) and advise in good time to lay hold on the tenth rank: for there are nine neither pleasing nor laudable.

Sus luta & volutabro Pet. 2. 2.

In the first sphere are those, which are of the nature of a hog, creatures unworthy to be named, who soil the honour of their sex, by the disorder of their carriage: for leaving all that which is either honest or generous in our manners, they let themselves loose to all kind of infamous pleasures, of gluttony and lust, which ruineth them in conscience, fortune, & reputation. They are whoups, proud birds, which have nothing but crest, and naturally delight in ordure: they are bats, which cannot endure one little ray of light, but seek to hide themselves under the mantle of night: they are horse-leeches, which draw blood from the veins of a house & state, where they exercise their power. They are Syrens of the earth, which cause ship-wracks without water. They are Lamia, who have hosteries of Cut-throats, that kill men under pretext of good usage. They are harpies, who surprize even from Altars, and in the end become envenomed dypsades, which enforce an enraged thirst upon those whom they have once bitten. He that speaks this vice of a woman, hath as it were nothing to say of all the evils in the world. And when impudence hath given them a brow of flint and steel to sin, the bankrupting, which is made upon honor, is attended by that, which is committed on virtues and Altars, and there is not any vice in the world, which will not seek to possess it self of the throne, from whence shamefac'dness is banished. I beseech you I may speak no more of these scandals of nature, least I may poison my tongue by the recital of their deportment.

Vide Petrum Damianum in Gomorrheanis.

Eccles 9. Laqueus venatorum.

In the second rank are those, who have the skin of the fox, and the snares of the hunter, to surprize the simple. I speak not at all of certain creatures, who use pleasing and innocent subtleties, as were those of Rebecca and Rachel, which rather relished of prudence then craft: but I discourse of some women, cunning, inconstant, ingenious, and practick. We see by experience, that creatures the less strong, have the more sleights, as if nature were willing to recompence the defect of one part, by the excess of another? So it often happeneth that we our selves being destitute of forces, which is more proper for men, have recourse to an infinite number of deceits: wherein we think to have some advantage, & by the cunning of our wits, which are nimble enough, & by the superabundance of leisure we enjoy in a sedentary life, and by the fervour of our passions, which being almost never in the mean, do stir up our understanding, to make it produce an infinity of designs. There are women able to give a lesson to the greatest Lawyers in matter of process, so well are they versed therein: they know all the terms of litigious pleadings, better then ever did Labeon or Tribonius, & they so cunningly make use thereof, that they tire the strongest patiences by the tricks and flexibilities which they invent. There are some, who have a sent so penetrating, that they smell from far all that which is done in a City, & discover the most secret things to find in some sort their own interests. Others perpetually bear a snare on their tongues, such words have they of double meanings; they know how to measure their dalliances to their own profit; to counterfeit friendship where there is not any; to hide hatred under flattery; to put Rivals into passion and quarrels; to make them fight and play the Fencers at their pleasure, and afterwards to pull some feather from those that are beaten. We do not so much advance our affairs as we would wish by these tricks; for that maketh us odious, & taketh the credit from us, which we should rather derive from the goodness of our manners. And besides, as there is no policy, which hath not in the end its countermine, whilest passion holdeth us in breath to deceive others, oftentimes we suffer our selves to be surprized by a certain levity, of easily beleiving all those which flatter us. Fair maids believe me, as there is nothing more lovely then goodness, so is there not any thing more stable then an honest simplicity. We are not born to be Circes and Medea's, nor to open a shop of all subtleties; let us be contented that Poets have made a monster of a creature of our sex, which commonly spake in very ambiguous terms, and they named it Sphinx; let us speak truths to make fables false, and beware of the art which they profess.

Malier finita & clamosa, nihil omnino suave.

Eccles. 9. Tolla a pertinacia in die frigoris, Prov. 17. Ulysses Aldebrandinus.

In the third rank go along certain natures endowed with dog-like qualities, most insupportable, as are so many women troublesom, importunate, & slanderous, who do nothing perpetually but bay, bawl, or bite. To live with such a creature in a house, is to have a rotten roof, which letteth rain & tempests drop in winter upon the head of the host. There are men who becom familiar with Lions, Bears and Dragons; but where shall you find one, who hath made tractable such like humours? The habitations of deserts are delights in comparison of such company. A film in the eye, the gout in the foot, the ston in the reins, the hissing of aspicks, thunder, lightening, rasors, hooks of iron, make less noise, and do less hurt, then these poisoned tongus, which penetrate even into the entrails.

A husband which meeteth with so ill a chance, daily acteth that part in his house, which did heretofore Prometheus on the mountain of Caucasus, when a vultur rent him alive, and gnawed his heart, which was only fruitful for his punishment. The wise that meets with a bad husband should not much complain, but yet she findeth that being in subjection, she is not so far distant from the degree, wherein nature hath placed her: but on the contrary side, to see a man ill handled by the impudent exclamations of an imperious woman, is a kind of monster in nature, which moveth pity in some, & astonishment in others. All husbands have not the resolutions of the Philosopher Socrates, who held opinion we must endure women, as the dung of pigeons, which pay our patience with their fruitfulness. For verily being crowned with a bucket of water by his Mistress Xantippe, after a great noise of bitter words, he replied, Such was the nature of the world, because after the thunder-clap followed rain. Our age is not so fruitful in such insensibilities: but in like occasions the husband and wife coming to contend with words, a wind is raised at the door and window, which bringeth a storm into the house. In all times our tongues have been censured, as tempests peſts oppoſite to publick repoſe: ſome have compared them to thoſe bells of the Forreſt of Dodona, which made a prodigious jangling: others have ſaid, there needeth not above three of them to make up a Faire; and others have added, It was ill done to ſay, there were words which came from our mouthes, but rather waves and froath of the Sea. I cannot but think theſe Cenſors ſpeak out of exceſs; but let us prove them lyars by our diſcretion, and perſwade our ſelves, that diſcourſes of a woman which have been purified by ſilence and conſideration, have a marvellous virtue.

Mulierum verbales unda. Fulgentius.

Mulier fatua. Prov. 1.

In the fourth order are women of the earth, who are of a nature groſs, ſtupid, and dull, that live in the world as ſuperfluous creatures, and know as it were, neither good nor ill; the care of their houſe very little toucheth them: the leaſt buſineſs is of power much to perplex their mindes; their kindred and allies finde little friendſhip with them, ſince they themſelves have oftentimes the heart of an Oſtrich towards their own children, whom they regard as if they were ſtrangers. In the end, they have much ado to endure themſelves, ſo unprofitable they are, and malignant towards civil life, : which happeneth to them through depraved habits, and inordinate idleneſs, whereinto they have ſuffered themſelves to ſlide from their tender years or by ſome other corruptions of a melancholy ſpirit, which they foment to the prejudice of their repoſe.

These kinde of natures are good neither in the Country, City, houſe-keeping, nor in religion. For we finde that in all things we muſt uſe endeavour, and that we came into the world, as into a Galley, where, if one cannot manage either the Stern or Oar, he muſt at the leaſt make a ſhew to ſtir his arms, and imitate the Philoſopher Diogenes, who rolled his Tub up and down, wherein it was ſaid, he inhabited, to buſie himſelf. For my part, I like well thoſe people who baniſhed all idle gods out of their walls, and retained ſuch as enjoyned travel. For, to live and take pains, is but one and the ſame thing; and that, which the nouriſhment we take, operateth for the preſervation of life, labour doth the like for accommodation thereof.

Augull. l. 7. de Civit. Dei. Philo de ſacrif. Abel & Cain.

In the fifth ſtation you have women of the Sea, who much deceive the world by their fair ſemblances: for they at firſt appear quiet & peaceable, as a Sea in the greateſt calm, having no want of grace or beauty, which promiſeth much good to thoſe who know them not, but one would not believe how they ſhift away upon the leaſt wind of contradiction which is raiſed: how they are puffed up, and become unquiet with anger, love, avarice, jealouſie, and other paſſions very active. Such an one ſeeth the flower of the thorn, who knoweth not the pricking thereof, and ſuch an one beholdeth with admiration thoſe excellent beauties, who cannot believe how many pricks and ſtings they cover under theſe imaginary ſweetneſſes. You ſhall therein ordinarily obſerve very great levity & impatience, which maketh them hourly to change their reſolution, in ſuch ſort, that they think nothing ſo miſerable, as to remain ſtill in one and the ſame condition. I have ſeen young widows, who had waſhed the bodies of their husbands with their tears, wiped them away with their hairs, and, as it were, worn it by force of kiſſes, and who not content with theſe ardent affections, diſcharging the ſurpluſage of their paſſion upon their own proper bodies, toar their hair, pulled their cheeks, and were rather covered with duſt then apparel; they died every hour, ſaying, they could not live one ſole moment without their beſt-beloved, and filled the air and earth with their complaints; which was the cauſe why ſuch as came to the Funerals, knew not whether they ſhould bewail the dead, or the dying. Notwithſtanding, preſently after theſe goodly counterfeitings, they began again to reform their hair, and change the duſt of the pavement into the powder of Cypreſs, to put painting upon their tears, to adorn with a carcanet of pearl the neck, which they ſeemed to deſtine to a halter, to ſeek for Oracles from their looking-glaſs, and to do all things as if death and love conſpired to make their feaſt in one and the ſame Inn. I have obſerved others, who being yet under the yoak, were the beſt ſervants in the world; but as ſoon as they ſaw themſelves at liberty, there were no worſe miſtreſſes then they. There are noted to be in the heart of a woman the paſſions of a tyrant, and ſhould they continually have wheels and gibbets at their command, the world would become a place of torture and execution. Never have I ſeen paſſions more hard to vanquiſh: for in the end the Sea which threatneth the world to make but one element, ſuffereth it ſelf to be diſtinguiſhed into ditches by little grains of ſand, which ſtaied it with the commiſſion they received thereupon from God: but when a woman letteth the reins of her paſſion go, there is not, as it were, neither law divine nor humane, which can recal her ſpirit to reaſon. Fair maids, take ever from the modeſty of your hearts, the laws which may be given you by juſtice.

Non eſt ira ſuper iram mulieris. Eccleſ. 25.

In the ſixth degree are the natures of the Ape, who have a certain malice ſpightful and affected, and ſuch ſpirits may be found of this kind who day and night dream on nothing but miſchief. They are filled with falſe opinions, ſiniſter judgments, diſdains, ſmothered choler, diſcontents, acerbities, in ſuch ſort, that the ray of the proſperity of a neighbour reflecting on their eys, makes them ſigh and groan. And as thoſe Apes which ſculk in the ſhop of a Tradeſman, mar his tools, diſturb his works, ſcatter his labours, and turn all topſie-turvy: So theſe malicious creatures ſpy occaſions to trouble a good affair, to diſſolve a purpoſe well intended, to over-throw a counſel maturely deliberated, to cauſe a retardation on the moſt juſt deſires, and fruſtrate the moſt harmleſs delights. How many times do we behold the ſun to riſe chearful and reſplendent in a bright morning, and every one is abaſhed to ſee a miſt ariſe, which in this ſerenity doth that which blemiſhes on a fair body? It is ſaid, it ſometimes proceedeth from a ſorcereſs, which darkeneth that glorious eye of the day with her charms: and how often have you obſerved proſperities more radiant then the cleareſt Summers day, which have been cloyed with dusky vapours by the ſecret practiſes of a woman, who biteth the bridle in ſome nook of a chamber? Fair maids, malice is an ill trade: it ever drinketh down at leaſt the moiety of the poyſon which it mingled for others.

Cuſtodi te à muliere mala. Prov. 6.

S. Zeno Hom. de continent.

In the ſeventh Region, there are ſome kinde of Owls, or Wild-cats, certain creatures enemies of day, of all converſation, all civillity, and all decorum: who having received from God many honeſt enablements to adorn life, and to do good to perſons neceſsitous, ſo lock up their entrails, that you may ſooner extract Honey and Manna from flints, then get a good turn out of their hands. How is it poſsible they could be courteous to oblige their likes, ſince they are many times cruel to themſelves, defrauding themſelves of the neceſsities of life, which are, as it were, as common as elements, to ſatisfie a wicked paſsions of avarice that gnaweth them with a kind of fury? For they endure in abundance part of that, which the damned ſuffer in flames perpetually, and fearing leaſt the earth may fail them, they bewail what is paſt, they complain of the preſent, they apprehend the future, they love life, onely to hold money in priſon; and fear not death, but for the expence muſt be made at their funerals.

Fountain of Gatamam. Helmicus, S. Bonaventura in dicta.

Let us take heed we reſemble not thoſe fountains, which are ſo cold in the day, that they cannot be drunk, and ſo hot in the night, that none dare come near them. Let us do good both in life and death with the goods which God hath given us. If men be ungrateful, he will ſuffer us to reap reward even from his hands. A covetous ſoul, which in the proſperity of its affairs, and ſuperabundance of riches, hoareth not the clamours of the needy, is as the hen, which is ſaid to be deaf in ſummer; is like a bottle full of ſilver which affordeth nothing till it be broken; is a mil-wheel which much laboureth, and gaineth nothing; a hog, which never doth good, but at his death. It hath always folly for guide, ſervitude for dowry, and miſery for recompence.

Invoni a-mariorem meis moribus. Eccleſ. 7.

In the eighth are thoſe, which are ſaid to be compoſed of a certain mixture of powders very different, which cauſeth them to be of humours light, giddy, fantaſtical, in ſuch manner, that they daily make an infinite number of metamorphoſes, and one knoweth not in what mould they muſt be caſt, to put them into a ſtate of conſiſtence. You may there obſerve a ſpirit, which is perpetually upon change, which ceaſeth not to jump from deſire to deſire, like a bird from branch to branch. A ſpirit, which will, and will not, which ſaith, and unſaith, doth and undoeth, and which continually hindereth it ſelfe in its thoughts. All that which you think to be very firmly ſetled with ſuch kind of perſons, is tied with a ſliding knot, and there needeth but the turn of a hand to overthrow what is thought to be beſt eſtabliſhed. One thing they retain very conſtantly in ſuch an ebb and floud of inconſtancies, which is obſtinately to fix themſelves upon their own opinions, and no more to give way to reaſon, then rocks to waves. It is verily one of the greateſt vices which may be in a woman, as being the ſeminary of all diſorders that grow in houſes. I have ever learned from Antiquity, that the nobleſt Spirits are thoſe, which give good counſels, and that ſuch as willingly hearken unto them, come neareſt, and joyn with them in a laudable degree of goodneſs. But ſuch as neither can give good advice, nor receive it from others, are the very worſt natures of the world. Preſerve your ſelves, Maidens, from this imperfection, which is the blemiſh of a noble courage, the worm of concord, the poiſon of life, the inſeparable companion of folly. Make it not your trophey to be refractory againſt the advices and remonſtrances of thoſe, to whom nature, juſtice, and reaſon hath ſubjected us: otherwiſe you would travel much, and get nothing in recompence, but the perfection of a mule.

Malier compta. Eccleſ. 9.

I ſet in the ninth place maids, who are of the nature of thoſe proud kinde of creatures, as of peacocks, or little dogs, which are glutted with curioſities, whileſt ſo many poor people die for hunger in the ſtreets. This order is now adays much ſpread over the world, for it is filled with nice women, who ſeem to be born for nought elſe, but to make it appear how high the deſires of exorbitant nature may mount, when a great fortune ſupporteth them. Many little fisking goſſips are ſeen, who are made up like puppets, ſo curiouſly bred, that they ſeem to be fed with potable gold between cotten and ſilk. Thoſe are the divinities of fathers and mothers, who raiſe rain and fair weather in their houſes, at the onely aſpect of their countenances. The joy and ſadneſs of the whole family waiteth on the condition of their humours; they muſt no more be offended then thoſe ſtars, which are thought to ſend tempeſts upon ſuch as have not ſaluted them. What may one hope from a ſoul altogether drenched in theſe delicacies? follies attend the increaſe of age, and multiply by infinite degrees. Reaſon is trampled under foot, and paſſion armed with a great power makes it ſelf to be carried on the ſhoulders of men. Deſires are without meaſure, wills without bridle, paſſion without moderation, and ſenſuality without reſiſtance; bravery, tattle, impertinent babble, toyiſhneſs, love, afford no paſſage to truth, and if there be any devotion, it is altogether ſilken; ſo coy and curious it is in the choice of perſons. Sacraments are good, if they be not tied to hands, where vanity ſeeketh its intereſts; yea, pride is planted upon the hair-cloth of pennance; and if God would chaſtiſe ſuch creatures to their liking, he muſt tie up his rods with ſilk, or elſe they never would receive correction.

When they leave their parents to be delivered to husbands, they go to change power, and not nature. A husband is ever uncivil, according to their ſaying, if they have not permiſsion to do any thing. And as it is ſaid the moon never agreeth in qualities with the ſun, but when ſhe hath eclipſed him; ſo they find not any concord in marriage, but in the dimunition of his authority, whom God hath given them to be their head. They carry along with their portion all the vices of their childhood, which oftentimes accompany them even to the grave. They have no eyes to ſee adverſity, no nor ears to hear it; the miſeries of the poor touch them ſo little, as if they were made of marble, and the care of their family ſhall never interrupt their pleaſures. What a life is it to behold a woman, who although ſhe riſe in a time when the ſun is near noon-tide, notwithſtanding, as if ſhe feared the vapours of the ſerain, ſhe is armed before ſhe come out of her bed, with a reſtorative from the kitchin, to keep her colour the more freſh. Ptolom. Almag. 2.

From that time ſhe cauſeth her ſelf to be attired, and clothed like an Idol, by three or four ſervants, who have more ado to preſerve her beauty, then ever had the Veſtals of Rome to maintain the ſacred fire. One preſenteth her with red, another with white, one holds a looking-glaſs, and another dares not tell her that the time of Maſs is already paſt, whileſt my Lady taketh her head-dreſſings: yet muſt the Canons of the Church be broken as eaſily as a glaſs, to obey the humours of a woman, and to celebrate then, when it is to be doubted whether the ſun begin not to bend already to his ſetting. Maſs is paſt over with making ſowr faces, and looking ſcornfull with a good grace, with ſome ſlight ceremonies of devotion, which go no further then the outward parts. There it is, where reſolutions are made of entertainments of time, to be choſen for the reſt of the day. Then follow the viſits of child-bed women, gaddings, and coachings, dances and banquets, where the prattle is ſo loud, that a few women could ſuffice to make the noiſe of a mil. They much love to hear diſcourſe upon all kinde of affairs. They that have not their ſpirits ſo ſubtile, entertain themſelves upon trifles, and ſlight complements, which they have ſtudied for the ſpace of ten years. Others, who can ſhew they have read a great quantity of love-pamphlets, or ſuch like, would ſeem of ability, ſo far as to give law to Poets and writers. Others, who have not this kind of reliſh, love not to pleaſe any thing ſo much, as their own ſenſuality, and in theſe looſe companies take fire and winde on all ſides, to the great prejudice of their reputation.

I leave it my Daughters, to the repose of your recollected cogitations, to think what Epitaph may be bestowed upon gentlewomen that lead such a life, but that they have employed themselves in the customary actions of a beast, nay, which a beast daily performs better then they; with this disparity, that they have been more inventive to season their sin.

Behold what honest women commonly most condemn in the carriage of the vitious and imperfect, which I have abbreviated in few words; being unwilling to enlarge any further upon the other imperfections, whereof I have no experience, having ordinarily so much entertainment with my books and employments, that I have no leisure to study on the manners of this sex.

The fourth SECTION.

The tenth Order of Women, full of Wisdom, and Virtue.

THe young Emperour took great pleasure to hear the Empress his mother speak so freely concerning the nature of women; and he prayed her to perform her promise touching the characters, which might serve him in the choice he meant to make; whereupon she replied:

"The last and most excellent Order of women is that, which heretofore was called the order of Bees; women truly divine, who seem to have been made upon Celestial globes by the hands of Angels, so sweet is their nature, their virtue so rare, & price so unvaluable. They are in houses as the sun in his Orb, (a) and he that would equal their worth, should he draw out all mettals and precious stones which the earth hideth in its veins, would rather finde insufficiency in his purpose, then want of merit in his object.

(a) Sicut sol oriens in mundo, in altissimis Dei. Eccles. 26.

Bees (as said an (b) Ancient) having nothing mortal in them but death: they perform actions worthy of immortality. Bees are labourers from the day of their birth; and it seemeth these are framed for the practice of virtues from their cradle. Bees have their little wings; these meditation and action. Those have a sting, these a point of vigour, which is the instrument of all perfections. Those live under a King, and these consecrate themselves to the obedience of laws both divine and humane. Those are great enemies of ordure, and these live in the delights of chastity. Those travel incessantly, and lose not a day unless heaven enforce it; (c) these are perpetually in the exercise of good works, and loose no time but to give it unto God. Those never stay upon withered flowers; and these set not their hearts upon any fading things which are under the Moon. Those have their hives rubbed with bitter herbs, to defend them from venemous creatures; and these use mortification of flesh against the poison of pleasures. Those make themselves connterpoises with certain little stones to fly the better; and these make a counter-ballance with humility to soar the higher. Those make honey which serves for nourishment and medicine; these have ever charity in their hands to cure the wounds and acerbities of the life of the poor, succouring their want by their liberalities. Those make the Altars to shine by the help of wax, which they produce; these adorn and enrich all the Church with the travel of their hands, or wealth of their Cabinets. What, would you to be more noble or divine? Why then are you amazed, if the Scripture (d) hath said, That houses and riches came from Parents, but a wise and a virtuous wife from the hand of God?

(c) Nullus diem per eum lucit, nisi peritis die; Plin. l. 11.

(d) Prov. 19. Domus, & divitiæ dantur à parentibus, à Domino autem propriè uxor prudens.

The fifth SECTION.

A brief Table of the excellent qualities of a Lady; and first of true Devotion.

THe Gentlewomen that stood round about the Empress, expressed much earnestness to know in few words the excellent qualities of a woman truly virtuous; and Euphrosina, not to frustrate their desire, proceeded in these terms:

"A Lady well accomplished, is like a star with five rays, which are the five vertues, of Devotion, Modesty, Chastity, Discretion, and Charity (a.) Devotion formeth the interiour, Modesty makes it appear in the exteriour with a requisite comelines, Chastity perfecteth both the one and the other, Discretion applieth it to the direction of others, and Charity crowneth all her actions.

(a) These are the qualities which the Scripture giveth her in divers places.

(b) A woman without Devotion, were she composed as a Pandora, & had she all the beauties which the heart can desire, and the imaginations feign, is a Bee without a sting, which will make neither honey nor wax, is a savage beast that nature hath lodged in a painted house, is a case covered with precious stones, to preserve a dung-hil, is a Michol, who appeared outwardly with a Crown, and lived inwardly a slave to her passions, is a piece of flesh already halfe rotten, having not so much as one grain of salt in it. Corruption will creep into her life, disorder into her manners, infamy into her reputation, and despair into her salvation. Devotion is a virtue hereditary to our sex; it is the first portion which God hath granted us; it is the title which the Church hath given us; it is the most eminent mark of our Nobility. If we loose this ornament, I cannot see why we should pretend to live, having renounced the honour of Christianity.

(b) The first title of a woman, which S. Paul observeth in the Epistle to Titus. c. 2. when he calleth her by a Greek word σώφρονας, as one would say, suitable to holy things.

But to tell you my opinion, Devotion being no other thing but a prompt and vigorous affection, which disposeth us to all that which concerneth the service of God, it seemeth to me, that many among us have great illusions in this point, and oftentimes court a fantasie, thinking to entertain a truth.

There are of those, who by over-much embracing Altars have overthrown them, (c) and broken the Idol of Dagon, to set their own judgement up in the place thereof.

(c) Altaria dum venerantur, evertunt. S. Zeno. hom. de patientia. Strabo lib. 1. Alian. de animal. l. 7.

I have seen very many, who have a slight devotion of apish tricks, which onely consisteth in a certain light and childish imitation of countenances and gestures, having not any solidity in the interiour. For my part, I imagine when I think upon such apparences of piety without effect, that if apes had a little studied our countenances, they would much exceed us in this point: For they are great and mischievous imitatours of all they see; witness those, who washed their eyes in a bason full of glew, having observed a huntsman, who washed his with fair water; and he who being desirous to bathe a little infant in imitation of its nurse, hastened to plunge it in a boyling cauldron. How many do we daily see in the seemings of affected piety, who so well act all countenances, as if with such merchandise Paradise were to be purchased? And in the mean space they are altogether devoid of true virtues; so that he who could penetrate into their hearts, should finde they were like to those pearls, which in stead of a solid body, have nothing but the husk.

Some take devotion as a slight pastime, others as a light complement; others bend that way for complacence to the humours of another; others for glory: and although they have consciences as rude as those of the Countrey, they would willingly draw Seraphins, out of Heaven to govern them, to the end that although they cannot have devotion, they may at the leaſt gain the reputation to ſeek after the perfecteſt: others are thereto tranſported for ſome ſlender cloak of liberty, and certain accomodations of their own proper intereſt.

I do not ſay, but that there are a great number who have intentions moſt pure, and proceed very piouſly, but we muſt affirm, that the defects whereof we ſpeak, may craftily ſlide into the infirmity of our ſex.

For, what may we ſay of a creature to whom ten years of devotion, twelve hundred communions, and a thouſand exhortations have not yet taken off one hair of vanity? What may we think of her, who eateth the immortal Lamb twice or thrice a week, and daily on all occaſions becometh a Lioneſs in her houſe? What may we judge of her, who ſo many times layeth the holy Euchariſt on her tongue, as a ſeal of the ſpouſe, not being able to bridle or reſtrain it ſo far, as to forbear ſo many indiſcreet and evil words? what may one preſume of her, who makes a ſcruple to drink cool in ſummer, and to behold a flower with delight, yet feeleth no remorſe of conſcience to have ſpoken more ſlanders in one dinner, then ſhe hath eaten morſels? Verily we betray devotion, which is of it ſelf fair and glorious, when we uſe it in ſuch ſort; and we give matter to exorbitant ſouls how to juſtifie their ſins by our deportments, to which they ever have but too much inclination, & think that in depainting us with a coal, they make themſelves as white as ſnow. There are others, who deſire devotions extatick and raviſhing, diſguiſed in ſtrange words, in faſhions never heard of, in ceremonies not accuſtomed. All that which is juſt, prudent, and moderate, taſteth too much of common; other paths muſt be found to Paradiſe; new habits muſt be cut out for God under the mould of their fancy, to make him known. I am not ignorant, that there are in religious orders ſouls purified from the dregs of the world, which have apprehenſions of God moſt elate; nor would I for any thing condemn ſuch bleſſings. But when in ordinary life they ſpeak to me of faſhions ſo extraordinary, I ever go along with a leaden pace, ſo much do I fear, leaſt for a ſtrong piety, I find a body of ſmoke. I add alſo others, who make to themſelves a devotion hideous, penſive, and melancholly, which amazeth thoſe who behold it with the only ſight thereof; they voluntarily reſigning themſelves to, as it were, perpetual tortures of the mind. This virtue hath but too much ſlander in the world; we have nothing elſe to do, but to hide its beauty, and to give it a maſk of terrour, to affright thoſe, who have buſineſs enough to free themſelves from their ſenſuality. I eſteem the devotion moſt proper for our ſex, is that which hath leaſt of affectation, & moſt of effect. Every one will be able to direct the prayers ſhe ought to make, confeſſions, communions, according to her own capacity, profeſſion, and leiſure, uſing therein the counſel of ſome that govern her conſcience; but let her aſſure her ſelf, ſhe ſhall never taſt devotion at the fountain head, but in the practiſe of virtues, and the conſtancy of good reſolutions.

The ſixth SECTION.

Modeſty.

AFter the interiour is directed by the motions of piety, followeth the virtue of modeſty, which proclaimeth us exteriourly. It is the needle of the dyal, which ſheweth how our ſouls circumvoleth times, and the hours of the day: it, which witneſſeth the power we have over our paſſions; it, which formeth us after the model of great ſouls; it, which cauſeth us to appear in converſation, in a manner not only regular, but ſweet, honeſt, & exemplar.

In incorrupibilitate quieti & modeſti ſpiritus. 1 Pet. 3. 4.

It is the virtue, which S. Peter the Apoſtle required of our ſex, when he adviſed us to hold the inward man in the incorruptibility of a ſpirit peaceable and modeſt. This is ſeen in the carriage, geſtures, and countenances; but eſpecially in ſpeech, and habits. We cannot believe how wiſe we are in ſimplicity, and how powerful in mildneſs.

It is the ſtrongeſt armour we have from nature. When we manage a ſpirit, and govern an affair by theſe ſweet and peaceable ways, we aſtoniſh the moſt confident, we diſarm the ſtouteſt, and triumph over conquerours, we have nothing to do but to hold our peace, and our ſilence ſpeaketh by us. But when deveſting us of this ſpirit of ſweetneſs, modeſty, and docibility, we put on a faſhion haughty, ſcornful, & turbulent, we are onely able in loud noiſes, which render us contemptible to thoſe who are more powerful then we, troubleſome to our equals, intolerable to our inferiours, and hateful to all the world. With this mild temper of ſpirit, Heſter changed King Aha ſuerus into a lamb, with the ſame, Abigail, was much ſtronger then the arms of David; and Jeſabel with her natural cruelty having ſlain Innocents, ruined Cities, diſturbed States, was thrown out of a high window on the pavement, to be trampled all bloudy under the feet of horſes.

But as concerning Modeſty, which regardeth the comlineſs of body and attire, it is a ſtrange thing, how many complaints are made againſt us upon this point. We have already ſerved for the ſpace of ſo many Ages as a common place to Preachers, matter of cenſure for Edicts, a fable for Cities, and laughter to our ſelves. In the mean time this love of bravery is ſo throughly engrafted in our ſpirits, that we will not deſpoil us of it, but with our skin. It is an original ſin, which all women carry with them from their mothers womb, for which there is no Baptiſm to be found, and he that ſhould go about to waſh us from this ſtain, we would have an action againſt him. Yea, were this onely usual among great Ladies, for whom earth, rivers, and ſeas, ſeeme to produce wherewith to ſatisfy their curioſity, it would appear leſs ſtrange, but all women are born with this paſſion and they ſo heartily hug it, that there will be almoſt no diſtinction made in orders, ſince there is ſo much confuſion in habits.

Citizens wives will become Queens; and if we hereafter would be taken for Queens, we muſt become Citizens wives. Perhaps thoſe who cenſure us in this point, require too much of us, and ſome are therein tranſported with ſo much zeal, that if we would believe them, we ſhould make all the Maries of Egypt to be at Court. Thoſe who intend to treat with us in this manner, by falling upon our hair and attires, touch not our hearts, for could any one truely perſwade us to virtue, we ſhould cover our ſelves with a ſack, ſo that it might advance the glory of God, and the profit of our neighbour: yet do I think we have ſome right to comlineſs, and propriety in our garments, ever abiding within the limits of the moſt regular in ſuch ſort, that the wiſe may not blame our ſuperfluities, nor thoſe who are more favourable accuſe our defects.

But to ſpeak ſincerely, there is a kind of frenzy in our proceeding. He who ſhould ſee the ſtuffs taken up ſometimes at the Mercers to cloath a little body, whereof the worms will quickly make a dung-hill, would would say they had undertaken to cover some huge whale: & he who should reckon up all the furnitures of a Lady, as they ly on a table, having never seen any woman, would think it were a Mercery to furnish a little City: we resemble those birds, which have no body, and are as it were nought else but feathers; we use therein so many fashions, disguises, and inventions, that we tire our spirits, so much study and affection, that many of us make so much business about a ruff, as if we had a Commonwealth of Athens to manage.

And that which is most horrible, is, these vanities are drawn from the bloud of the poor; and in the same proportion as they are extracted, they so impoverish, as I fear posterity may have more cause to curse our dissolutions, then cherish them. Nay, worse is done, when they so vehemently affect to begin the adultery of their bodies by that of the face, that it is insensibly eaten into with painting and poyson, as if they would derive beauty from corruption. Then certain fashions of apparel are found out, which seem to be made rather to sell bodies, then to cover them. I do not know what may be reserved for the eyes of a chast husband, when through all markets the secret parts of his wives body are expoled as open, as if they were ready to be delivered over to the best bidders. I cannot tell what husbands can be pleased with the publication of this nakedness, if not certain Platonists who would approve the law this Philosopher made, as it is said, of community of beds, then the doctrine of Idea's, which would be viands too empty to satiate the hunger of concupiscence. Verily, if we yet retain a vein of the perfect Christianity which swaied in the golden age, we ought to stifle by a generous consent, all these abuses, and make of the spoils of superfluity a Sacrifice of mercy, giving in part for the relief of the poor, that, which hitherto we have dedicated to the fantasies of our spirits. Since we are born with some supereminencies of body, and are the goodliest creatures of the world, why should we go about to beg glory from poisons of the earth, from worms, and spoils of the dead? If opinion have put us unto it, it is now long since withered by the confusion of so many hands, who incessantly gathered it. The glory of the greatest Ladies shall not hereafter survive, but in great modesty.

The seventh SECTION.

Chastity.

It is the quality S. Paul calleth sanctification. 1 Tim. 2. Exhortabitur per sermonem, & per assistentiam in fide, & dilectione, & sanctificatione cum sobrietate.

THis is the shortest way we have to the preservation of Chastity, an incomparable virtue, & the richest jewel of our sex. It ought to be as natural to us, as flight to birds, swimming to fishes, beauty in flowers, and rays in the sun. You need not ask, what may become of a maid or wife, who is prodigal of a good, which should be as firmly united to her body, as her hearts: She is capable of all sorts of crimes, and were there question to open all the gates of hell, incontinency alone would put the keys into her hands. There is no beast in the world that is not better then a prostitute, who by the dishonour of her bed hath charged her soul with sins, her body with intemperance, her renown with reproaches, and her memory with execration. We sought so to instruct your daughters in the virtue of purity, that they may not know the least shadow of sins which are committed in the world. I approve not those little Dina's, who will see and smell out so many customes of Countries, and entertainments, for they too soon learn that, which they too late will forget, and take so much fire in at the ears and eyes, that water enough will not be found to extinguish it. I do not wish a maid, though very young, should be delighted in the company of children which are not of her own sex. I likewise fear those of her sex, who are too curious, their company is sometimes so much the more dangerous then that of men, as we least take heed of a domestick enemy. That Chastity is ever the most stable, which knoweth not so much as what voluptuousness may pretend unto. I will think crows might become nightingales, when any one should make me believe that a creature of our sex, which is delighted to hear or utter scoffs, and speeches of double sense, which cover ordure under golden words, either is chast, or can any long time continue as she is.

Simon, ad Lætam. Sæuriorès of continuatio nescire quod quærat.

Let us guard the eyes, mouth, and ears of those young maidens, as Temples dedicated to Honour, let us do nothing in their presence, which they cannot imitate without sin: let us teach them not to addict themselves, either to pleasures of the mouth, or sleight desires, to take and freely possess any petty favours. A creature which much covereth to have that which her condition cannot afford, hath many enemies in her heart, which will deliver her body over to dishonour, and her soul to confusion. Let us cut off as much as we may so many wanton songs, idle books, infamous pictures, gossipings, dancings, and banquets: never is a beast taken but with some bait, nor chastity lost, but that such attractives serve as fore-runners.

There are not so many lost spirits to be found among women well bred, who in sin pretended nothing but sin: but the love of divers Ladies proceedeth rather from vanities of the mind, then weakness of the body. They desire to be in some esteem and admiration of those, who can neither esteem nor admire them, but in the pretensions of their own interest: they take delight to be commended for their beauties, which never any man so profusely applaudeth, as not to hope to be paid for his praises. They are subject to much credulity, whether it be through some easiness of nature too weak, or by overmuch presumption and self-love, in such sort, that they quickly esteem themselves fair, and worthy to be beloved by those who feign affection, not seeing that fishes are taken with nets, and women with the credulity of their light belief. They unde take designs to make servants, who are not of the order of Arch-angels, to serve them as Raphael did Toby, not pretending power over their hearts and honours. They are infinitely delighted to see a man prostrate at their feet, especially when he hath some qualities, which put him into the estimation of the world. It is a glory among the quaintest to have gained slaves, who love their chains, and who will no longer live nor dy but for them. This is the cause they counterfeit themselves to be little Idols and take many sacrifices of smoak, and although they at the same time have not any intention to offend God, notwithstanding they suffer themselves to dissolve at sight of so many offers of services, complements, and protestations, and in the end feel, it is a very hard matter to defend ones self from an enemy, who onely administreth us with gold or incense. Drops of rain are composed of nothing but water, and do by their continual fall penetrate the stones, so much sweetness of words, submissions, and observancies redoubled one upon another are able to make a pock-rent in the soul: how can they but transport a woman, who is more frail then a bone, faileth not to retain all the softness of flesh.

Love sometimes hath wings to fall upon its prey with a full souce, and sometimes it goeth slowly with a crooked a crooked pate. That which it cannot obtain by a prompt heat, it expecteth from a constant importunity. From thence ensue private conversation, and disorders, which make tales in cities, stage-plaies, and bloudy tragedies, which being begun behind a curtain, are many times ended at the gallows. I do not find a better remedy to stop the beginnings of lust, then to behold the end thereof. A Lady who solicited in matter of dishonour, in the first baits shall draw the curtain, and behold a huge gulf of scandals, injuries, rages, and despairs, will as willingly descend into Hell alive, as consent to this brutish passion. She will seasonably proceed to remedies, and unfolding her heart in the secret of Confession, will discover the deceipt of it, and by this means avoid an infinity of disasters. Thrice, yea four-fold happy is she, who will take these words as an Oracle, and enchace them in her heart to remember them eternally.

Discretion in the manage of affairs.

A title which the Wiseman expresseth by the word Sensata, Eccles. 7. And S. Paul useth the word σώφρ, Tit. 2. much recommending to women the care of household affairs.

WHen we have begun to polish our selves by these virtues; Discretion will regularly apply us to conversation and affairs, every one according to her qualities.

A woman is a poor thing, which hath no imployment nor discretion; as there are many to be found, who having lived to the age of ninety years have not learned any thing, but to dress and undress themselves. Why should we have a reasonable soul, were it not to enrich it with knowledges, which are necessary to us, both for our selves, & the government of those which fall into our hands? As we profess not to be wise, so we have not made a vow of stupidity. We should love as our eye-sight the reading of good books, which teach us how to become better; for they are wise companions, and honest entertainments, from whence we never behold jealousies nor scandals to arise. It is not a very barren delight to behold women, who as soon as they have made a silly complement, have nothing else to say, unless they talk of their ruffs, or some such kind of trifles? At the least, I wish those, who never have been willing to learn to speak, would one day practise to hold their peace: But they deafen the world with their prattle, and daily deliver an Iliad of speeches, wherein there is not so much as one good word. Tell me not these maids so knowing, are more subject to caution: I would not have them, I say unto you, all learned, as the Sybils and Muses, but who will envy them an honest science of things, which serve for the direction of manners? There is none but spiders, and such little creatures, that turn flowers into poyson. We ought not to fear that a maid, to whom good foundations of humility & devotion are given, will abuse this celestial manna, which is found in sage Writers.

I have learned from one full of wisdom and experience, that for one young virgin instructed in learning, which hath failed in her honour, twenty other have been found of the ignorant, who have so much the more grossly erred, as they had the less knowledge of their fault. I intend not by this counsel proposed, which is, to perfect them by reading that therefore we give liberty to the curiosity of reading of all sorts of books, and namely those which treat of loves, though in a very gentle manner; for they have a little sting in them as soft as silk, which insensibly enters into the heart; and when they describe this passion unto you with so many exquisite terms and honest inventions, they create so beautiful loves, that in seeking to imitate them, we produce such as are deformed. If we must become learned, we ought to do it in that manner as the Sts. Tecla, Catharina, Eudoxia, Marcella, Paula, Fabiola, Eustochium, who with the spoils of Egypt, furnished the Cross and Altars of our Saviour: Nor would I advise a virgin to go and hide her self in a granary or cave, to devour books: It is fit she season her reading with works proper to her profession. Let us never suffer her to be idle, but so soon as age rendereth her capable, let us give her some little direction and exercise in the house. For why should we be ashamed to work with the needle, since Augustus Cæsar, the founder of Empires, reputed such kind of imployments not unworthy of his daughters; and that the Romans many years preserved, as a relick, the distaff of Queen Tanaquilla, much more charily then the lance or sword of Romulus; thinking it was more necessary to give women examples of industry, then furnish men with idæa's of war? One would not beleive, how much the earnestness some have upon a good piece of work, diverteth all other passions, which may embroil the spirit; but whosoever will make trial, shall find that innocency is never better lodged then at the sign of labour. I leave you to think, when a maid hath endeavoured to learn from her tender years, matters fit for housewifery, even to the kitchin, what a goodly light is in that house, whether it proceed from a father, or from a husband for the direction of the family, the government of men, and maid-servants, the example of youth, and the comfort of the family. She maketh her self necessary in the best affairs, there is much repose in her prudence, her health is accounted important, her life precious, her death deplorable, and her memory replenished with honour. The wisest of men Solomon, hath given no other marks to know a virtuous woman then the Oeconomy she holdeth in the government of her family. She hath considered (saith he) the paths of her house, and hath not eaten her bread in idleness; she hath taken pains in linnen and wollen. She is become as a ship laden with victuals and riches. She riseth before day to provide fitting food for her family. She hath made purchase of farms, and entertained traffick. She hath put her hand to work, then opened it to the necessity of the poor. All her servants are in good order; her husband, and children cannot sufficiently praise her for her great wisdom. She is a lamp which will never be extinguished in the darkness of night. Behold some what near the tearms which he useth, to reckon up the perfections of a wife, ending with wisdom, and fear of God, which is the first and last ornament.

The ninth SECTION.

Conjugal Love.

IN the end; as love is a generous passion which by its good government crowneth all virtues, I would advise a married Lady, for the accomplishment of her perfection, to bear a most cordial charity towards her husband. This is no hard matter when there is good fortune and correspondence in marriages: for complacence ever maketh wings for love, and it is held a happiness to love that, which pleaseth our passion. But it is a most pitiful thing, when parents blinded with avarice, and charmed with the sweetness of pretended interests, renew the example of cruel Mezentius, who tyed the living to the dead & endeavoured to match a poor young maid, who surviveth in favour & blessings from heaven, with a husband putrified in vices, ordures, and diseases of body. Then in a time when much virtue is to be shown, in putting on a resolution to love a monster, from their most tender years to their tomb. what should we do therein? The law of nature gives us free permission to desire good husbands, but the laws of marriage exhort us to bear with them as much as we may howsoever they prove. if we love for our selves, this is impossible; but if for God, we therein shall find duty and facility. A woman cannot seek out a shorter way to the perfection of her sex, then by wedding the humours of her husband, so that they be not opposite to the commandments of God: she who well obeyeth, commandeth well; and when we once have surprized the heart of a man, there is not any thing resisteth our wills.

Union is a marvellous cement, which so straightly knitteth obedience and power together, that it is a very hard matter to distinguish him who obeyeth, from him that commandeth. We have in all ages excelled in this conjugal piety, and there are hereof so many rare examples to be found, that pens are troubled to express, as well as ears to believe them. Tender and delicate young maidens have been seen, who inconsiderately married to husbands, worn out with maladies, perceiving from the first night of their nuptials, unguents, ulcers, and evil savours, and finding a counterfeit health in bodies, more fit for a tomb then a marriage bed, yet have not abandoned them, but loved, honoured, and served them, watching sometimes fourty days, and fourty nights about their beds, never disarraying themselves. Some one man hath been found among others, whose indisposition drawing along with it seven years together the stench of wounds that were incurable, the horrible infirmity of members which appeared wholly disfigured, did weaken all the forces of those who were willing to assist him, overthrew the patience of the most faithfull, wasted the charity of the most zealous, yea even such as do all for money, abhorred to come near him. And then to see a young maiden of sixteen years of age, weak of complexion, handsom of body, and endowed with a beauty which the most flourishing husbands would have coveted, to tie her self to this dead body, to stir it, touch it, cleanse it, to give it broths, to blow the powder of herbs into the nostrils of it, which distilled an humour insupportable to all the world, to cut his beard, and hair, when no man would undertake this adventure, is it not a miracle of our sex worthy of the admiration of men, the applause of histories, and love of all posterity?

Vives relateth this in the second book of a Christian Woman, of one named Clara.

See Lipsius in his Politicks.

What shall I say of one Eponina, who having espoused a husband much clogged with troublesom affairs and crimes, yea even of treason, was nine years shut up with him in the vault of a sepulchre; and afterwards seeing him to be discovered, and condemned to death by the Emperour Vespasian, would needs accompany him to execution, and die with him, saying, she already was prepared for a tomb, and that she could better tolerate it dead then alive? What should I speak of a Persian Queen, named Cabadis, who seeing her husband detained in prison, came to visit him, not suffering her self to be known; and giving him her garments of a wife, to put on those of a husband, afforded him opportunity to escape, paying afterward with her noble blood the errour of her piety?

Are not these prowesses worthy to be written in letters of gold and azure, to be exposed to the view of all Ages? A thousand-fold happy they, whose concord hath bound love up with chains of adamant, separation never finding place in the knot of marriage, which God hath been pleased to tie with his own hands. Let us for this cause preserve us from jealousie, which useth to grow from the most beautifull loves, as those worms, which are said to issue from the fairest flowers. It is a most unhappy passion, formed by fantasie, attired by suspitions, darkened by discontents, fed with bad humours by curiosity, entertained with impostures by slander, which gnaweth asunder all that which there is of virtue in chast affections, troubleth the repose of beds, embroyleth the affairs of houshold, renteth alliances, produceth monsters, soweth fury and rage, and having tormented all the world, devoureth it selfe. If our husbands fall into this misery, let us pity them as franticks, and take away from them all manner of occasions which may stir up their imaginations, and if the like malady surprize us, let us not resemble those women, who have travelled in the dead time of night through hugh forrests full of horrour, that they might hasten to watch their husbands, accompanied onely with their passions, whereof some fell between the teeth of wilde beasts, which to them were more pleasing then the executioner they retained in their own proper entrails.

We oftentimes in this point more bewail our own interests, then the offence done to God; and it is no strange thing, that she who loveth ill, should be deprived of what she affecteth. When there is sin in it, let us deplore it, let us endeavour to remedy it by prayers, by discretion, by patience, by all the most holy industries we may use therein. We shall find our selves strong in silence and hope; and not in ceaseless complaints, which have no other effect, but to fret wounds, and renew disasters.

The tenth SECTION.

The care of children.

TO hide nothing from you, women, who are called to the Sacrament of Marriage, ought to be very perfect, because they have as it were in their manage the most precious interest of posterity, they being chosen out to bring forth, and educate Children, which are to be members of the body of State.

It hath often been questioned from whence proceeded the good and evill nature of men; and I find that many have attributed it to the divers aspects of Planets, as by a fatal necessity: But to say truly, this Astrology of fools, and webs of spiders, are as it were but one thing, both being fit to catch flies, and not deceive understanding men. I hold opinion, good mothers make the good nature of children; and it hath ever been observed, that great personages who have flourished in some eminency of virtues, have taken from thence as it were generally the first impressions of sanctity.

If chast daughters chance to be born of incontinent mothers, it is almost as rare, as to see nettles bear gilliflowers. Let us preserve our bodies as temples, to bring forth more virtues then flesh for the publick, and when God affordeth us issue, let it be one of our chiefest cares to train it up in his service. My heart bleedeth when I consider how now adays many children of quality are bred, which are stifled with servile indulgences under the shadow of dandling them. God sends them as creatures, with which he intendeth to support the world, govern Common-wealths, people heaven, and adorn even the conversation of Angels: but to see how they are used, it seemeth that pieces of flesh are ingendered, which are onely to be licked as bears, to give them true perfections. They are loaden with fat and the kitchin, they are entertained in the full fruition of all the desires of their hearts; they are observed like little kings, who are not as yet many times above five years of age, & already exercise a Monarchy in the houses of their parents. Jesus Christ banished Idolatry from the world with so much sweat and blood, and it is again daily renewed, when children are set up as certain little Idols, to whom all hearts, respects, hopes, fears, and homages are sacrificed. I beseech you, let us not cause them to learn that which we should make them forget; let us not accustom them to mimick affectation of words, to pomp of habits, to liberty, to pleasures. Let us attire them for the service of God, and exercises suitable to their sex and condition; and above all, let us take heed they be not poysoned by the ear, in the frequent conversation of such bad company, who seem to be born for nought else, but to infect purity.

The eleventh SECTION.

The conclusion of the Discourse.

THe Empress held ears and hearts suspended with this her discourse, when seeing the hour approach, wherein choice should be made of a wife for the Emperour her son: Behold the time (saith she) my Lord and son, when your Majesty must consign the golden Apple into the hands of her, whom you shall judge to have the best portion of those excellent qualities, which I have recited. And saying that, she caused a goodly room to be opened, where upon one side were seen pictures of Ladies, who flourished in the more elder Ages, in sanctity, in spirit, in courage, and in all virtues mentioned by us, which composed a triumphant Court. There was Sarah, Rachel, Lea, Deborah, Abigail, Susanna. Ester, Judith, Mariamne, S. Agnes, S. Cecily, S. Helena, S. Monica. S. Felicitas, the ten Sybils, Zenobia, Amalazunta, Placidia, Pulcheria, Eudoxia, Theodora, Marcella, Paula, Eustochium, Victorina, Clotilda, Radegundis, and very many other, not comprizing those who have flourished within these eight hundred years; which much amazed me, and made me say, that such as affirmed women of honour were so rare to be found, would perhaps have some trouble to finde leaves on trees, and water in the river. All these pourtraits appeared with lights of glory in a most pleasant manner, having enchasements all enriched with pretious stones. Behold, saith Euphrosina, O Virgins, how pretious is the memory of holy Ladies. Then turning her self to the other side, she shewed with her fingers the figures of such as had forsaken honour and virtue, which were pale, pensive, cloudy, and encompassed with flames, as if they came out Hell. There was Semiramis, Phædra, Thisbe, Phillis, Helen of Greece, Clitemnestra, Cleopatra, Agrippina, Julia, Messalina, Calirrhoe, Thais, Phryne, Rhodope, Flora: and in perspective so great a quantity, that it seemed to equal the sands of the Sea, not accounting those therein, who afterward had a share in their misery.

The Emperour having observed them, entred into the room called the Pearl, where he saw so many pearls selected from all the Provinces of his Empire. There was nothing to be seen but stars, lightning, and rays, so much these beauties on every side mingling their lights afforded lustre, which gave him much difficulty how to resolve. There was among others one named Iceſia, a maid of much knowledge, to whom the Emperour Theophilus spake a Greek verse, to which she replied with an admirable promptness, notwithstanding he relished not this spirit, finding it too curious for his humour: but after information taken from his eys, his ears, and the mouthes of those who bred these creatures, he gave the golden Apple to one named Theodora, a Paphlagonian by Nation, whom I notwithstanding cannot think to come near, whom I here represent for a model.

CLOTILDA.

The first SECTION.

Her Birth and Education.

Ex Greg. Turonensi, Ammonio, Hincmaro, Philippo Bergomensi, Baronio, &c.

THE number of Ladies eminent in sanctity is so great, that it rebateth the point of wit to think thereon, and the virtues are so resplendent, that in the commixtion of their lights they dazle all eys in such manner, that it is a hard matter to speak of it, unless we put some limits upon the discourses of so many singular subjects, who set none on their merits. And that is the cause, why out of a great number of Princesses, some of those whose names I have produced, I here undertake one, raised upon the most perfect Idæa's, which is the first Christian Queen of France, I mean the most glorious Clotilda, wife of our great Clodovæus, who verily is much bound to Heaven to have been chosen out for the advancement of the affairs of Christianity in this flourishing Monarchy, with prowesses and successes encomparable: so likewise are we tied to her in an immortal obligation, to have cast the first seeds of piety into the Court of our Kings, that it might with the more authority, enter into the souls of all their subjects.

The good Princes like to a pearl which cometh from the salt Sea, beheld her self involved almost from her birth in great acerbities and horrible confusions, from whence she arose with so much lustre, as she made of adversities the steps to the Temple of glory. She was daughter of Chilperick, who contending for the Scepter against Gombaut his elder brother, King of Burgundy, with more temerity then reason, sunk down to the ground, and was forsaken by the people, whom he had excited against this his brother, who verily was a bad King. But God who giveth Soveraigns leave to reign, favouring a just cause even in the person of an evil man, gave victory to the elder. He most truly made use of his fortunes, for having surprized his younger brother at the siege of a City, he caused him to lose his head on a Scaffold: and not content with this murther, extended his vengeance against the wife of the deceased, by an act most unworthy. For causing a stone to be tied to her neck, she was thrown into the river, and it was a great chance he had not inflicted the like upon two other Virgins, the lamentable remainders of this unfortunate marriage. But beholding them as yet so young and innocent, he thought their life could not be prejudicial to his estate, and their death might be ignominious to his reputation. Behold the reason why he contented himself to shut the one of them up in a Monastery, and retained the other, which was our Clotilda, with himself, that she might be bred in his Court.

The holy Maid entreth into the palace of her Uncle, as a Sheep into a Lion's Den, having no reason to repose such assurance in a man, who still had the blood of her father and mother in his hands. Notwithstanding, great is the power of virtue, when it is enchased in beauty. For this cruel Basilisk, who had an eye of blood and poyson, no sooner considered the praise-worthy parts of this Princes, but that feeling himself dazeled with her aspect, and his heart softned with the innocency of this poor Orphan, he instantly took compassion upon her, who never inclined to it before.

He began to behold her with a pleasing countenance, to endear her, to wish and promise her much good. But the good creature, who could not think after so strange an affliction she was any more to pretend to greatness, and pleasures of the world, threw her self between the arms of the Cross, that there she might finde those of God: and though in publick she stifled the resentments of her sorrow with a discreet patience, nor resisting the storm, nor striking her head against the rocks, yet in the secrecy of her retirement she daily dissolved her self into tears, and found no comfort but in the wounds of the World's Saviour.

'My God (said she to him) I adore your holy 'providence, which drencheth me with Gall and 'Wormwood, in an age wherein Maidens of my 'quality accustom not to walk but on roses; perhaps you know my pride hath need of such a counterpoise, and you in all equity have done that 'which your wisdom thought good. Behold I have 'my eyes still all moistned with the blood of my father, and the body of my poor mother, which being covered with so many waves, cannot have over 'it one silly tear from the eyes of her daughter, 'which fail not every night to pour forth streaming rivers. My God, Your name be blessed eternally. 'I require nought else of you, but the participation of your sufferings. It is no reason I here should 'live without some light hurt, seeing you wounded 'on all sides for my example. Some have been pleased to wish me I should receive and take contentments in the hope of a better fortune: where 'would they have me gather those pleasures? I am 'yet upon the weeping shores of the river of Babylon. I fix all my consolations and songs at the feet 'of your Cross, promising to desire nothing more 'in the world, but the performance of your holy 'will.

There is I know not what kinde of charm in holy sadness, which cannot be sufficiently expressed, but such it is, that a soul contristated for God, when it is fain into Abysses, wherein all the world reputes it lost, findeth in the bottom of its heart lights and sweetnesses so great, that there is not any comfort in the world to be compared with them.

Clotilda was already come to these terms, and if for obedience she had not learned to leave God for God, she had been softned with those tears by suffering her self voluntarily to slide into a lazy sorrow. But considering that whilest she was in the house of this Uncle, an Arian Heretick, she was bound by God to instruct with her example all those who were to be spectatours of her actions, she set her hand courageously to the work, and shewed her self so able of judgment in her carriage, and so regular in all her deportments, that her life became a picture of virtue, which past to all the world. Although she were derived from the blood of Kings, she shewed to have no other nobility, but that which springs from worthy actions. As her face was free from adulterate beauty, so her soul was exempt from those affected authorities and disdains which ordinarily grow with great fortunes. Her aspects were simple and dove-like, her words discreet, her actions sober, her gesture measured, her carriage honest, her access affable, her conversation full of sweetness and profit. She was a virgin in minde and body, living in marvelous purity of affections and amities, which she fomented by the virtue of humility, which the Ancients esteemed to be as the wall of the garden of charity: God oftentimes suffering impurity of body to chastise the rebellion of the soul. She was so humble of heart, that she accounted her self as the meanest servant of the house, not scorning at all to apply her self to inferiour offices; which she notwithstanding performed with so much majesty, that even in spinning with a distaff she seemed a Queen.

She was marvellously wise in her counsels, prompt and agil in execution, moderate in all good successes, constant in bad, ever equal to her self. She spake little, never slandered, envied none, did good to all the world, not pretending her own interests, expecting from God alone the character of her merit, and the recompence of her charities. She had no worldly thing in her person, and as little regarded her attires, as the dust of the earth. She knew almost but one street in the City where she dwelt, which was the same that led to the Church. Sports and feasts were punishments to her, and she was seldom found in the company of men, unless it were some beggers, whose misery she assisted. Her whole heart went towards God, her feet to the Church, her hands to alms, her eys to reading books of devotion, her arms to exercises and works of her sex; all her body to sacrifices and victims of her soul.

Observe, you young maids, who read these pages, of what wood God useth to frame Saints, and that never any happeneth to produce the miracles which Clotilda did in the conversion of a Kingdom, not acting wonders of virtue in the interiour of the soul.

The King her uncle was so ravished with these precious parts, that the excess of his admiration turned into a furious jealousy; for beholding this spirit more masculine then he could have wished, and fearing least she might be possessed by some other besides himself, he had no purpose to marry her, but kept her so straightly, that one would have said to have seen him, he was the dragon in fables, that ever stood centinel near the golden apple.

But, oh silly humane prudence, which still rowing against the current of the providence of God, findest as many precipices in passion as thou openest snares for innocency! This man notwithstanding all his endeavours, which went the contrary way, bred up in his house a maid, whom God had already destined to chastice his cruelty, and make, he unwitting thereof, his Scepter tributary to a valorous husband, who was to marry Clotilda, and joyn the Kingdom of virtues to the force of his arms.

The second SECTION.

Clodovæus requireth Clotilda in marriage.

Clodovæus King of France, a man born to make it appear what valour may produce when, it is supported by piety, daily advanced his conquests among the Gauls, yet in so many victories remained a slave to Idolatry. God was willing to win him to himself by the ways of chast love, and by the means of a wife, which should sanctify his person and house.

The fame of the beauty and virtues of Clotilda, which spread through neighbour Kingdoms with so sweet an odour, failed not to approach him at that time, when he was upon tearms to take a wife in lawful marriage. Love, which many times surprizeth as well by the ear, as the eye, so enkindled him at the report made by his Embassadours of the perfections of this divine maid, that he no longer retained either heart or thought, but for her. He affected what he never saw, with a love mixed with reverence, felt a more noble flame then he was wont, which scorched him with a generous passion, and excited him to require this Princess, as the type of his felicities. The difficulties proposed upon the effecting of this marriage, augmented desire in him. For he was of a vigorous spirit, who measured all by the greatness of his own courage, and resolved to break through obstacles, to crown his purposes. He addressed himself to his great favourite Aurelianus, and having opened unto him the project of this marriage, would needs instantly dispatch him upon a solemn Embassage to confer with the maid, and treat with the King her uncle. This man who understood the suspicions and apprehensions of Gombaut, made it appear unto him, that the conquest of the golden fleece, & the marriage of Clotilda were almost one and the same thing; and that no access could be had to this maid, without first speaking to this bull, who threw flames and fire through his throat. Clodovæus conjureth him to use all possible industries to satisfie his passion, assuring him he could not oblige him in any matter, whereof he would be more sensible. Aurelianus obeyeth, and taking a ring from the Kings finger, with certain other Jewels to present the Lady, hastened towards Burgundy.

I cannot here conceal, that which Baronius, the Father of Ecclesiastical History was unwilling to omit, seeing it is witnessed by good Authours, and hath nothing incredible therein, but onely with such who think it is a note of wisdom to seem very incredulous,

We know by what hath been spoken before, that Clotilda seldom appeared in publick, if it were not at Church, and cast her eyes on very few, but the poor. God made use of this disposition for her good: for Aurelianus, having learned this Lady daily conversed willingly with needy persons, and that it was necessary to seem of this quality to speak unto her without suspicion, took the habit of a begger, and as the servant of Abraham, sent by the first Father of Believers, treated the loves of Isaac in requiring water of Rebecca, who was to be his future spouse; so this man managing the commission of marriage, for the prime King of the faithful, resolved to beg alms of Clotilda, to find means of access to her; and for this cause he stood at the gate of a Church among a great rabble of beggers, expecting till Mass were done, that he might see the Princess come forth. She failed not to perform acts of charity to all the poor according to her custom, & perceiving this man who seemed of a generous aspect in these miserable rags, felt her heart seized with extraordinary piety, beholding one of so good carriage reduced to such misery, and without any further enquiry she gave him a piece of gold. Aurelianus seeing this royal hand so charitably stretched out to succour a counterfeit want, whether he were transported with joy, or whether he were desirous to make himself observed by some act, he lifted up the sleeves of the Princess, which according to the fashion of robes then usually worn, covered all even to her hands, and having bared her right hand, kissed it with much reverence. Clotilda blushed heartily thereat yet passed on further not shewing any resentment, nor blaming the begger as some Authours add. Well saith she in secret to an old Lady, who was her confident friend, Have you observed what this begger did? The other replied: It was a very easie matter to note it, since this act had painted her forehead with a most lively scarlet: But yet (said

Clotilda to her what think you of it? The Lady answered smiling, what can I els think, but that your rare perfections joyned to your liberality have transported him? For my part I suppose (said the Princess) he hath some other design, and if you think good we will cause him to come to the Palace to beg alms, and thereupon take occasion to be informed of his person.

Aurelianus failed not to entertain this commandment, which was the scope of his desire, and accordingly to pass to the place assigned him, where Clotilda beholding him soundly chid him for his boldness, in lifting up the sleeve of her garment and kissing her hand. He who was a most quaint Courtier, found out his evasion, and said: The custom of his Country permitted to kiss the lips of Ladies at salutation: but the happiness of his condition having abased him so low, he could not aspire to the face: Behold the cause why he contented himself with the hand, it being a thing very reasonable to kiss a hand, which is the source of so many charities, since the doors of Churches from whence we expect good, are kissed. Clotilda was much pleased with this reply, and well saw this man belyed his habit by his discourse and garb. She therefore importuned to tell who he was, and from whence it proceeded that he was reduced to such misery as to beg his bread. Madam (saith Aurelianus) since your Greatness presseth me thus far, you shall know I am born of a good place, and that it, which hath brought me to this state, is nothing els but the love of a Lady, whom I court, not for my self, but for one of the greatest Princes under Heaven. The maid was very curious to know who this Prince was as also the Lady, sought unto with so much pains. Aurelianus seeing it was now time to speak to the purpose, said: The Lady is three steps from me, for indeed it is your self. At which she began to blush again, and to shew some disturbance of mind: but (quoth he) Madam, trouble not your self, since I am in a place where I with confidence may speak unto you, your Excellency shall know, I am sent by Clodovaus King of France, my Master, who is the best Prince, and the most valiant Monarch in the whole World. The fame of your most precious and eminent qualities coming to his ear, he desireth to marry you, and hath dispatched me to give you notice thereof, and require your consent. I could have entred into the Court with some solemn Embassage; but the difficulties the King your uncle enforceth upon you, made me resolve to take this attyre, to speak to you with the more freedom. You may well assure your self, this marriage shall make you the prime Queen of the West, and the most happy in the world; and to approve the authority of my commission, behold the ring of the King my Master, which I present unto you.

There is not any woman so holy, who is not capable of much delight upon praises afforded her, and who doth not willingly open her eyes to greatness. Clotilda was not so insensible, as not to be touched to the quick with such an Embassage, howsoever she shewed in this surprisal, she had within her a heart very faithful to God: for most freely refusing the ring, and interrupting the Embassadour: Speak no more Sir (saith she) I know your Prince is a Pagan, and I a Christian: God forbid that I ever marry an Infidel, were he the Monarch of the world. Madam, replieth the Gentleman, frame to your self no difficulties upon the difference of Religions, my Prince is not so tyed to his Sect, as not to forsake it for your love. But what means will there be said (Clotilda) to gain my uncle? I do not think he hath any purpose to marry me. The Embassadour answereth: If you give me your consent, we will find opportunity to bear you from hence. Not so (replied the prudent maid) it is a course I will never admit. Ah, why Madam? saith Aurelianus: should you do it, who would condemn your discretion? Is it a sin in your Religion to fly from the den of a furious wretch, to resign up your self into the hands of a King? We know how he used your father and mother, and how he also treateth you at this time.

At this word the Lady poured fourth some tears, and said: Do by Embassadours all that possibly you can, and assure the King your Master, that I hold my self much honoured by the choice he hath made of me, and that he cannot be so soon for God, as I for him, at least in heart and body, when the King my uncle shall give me leave. Upon these conditions I take your Ring, which I very charily will keep. All this passed very happily in a Court of the Palace, where she ordinarily spake to the poor, interrogating them of their necessities; and none perceived there was any other business but the care of the poor, her confident friend onely excepted, who had a share in the secrets of Clotilda.

The third SECTION.

The Embassage to the King of Burgundy for the marriage of Clotilda.

Aurelianus touched Heaven with his finger, that he had so successfully thrived in his commission; and forgot not parcel-meal to relate to the King his Master all the particulars of his voyage entertaining him above all with a curious discourse made upon the admirable beauty and singular prudence of Clotilda. Clodovaus burnt with impatience, and would presently have taken the King of Burgundy by the beard to make him let go his hold: but wisdom adviseth him, he must observe therein requisite formalities, and that it was fit to send his Embassadours to Gombaut to require of him his neece in marriage, which he speedily did, appointing thereunto his faithful Aurelianus, to whom he allotted a flourishing company of Nobility; which caused such apprehensions to arise in the mind of the Burgundian, that he slept not upon it either night or day. From whence proceeded it, said he to himself that Clodovaus knoweth my neece, since I have hitherto kept her so close, that she hath seen nothing, but the walls of the Church, and my Palace? Is there some Cell under a rock? would he have my estate? This French man is too harsh: I would neither have him for a Son in law nor a neighbour. Besides, this maid, who hath seemed hitherto as a lamb in my house, being at my disposition, when she behold her self Queen of France, and have swords at her command, who can tell whether she will not shew me her teeth, & revenge on me the bloud of her father and mother? I must rather keep her immured within ten iron gates, that she may not escape my power. Behold a great act of State, which I must cunningly play.

This man environed with such thoughts recieved the Embassadour of France very slightly, and having promised with all speed to give them answer, he was wary enough not to discover all the thoughts he had thereupon: but taking the most pleasing pretext, answered, that he honoured the King Clodovaus, as one of the most valiant Princes of that Age,

Age, and ſhould ever account the ſervice done him, as one of the greateſt favours he could receive from Heaven; but as for this alliance which he ſought, it was a matter he could not think on. Firſt, becauſe his Niece had never raiſed her ambition ſo high as to pretend marriage with ſo great a King, having nothing in her perſon ſo eminent as might deſerve ſuch a husband: and although there were ſome equality on this ſide, yet was there on the other part an eſſential impediment, which was diverſity of Religions, it being a thing unheard of for a Chriſtian maid to marry a Pagan, nor could he permit it without betraying the ſalvation of his Niece, and diſgracing himſelf through the whole world. Aurelianus, who well knew where it itched with him, replied in few words, That for the qualities of his Niece he ſhould not trouble himſelf, that the woman beſt beloved, was ever beſt conditioned: that it was ſufficient ſhe pleaſed the King his Majeſty, who was not ignorant of her perfections; and for the matter of Religion, which was the moſt conſiderable, he hoped the King would put on a reſolution to become a Chriſtian. The Burgundian replied, this affair was of ſuch importance, that he would not confide in ſucceſſes upon hopes, which are always uncertain, but that he muſt ſee an expreſs promiſe from the King of France; and thereupon diſmiſſeth the Ambaſſadour, thinking he had ſufficiently hindred the buſines. But the brave Aurelianus ſpeedily diſpatched a Currier to Clodovæus, to ſhew unto him where the obſtacle lay, and to get a promiſe from him to become a Chriſtian.

The King, who was ſo tranſported with affection, that he was on terms to refuſe nothing, haſtily gave the promiſe required of him; which being afterward preſented to Gombaut by the Ambaſſadour, it made him ſweat apace, not knowing further what invention to make uſe of to avoid this fatal blow: notwithſtanding he anſwered, that this marriage was of ſo great conſequence, that it could not be decreed, but in an Aſſembly of his States, thinking by this trick he might diſſolve the deſign of Clodoræus, or draw the affairs out at length with ſuch delays, that he ſhould trouble all the world. But this was it which transfixed him: ſo far humane prudence is cunning to ruine it ſelf by its proper inventions. For the moſt active French Nobility ſojourning in Burgundy in the expectation of the States, ſowed in the ſpirits of the Magiſtrates aud people, the great good would enſue to their Nation by this alliance, when they ſhould come to be all united together, as brothers: but if they once refuſed the requeſt of a great Prince, ſo repleniſhed with honour and courteſie, they muſt neceſſarily proceed to arms which could not but be fatal to their Kingdom. The Burgundians, hungry after repoſe, very well taſted theſe reaſons; and the prudent Clotilda ſpared not ſilently to ſtrike her ſtroak, inſenſibly gaining the chief of the Council to follow her inclinations. Aurelianus, who had a very ſharp and clear-ſighted ſpirit, much preſſed the States, nor could Gombaut make ſo many knots, but that he ſtill diſſolved them.

In the end he muſt come to the point. The States aſſembled, and the King came thither with a ſtudied ſpeech, wherein he had heaped together with very great ſubtilty all the reaſons which made him apprehend this alliance with the French: but God, who maketh great alterations in Kingdoms, as billows in the Sea, ſo diſpoſed the hearts of the Burgundians, that all allegations oppoſed againſt the deſign of this marriage, ſeemed but dreams and Chimæra's. One of the greateſt States-men riſing up, made a long ſpeech, and declared to the King, That the repoſe of his Kingdom, at which he aimed in all his diſcourſe, conſiſted in this alliance; That marriages had in all times been rather the knots of peace, then incentives of war; that the comfort which might grow from ſuch an action, would deſtroy all the acerbities & diviſions of factious ſpirits: that the greateſt troubles of Kingdoms had been often pacified by good alliances; that the French were become ſo powerful, it was not fit to deny them any thing: that the requeſt of Clodovæus was ſo fair, it could not be rejected without a notable act of incivility: That there was not any beaſt more cruel in the world, then love changed into hatred, and that it was to be feared, leaſt entreaties of a lover might end in the fury of a Conquerour: That the offer he made to become a Chriſtian, would for ever be glorious to their Nation, for furthering ſuch a piety: That Clotilda had naturally affection for her Country, and wit enough to gain her husband, and wholly tranſport him to the love of her Nation: That the people were tired with ſo many wars, which would infallibly grow much more bloody then ever, if they ſlighted the faithful love of ſo great a Monarch.

This man connected ſo many reaſons one upon another, that he prevailed, and almoſt all came to this concluſion, that they muſt with all ſpeed ſend the Princeſs to the King of France, who required her. The miſerable Gombaut finding himſelf ruined on all ſides, ſaid he would uſe no obſtacle; but did think it fit to obſerve the deportments of his Niece; for ſhe had vowed her ſelf to God, and to enter into Religion. The Ambaſſadour underſtanding this laſt evaſion, extremely laughed from the bottom of his heart, and ſaid, if the Princeſs were that way diſpoſed, the King his Maſter would not be ſo earneſt in her purſuit, as to cauſe her to break her vow. But that it was fit ſhe ſhould be heard, which was done; and ſhe being asked thereof, anſwered, that her devotion had never hitherto tranſported her ſo far, as to make any vow of virginity: and although ſhe were infinitely pleaſed with the ſweet retirement ſhe enjoyed in the Court of her Uncle, notwithſtanding if it were his good pleaſure to marry her to the King of France, on this condition that he became a Chriſtian, ſhe would not be ſo indiſcreet as to hinder it. Upon this anſwer of the Princeſs, the Deputies of both Nations there preſent gave a loud applauſe, and cried out the marriage was concluded. The King himſelf diſſembling, his paſſion forced a ſmile, and well ſaw it was high time to forgo what he could hold no longer. He diſpoſed of her train very poorly, as a man naturally covetous, ſaying, His Niece was too fair for him to give her ſo many rich attires: That the Roſe was ſufficiently beautified with its leaves, and the Sun with his rays; and that all humane Arts arrived not to the perfections of Nature. Aurelianus did not with much earneſtneſs inſiſt hereupon, ſo much he feared, leaſt the diſpoſition of this man might change, and he invent ſome new tricks to hinder their departure. But he reſolved inſtantly to carry this Princeſs away. The Uncle ſeeing her upon her journey, began much to flatter her which he had never done before, ſaying:

Go too Niece, I well perceive, that notwithſtanding your devotions, you are of the humour of other women, and affect glory. You are weary to abide with an Uncle, you will have a husband, aud needs muſt he be a King. Proceed, I ſhall not be againſt it, let every one ſettle their affections where they may expect their felicity. Good daughter, you ſee how much I endeavour to content you, and how it being in my power to hinder this marriage, which I thought to be little advantagious to my Realm, yet have I been willing to cause it to be confirmed in a general assembly of my States, to render your desires the more assured. This affection, which I at this present witness, sufficiently declareth, that I for a long space have entertained most sincere and hearty affections for the good of your house. For that which passed concerning your father and mother, troubled no man so much as my self, God is my record thereof. But, dear daughter, there was a necessity in it. I must obey the advice of my Council; such are the priviledges of Empires: I could not otherwise save the repose of my people, and secure the lives of my subjects. Whensoever I shall fall into the like crime, I wish to be used in the same manner. Behold the true cause, most dear daughter, if there yet remain in you any resentment concerning this death, I suppose you are wise enough to do that herein which the law of God ordaineth, which is to forget what is past, and not to be ungrateful for the present. If I have hitherto detained you in my Palace very retiredly, it hath been to please your humour, which I saw had sincere inclinations to devotion; and to breed you as a childe of honour, which is the portion you are to carry presently with you to your husband. My well-beloved daughter, endeavour to love your Country, and to hold good correspondence with us. You submitted to my humours whilest you lived with me, you now must undergo those of a husband, and in complying with them shall be most potent. Forget not the fear of God, which ever hath been a faithful companion to you from your most tender years; and let us often hear good news from you.

In saying this he kissed her, and the virgin most humbly thanking him for so many remonstrances of affection, with promise to honour him all the days of her life, began to weep; which a Burgundian Gentleman perceiving, who was of her train, said, that so long as he lived he would never confide in the tears of woman: for were there a creature in the world which might make bone-fires of joy in her heart, it was his Mistress, who on this day was delivered from the Lion's throat, to become the wife of a great King, and Queen of a vast Empire.

The fourth SECTION.

The arrival of Clotilda into France, and the life which she led in the time of her Wedlock.

NEver Ship laden with Gold so gladly arrived at the Haven, after so many tedious tempests, and a thousand disasters among Pirates at Sea, as Clotilda seemed content to behold her self to tread on the ground, where she was to command, after so long a servitude suffered in a Palace, which had all her life-time, as it were, served her for a prison.

Clodoveus expected her at Soissons with so great impatience of love, that he would have willingly hastned the course of the Sun, to measure it by his affections. When he saw this most beautiful Princess, he found she surpassed all the Idæa's he conceived of her, and that her presence far prevailed above her fame. He then embraced her most lovingly, nor could be satisfied with beholding her. For God, who was pleased to make use of this maid for the conversion of a great King, had (as it is said) varnished over the Table of this mortal beauty, and imprinted with his finger, I do not know what kinde of graces and attractives, which Clodoveus never had felt before. She as an humble Abigail cast her self at the feet of a husband, calling him her Lord and King, and protesting she entred into his Palace to live there as his most humble hand-maid. The Court stood wholly rapt with admiration to behold the worthy qualities of this Princess, and took part in the contentment of their King. The people ran by heaps on all sides to see her; and so many poor Catholicks as were then in France, looked on her as the dawning of the day, which came to charm their cares, wipe away their tears, break their fetters, and gild the times with the lustre of her Majesty. There was nothing to be seen every where, but jousts, tournaments, sports, feasts, largesses to crown the solemnity of these great Nuptials. Notwithstanding the good Queen suffered not her self to be transported with the current of her prosperities; but that in the midst of pomps she held her eys firmly fixed upon the many benefits she had received from God, and sought out in mind the ways she should take to testifie her gratitude, and pour her self as incense upon coals towards the divine Majesty. She had one thorn in her heart, which then entred very far therein. It was, that she saw the King spake not at all of the promise he had made to become a Christian, and that she having attempted to put him on this discourse, he subtilely declined it. She knew not in what manner to speak to him of it, nor where she might take entrance into his heart.

In the end she resolved to say unto him: Sir, I see your Majestie exerciseth at this time your liberalities towards all the world, and I would gladly partake therein, and receive a favour.

The King thinking she would beg a gift for a Favourite, or some other: Ask (saith he) confidently; for you must not be denied. Thereupon she replied: If your Majestie bear so sincere an affection to me, as you make shew, I most humbly intreat, that on the first night of my nuptials, I enter not into the bed of a Pagan.

Clodoveus answered: Madam, I understand what you would say, It shall be done, but it is not yet time; suffer the fruit leisurably to ripen, and then either you shall gather it, or it will fall of it self. Alas, would you now speak to me of Baptism, and all your ceremonies? Your attractives are not so faint, as to permit me to entertain any other thoughts, then of you: all my devotion should be but of love, and my piety should have nothing but shews; but this is not it, you desire of me. Give me time to look about me, and I will advise on the means, which I will use for the accomplishment of my promise. As for the rest, you ought not to have any scruple to lye with a Pagan husband; for your law saith, as I understand, that the unbelieving husband is sanctified by a believing wife.

The Queen doubted whether that she should entreat him to defer the Nuptials at the least for some time, and deny him all conjugal company till the accomplishment of his promise; but she considered that her conscience was not interessed therein, and the law of God commanded her not to separate her self from her Pagan husband: that if she used so much cunning, it would cause of two things, one; which were either to exasperate, and put him off for ever from Christianity, or make him to undertake a dissembled piety, which would still be said to have been besieged with importunities and allurements, and consequently, would never be constant. She resolved to render him all the duties of marriage, and to gain him rather by the example of a good life, and her humble prayers presented on Altars, then by any other way.

Clodoveus very well liked her humour in this proceeding, and well saw she was wise, which gave him occasion to honour her much the more. He was about the age of thirty years, when he married Clotilda, and as a Pagan bred up in the liberty of Arms, he had not spared to use many love-dalliances; but the affection she bare to this good Queen was so great, that it razed out of his heart all other love, as the ray of the Sun scattereth the shadows and phantasms of the night. The holy Lady perceiving the spirit of her husband already moved in hers, and that there was no need of power, but example, so composed her manners in her marriage, that she made her self a perfect model of perfections, requisite for this estate.

Royal Crowns lose their lustre on heads without brains, and brows without Majesty. But this Lady made it presently appear, that although her birth had not made her worthy of a Crown, nor her good fortune had afforded it, her merit alone had been of power to make her wear the best Diadem in the world. She practised in the Court of a Pagan King, a strong and vigorous devotion, which was not puffed up with outward shews and vapours, but wholly replenished with wisdom. For she had a fear of God so chast, that she apprehended the least shadows of sin, as death; a love so tender, that her heart was as a flaming Lamp, which perpetually burned before the Sanctuary of the living God. Her faith had a bosom as large, as that of Eternity; her hope was a bow in Heaven, all furnished with Emeralds, which never lost its force, and her piety an eternal source of blessings.

She had made a little Oratory, as Judith in the Royal Palace, where she attended as much as time would permit to prayers and mortifications of flesh, abiding therein as in a fortunate Island, which made the sweetness of her immortal perfumes to mount up to Heaven. Yet did she manage all her actions with singular discretion, that she might not seem too austere in the eys of her Court, for fear weak souls might be diverted from Christianity, by observing in her carriage perfections transcendent above ordinary capacities. But all that which most passed in a common life, was done by her and her maids with much purity, fervour, majesty, and constancy. It was an angelical spectacle to see her present at Mass, and dispose her self to receive the blessed Sacrament, which she very often frequented, to draw grace and strength from its source. She honoured Priests as Messengers descended from Heaven, as well to discharge her conscience, as to hold her Religion in much estimation among Pagans. The zeal of the houses of God, which are Churches, enflamed her with so much fervour, that she had no delights more pretious, then either to cause new to be raised, or to adorn those which had been erected, so far as to make them receive radiance from the works of her royal hands. Her charity towards the poor was a sea which never dried up, and her heart so large, that all the hearts of the miserable breathed in hers. She composed and decked her self daily before the eys of God, putting on all virtues, as it were, by nature, and rich attire of Ladies, for necessity. But the King her husband she honoured, as if she had seen the Saviour of the world walking upon the earth: and not staying alone on the body, she penetrated even to the center of this infidel soul, which she beheld with eys of unspeakable compassion. She most particularly endeavoured to observe all his humours, and follow the motions of his heart, as certain flowers wait on the Sun. All that which Clodevæus affected, took presently an honourable place in the soul of Clotilda; if he delighted in Arms, in Dogs, in Horses, she for his sake praised Arms, Dogs, and Horses, regarding even the objects of the honest pleasures of her husband, as her best entertainments. Her conversation was full of charms and attractives, which ever carried profit along with them: Sometimes she sweetned the warlike humours of her husband with harmony of reason, sometimes she comforted him upon occasion of troubles, which might happen in the world: sometime she withheld very soberly, and with prudent modesty his spirit, which took too much liberty, sometime she repeated unto him certain precepts of wisdom, and practices of the lives of Saints, and worthy personages, that he might love our Religion; sometime she pleased him with an eloquent tongue, and an entertainment so delicate, that nothing might be said more accomplished. She was magnificent and liberal towards her household servants, most exactly taking notice of the faithful services they yielded to her husband, and kept her house so well united within the bands of concord and charity, that it seemed, as it were, a little Temple of peace. Slander, uncleanness, idleness, impudence, were from them eternally banished; Virtues, industries, and arts, found there a mansion, and the miseries of the world a safe Sanctuary. For she embraced all pious affairs of the Realm, and governed them with so much equality of spirit, that she resembled Angels, who move the Heavens, not using in themselves the least agitation. May we not very well say, this Divine woman was selected out by God, to set a golden face on an entire Monarchy, by the rays of her piety?

The fifth SECTION.

The prudence which the Queen used in the conversion of her husband.

THe holy Queen brought forth a King, and a great Monarch to Jesus Christ, bearing perpetually his Court and the whole Kingdom in the entrails of her charity. She had her Centinels day and night before the Altars, who ceased not to implore the assistance of Heaven for the salvation of her husband, and she her self often in deep silence of darkness, caused her weeping eye to speak to God, & addressed many vows to all the elect for the conversion of this unbelieving soul. She very well considered, that that which oftentimes slackneth these wavering spirits in their endeavour to find the way of eternal life, is certain interests of flesh and blood, certain impediments of temporal affairs, some inordinate passion, which tortureth and tyrannizeth over the mind. Behold the cause why she took great care to sweeten the dispositions of her husband, calm his passions, and through a certain moral goodness facilitate unto him the way of the mysteries of our faith. This being done, she took her opportunity with the more effect, and found the King daily disposed better & better for these impressions.

He already had the arrow very deep in his heart, and began to ask questions, proposing conditions, which shewed he would one day render himself. He said to Clotilda: Madam, I should not be so far alienated from your Religion, were it not that I saw therein matters very strange, which you would have me believe by power and authority, not giving any other reason thereof. You would have me believe, that three are but one in your Trinity, that I adore a Crucified man, and that I crucifie my self in an enforced and ceremonious life, wherein I was never bred. My dearest, had I your good inclinations, all would be easie to me: but you know, that all my life time I have been trayned up in arms. If I should to morrow receive your Baptism, which blotteth out all sins (according to your maxims;) I were no sooner washed, but I should fear to plunge my self again into an infinity of occasions, which might daily present themselves to my understanding. Then would you threaten me with the judgment-day, and Hell, with terrours able to overwhelm my mind. Consider whether it would not be more to the purpose, to let me persevere in my Sect, therein performing all the good I may: Can you think, that for all this I should be excluded from the mercy of God, who will save all men?

The wise Clotilda replied thereunto: Sir, I beseech your Majestie not to flatter your self with this specious title of mercy, for there will be none in the other world for those, who have not performed formed it in this without profit. Now is the time, that God spareth not to stretch out his arme for your obedience: if you despise him, you will loose him without recovery. One can never do too much for eternal life; and whatsoever we suffer, Paradise may still be purchased at a good penny worth. Alas, Sir, why do you find so many difficulties in our Religion? Think you that God doth wrong in desiring to make you believe things which you cannot conceive by humane reason? It is he, who hath made the soul of man, and who accommodateth all the wheels thereof, nor is there any one of them which moveth not at his pleasure. What marvel is it, if man offer the homage of his understanding to God? If weakness submit to strength, littleness to greatness, the finite to the infinite, that which is nothing, to him who is an abyss of essence, goodness, wisdom, and light?

If you make a promise to any of your servants, although it be unreasonable, and almost incredible, yet would you have him to believe it without reply, and that he take no other ground for this belief, but the greatness and infallible word of your Majesty. One man exalteth faith of another, though both of them are but earth and dust: and you think the Soveraign Creatour of Heaven and Earth is unjust, to make us believe that, which our brutish senses cannot comprehend: is this the submission and obedience we ow Eternal Truth? why should not I believe, that three are but one, that is to say, three persons, one onely God, since I daily finde my memory, understanding, and will, make but one soul? Wherefore should we scorn to adore a Crucified man? The Cross is so far from weaking my belief, that there is not any thing which more confirmeth it. For if the Saviour of the world had come, as your Majesty, to the conquest of the Universe with Legions, Horses, Treasures, and Arms, he should in my opinion retain that esteem, which great Captains hold: but when I consider, that by the punishment of the Cross, he hath reduced the whole world under his laws, and planted the instrument of his excessive dolours even on the top of Capitols, and the heads of Monarchs, I affirm, that all is of God in such an affair, since there is nothing in it of man. Alas, Sir, if you have a faithful servant, who would suffer himself to be tormented and crucified, to make you master of a rebellious Fort, would you not find more glory in his loyalty, then ignominy in his torments? And think you if the Eternal Wisdom having taken a humane body, and voluntarily exposed it to extream rigour to wash our offences in his blood, and subdue the pride and curiosities of Earth to the power of Heaven, it hath done ought therein reprehensible? Have we not much more cause to adore the infinite plenty of his charities, then to dispute upon honours, which onely consist in the opinion of the world? I beseech your Majestie, figure not to your self our Religion, as an irksome and austere Law: when you have submitted to the yoak, God will afford you so much grace, that all these difficulties which you apprehend, will no more burthen you, then feathers do Birds. And although it should happen you after Baptism fall into some sin, which God by his grace will divert, the blood of Jesus Christ is a fountain, which perpetually distilleth in the Sacraments of the Church to wash away all our iniquities. Sir, I fear least you too long defer to resign your self to the many advertisements which you have received from Heaven: if you weigh the favours that God hath done to your Majesty, having set a Crown on your head at the age of fifteen years, having preserved you against so many factions, defended you from so many perils, adorned you with so much glory, honoured you with so many prosperous successes, you shall find, he hath reason to require at this time from you, what he demandeth of you by my mouth. What know you, Whether he have chosen out your person to make you a pattern to all other Kings, and constitute you such in France, as Constantine hath been in the Roman Empire, which will render you glorious in the memory of men, and happy in Heaven to all eternity? Verily, Sir if you yield not your self up to my words, you ought to submitt to the blood of so many worthy Martyrs, who have already professed this faith in your Kingdom: you ought to submit to so many great Confessours, as knowing as Oracles, of as good life as Angels, who denounce truth unto you. You ought to submit to miracles, that are every day visibly done at the Sepulcher of great S. Martin, which is an incomparable treasure in your Kingdom.

Sweet-heart (answereth the King) say no more, you are too learned for me, and I fear least you should perswade me to that, which I have no desire to believe; and although you had convinced my soul to dispose it to this belief, think you it would be lawful for me so soon to make profession of your faith? You see I am King of an infinite people, and have ever at my command a great Nobility, who acknowledge no other Gods but those of the Country. Do you believe that all spirits are so easy to be curbed, and that when I shall go about to take a strange God, will it not make them murmur, and perhaps forge pretexts to embroil something in my Kingdom? For Religion and the State are two pieces, which mutually touch one another very near; one cannot almost stir the one without the other: the surest way is not to fall upon it, and to let the world pass along as our predecessours found it.

Clotilda well saw this apprehension was one of the maineſt obſtacles of his ſalvation, and ſhe already had given good remedy thereunto, practiſing the diſpoſitions of all the greateſt of the Court. Behold the cauſe why ſhe moſt ſtoutly replied thereunto:

Sir, is it to apprehend fantoſmes, to form to your ſelf ſuch imaginations? You are a Priace too abſolute, and too well beloved to fear theſe commotions, but rather much otherwiſe, I aſſure you upon mine honour, your people are already much diſpoſed to receive our Religion, and your Nobility, which hath ſufficiently underſtood the vanity to Idols, expecteth nought elſe but your example to embrace Chriſtianity: Nay, if need were to penetrate rocks, and cut through mountains to gain ſucceſs for ſuch an enterprize, your travells would therein be very well employed, nor is it fit you fear to looſe earth to purchaſe Heaven. But all the facility is in your hands, the grape, which you ſaid was not yet ripe almoſt five years ſince, is now mature and it is neceſſary you gather it.

Theſe words oftentimes preſented upon occaſions, had quickly a marvellous power over the mind of Clodoveus; and the iron began in good earneſt to wax ſoft in the fire. For he honoured Churches and uſed Eccleſiaſticks with a quite other reſpect then he accuſtomed, whereof he gave a moſt evident teſtimony in the buſineſs which paſſed with S. Remigius.

The Hiſtory ſaith, the ſouldiers of Clodoveus forraging the Country in their liberty of arms, had pillaged in the Church of Rhemes a goodly and large veſſel of ſilver to pour water into; at which the good Biſhop being ſomewhat troubled, for the reverence he bare to all that which appertained to his Miniſtery, he ſent his commiſſaries to the King to make complaint thereof, which was not loſt. For Clodoveus commanded them to come to Soiſſon, where diviſion ſhould be made of the booty had been taken from all parts, which was done, and they coming to unfardle all theſe pilfries, the King being there preſent in perſon, found the veſſel, which he preſently commanded to be reſtored to the Commiſſaries of the Church; but a ſouldier becoming obſtinate thereupon, and much diſpleaſed that ſo goodly a piece ſhould eſcape his hand, gave a blow with a halbard upon it to cleave it aſunder, which Clodoveus for that time diſſembled, fearing to proceed to a reaſonable chaſtiſement with any paſſion: but afterward ſeeing this fellow much out of order, How? ſaith he, is there none but you that grow mutinous, and yet are the worſt armed of all the troops? And ſaying ſo, he took the halbard out of his hand, and threw it to the ground, the other ſtooping to take it up again, felt a furious blow from the hand of the King, which bereaved him of life, in puniſhment of his temerity.

The Queen underſtanding this news, held it a good preſage of his converſion, and that which much more confirmed her in this hope was, that being delivered of a goodly ſon, ſhe obtained love of the King it might be Chriſtened, which ſhe ſpeedily did: but the infant ſtayed not long after his Baptiſm, to forſake an earthly Crown, to take in Heaven a Diadem of eternal glory.

Yet Clodoveus found ſome ſlakneſs in his good purpoſes, and chid the Queen, as being too vehement to diſpoſe all the world to her own Religion, ſaying, this Baptiſm might very well have procured hurt to the health of the child: but ſhe replyed, that life and death were in the hands of God; that this child was not ſo much to be lamented for having ſo ſuddenly changed from the life of a fly, to that of Angels; but that the Saviour of the world, who holdeth in his hand the keys of fruitfulneſs could bleſs their royal bed with a fair iſſue, when he thought good; and that we ſhould not be amazed at the death of ſo frail a creature, nor attribute the cauſe thereof to Baptiſm, which operateth nothing but good. She knew ſo well how to excuſe her act, that, being the second time delivered of a male child. Baptism was as well conferred on this as the former, after which it deceased; whereat the King offended more then ever, blamed her very sharply, saying, that he from this time forward well saw these waters of Baptism were fatal to the death of his children, and that she should take heed how at any time to open her mouth to obtain of him such like liberty.

She endowed with a constant heart, and having taken very deep roots in faith, made an answer worthy of her piety, saying to her husband: Ah, how Sir! What if God had thought me unworthy ever again to have any issue by my child-beds, were it not reason I adore his holy Providence, and kiss the rods of his justice? I humbly beseech your Majesty not to cast upon the baptism of Christians that, Which you should rather attribute to my sins.

The King all enraged with choler, was so edified with this word, that from this time forward he retained it in memory with much admiration, not being able to wonder enough at the great courage and modesty of his wife.

The sixth SECTION.

The conversion of Clodovæus.

IT is to sail without Stars, and to labour without the Sun (saith Origen) to think of coming to God without a particular grace of God. After so many humane speeches redoubled one upon another, the Holy Ghost, worker of all Conversions, spake with a voice of thunder to the heart of Clodovæus in the middest of battels, and caused him to settle upon this resolution, which he had pondered the space of many years.

The occasion was, that the Suevi, a people of Germany, passed the Rhein with great forces, commanded by many Kings, who were personally in the army, & came to rush on the Gauls, with intention to destroy the beginnings of the French Monarchy. Clodovæus having received news of this preparation, speedily opposeth them with good troops: for he likewise had drawn together to his aid the Ribarols, people near bordring on the Rhein, who were allied to the French, and had first of all given notice of the enterprize of the Suevi, who in a near degree threatned them.

The encounter of the two Armies was at Tolbiac near Colen, which verily was one of the most desperate that is found in Histories. The King undertook the conduct of the Cavalry, and had given to Prince Sigebert his kinsman, the Infantery. All of them were extremely inflamed to shew themselves valiant in this Conflict. Clodovæus, who proceeded to lay the foundations of a great Monarchy, wherein he would have no companion, thought he must either triumph or be lost. His allies, who were interessed very far in this war, failed him not in any kind. The Almans on the other side, had an extreme desire to extend their conquests, and thought their fortune depended on the success of this battel. There was nothing but fire tempests, deaths, and slaughters; so great was the resistance on either side. In the end, Sigebert valiantly fighting, was wounded with an arrow, and borne all bloody out of the battel by his son. The Infantery, through the absence of their Colonel, was defeated and put to rout. All the burthen of the battel fell upon the Cavalry, which did marvellous exploits, fighting before the eys of their King: but in the end the shock of enemies was so impetuous, that it brake through and scattered them. Clodovæus bare himself like a Lion covered with blood and dust, among the ranks of those affrighted men, cried out with a loud and shrill voice, to rally their troops, he in the mean time fighting in his own person, and withall performing the duty both of a great Captain, and valiant souldier. But notwithstanding all his endeavours, terrour had so seized on these flying men, that the affair grew desperate.

And as remedies are sought from Heaven when those of the earth are of no effect. Aurelianus the great favourite of the King approaching near to his Master, perswadeth him to make a vow unto God, to fulfil the promise he had made to the Queen his wife, which was, to be baptized, if he returned victorious from this battel: which he did, calling aloud upon the God of his wife, and promising an absolute conversion to the Catholick faith.

The word was no sooner spoken, but that his troops rallied themselves up, made head against their enemies, pursued them, ran through, and routed them with so great a massacre, that the fields were all covered with dead bodies. The discomfiture so terrified them on the other side of the Rhein, that the Almans which survived, fearing least the King puffed up with his victories, might pass the river, dispatched a speedy Ambassadour unto him, to yield themselves tributaries to his Majesty.

Clotilda hearing the news of this battel, and of the holy resolution of her husband, was transported with so great joy, that she went out to meet him as far as Champaign, accompanied with the great Archbishop S. Remigius, a man whom God was pleased to make use of to crown this great work of the salvation of Clodovæus. For besides his admirable sanctity, acknowledged throughout all France, he had the reputation to be one of the most able & eloquent men of his time; witness Sidonius Apollinaris, who speaketh of his eloquence with admiration, saying, He thought there was not a man living upon the face of the earth, whom S. Remigius surpasseth not, without any elaborate study at all, through the experience he had acquired of well speaking. His conceptions were inimitable, his language so sweet and polite, that it resembled a piece of Ice very smooth, whereon nothing might be seen unequal. His sentences were full of weight, his arguments of force, and his words glided along like a river, and ever bare in them some flashes of lightning at the end of his periods.

So soon as the King, who was still repleniſhed with sweet Idea's of his victory, saw the Queen his wife, It is now, Madam (saith he) that you have gained; Clodovæus triumpheth over the Almans, and you triumph over Clodovæus. The deed is done, my Baptism must no longer be deferred. The Queen infinitely comforted with this word, answereth: Sir, To the great God of Hosts is due the glory of these two triumphs; and your Majesty doth most wisely to render him with the first opportunity what you have vowed. That man giveth doubly, who affordeth readily. Behold one of the greatest Prelates of your Kingdom, whom I have brought along to serve your Majesty in an affair of such importance.

Thereupon S. Remigius was presented, whom the King most honourably entertained, and signified he much desired to be rectified by his good instructions: whereat the holy man exceedingly rejoycing for the good which he hoped to derive from thence, made him on the day assigned a Sermon of the knowledge of God, and of the glory of Christianity, against the vanity of Idols, so ravishing, that it transported the King, and all his Court, who ceased not afterward to confine himself to the lips of S. Remigius, as to a stream of living waters. It is true that S. Vedastus, who was afterward Bishop of Arras, had already begun to catechise Clodoveus. But as these holy men pretended nothing but the interests of God, not having regard to any thing which touched their own persons, he most willingly gave way to the dignity of an Archbishop, and to the great ability of a man accounted as an Oracle, contenting himself to assist S. Remigius, and to contribute in this action all which his ministry and service might afford.

This King going to Rhemes disposed himself religiously to receive Baptism under the direction of of this Prelate, daily hearkning with singular attention unto the instructions of faith, and informing himself with much judgment, in all that which was necessary for his salvation. It is written among other things, that when S. Remigius came to explicate the mystery of the passion unto him, he was much moved thereat: so that transported with a generous impatience, he put his hand to his sword, and spake aloud in anger, That had he with his French been present in the place where this act was committed against his Master, he would have revenged it, with the utmost ability of his forces. The holy Prelate sweetned his warlike humours, and made him capable of every mystery, using therein much endeavour and great perspicuity of discourse. After these instructions, they proceeded to confession, and ordinary penances, wherein the King shewed so much devotion, that laying aside the Purple Robe and Crown, he covered himself with ashes, imploring the mercy of God in his most fervent prayers.

When the day of Baptism came, which was the Eve of Easter, Saint Remigius caused the Church of Rhemes to be excellently adorned, as the custom of those times would permit, commanding it to be hanged with the richest pieces of Tapestry he could finde, to be perfumed with sweet odours, and lightned with a great quantity of wax-lights, composed of certain perfumes, which rendred a delicate splendour, in such manner, that Saint Gregory of Tours saith, this place resembled a little terrestrial Paradise.

Some while before the Baptism, the King and Queen sitting with S. Remigius in the Oratory of S. Peter, attended by few persons of note, behold there came on a sudden a most resplendent light, which appeared unto the eys of all the world with rays so sparkling, that scarcely it might be endured; and at the same instant was heard from Heaven a voice, which said, Peace be with you, fear nothing, persevere in my love. This was the time when the new Constantine set forward towards holy Baptism; where being arrived in the presence of all the world, S. Remigius spake to him these words: Mitis depone colla Sicamber; Adora quod incendisti, incende quod adorasti. Bow thy neck (O French man) under the yoak of God; adore that which you have burned, and burn what you adored.

Omnipotentem Deum in Trinitate confessus. Gregor. Turon.

Thereupon pronouncing his profession of faith, and especially that which concerned the mystery of the holy Trinity, he was baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost.

The hand of God, that is not shortned, and which being the Work-master of Nature, operateth when it pleaseth him above nature, useth to honour with some great miracles, the foundations of Religion in certain places, where it is planted. Here he was pleased to consecrate the Kings of France, & the whole Realm to his Majesty, to derive from hence an infinite number of services; and as those great Kings are the first of the Church, and the most perfect images of the Divinity among all Monarchs, especially when they declare themselves imitatours of the piety of Clodovæus, so God was willing to renew at their consecration, the wonders he did at the Baptism of his Son, to the end, the workmanship might have conformity with its model: for he caused a Dove visibly to appear, which bare in her beak the holy Viol, filled with the unction wherewith Clodovæus and his successours were afterward anointed.

In baptismate ejus Angelus ampullam sacri Chrismatis detulit. Vide Morum de sacris unctionibus l. 2. c. 7. Clemens quartus, alias Guido, scripsit in Jus civile.

It is a thing so authentical, that it is rather to be reverenced, then disputed; the memory thereof is still preserved in the Epitaph, set over the ashes of Clodoveus in the Church of S. Geneveſue of Paris, which said, this Dove was an Angel: in S. Thomas in the second book of the institution of Princes, in Clement the fourth in his Questions, and so many other Authours, that it were to do a thing already done, to distend my self any further upon this subject.

Ita Savarus in Tractatu de sanctitate Regis Ludovici.

Others have added, That the Flower-de-luces were brought at the same time by the help of an Angel, to be set in the Arms and Scutcheons of the Kings of France: but that is not well proved. I should rather believe that the Lilies were the Symbole of the Gauls, as the balm of Judæa, long time before Clodovæus: for there are yet certain Medals found, stamped in the time of the Emperour Adrian, who was little above one hundred years after our Saviour Christ, whereon the figure of Gaul was to be seen, formed as an honourable Lady, which seemed to hold in her hand a Flower-de-luce, offering it to the Emperour, and yielding thanks for its preservation by this Title engraven on the same coyn, RESTITUTORI GALLIÆ. I cannot likewise understand, who is that Cilurus cited by Monsieur Capet, in his pleadings of Rights and Liberties, that maketh mention of a Rod sprinkled with Flower-de-luces, which then appeared in Heaven, to witness the Kings of France should be the true Defenders of the Catholick Church.

We have no want of true miracles, nor need we go about to entertain ill grounded fantasies: they who desire to establish false things, gain nought else upon the credulity of humane spirits, but to make truth to be doubted.

That which I finde in this Baptism most probable, is, that Clodovæus was baptized with his children, his sisters, and more then three thousand Cavaliers, Captains, Souldiers, and other Courtiers, not numbring women and little children; and which is more, the King made an Edict so favourable for Christian Religion, that being published, it converted to the faith almost all the rest of the French Nation, in such sort, that every where there was nothing to be seen, but burning of Idols, and erecting of Altars.

The admirable Clotilda, who had so long time sighed after this most happy day, being wholly absorpt in reverence & thanksgiving rendred to God, beheld her self crowned with so many thousands of children; and if those women of the old Testament for a slender carnal race, sing Canticles of triumph, what might this Lady both say and do, who, after her coming into France, saw the face of a Monarchy absolutely changed, the Kingdom of God established, and so many souls aranged under the banner of our Saviour, who was pleased so powerfully to make use herein of her prayers and industry?

The seventh SECTION.

What Clodovæus did by the perswasion of Clotilda after his Baptism.

THe holy woman daily building upon her foundations, ceased not to dispose her husband to all the holy and glorious actions, which she could think on, that he might in some sort answer the favours he had received from the Divine Majesty, she caused him to bend his affections to the embellishing and enriching of Churches; which he did, beginning with that of Rhemes, with so much magnificence, that S. Remigius, who was of a noble and generous courage, had much ado with himself to take all which the King was willing to give: humbly beseeching his Majesty he would apply his liberalities to other places that had more need thereof.

Thereupon he disposed himself to build the Church of the Apostles S. Peter and S. Paul, whom he honoured as the Fathers of Christianity. It is now dedicated to S. Genovefue of Paris, which the King and Queen afterward chose out for the place of their sepulchers.

One cannot too much glorifie this holy place, which hath been as the cradle of the piety of Clodovæus; and it is a most manifest blessing from Heaven, that it fell into the hands of that sage and religious Prelate, the Lord Cardinal of Rochefaucault, who by his zeal (a most powerfull alchymie) daily changeth the bricks and morter into marbles and gold: and not content with dead stones, hath assembled the living in so many good Religious men, there eternally to praise the greatness of God, and of this heavenly Virgin, Patroness of the place. He could not better serve our great King, then by so preciously honouring the ashes of the first most Christian Prince, and of his holy spouse Clotilda, to tie their protection to his standards.

In the third place, the blessed woman very deeply impressed in the soul of her husband, the devotion of S. Martin, in such sort, that in all his most thorny affairs he had a singular recourse to this great Apostle of France, making there many vows, and sometime praying prostrate at his tomb, with the fervour of an incredible piety.

From whence also proceeded, that not satisfying himself with giving large donatives to his Church, he treated the whole Dioces with marvellous reverence; forbidding his troops when they marched upon any exploit, to take ought else in those precincts, but salt and herbs. Which was so streightly observed, that he caused a souldier to pass through the pikes, who had taken hay from a Countreyman, saying it was herbs.

Moreover, to imitate in all eminency the piety of great Constantine, he procured a national Council to be held at Orleans: where he witnessed much respect to the Prelates assembled in that place to decide Ecclesiastical affairs, writing unto them a notable letter, by which he confirmed the rights and immunities of the Church, according to the form of ancient Canons.

Baron. tom. 5. anno. 514.

In the end Pope Hormisdas, coming to succeed Symmachus in the holy See, Clodovæus was the very first dispatched Embassadours unto him, with a very beautifull Crown, surnamed the Realm.

It hath been a custom very ordinary in all times, to offer Jewels and Crowns to Altars, in gratefull acknowledgement towards the Divine Majesty. So Constantine tendered his Diadem to the Saviour of the world, which is yet at this time to be seen hanging over the Altar of Saint Sophia. So did Mauritius, so Henry the Emperour at Clunie, who made offer to the Church of a World, all over diversified with most exquisite precious stones.

Flodoardus Philippus Bergomensis.

This is the cause, why the King sent this present, as the History expressly mentioneth, to be hanged up before the chief Altar of Saint Peter at Rome, in token of the offer he made to God of his person and estate, as the eldest Son of the Church. And he that would well consider the foundation of the History, shall finde this Diadem, called the Kingdom or Realm, was a kind of crown come from Constantinople: For it is said, that the Emperour Anastasius, who sought support from the favour of the King of France, against the Goths that swayed in Italy, understanding the great feats of arms done by our Clodovæus, sent a solemn embassage unto him, to congratulate, and offer him the title of an honourable Consul, the purple robe, and the Crown, which the Grecians at this time called Βασιλεία.

Savaro. p. 15. de pietate Regis Ludovici.

Clodovæus very gladly entertained this Embassage, and shewed himself attired with those ornaments in the Church of S. Martin, where he made a largess of gold and silver: then acknowledging all these prosperities came to him from God, after he was baptized, he consecrated this rich jewel, which had been presented to him by the Emperour, in the chief Church of Christendom, to serve as an eternal monument of his religion. Behold how this illustrious Monarch began at that time to manifest the marks of his zeal, and to cement together the good intelligence which France afterward had with the Pastor and spiritual Father of the whole world.

I am bound to touch this as I pass along with all sincerity, being naturally an enemy of these questions which are many times moved with too much fervour and inconsideration, in the point of contestations of the jurisdiction of Soveraign authorities. We are learned enough, when we know that Jesus Christ, who had the source of power in himself, distributed it to Popes and Kings: constituting the one for spiritual government, the other for temporal. It is his pleasure we honour the character of his authority, both in the one and other, and not to argue upon fantasies. God hath set them over our heads to admire their lustres, & not to controul their power.

Amongst the follies of Nero, it is reported, that one day beholding a space of land, which separated two seas, and held them in excellent order, he had a desire to cut it, that these two seas might encounter, and himself see what countenance they would carry, when they commixed together. Take you good heed (saith the Oracle unto him) otherwise they will overflow to drown you. Leave matters as God hath appointed, and confound not the limits of nature. It is true, Ecclesiastical and Civil power are two great seas, God hath limited and divided them by the interposition of spiritual and temporal administration: Both exercise their functions, and live in fair peace. God preserve us from those miseries, which may dis-mantle the wall, and cause them to intermingle together, so, that we may behold the world in a deluge of calamities.

Communis Episcopus eorum quæ extra eccles. siam.

To what purpose is all this? The Sun doth not the work of the rain, nor the rain of the Sun. Constantine said, the Bishops were Bishops in their Churches, in that which concerneth Religion, and God had appointed him for the government of his Empire in matters temporal. Let us rest in these limits, Give me to Cæsar, that which belongeth to Cæsar: to God what appertaineth to God. We have better learned to live then dispute, and our Ancestours have preserved a Monarchy so flourishing, the space of twelve hundered years, not with disputations and unprofitable wranglings, but with the arms of wisdom, obedience, and courage.

We have always rendered to the Pope the honour he deserveth, as to the Soveraign Pastour of the Universal Church, which is under Heaven. We have confessed,

Subditi æstue omni humana creatura propior Deum, sive Regi quasi præcellenti, sive ducibus tanquam ab eo missis sessed, and do acknowledge the King true and absolute Monarch in the government of temporal things, singularly honouring him, and with most cordial affections loving him, as an animated protraicture of the greatness of the Divine Majesty. God thereupon maketh us to prosper, and tast by experience, that there is no science more noble then obedience, nor any felicity, but the accomplishment of the will of the soveraign master. On the contrary, it is observed in the History of so many Ages, that the wounds from Heaven have on all sides fallen upon those, who have sought to cast the apple of discord into the house of God: The winde blown from their mouths, returned on their heads, since it is fit, iniquity should first kill it self with its own poison.

The eighth SECTION.

The good success which God gave to Clodovæus after he became a Christian.

Clodovæus was no sooner become a Christian, but that it seemed God had tied to his arms some secret virtue, which made him triumph over his enemies, and crown all his enterprizes with most glorious successes.

The first war he undertook after his Baptism, was against Gombaut King of Burgundy, of whom we have very amply spoken heretofore. I much wonder at certain Authours, who measuring the affections of Saints, with the weaknesses of their own spirits, and esteeming it a sweet glory to be revenged upon enemies, from whom some notable injuries are received, have said, that Clotilda excited her husband to the ruin of her uncle, to derive an account from him of the death of her father and mother. This is too inferiour a conceit of a Lady, who was arrived to so high a degree of perfection: nay, it was so much otherwise, that she should enkindle the fire of this war, that Gombaut being in the full possession of Clodovæus to bereave him of life, she withheld the fatal blow, and afterwards seeing he by his ill deportment had lost his Kingdom, she did all that possibly she might to preserve a part thereof for Sigismond, son of Gombaut her cousin-germane.

Paul. Æmil.

That which first of all ruined this unhappy King of Burgundy, was his heresie, which drew upon him the vengeance of God: for it being often preached unto him, and he convinced by reasons, offering himselfe in private to become a Catholick, yet still retained Arianism in publick. Behold the cause, why he having divided his heart, God divided his Kingdom.

The second cause of his ruin was his nature, cruel and covetous, which rendered him uncivil, and an enemy of all order. He sent his Neece as it were in anger to Clodovæus, giving her not any thing in marriage, but many complements: Whereupon the King making sundry remonstrances, and afterwards complaints, he neglecting both the one and the other, and answering the Embassadours, sent to treat with him very perversely, he resolved to make war upon him.

Add hereunto, that having already put two of his brothers to death, he tyrannized over the third, who to get shelter from the tempest, had recourse to the King of France, who was no whit displeased to take this occasion to possess himself of the Kingdom of Burgundy, which he saw to be very fit for him. Gombaut having learned that Clodovæus armed in good earnest against him, would needs flatter his brother, whom he had before much exasperated, to win him to his party: but he playing the fox against a fox, having given him fair promises, turned his back towards him, and yielded to the French with all his troups.

The Burgundian affrighted, fled, and cast himself upon the Rhosne, untill such time that he was shut up in Avignon, where Clodovæus desperately pursued him, pressed him, and thrust him upon extremities: so that the least word of Queen Clotilda, had been sufficient to take away his life. But the King contained himself both for the respect he bare to his wife, whom he well knew not to be delighted with the blood of her allies, and for the discretion which Arredius a Counsellour of Gombaut used toward him. The vanquished King yielded to all the conditions proposed by the Conquerour, so far as to become tributary to France.

Afterwards the troups of Clodovæus being retired, this man full of gall and bitterness against Godegisilus his brother, who had levied arms against him, besieged him in Vienna, contrary to all promises made to Clodovæus, and having surprized him, slew him in the Church with his own hand: which was an act barbarous, and only worthy of a man abandoned of all sense of Religion. This cruelty was the cause that Clodovæus returning back again, entred into Burgundy, and possessed himselfe thereof, to punish the exorbitances of a man, who was as outragious to offend those who might hurt him, as unable to resist the justice of arms raised against him.

There remained nothing for him in this shipwrack, but an ignominious and miserable life, which God oftentimes inflicteth for punishment of brother-slayers, as he did to Cain; which he finally ended in Arianism. The holy Clotilda (as I said before) taking pitty of the issue of this wicked father, employed all her endeavours to preserve for Sigismond the title of King, and some competent remainders of a fortune, horribly dis-membred by the evil manage of this Prince, blinded with errour and impiety.

From thence, Clodovæus transferred his arms into Aquitaine, where he had business enough to deal with Alaricus King of the Visigoths. But as I undertook not in this Treatise to enlarge upon the wars of Clodovæus, nor on his singular valour, but as it may be considered to correspond with the piety he received from Clotilda, I remit the Reader to the History of France: contenting my selfe to observe two or three passages of the Divine Providence over King Clodovæus in this war. The first was, that having resolved to turn his arms against this Goth, who drew into his Territories all the enemies of France, and who was an Arian heretick, most inhumanely used the Catholicks, which were in his power; he endeavouring to decline this blow, used many wiles to surprize his adversary, and murther him if he could, under colour of emparlance and amity. Clodovæus notwithstanding, shielded by the powerfull hand of God, was delivered from his practises, and although the other was supported by King Theodorick, who was his father-in-law, his countrey-man, and leagued with other Kings, our brave Monarch replenished with the confidence he had in the cause of God, as one who intended to cut off the root of the Arian heresie, which budded forth in France, courageously marched in the face of the enemy, and with so much speed prevented him, that he rather seemed to have the conduct of an army of eagles then souldiers.

see Monsieur du Plein.

A second testimony of the faithfull love of Heaven, appeared in wonders, which served for a presage of the near approaching victory. The one was, that the King, according to his customary piety, having appointed some men of purpose to offer up his vows at the feet of Saint Martin, they entring into the Church to perform their devotions, heard by good chance the Quire of Choristers who sung out aloud this versicle of the seventeenth Psalm: Præcinxisti me Domine virtute ad bellum: supplantâsti insurgentes in me. Lord, thou hast engirted me with force and valour for war: Thou hast cast under me all those, who were raised against me: which being related to the King, he thereupon conceived good success, and setting forward on his way, as he entred into Poictiers, there was seen to issue out of the Church of Saint Hilary of Poictiers, a great brand of fire, like unto that flaming pillar which heretofore led the chosen people through so many dreadful wildernesses; in such sort, that it seemed this great S. Hilary, who had heretofore been a light both for the East and West against Hereticks, enlightned still on the top of the place, where he had been reverenced, a burning Pharos, to illuminate the conquests of a Prince, who hastened to do that with the keen sword, which he had formerly acted with the sharp dint of the tongue. In the end, coming upon the brink of a river swoln up, where he knew not how to find a foord, which much stopped the course of his enterprize, behold a Hinde rouzed with the noise of the Army, took the river in the sight of the French, in a place where it was passable, and shewed them the way, who prosperously followed. The King encouraged by so many prodigies, encountreth with Alaricus, & gave him battel very roughly, fortune holding the victory in ballance about six or seven hours, until the French, animated by the good example of their King, renewed their forces with loud out-cries, & brake with all violence through the files of the Goths. Clodovæus, who had the flame of a generous vigour, burning perpetually in his heart, much desired to meet with King Alaricus, when perceiving him in the middest of the conflict, he set forward to encounter him. The other already contemned by his own Goths, for having heretofore refused the combat, and seeing his Army in disorder, became valiant in his despair, and put on a resolution, either to vanquish his enemy, or to wash away the stains of his dishonour with his bloud. He withdrew himself from the main of his Cavalry, and marched on towards Clodovæus. The souldiers stood still on both parts at this great duel of two Kings. They came to handy strokes in the head of two Armies, and charged one another bravely, being a very long time bloudily bent to battel: but in the end Alaricus felt the thunder, which proceeding from the victorious hand of his adversary, threw him down half dead in the list of combat. Clodovæus quickly alighted from his horse, to rid him of life; and being about to mend some defect in this cuiras, he was treacherously assaulted by two Goths: but he having dispatched his adversary, defended himself from both these, and mounted up again on his horse, whom he made to curvet in a martial manner, demeaning himself so bravely in all, that he seemed to be as it were a flash of lightning, sent from the hand of God, rather then a man.

This defeat ruined the hopes of the Goths, and cut off all the designs of heresy, which subsisted not but by their favour. From thence Clodovæus marched all covered over with laurels into the Countrys of his conquests, with so much good success, that being before the City of Angoulesme, which made shew of resistance, the walls miraculously fell down, as did heretofore those of Jericho, he having, by the advise of Aprunus his Chaplain, caused some holy reliques to be lifted up, whereunto he dedicated a singular devotion.

What need we here make mention of the adventures, which he had with the Kings Chararic, and Ragvachairus, whom he defeated as it were without blows? This man went every where as confidently, as one who seemed to have a Guard of celestial Virtues by his side: his hands were fatal to purge the earth from many Infidel Princes, that infected it with heresie, tyrannies, and sacriledges. Who can but wonder, that in so short a time he extended his Empire from Rheine to Seine, from the river of Loyre to Rosne, and from the Pyrenæi to the Ocean? Who can but admire, that he was so feared by all the Monarchs of his age, as the Grecians, who have written after that time under the title of King, intended for the more excellency, to speak onely of the King of France? who will not highly esteem his great authority, in that he first of all stampt golden coyn, which the Emperours had always forborn through extream jealousie, causing the marks of his faith to be impressed on this money? And who can sufficiently marvel, that having at his death left four sons to succeed him, he hath besides been followed by seven and fifty Kings, who constantly rendering themselves imitatours of his belief, have likewise shared with him in his felicity.

Suidas. Ῥᾳξ Γαλλων ἀγαθὸς.

I demand of you whether one must not become blind, deaf, and dumb, not to see, understand, nor declare, that all the happiness and prosperity of France is inseparably tied to the piety of our Ancestours, since the hand of God, thundering and lightning at the same time upon so great a number of Diadems of heretical Kings, as of Gombaut, Godemar, Chilperic, Godegisilus, Alaricus, and in the end on Theodorick himself, led Clodovæus by the hand through so many smoaking ruins, so many swords, & such flames, to establish him with all his posterity in a Throne, whereunto the great Saint Remigius hath promised an eternity of years, so long as it should remain cemented with the same faith and religion, which first of all consecrated the Lilies to the service of the Divine Majesty?

The holy Clotilda, amongst all these conquests of her husband, lifted her innocent hands up to Heaven to apply the forces of the Saviour of the world to his Royal banners. In the end, having drawn him to Paris, after so many bloudy wars, and sweetned the extravagancies of his nature, a little too violent, propending to excesses of cruelty, she caused him to tast in his repose, devotion and justice, in such sort, that having closed up his eyes in the exercises of piety, she enterred him with a most honourable reputation. There is yet to be found an old Calendar of the Church of S. Geneviefue, which maketh mention of the day of his death, on the seven and twentieth of November.

V. Kal. Dec. Depositio magni Regis Clodovæi. Du Pleix.

The ninth SECTION.

The life of Clotilda in her widow-hood: her afflictions and glorious death.

Clotilda vehemently desired to bring forth male children, for the establishment of her State, and though this affection seemed to be most just, notwithstanding God, who purgeth all the elect in the furnace of afflictions, found a rough Purgatory for this good soul, in the enjoying her desires. She had sons, as she wished, whom she endeavoured with all her power to breed in the fear of God, whilest she might bow them: but these children, who tasted too much of the warlick humours of the father, and had not not enough of the piety of the mother, being arrived to an age wherein it was not possible any longer to restrain them, they fell into many terrible extravagancies, which transfixed the heart of the mother with a thousand swords of sorrow.

It happened that Sigismond, the cousin-germain of Clotilda, for whom she had procured the Kingdom of Burgundy, after the death of his wife, by whom he had a son named Sigerius, suffered himself to be surprized with the love of a Lady waiting in Court, whom he afterward married, to the great heart-burning of the son, who could not endure to see her clothed with the spoils of his mother.

This step-dame being drawn from servitude and wantonness, to enter into the bed of a King, beholding her self crossed in her loves by this Heir of the house, conceived so much gall and rage against him, that she prepared a most fatal calumny for his ruin, accusing him to have a plot upon the life of his father. Sigismond, who was of an easie nature, stirred up with love and ambition, quickly believed this shameless creature: and after he had called this poor young man to dinner, under colour of affection, he commanded him in his sleep to be strangled by the hands of his servants. But the miserable man, delivered out of the gulf of his passion, and seeing himself defiled with an act so black and wicked, publickly confessed his sin, and for it performed a most austere penance: but God, who ordinarily blotteth out the crime, not forgiving the pains and satisfactions due to his justice, deprived him of Scepter and life by the hands of his allies, raising up a sharp revenge, to give to such like an eternal horrour of his iniquity.

The children of Clodovæus, who had already shared the Kingdom of their father, were not yet satisfied, but desired to advance the limits of their division, as far as the point of their lance might extend. Behold the cause why Clodomer, who was the eldest of the legitimate, seeing the Kingdom of Burgundy in this danger, entreth thereinto with great forces, and found little resistance; Sigismond being formerly convinced by his crime. Having possessed himself of the places most important, he took the miserable King, and led him away prisoner to Orleans; to dispose of him according to his pleasure. But Godimer, the brother of Sigismond, who had retired to the mountains, while the French made all this notable havock, returned with a great power, and having slain the French Garrisons, made himself Master of the Kingdom. Clodomer understanding this defeat, became so furious, that he caused the head of his prisoner to be cut off, with his wife and children by his second marriage, commanding, through extremity of cruelty, to throw the body into a ditch, which was executed. Nor content with this, he re-entereth into Burgundy boyling with choller, with intention to recover all to his obedience: but he found himself assaulted by the Burgundians in a battel, who slew him; and knowing him by his long hair, they cut off his head, and fixed it on the point of a launce, to serve for a sad spectacle to the French.

This accident afflicted the heart of the mother, who bewailed her son with inconsolable tears, as well because he was the first, whom she had bred with all tender affection, as for that she seeing him dead in the pursuit of so many bloudy acts, was full of anxiety in the matter of salvation of his soul. The poor Queen fortified her self, as much as she might, against the violences of sorrow, and armed her self against other accidents which she foresaw might grow from the evil dispositions of her children.

Clodomer left three sons very young, whom the holy woman bred up in her house, and near her person, into whom the most excellent Maxims of all wisdom and piety were distilled. These little children very well bred, and gently trained by the very good precepts of their grand-mother, promised something excellent in time to come, and served as a most sweet lenitive to this disconsolate turtle, to sweeten the acerbities she had conceived upon the death of their father: when behold an horrible frenzy crept into the souls of Childebert and Clotharius her two sons, which is read in all our histories, the brows whereof do blush to leave a blemished execration on the wicked exorbitancy of ambition.

It were much fitter for the great men of the earth to have gnawing vultures, and sharp rasors in their entrails, then to nourish such a passion, which being onely puffed up with a smoake, violateth all it hath therein of right or humanity, to fatten it self with bloud, and never as it were openeth its eyes, but in the flames of the damned.

Childebert and Clotharius, sons of the great Clodovæus and the holy Clotilda, despoyling themselves of all respect, sweetness, & humanity, conceived a mortal jealousie against their little Nephews, imagining their mother would breed them up to their prejudice; and so not taking counsel of ought but their own brutish passion, they resolved to be rid of them. The poor children were perpetually under the wing of their good grand-mother Clotilda, who could never suffer them out of her sight, such fear had she of ill habits, which are easily made to slide into the hearts of children by the corruption of evil company. These infamous Uncles besought their mother to let their little Nephews come to visit them, to have thereby some harmless recreation, promising to restore them again speedily into her hands. The holy woman, who could not imagine the execrable malice, which was hatched in the heart of these unnatural sons, consented these little ones should go, fearing least the denial she might make, would further exasperate the suspition of the suppliants. Yet did she even then quake for fear, and bidding them farewel, kissed them with redoubled embracements, raptures, and affections, not being able to contain her passion, nor the presage of her unhappiness.

The little innocents went to the slaughter with a smiling countenance, as children who have walks of recreation, and play in their heads.

When they had them in their full power, they dispatched a messenger to their mother, to bear unto her most unwelcome news. For he was commanded to shew her a poynard and a cyzars, requiring her, she would make choice, which of these she should judge fittest for her grand-children, either to pass them by the dint of sword, or forcibly to shave them and make them Monks.

Clotilda, extreamly astonished at this impudence, answered, As well dead, as Monks: which some very inconsiderately have interpreted, thinking this answer proceeded from an ambition she had, that her grand-children might reign: but the admirable Princess would say, that we ought not to apply any to the service of God, but voluntaries, and that she had rather see her children well dead, then to behold them in a religious profession by constraint & force. This wretched messenger made to the humour of his Masters, instead of sweetning the matter, made a very harsh relation of his message, which precipitated the evil already beginning to fall into extremity.

Clotharius possessed with a diabolical spirit, took Thibault the eldest of these children, & striking him down down to the ground, thrust his sword quite through his body. The little Gontheran, who was the second, besprinkled with the blood of his brother, whom he saw distended on the pavement, grasped the knees of his Uncle Childebert, with lamentable outcries, saying: O Uncle, save my life, wherein have I offended you? He so quaked in all the parts of his body, & so transfixed him with his sight, that the other, though he purposed this mischief, was seized with much compassion, and prayed his brother to pass no further. But Clotharius enraged, and more ravenous then a Tyger of Armenia, What? (saith he) you have been of the Councel, and yet now hinder me in the execution: I will run you both through with my sword. Childebert amazed, threw the poor victim from his knees, and delivered him to the executioner, who in that very place cut his throat.

As they were upon these contestations, the third son of Clodomer named Clodoaldus, was taken away by a friend of the father, and secretly bred up in Ecclesiastical condition, wherein he arrived to so perfect a sanctity, that forsaking the shadow of Diadems and Scepters, which deceiveth the credulity of the most passionate by its illusions, he hath merited Altars on earth, and a Crown of Glory in Heaven. For this is that S. Cloud which we reverence, near unto Paris.

What imagination is sufficiently powerful to figure to its self the ardent dolours, which seized on the spirit of poor Clotilda, when she heard all that passed by the practise of her unnatural sons? What might this soul think so free and purified from the contagions of the earth, which apprehended the shadow of the least sins, when she beheld her house polluted with so horrible sacrileges? Yet still she guided the helm of reason in so tempestuous a storm of passions, & in so dead a night of misery, she adored a ray of the Providence of God, which she considered in the depth of her sorrows: she her self no whit affrighted, took up the mangled bodies of these innocent creatures, and gathered together the scattered members as well as she could, saying: Poor Children, I bewail not your death, although it cannot be too much bemoaned. You are dead like little Abels, like little Innocents, forsaking the earth, profaned with the crimes of your Uncles, to hasten to possess a place in Heaven; you have out run me, to live hereafter in the bosom of your grand-father. But I sorrow for these Cains, and these Herods, who so treacherously have murdered you, and who, wheresoever they are, I assure my self do carry pincers and executioners in their hearts. They ought at least to bear respect to the ashes of their father, they ought to have compassion on the tenderness of your bodies; They ought somewhat to regard my age and the care I have had to breed them, since the death of the King. And had they concluded upon this massacre when they took you from my house, they should have executed you in my arms; I at the least had closed up your dying eyes with my fingers, I had wiped away the blood from your faces, I had encouraged you to death, I had received your last sighs in my bosom. Alas, my pretty creatures little did I think the kisses I gave you at your departure, were to be the last I should afford in your life. Pure and innocent souls departed from these bodies in an age, wherein you were ignorant of sins which never approached your knowledges, much less defiled your bodies. Behold from those Palaces of Stars and light your afflicted mother, whom God hath as yet left on earth to give burial to your bodies.

Speaking this, she caused them to be carried away that she might bestow them in the tomb of their grand-father, where being her self personally arrived, nature evicted a huge tide of tears from her constancy and caused her to say:

My most honoured Lord and husband, who so cordially loved me in this life, will you not open unto me your sacred tomb to entertain me near you? Behold here your grand-children, which I bring unto you, little blossoms cut off in the tenderness of their age, by the hands of their Uncles, your children and mine. Most dear husband, I account you thrice happy, to have been transported into the other world before you saw these lamentable tragedies. Were there nought but their respect towards you, it ought to have restrained them. But my sins alone have deserved this desolate old age, to which God hath reserved me to make trial of the most sensible dolours which might ever fall into my imagination. I will endure them as long as it shall please the Divine Providence, who will draw this satisfaction from my sins, and I wish sorrow will waste my body, that hath almost nothing left but the bark, to place it in short time with yours.

The holy woman daily poured her self out in tears near to this sepulchre, remaining there day and night, as if she had been some shadow of the dead: but in the end to divert her self from this imagination, which was too full of affliction, and that she might the more freely enjoy God, she resolved wholly to leave the Court, and to pass the rest of her days in the City of Tours, near to the sepulcher of S. Martin.

There it was where she began to lead a life wholly celestial, as one who seemed to have nothing to do with the bodies and conversation of the living.

It is true, that great prosperities do not easily corrupt souls, which have taken a good temper in the fear of God,; yet notwithstanding they wound, and in some sort change them. A little Bee sometimes goeth so long upon her honey, that by much walking there, she entangleth her wings: so a soul, yea one of those which are the most devout, being continually soothed by a long sequel of good successes of the affairs of the world, taketh some small flight out of it self, and seeketh recreation in a smiling and delicate air, which affordeth it nothing but objects of delight: but so soon as adversity hath given its blow, it re-entreth into it self; it foldeth it self within it self; it tasteth it self; it knoweth it self; it findeth God in the bottom of its heart, afflicted and perplexed with the revolutions of the world; it raiseth it self above the ways of the Moon, and the tracks of the Sun, to that goodly Temple of Eternity, where spirits live despoiled from these masses of flesh and bones, which we drag along with us in this mortal life.

This is the way which the wise Clotilda took so soon as she was alienated from the Court, and disentangled from affairs, which she never had used but for obligation of conscience, she entreth into a sweet retirement, where it seemed unto her that nature had not displayed the mountains and valleys, the forrests and rivers, but to make her a theater of the works of God. She relished this retreat, as Manna from Paradise, and tasted this deep silence with incredible delight, after so many confused clamours of the embroylments of Court. It seemed unto her that she then spake to God, face to face, and that she saw all the pride of the earth much lower then her feet. Her soul was whitened with her tears, was purified in her desires, and vapoured out all into God, as it were, through the limbeck of her ardent charity.

The holy Lady, who had heretofore loved to behold her self shine in the majesty of sumptuous attire, to render her self more acceptable to her husband, more illustrious in the eyes of her people, was cloathed so modestly, that her history telleth, she was seen to be covered with course cloth. She who heretofore was altogether sparkling with precious stones, appeared now in the livery of penance. She who had endeavoured temperately to entertain a mortal beauty for the contentment of her dear husband, was wholly wasted with mortifications of the flesh. She who after so many victories of one of the most valiantest husbands that ever was, had been led along triumphant in the chariot of glory, conversed with widows and orphans, going as it were perpetually on foot, were it not that the weakneſs of her body diſpenſed with her therein, by the counſel of thoſe who undertook the care of her health. She, who had ſeen all the ſervices of a great Monarchy at her feet, was then continually proſtrate at the feet of the poor, whom ſhe ſerved as the living Images of God. She, who had taken ſome care to manage revenues, as the ſinews of State, deſpoiled her ſelf as it were from things moſt neceſſary for life, to ſuccour the neceſſities of the people. She, who had delighted to build goodly Palaces, had not any affection but for Monaſteries and Churches, which ſhe cauſed to be erected every where, with ſo much liberality as her means would permit. This divine woman was as the Moon in eclipſe, which appeareth wholly dark on the ſide towards the earth, but faileth not to be moſt radiant on that part wherewith ſhe looketh towards Heaven. So thoſe who beheld this Princeſs with carnal eys in ſuch a ſtate, ſaid ſhe was eclipſed; but God, who in this retirement darted on her, rays of glory through the Cloud of the body, cauſed her to ſee with eys of Angels, as a ſoul wholly inveſted with the Sun of juſtice.

As ſhe was in the ſweetneſs of this repoſe, news came unto her very haſtily, that ſhe muſt return to Court, to appeaſe the diſcord between her children who were ready to encounter one another, and to embroil the Kingdom in the deſperate deſolations of Civil war.

The good woman did not as thoſe, who hold retirement from the vanities of the world as a puniſhment, nor ever are with themſelves, unleſs neceſſity make them take the way, which they cannot elect by reaſon. So ſoon as ſhe underſtood theſe importunities, which call'd her back to the affairs of the world, ſhe haſtened to proſtrate her ſelf at the ſepulcher of S. Martin, ſhedding forth bitter tears, and ſaying: My God, you know my heart, and that it is neither for fear of pain, nor want of courage, that I retired from the Court of my children; but that ſeeing their diſpoſitions and affairs in ſuch a condition, that I could not think my ſelf any way able to profit them by my counſels, I made choice of the means which I thought moſt likely to help them, which are Prayers. And behold me here now humbled at the Tomb of one of your great ſervants to beg of you by his merits and aſhes, to pacifie the differences of theſe unfortunate children, and to behold with the eye of your accuſtomed mercies this poor people and Kingom of France, to which you have configned and given ſo many pledges of your faithful love. My God, if you think my preſence may ſerve to ſweeten the ſharpneſs of theſe ſpirits, I will neither have conſideration of my Age nor health; but ſhall ſacrifice my ſelf in this voyage for the publick: but if I may be of no other uſe, but to ſtand as an unprofitable burthen, as I with much reaſon perſwade my ſelf, I conjure you for your own goodneſs ſake, to receive my humble prayers, and accommodate their affairs, and ever to preſerve unto me the honour which I have to ſerve you in this retirement.

A moſt miraculous thing: it is obſerved that at the ſame time when the holy woman prayed at the tomb, the Arms of the brothers now ready to encounter to pour forth a Deluge of blood, ſuddenly ſtopped; and theſe two Kings not knowing by what ſpirit they were moved mutually ſent to each other an Embaſſage of peace, which was concluded in the place, to the admiration and contentment of the whole world. This much confirmed Clotilda in her holy reſolution, wherein ſhe lived to great decrepitneſs of Age. And in the end, having had revelation of the day of her death, ſhe ſent for her two ſons, Childebert and Clotharius, whereof this, who was the moſt harſh, was in ſome ſort become humble, having undergone certain penances appointed him by Pope Agapetus, to expiate many exorbitances which he had committed; for ſuch is the moſt common opinion. Theſe two Kings being come, the mother ſpake to them in theſe terms:

I was as it were reſolved to paſs out of the world without ſeeing you, not for the hatred of your perſons, which cannot fall into a ſoul ſuch as mine, but for the horrour of your deportments, that cannot be juſtified but by repentance. God knows, I having beheld you ſo many times to abandon the reſpect you owe to my age, and the authority which nature gave me over your breeding, never have endeavoured to put off the heart of a mother towards you, which I yet retain upon the brink of my tomb. I begged you of God before your birth, with deſires which then ſeemed unto me reaſonable, but which perhaps were too vehement; and if ever mother were paſſionate in the love of her children, I moſt ſenſibly felt thoſe ſtings, yielding my ſoul as a prey to all cares, and my body to travels, to breed and bring you up with pains, which are not ſo ordinary with Queen-mothers.

I expected from your nature ſome correſpondence to my charitable affections, when you ſhould arrive to the Age of diſcretion. I imagined after the death of your father, my moſt honoured Lord, that my Age which began to decline, ſhould find ſome comfort in your piety. But you have done that which I will paſs under ſilence: For it ſeemed to me your ſpirits have as much horrour of it as mine, which yet bleedeth at it, nor do I know when time will ſtanch the blood of a wound ſo hideous.

Out alas, my children! You perſwaded your ſelves it was a goodly matter to unpeople the world, to enlarge your power, and to violate nature, to eſtabliſh your Thrones with the blood of your allies; which is a moſt execrable frenzie. For I proteſt at this hour, wherein I go to render an account of mine actions before the living God, that I ſhould rather wiſh to have brought you into the world to be the vaſſals of Peaſants, then to ſee the Scepter in your hands, if it ſerved you to no other uſe, but to authorize your crimes. Blind as you are, who behold not that the Diamonds of a Royal Crown, ſweat with horrour upon a head poiſoned with ambition. When you ſhall arrive to that period wherein I am now, what will it help you to have worn Purple, if having defiled it with your ordures, you muſt make an exchange with a habit of flames, which ſhall no more wear out then eternity?

Return, my children, to the fair way you have forſaken: you might have ſeen by what paths the providence of God, led the King your father to the Throne of his Monarchie: you might have alſo obſerved the diſaſters of Kings our near allies for that they wandered from true piety. That little ſhadow which you yet retain of holy Religion, hath ſuſpended the hand of God, and withheld the fatal blow, which he would otherwiſe have let fall upon your ſtate. If you perſiſt in evil, you will provoke his juſtice by the contempt of his mercie. Above all, be united with a band of conſtant peace: for by dividing your hearts, you diſunite your Kingdoms; and deſiring to build up your fortunes by your diſſentions, you will make deſolate your houſes. Do juſtice to your poor people, who lived under the reign of your father with ſo much tranquilitie, and which your diviſions have now covered all over with acerbities. Is it not time to ſo get what is paſt, and to begin to live then, when you muſt begin to die? My children, I give you the laſt farewell, and pray you to remember my poor ſoul, and to lodge my body in the Sepulcher of the King your father, as I have ever deſired.

The Saint ſpeaking this, ſaw that theſe children, who had before been ſo obdurate, were wholly diſſolved into tears, and kneeling about her bed, kiſſed her hands, having their ſpeech ſo interrupted with ſobs, they could not anſwer one word. Thereupon ſhe drew the curtain over all worldly affairs, to be onely entertained with God. And her maladie daily encreaſing, ſhe pronounced aloud the profeſſion of the Catholick faith, wherein ſhe died; then required the Sacraments of the Euchariſt and extream Unction, which were adminiſtred unto her, and by her received with infinite devotion. From thence forward ſhe for ſome time onely lived on extaſies of her ſoul, turning that little breath which remained on her lips, to the praiſes of God: and in the end, rendered up her happy Ghoſt, the third day of June, on the firſt hour of the night, pronouncing in the inſtant of death theſe words: Adte Domine levavi animam meam: Deus meus in te confido, non erubeſcam.

The Hiſtory telleth, that the chamber where ſhe died, at the inſtant when her ſoul departed out of her body, appeared very lightſom, and that her ſacred members yielded forth a moſt ſweet ſavour, which left to all there preſent a great eſtimation of her ſanctity.

city. Her body was interred, as she desired, at the feet of S. Genevefue: for she was so humble, that she accounted her self most happy, to submit her diadem to the ashes of a poor shepherdess. Her memory hath been so honourable throughout all France, that she is yet reverenced under the name of S Clothe, which is the Vulgar word.

O woman, truely worthy to bear a Crown of stars! gold, silver, and precious stones are too base for you If statues should be erected suitable to your desert, Diamonds, Emeraulds and Topazes, which have been employed on the pourtracts of the Queens of Ægypt, would be of too mean a value in respect of your prayses.

Oh Queens, oh Princesses, nay, oh Ladies, and Gentle-women, why do not you at the least in your houses, that which she performed in an ample Kingdom? What a glory? What an Empire? and what a triumph, to issue from the house of a King of Burgundy, as an innocent lamb, a poor orphan, married for despight, and to enter into a Court full of Idolatries, which seemed then a forrest of ravenous beasts, yet knew so well how to charm them with invincible spels of her piety, as to convert a King warlike, haughty, a Pagan, and in converting him to change the whole face of a great Monarchy?

All that which we retain of Religion, piety, and happiness under God, we ow to this holy Queen. O France, France, my dear Country! how art thou bound to her memory, to her name, to her virtue, & how much oughtest thou to preserve the precious treasure of faith, which she hath so happily recommended unto thee by her example!

I speak not at all now of the particular favours thou hast received from Heaven: I say nothing of thy flower-de-luces, of thy holy Viol, of thy Standard, of thy cure of the Kings Evil, and other such like. I onely mention that which thou mayest boast before the face of all Nations], nor ever shalt thou loose the glory which S. Gregory the Great, an incomparable man, who flourished above a thousand years since, gave thee in his books, when he calleth thee, the lamp of the whole world, and faith, thy Monarchs as much surpassed all other soveraign Princes, as Kings transcend the people.

Greg. ep. 6. l. 5. quz est 106.

I pronounce that, which thou mayest publish as a priviledge very extraordinary, that Constantine the Great made heretofore a decree, which was afterward engraven upon the Altar of S. Sophia, in the prime Church of Constantinople, by which he expresly forbad all his posterity, to make any alliances or marriages with forreigners wheresoever under Heaven, except the French Nation, as if this Religious Monarch had foreseen that they were the Kings of France who should second him in the zeal he bear to the support of the Church. See and consider the favours God hath done thee herein. Behold thy neighbours, behold the powers and soveraignties of the earth, behold the Empires and Kingdoms: where is it, that one alone may be found from the memory of men, which hath received Catholick Religion with more favour, which hath defended it with more courage, which hath preserved it with more constancy? Behold the Roman Empire, and thou shalt see presently after Constantine, his sons to be Hereticks, and his son-in-law an Apostata. Behold Italy, and thou shalt see it sheltered under the protection of thy Kings. Behold Spain, & thou shalt see it overrun with Goths, Vandals, and Saracens, and the Scepter in the hands of Arian Kings. Behold England, and thou shalt see, that it did not seriously receive the faith, till six hundred years were fully expired, after the publication of the Gospel. Poland accounteth six huudred and two and fifty years since it was Christian: Muscovia six hundred and two and twenty. Thou (O France alone art it, to whom Jesus Christ being in the agony of his dolorous passion when he recommended his mother to S. John, and his soul to his father, designed, and miraculously deputed a Pastour, to wit, the glorious S. Denys, who received the first rays of the knowledge of God in this eclipse, which happened at the death of our Saviour, to diffuse his divine lights afterward with his bloud upon the mountains, where thy Virgins do as yet a lead a life wholly Angelical.

Baron. tom. 10. anno Christi 960. Constant. Octavi 49.

O France, wherefore hast thou enlightned all the parts of the world with thy conquests? Wherefore thy Kings having communicated themselves with so much sweetness and facility, have they augmented their Majesty by familiarity with the people, which usually dissolveth it? Why have they appeared as Amethists, which shine so much the more, as they are often worn? Why hast thou been a Seminary of all great spirits? Why hast thou in all times held predominance in learning and sciences, like unto the Altar of the Sun, from whence light is borrowed to illuminate all other lamps? Why dost thou astonish all histories with the continuance of thy Monarchy, to which there is none to be found comparable in the world? Why hath God so many times enriched thee by thy losses, ennobled thee by thy disasters, raised thee by thy ruins and precipices,

——fecitque cadendo,
Ne caderes?

Is it not for having preserved this precious jewel of Clotilda, this faith, this Religion, which she hath consigned to thy Kings, and to thy people? Oh blind, if thou knowest it not! Oh insensible, if thou neglectest it! Oh unfortunate, if thou loosest it! Go yet, and see the ashes of this good Princess, which are in thy Capital City, ashes worthy to be kissed of Queens, honoured by Kings, and reverenced by all people.

So long as there shall be Sacrifices and Altars, Angels and men, the name of holy Clotilda shall live, & spread it self with a sweet odour through all the Provinces of Christendom; and my pen, which taketh its flight much further then my design intended, shal be the messenger of her greatness, with so much the more fidelity, as it hath confidence in her protection

I will also to crown this work, represent unto you a Lady, issued of her bloud, a grand-child of one of her sons, who hath done in Spain, that which this in France; converting her husband to the faith, and by consequence gained the Nation.

The tenth SECTION.

INDEGONDIS,
Issued from the bloud and house of Clotilda, transporteth the Catholick faith into Spain.

ABout the year five hundred foureſcore and three, Levigildus an Arian Prince, reigned in Spain, who seeing the house of France held supereminency amongst all the Kingdoms of the world, sought the alliance thereof; and obtained for wife to his eldest son, called Hermingildus, the daughter of Sigebert, grand child of Clotilda, named in History Indegondis.

She was one of the most accomplished Princesses of that Age, in whom beauty, grace, and virtue, made together an admirable harmony, to purchase her the hearts hearts of all the world. Every one lamented that this bright day-break, which began to enlighten France with its rays, went at her rising into a Countrey, where the Sun setteth, and that so many singular perfections were separated from that Kingdom which had given them birth. The good virgin, who had no other object, but the obedience she ought to render those to whom nature had subjected her, went well pleased, besides was something satisfied with the title of a Queen, which she might justly one day expect. But little knew she the combats and difficulties that waited on her in the same place, where she hoped to gather nothing else but flowers.

I do not think hell can ever produce a mischief like unto heresy: which wholly perverting good affairs, instantly hasteneth to drench all the contentments of this innocent soul in a deluge of tears. Alas, a million of tortures well deserve to be employed upon the criminal souls of those who were the first authours of this monster. For it in all Ages hath disturbed States of Princes, ruined so much generous Nobility, and sowed division among the most settled amities.

The wise of that time much apprehended the sending of this young maid into Spain, to marry her to an heretical Prince, to place her in a Court wholly infected with heresy, where no other objects should be presented unto her, but errour and vice. Behold (said they) a goodly vessel well rigged, well furnished, well guided, which hath sails of linnen, cordage of purple, and oars of silver; but they go about to expose it to a rough tempest. Behold an excellent meadow all enamelled with most delicious beauties of nature; but they endeavour to oppose it to cruel Northern blasts. Behold a chrystal well polished, smooth, and delicate; but they seek to hazard it to the strokes of the hammer. Behold a statue all resplendent with gold, and precious stones; but they trample it under foot. What will a child be able to do amongst so much malice? An age so tender, amongst so many heads grown hoary in sin? A great simplicity amongst so many snares? A maid which hath no recommendation but chastity and obedience, amongst so many wicked commands? Do we think that a father-in-law, a husband, a mother-in-law will have no power over her spirit? That pleasures will not allure her? That the dignity of a Kingdom will not move her? That the lustre of a Diadem will not dazle her eyes, and force prevail upon her? If that should be given her which she deserveth it were fit to afford her all but the power to ruin her self.

Others said very temperately, that we must not believe, that by gaining a Kingdom she should loose religion: that she was of bloud so illustrious, it received no blemish; that she would rather dy then dishonour her birth; that she would endure all the torments of Martyrs rather then betray her faith. And that if needs she must make ship-wrack of all her fortunes, that the last plank she would embrace, should be a good conscience: that she should be assisted by a good Council, that would never forsake her: that there were as yet in Spain very many Catholicks, whose tears she would wipe away, and sweeten their acerbities: That her husband, a young Prince, was not so obdurate, but that she might hope one day to joyn him to the Catholick faith: Women are infinitely powerful, when they once have gained the heart of a man. In the end, that she must reflect on the example of her grand-mother, who had converted her husband, with all his Court; and if then cold and timorous considerations had been used upon this marriage, France might still have Pagan. If the mother overcame an Idolater, the daughter may well prevail on an Arian.

Yet they, which speak thus, judged not the conversion of hereticks to be much more difficult then that of pagans, as well for the intolerable pride which ordinarily possesseth their spirits, as for a certain malediction, which seemeth to be tied to those who voluntarily withdraw themselves from the light, and shake off the yoke of lawful powers.

Yet notwithstanding considerations of State transported her, and Indegondis would take her fortune promising her self so much assistance of God, that not onely she should stand firm in the piety of her Ancestours, but that if it were possible, she would save her husband: supposing to her self he was neither of marble nor iron, nor to be mollified with the attractives of her sex.

The courageous maid was waited on into Spain, by a flourishing conduct of French Nobility, where she was received with very great applauses, for the reputation which the name of France had acquired in the opinion of all the people.

The King Levigildus her father-in-law, was married upon second nuptials to an Arian wife, named Goizintha, who was as deformed of body as mind: notwithstanding, she had charmed the heart of this old man, by I know not what kind of sleights, that she held predominance upon affairs, and bent as it were all his wills at her pleasure.

She shewed in the beginning an extraordinary affection to this marriage, and went in person to the Princess, giving her such fair entertainment, that it seemed she went about to over whelm her with courtesies.

Yet was it to behold night and Aurora in one and the same Chariot, to see these two Princesses together. For Goizintha, besides other deformities of her person, was become blind of one eye: and Indegondis laying aside so many excellent parts, which she had from nature, appeared on that day in her attires like unto those Goddesses which the Poets and Painters form, according to the most advantageous idæa's of their spirits.

Hermingildus her husband beholding her so accomplished, easily felt the glances shot from her eyes, were rays from her, but arrows for his heart, from whence he could receive nought but honourable wounds. Never any man bound himself to a creature of the world with a love so forcible, so honest, and so innocent, as did this Prince to this admirable Virgin. From the first arrival, and first glance of the eye, he felt his soul transported with a sweet violence, and it seemed unto him this stranger came to negotiate with him a love, much different from that of flesh and bloud.

It is a position, which hath been sufficiently argued by ancient Sages, touching the encounter of amities, which are so diversly applied to objects; sometimes by ordinary ways, as by a manifest reflection of beauty and goodness; sometimes also by passages altogether extraordinary, in such sort, that it is very hard to divine from whence the knot groweth, which tieth two persons who never have seen one another, so suddenly, that it is done in an instant, and so inseparably, that it lasteth even to the tomb. Some have said, it proceedeth from secret influences of the same stars, which predominate at the their births; a matter, which they verily have ado to make good. Others have thought it is a work of fortune, and that loves were shuffled together like cards, to marry sometimes a Queen to a Groom. Others have referred it to complexions of the body, and to reſemblance, which uſeth to be the mother of affections, a thing very probable. Others to the qualities of humours, which is daily ſufficiently found.

But beſides this there is a certain ſecret touch, as in the Adamant, not to us throughly known, which readily ſtriketh its blow, and ſpeaketh in a dumb language in the bottom of hearts. For my part I ſhould think that in this love which Hermingildus bare to Indegondis, there ſhould be ſome very particular paſſage of the Providence of God, who was pleaſed conſtantly to bind his heart to her, whom he intended to make uſe of for his converſion.

The eleventh SECTION.

The perſecutions of Indegondis.

NEver Nuptials were more full of content, nor amities more faithful, nor beginnings more proſperous then were theſe. But there is ever in humane things ſome miſchief, which ſticketh on the moſt ſmiling felicities, and never giveth wine but with a mixture of dregs.

I know not what kinde of fantaſie poſſeſſed this wicked ſtep-mother Goizintha, but ſhe became jealous of the chaſt contentments of her ſon-in-law, altogether, as it were, beſotted of this admirable Princeſs, whom he could not endure out of his ſight. She obſerved their converſation, their diſcourſes, their pleaſures, & ever put her ſelf athwart their deſigns, becoming as troubleſom, as if ſhe had been one of thoſe malign ſpirits which uſe to obſeſs men.

Indegondis, although ſhe paſſionately loved her husband, durſt not refuſe the flattering entertainment of this ſtep-mother, nor ſhew that ſhe diſtaſted the company of her ſex, to ſeek after a man; but the Prince extremely repined hereat, and could not diſſemble the jealouſie of his ſtep-mother, ſaying, She ought to be contented with the credit ſhe had in affairs, not to pry ſo narrowly into his marriage, and by her importunities take from him his deareſt Spouſe. The other let him underſtand, this frequent converſation and amity offered her, tended to no other end, but to convert her to her Religion, thereby to render her the more obſequious to his will. And verily ſhe well witneſſed this deſign was deeply engraven in her heart. For ſhe neither ſpared endeavour nor ſubtle practice to ſeduce this innocent Princeſs, firſt waging war againſt her in the ſhape of a Dragon, afterward of a Lion.

She told her with much cunning, that God might as well be ſerved in one Religion as in another: That we ought to accommodate our ſelves to the place, where Fortune hath ranked us; that it was the chiefeſt policy of a Kingdom, to ſatisfie the will and inclinations of the King: That ſhe was not come into Spain to give Law, but example of obedience: That her husband never could faithfully love her, whileſt ſhe entertained any other ſenſe, other laws, and other Sacraments then himſelf: That never could ſhe be a Queen of people, if ſhe embraced not the faith of the people over whom ſhe was to command: That it was a folly to fear the reproaches of France, where the wiſeſt would ever think ſhe had done diſcreetly, to ſubmit to the times: That if the ſame faults were pardonable in thoſe, who in erring, authorize themſelves with a multitude of great compliees, no man could argue her juſtly of a verity, which ſhe had entertained with a whole Kingdom.

The wicked woman ceaſed not to afflict the innocent ears of this young Princeſs with ſuch like words: but ſhe who had not herein a pliant and yielding ſpirit, proteſted, that if ſhe perſiſted to maintain theſe diſcourſes, it would enforce her to forſake her company, and that it was not needful to uſe ſo many ſubtleties; for ſooner ſhould her heart be torn out of her belly, then her Religion from her ſoul. In ſaying this, ſhe went out of her chamber, ſhewing unto her an eye ſweetly diſcontented, with a ſoul well reſolved: with which the other offended, notwithſtanding diſſembled her anger, ſo much ſhe feared to diſturb her; but quickly afterward endeavouring to make this breach up again, ſhe tendred her a thouſand proteſtations of affection, and ceaſed not to tire her out with flatteries, whereat the poor Indegondis was much perplexed, and could not any longer handle the matter ſo as not to expreſs her diſdain.

Notwithſtanding Goizintha, who loſt not hope to ſeduce her, attempted once again to get her to be baptized after the Arian manner, alledging a thouſand reaſons; whereunto the Princeſs anſwered very wiſely; That ſhe was (thanks be to God) well chriſtened in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt; and that if the water of the Baptiſm of the Arians had been caſt on her head, although ſhe loved her hair as well as any woman of her ſort, ſhe would cut it off, and tear away the skin, which had been defiled with ſuch an execration.

The ſtep-mother hearing theſe words, ſhifted away, and ſaid all foaming with choler, That ſince ſhe would not be baptized after the Arian manner, ſhe would prepare another kinde of Baptiſm for her, which would waſh her from the head to the foot: And thereupon enraged, ſhe put her ſelf upon a practice wholly barbarous, which is related by Saint Gregory the Great, and many others; to wit, that after ſhe had dragged this poor Princeſs by the hair, and tormented her even to the effuſion of ſome blood, ſhe cauſed her to be taken by two or three of her waiting women, commanding them to ſtrip her ſtark naked, then to binde her with cords by the arms, and in this poſture plunge her in a pool, in a very cold ſeaſon of the year.

It was a pitiful ſpectacle to behold the daughter of a King thus cruelly uſed in the ſame place where ſhe entred with ſo many triumphs. The impious Goizintha ſtood upon the brink of the pool, as ſhe, who bare ſway in this torture, and commanded her wicked ſervants to drench her in the water, not all at once, but by little and little, that ſhe might endure the longer Martyrdom. At every moment the miſchievous Queen cried out; Say you are an Arian, and you are ſafe. The holy Maid, who had not ſo much apprehenſion of death, as of her nakedneſs, anſwered aloud: I am a Catholick, a Catholick I will dye: take away my life in this confuſion; neither fire nor water ſhall ever have ſo much force upon me, as to make me unſay it. She was a long time in this torment with a conſtancy, which amazed this bloody ſoul, that ſo tortured her. In the end, ſhe again took her garments, going out of the water, as from an Amphitheater of her glorious battel.

The twelfth SECTION.

The retreat of Hermingildus, and his Converſion.

HErmingildus who knew nothing of what had paſſed, beholding her ſomewhat pale, and weakned with ſuch harſh uſage, asked her if ſhe felt any pain of body, or affliction of minde, to diſcolour her ſo much more then ordinary: but the wiſe Princeſs replied, It was nothing, and that there was not not any thing so important, as to be worthy of his knowledge.

He, who well perceived that she by her discretion dissembled some great affront, enquired very curiously of those who might inform him, and somewhat too soon discovered the cruel disgrace, which his mother-in-law Goizintha had put upon his wife. This transfixed him with a dolour so sensible, and so enkindled him with fire, and choler in his heart, that if the fear of God, and the sweetness of his wife had not served for a counterpoize to his passion, he had torn this wicked Queen in pieces. But the good Indegondis prostrating her self at his feet, besought him by all that which was most noble in him, not to precipitate the matter into such extremities, and prevailed so well with her natural eloquence, that he was contented to remove presently from the Court, and retire to Sevil, which his father had given him for his livelyhood.

Then was the time, when those chast loves, which had been crossed by the disturbances of Goizintha, all obstacles being overcome, enlarged themselves as a River, which having broken its banks, poureth it self with a victorious current in the wideness of his Channel. Hermingildus could not sufficiently satisfie himself to behold so many virtues in so great a beauty: the modesty, which she had witnessed in this last disgrace, gave him apprehensions of her piety above all may be said.

Those, who seek nothing in marriage but sensual pleasure, which is more thin then smoak, and much lighter then the wind, cannot imagine how much these fair amities, which are the daughters of virtues, nourish holy delights. These are celestial fires, which are ever in the bosom of God, as in their sphear. It is he, who begetteth them, and breedeth them, they being not constrained to descend upon earth, to beg a caytiff nourishment from perishable creatures, which promise so many wonders, and produce nought but wind.

These two great souls beheld one another with the eys of the Dove, and were mutually inflamed with affections so honest and innocent, that Angels would not be ashamed to entertain the like fires, since they are those of charity, which is the eternal furnace of all souls the most purified.

Indegondis perceiving she had already great power in the affection of her husband, and that there was no longer any step-mother to dissolve her designs, sollicited him seriously for his conversion, and sayd:

SIR, I must confess unto you, the honour I have received from your alliance seemeth not accomplished, whilest I behold between us a wall of division, which separateth us in belief and Sacraments. Since our amities are come to that point, as to enjoy all in common, and that they unite things most different, why should we divide God, who is most simple of nature? Why should we make two Religions and two Altars, since we now live in such manner, that we have but one table, one heart, and one bed?

Verily, SIR, if I saw the least ray of truth in the Sect you professe, and some hope of salvation, I would submit thereunto, the more to oblige me to your person, which I love above all the things in the world. But it is most undoubted, that you are ill rectified, that you pursue a fantasie in stead of a verity, and that dying in this state, you loose a soul so noble, which I would purchase with expence of my blood. I boast not to be learned, as you Arians, who have so many goodly allegations of Scripture, that you make the ignorant believe, God is all that, which to your selves you imagine.

SIR, I for my part think the chief wisdom in matter of religion, is, not to be so wise as you are, and to have a little more submission of spirit; for faith is the inheritance of the humble, and never doth the day of God shine in a soul, which hath too much light of man. You well see this hereste of the Arians is a revolted Band, which hath forsaken the highway, to wander cross the fields: you are not ignorant that this Arius was a wicked Priest, who raised an hereste for despight, that he was not made Bishop; and was rejected, and solemnly condemned in a Council of three hundred and eighteen Bishops. These men were wise enough for you and me; I fix my self upon their resolutions, I follow the generality of the Church, I adhere to the body of the tree, and you tie your selves to a rotten branch. I have no argument more strong, then the succession of lawful Pastours, then the conformity of the Universal Church, then the succession of all Ages, then the Wisdom, Sanctity, and Piety, which I see resplendent on our side.

Besides, I come from a Country where we have seen all the Arian Kings our neighbours round about, to have had most unhappy ends: when in the mean time my great Grand father, King Clodovæus, for having sincerely embraced Catholick Religion, received so many blessings from Heaven, that he seemed to have good hap and victories under his pay. I am not the daughter of a Prophet, nor do I vaunt to have the spirit of Prophesie; but I dare well foretell, the Kingdom of Spain shall not be of long continuance unless it vomit out this pestilence of Arianism, which lies about the heart of it: I would to God, with expence of my life, I might establish my Religion, then should I account my self the most contented Queen of the world.

Hermingildus knew not what to answer to the strength of truth and love, two the most powerful things in the world; only he said, it was a business which well deserved to be pondered, and that these changes in persons of his quality are subject to much censure, if they have not great reason for caution. The good Princess to give him full leisure to advise thereupon, handled the matter so by her industry, that he conferred with S. Leander, who was a strong pillar of the Catholick faith in Spain. The sage Prelate so well managed the spirit of this Prince, that with assistance of God, and the good offices of Indegondis, who moved Heaven and earth for this conversion, he drew him from errour. This brave courage so soon as he saw the ray of truth, needs would acknowledge and freely confess it, taking the Chrisme of Catholicks with pomp and solemnity, even to the giving a largess of golden coyns, which he purposely caused to be stamped a little too suddenly, making his own image to be engraven thereon, with a Motto, which said, Hæreticum hominem devita: that is to say, we must avoid an Heretick, alluding to his father Levigildus.

Disputation, which concerneth the estate of Princes, is a tickliish piece; where the most part of those who speak of it, use their own interests for Text, and their passion for Commentary. Silence and peace, which are the two mansions of a good conscience, are of much more worth, then all the questions which enkindle divisions. I think the best doctrine is that, which best knoweth how to cement up concord among Miters, Diadems, and Crowns, entertain the obedience of people towards their Sovereigns, and if there be verities, which are the daughters of the Abyss, and silence (as those Ancients said) to leave them in the house of their father and mother, where, though they nought avail, they shall ever be better lodged then in publick.

It is not vice, but the times, which divideth Saints, and every one thinketh an affair probable, which he hath taken upon the byas of his own understanding. S. Leander approved the separation of Hermingildus in Spain: S. Gregory of Tours blamed it in France. I enter not into all the considerations of them both, but I think this Prince took ways too violent in his beginnings, levying arms against his father, which were not according to the counsel of his wife; and I will have no other Authour, but himself, since he condemned his own design, so soon as he began to become holy.

The

The thirteenth Section.

The reciprocal Letters of the father and the son, upon their separation.

Hermingildus, extreemly incensed at the affront which he received in the person most dear unto him in the world, and who wanted not a Nobility round about him, that enkindled the fire of choler, burst forth in the beginning with violence. The father, an old suspitious man, felt himself much displeased with this alteration, & the step mother ceased not to throw flames through her throat, and cry al-arm as loud as she could, to transport affairs instantly, unto the utmost point of severity.

Levigildus notwithstanding, before he would proceed to extremities, sought to do something by letters, which are found couched in the History: wherein this Prince flattereth his son with fair words to surprize him. Behold here the copy of them:

SON, I would willingly say that unto you present, which I cannot sufficiently express in my letters. If you have as much confidence in me, as I yet have love towards you, I verily think were you with me, and alienated from the evil counsels of those who abuse the facility of your excellent nature, I might do much upon your spirit, both as a father, and as a King; so that at the least if you fear my Scepter, you would love my charity which still openeth its arms to your obedience. I have bred you up from your tender infancy, to make you heir of my Crown; and since you arrived to full age, I have conferred so many benefits on you, that they have surmounted my hopes, and as it were drained my liberalities. I have put a Scepter into your hand, to serve your father with the more authority, and not to deliver it over to mine enemy. I have caused you to be stiled a King, to become a support to my Crown, and not a Lord over mine Empire. I have given you all, to repose my old age upon the hope of your duty, and not to afflict me.

And yet notwithstanding, after I have done all this, beyond custom, beyond your age, and above your merit, you pay me with impiety and ingratitude. Expect yet a little, and the law of nature will give you that which you seek by ambition. Alledge not Religion unto me to justifie your arms, it hath been a crime in you to take a Religion contrary to my commands; and an impiety in your Religion, to separate your self from my obedience. I counsel you as a friend and command you as a father, to render your self as soon as possibly you may at my Court, and set your self in the way of duty; otherwise I fear you may implore mercy, when there will be no other Kingdom found for you, but that of justice.

Hermingildus deliberated upon the answer he was to make these Letters: but his Council too fervent shewed him, it was now no time to retire back; that he had to do with a man imperious, and turbulent, a mother-in-law irreconcileable, who had no other aim but to ruin him: and that if he took not arms to defend his own life, he would be chased away like a beast, and should not find safety even in desarts. Behold the cause why he wrote back in this manner.

Sir, I give thanks to my Religion, which hath already afforded me patience enough to bear the sharpness of your words, and which is more, resolution also not to be shaken with the severity of your menaces. I have ever freely protested, that I am tyed unto you with immortal obligations, and am besides ready prest to acknowledge them, even to my last breath, were it not that some now endeavour with you, to render all my duties unjust, and my thoughts criminal. Your Majesty should quickly see me by your sides, if she who will not behold me at your feet, but in the quality of a Delinquent, had not preoccupated your heart and ears, to stop up the one to charity, the other to justice.

What assurance can I have of my life in a place, where she for whom I live, hath been dragged by the hair, and trampled under foot? The wound sticketh so sensibly upon me, that time can neither find a lenitive nor reason a remedy.

As for the change of Religion made lyme. I go along with the main current of Wisdom, and sanctity of the whole world, and where I find my salvation most assured, I cannot live with more authority, nor dy with more hope; and if you condemn me for it, your Majesty shall know, that a father requireth obedience out of the limits of nature, when he exacteth it beyond conscience. Sir I beseech you to add to so many benefits by you afforded me, the liberty of an honest repose, lest our arms may be as shameful for the Conqueror, as miserable to the vanquished.

Levigildus was more exasperated upon these letters, and the wicked Step-mother ceased not to rub the sore as much as she might. All designs tended to war: the father upon the one side maketh great levies of souldiers; the son fortifieth Sevil and Cordova, and draweth to his party some Forces of the Empire, having sent an honourable Embassy to the Emperour of Constantinople, which was at that time Tiberius, to intreat great succours. Acts of hostility were practised both by the one and other part, and in the end Hermingildus is besieged in Sevil, where he made his abode the space of two or three years after his departure from the Court. King Levigildus, who was an old fox, endeavoured then to entertain the Catholicks with much sweetness, to divert them from his sons side, and gaineth by force of money many mercenaries, who well discovered they had no other faith, but that which their fortune would give them.

The fourteenth Section.

The Treaty of peace between Levigildus and his son, by the mediation of Indegondis.

The war was yet like to continue very long, had it not been that the Princess, weary to behold these calamities that took beginning from an affront which she had endeavoured to dissemble with so much prudence, besought her husband with great tenderness of tears, to reconcile himself to his father. He touched at that instant with a quite other spirit then he had heretofore felt, prostrated himself before the Altar, and protested before God, that he abandoned all the justice of his cause for the onely considerations of piety, and would rather dy then prosecute those dissentions any further, to the prejudice of charity. He went out wholly changed upon this her motion, and coming to his wife, said unto her: Madame, behold me resolved to seek out the King my father, since you so desire it. But I must needs tell you that having forgotten my self in this resolution, I cannot neglect you. The unworthy usage which you have received at Court, requireth you return not thither but in triumph. Never will I admit that you undergo hazard, by exposing you to the mercy of a woman, which perhaps hath none either for you or me. You know the affairs of France are at this time in so great confusion, that you cannot hope there for any retreat to assuage your griefs. We have here a Prince, the Emperour Tiberius, who is our ally, in whose protection I advise you to put your self, to pass into Africa and from thence to Constantinople, if it happen that I be otherwise entreated, then your hopes import.

At these words the poor Indegondis felt her self seized with a great trembling, and wept bitterly, not being able to answer one word. The Prince, seeing he had proceeded too far in afflicting her so faithful heart, sweetned his discourse, and said: Dear heart, why do you trouble your self at my departure? I hope the affairs will run in a way so prosperous, that in two or three days, we shall see one another at Court; but that which I have spoken, is said, taking all accidents at the worst, to provide the better for your safety.

They had during their abode here, a little son, which yet hung at the breast: the father taking it in his arms, said: Madame, Behold a most precious pledge of our marriage, which I recommend unto you. Let God dispose of it as shall please him, but you must breed it up as a King. The mother beholding the infant, redoubled her ſighs, and the poor Hermingildus not knowing what would follow, felt himſelf ſurprized with a heavy and ſtupid dolour, which made him break off his diſcourſe: yet notwithſtanding he failed not to treat with the Emperours Lieutenant, to put all that which was moſt dear unto him into ſafeguard. But when the fatal day of ſeparation came, theſe two hearts ſo united, felt ſuch violent convulſions of grief, as if they then had foreſeen the events which afterward ſucceeded, and that this farewell ſhould be their laſt.

Indegondis at her parting, cried out: Sir, whatſoever happen, looſe not the treaſure of your faith. My good Miſtreſs, replied the Prince, aſſure your ſelf you have gained a diſciple, who ſhall never diſhonour you: be you merry, I will expect you at Court.

Alaſs, what is our life, and the affairs of man! That which is paſt is nothing, the preſent a fantaſie, and the future an abyſs, where even thoſe who ſtand on the brink, ſee not any thing. Theſe two great ſouls, which it ſeemed were worthy to live an Age to manure their faithful loves, and poſſeſs Empires as perpetual inheritances of their merits, go about to be divided for ever with a ſeparation, which would be judged hideous and pitiful, were it not that ſhe hath brought forth a Kingdom to Religion. Some time after that Indegondis was retired, Levigildus underſtanding his ſon diſpoſed himſelf to ſome compoſition, conceived much joy thereat: for he feared leaſt he might be enforced to give battel, wherein he had perhaps found what a man may do, thruſt into deſpair. So ſoon as he ſaw ſome overture of peace, he diſpatched his ſon Recaredus, who was in the Army with him, to gain his elder brother, well knowing they were both of humours very conſonant.

When the younger entred into Hermingildus camp, and had eſpied him, he ſtopped ſuddenly, & cried out Oh my brother, before I embrace, I deſire to know whether I come to a friend or an enemy. But the good brother, without making him any other anſwer, ſet forward, and moſt lovingly embraced him in the ſight of the whole Army. The other ſighing, Ah brother (ſaith he) moſt dear brother, whither have the counſels of thoſe tranſported you, who deſire the ruin of our houſe? Behold your ſelf here environed with Armies and Legions, and behold on the other part my father, who beſiegeth you with all his army. Miſerable that I am! What ſhall I do, but make between you both, a wall of my body to hinder your deſigns? Ah, how brother? are you upon the point to give my father battel? Oh how unhappy would the Sun be which ſhineth over our heads, if this day, before the ſetting, he ſhould ſee his face defiled with the ſtains of our blood! Brother, it is our Country againſt which you arm, that ſtretcheth out to your obedience the ſame hands it lifted up to Altars for your ſafety. Brother, it is your father and mine againſt whom you march: what honour can you get to tear out of his body by violence a ſoul, which he is ready to render up to nature, and to throw it out, yet alive, into the flaming ruins of his Kingdom? Have you no other objects to give teſtimony of your valour? I beſeech you, both by the Religion you have embraced, and the blood common to us both, ſtay your arms, or if you perſiſt in your purpoſe, kill me rather at your feet, and take me as a victim to purge both the armies. Behold the King, who lovingly expecteth you, and who reckoneth up the moments of my Embaſſage; I bring you the word of full aſſurance upon my life and honour. You muſt come inſtantly, if you dare believe me, for you cannot procraſtinate nor retard this affair, but you muſt ſlacken your own happineſs.

Theſe words were powerful enough to tranſport a man, who was already reſolved. Hermingildus having aſſured him of the good affection he had ever borne both to the King his father, and himſelf, went to the Court. Recaredus flieth with the deſire he had to inform his father of the ſucceſs of his Commiſſion, and being arrived, he bare the news of the coming of his brother, wherewith he was infinitely pleaſed. The Prince followed quickly after, and proſtrated himſelf at the feet of the King his father, ſaying: Sir, And my moſt dear father, behold here your poor Hermingildus, who will perpetually be yours, whatever happen. Thoſe, who have armed your clemency to the ruine of your blood, have chaſed me from your Court and Palace; but not been able to ſeparate me from your love. I have lived hitherto like a poor exile, and as it were a dead man among the living. If my enemies be not ſatisfied with my miſeries, behold Sir, I ſtretch my hands wholly diſarmed to the power, which nature hath given you over me, ready to live or die at your feet.

The King, whether he diſſembled his paſſion, or whether he truly were touched with ſuch a ſpectacle of piety, embraced him with much tenderneſs, ſaying: Ah my ſon, evil fame hath depainted you much other then you are. I aſſure you this confidence which you have witneſſed unto me, hath now ſet you free from all ſuſpition. You are very welcome, moſt dear ſon, where have you left the Princeſs your wife? The Prince replied, She ſhould ſpeedily be at Court. Goizintha faileth not to be there preſent, and to ſhew to her ſon-in-law all poſſible courteſies; which ſo confirmed the mind of Hermingildus, that he inſtantly diſcharged himſelf from all diſtruſt, and prepared to ſend ſuddenly for Indegondis to come to the Court. A friend notwithſtanding whiſpered him in the ear, that it was not neceſſary for him to haſten ſo much, and that he muſt ever fear a ſtil ſea, an old man amorous, and a ſtep-mother too curteous.

The fifteenth SECTION.

THis ſpeech was but too true; for the pernicious Goizintha foreſeeing, if Hermingildus were once again fully poſſeſſed of the heart of his father, whereof there was ſome probability, he would not fail to revenge himſelfe on her for the affront done to his wife, & if it were not with diligence prevented, he might diſcover her ſleights, and diſturb all her faction: She therefore called a fatal Council, wherein ſhe reſolved to overthrow this poor Prince. She gained unto her infamous men who poured into the ears of King Levigildus whatſoever they thought good; ſhe ſuborneth witneſſes, ſhe cauſeth letters to be produced, & frameth a groſs calumny, giving her husband to underſtand, that this reconciliation of his ſon was but a matter of diſguiſe, the better to arrive at the ſcope of his intentions; that he hath ſworn the ruine of his father, & that his ſpirit is become ſo arrogant, he cannot endure him as a companion in the Empire; that it is a thing undoubted that all the Romans deſire to lift him to the Throne: that he hath practiſed alliance with the Emperour of Conſtantinople, whereof expreſs letters might be produced: and to ſhew this is a buſineſs already concluded, he hath delegated his wife, a cunning and turbulent ſpirit, into Africa, to paſs from thence to Conſtantinople, and to bring with her all the forces of the Empire, to fall upon Spain; that there was no other remedy but with all ſpeed to prevent his deſign, and to make him feel the power of deſpiſed clemency.

She ſpake ſo much both of truth and falſhood, and her Commiſſioners were ſo well practiſed to forge many ſuſpitions, and repreſent a thouſand accidents in affairs, which ſeemed to confirm this conſpiracy, that in the end Levigildus entred into a frenzy more groſs then had poſſeſſed him before; and having declared his ſon guilty of treaſon, he cauſed him to be ſuddenly taken, & ſhut up in a ſtraight priſon. It was a pitiful thing to behold this Prince, a man wholly innocent, ſeaſed on in the middeſt of all the pleaſing triumphs of the Court, which they had prepared to honour his arrival, betrayed even at that time when he least thought thereon and used with so much cruelty. A matter very natural to heresie, where, after they had cloathed him with sackcloth, he was so loaden with chains, that he became crooked, not being able at all to lift up his head.

He then well knew his hour was come, so that renouncing all the pleasures of this life, he began courageously to prepare himself for death. The King accompanied with some Commissioners, whom he had given in charge to draw his process, would needs see him, and beholding him, suffered himself instantly to be transported with great disturbances of choler, calling him ungrateful, parricide, and wicked wretch. The Prince mildly answered: Sir, could I foretel, I should know what I had done, and wherefore I am accused; but since I have no such spirit, I will die in silence. The father replied, his ill conscience suggested thereof enough unto him, and that he knew but too much what designs he had upon the State and the life of his father; that he would have him speak freely, and that if he could justifie himself in these points, he would gladly hear him.

Hermingildus at that time made the Apologie, which I have else where expressed in Latin, approching as near as I might to his own intentions and phrase, and am here ready to render it in our language, that I may not frustrate my Reader of it.

Sir, said the Prince, the proof of my innocencie is as easie, as the defence thereof is difficult. I reposed, next after God, all my confidence in your Majestie, to choak the flame of cruel envy wherewith you see me assailed, and as it were still smoking. I attended to implore your name, to challenge your power, and to have you for witness of my fidelity, unworthily treated by slander; and now I have you for an ardent accuser, and a most severe Judg, nay, which is more, an incensed father. You have caused me to be taken as it were from the table of a feast, by you prepared for congratulation of my return; you have made me to be despoiled of purple, to be bound, and fettered like a Galley-slave. I fear least the justification of my actions, may not be the condemnation of yours; and that in seeking to defend mine own innocency, I be not enforced to accuse the errour of my father, which is to me one of the greatest punishments I can suffer. Notwithstanding, since you command I should speak, not that, in the condition whereunto affairs are arrived, I may hope of any thing either by my discourse or silence, but hap what may, I will pour into your ears the last voice of my blood. For did my accusers, demand no other thing then my life, I would willingly give it them without reply: but seeing they go about to fasten infamy on mine ashes, I beseech your Majestie, to hear the few words I have to say.

The business here is not a new crime; it is a very long time since the Queen your wife, and our step-mother Goizintha, began to weave this web against my brother and me, to deprive your Scepter of its lawful heirs, and give your Crown as a prey to her ambition. Would to God I might now call out of the other world, the blessed soul of my dead mother, to be present at this judgment: She would speak, and I might be silent; She would remember your Majestie, how being in the agonies of that fatal hour which took from us this great Queen, she embraced my brother and me, beseeching you by your chaste loves, and inviolable faith of marriage, to be unto us both father and mother. We were then of an age, wherein we could not as yet either feel or bemoan our losses. Notwithstanding, seeing you bowed over the body, which yeilded up the ghost, with weeping eys, we gave up our infant-tears to her memory, as a just tribute Nature: but you taking your little orphans into your bosom, forbade them to mourn, which you could hardly do, and wipeing away their tears, promised you hereafter would become to us a father for protection, and a mother for indulgence. I then grew up under your eys, spinning out the course of my innocent years, and am come to an age capable to bear some shave in your hopes. Had you any thing at that time in the world more dear unto you, then your Hermingildus? Dignities were for him, for him Empires, wars were made by him, and peace concluded in his name. Herminvildus was the object of your thoughts, the entertainment of your discourse, the contentment of your heart.

Your Majestie then resolved to marrie me, although very young, you found out for me a wife, daughter of a King, sister of a King, niece of a King, but such an one as by her virtues surpassed all titles of Kingdoms. Ah poor maid, who would have said then, thou wast reserved to be the subject of so lamentable a Tragedie! I was reputed the most happy man of the world, since for me were born so many singular virtues and perfections, admired by all men. I must confess I loved this Princess, not so much by the ways of an ordinary love, as a certain admiration of her virtues. For I have received the faith by her piety, her example, and her doctrine; holding in her soul the rank of a husband, a disciple, and as it were of her own son.

Thereupon Goizintha began to possess your heart, and to gain supereminence in your affairs; so changing your will by her ordinary practises, that she hath turned all your antient favours into disdain, your confidence into suspition, your resolution into disturbance, and your mild temper into command. This woman hath so persecuted me, that in your Court I neither enjoyed watchings, rest, recreation, nor affairs without danger. But I have willingly passed under silence all that, which touched mine own person, until she fell upon an action so barbarous, which were sufficient to justify the Scythians and Tartars. I have no words to speak it, having so much sorrow to feel it: Enough is said, when there hath been seen a daughter of so many Kings, trampled under the foot of a woman (whose birth I will not reproach, because indeed I well know it not) a Princess most innocent, beaten even to blood by a mother-in-law; a Lady replenished with honour, disarayed of her garments by unworthy servants, and plunged by little and little into a pool in a cold season, to consummate a Martyrdom, such as the antient Tyrants never invented more cruel for women, contenting themselves to impose oftentimes onely nakedness for a punishment.

Had I revenged my self of such inhumanity with sword and fire, no man could have thought my proceeding unjust, nor my thoughts unreasonable: notwithstanding, I have still endeavoured to cure my self by the remedy most ordinary with me, which was patience. I in silence retired unto a City which your Majestie gave me for lively-hood; resolved there peaceably to pass my days with my wife, whilest we beheld the face of this Court so adverse to our hopes.

But your Goizintha, as if we had committed a great sin, in not enduring her to thrust a sword through our throats, hath sounded an alarm in your Palace, and afterward in all the Province, declaring me an enemy to the country, an usurper of the Crown of my father, a Parricide, a creature excommunicate, and adding thereunto words much more injurious against me and my wife.

For my part, Sir, I wish you had rather harkened to our innocency, then served her passion; all then had succeeded better. But after strange Levies were made, you came thundring upon Sevil, to besiege me with a huge Army. So that you seemed to stir all the elements against me. I confess it, I then followed the instinct which God giveth creatures, even the most brutish, to defend their own family and fortune. I took Arms not to offend you, but to safeguard my self and my wife against the furies of a step-mother, who makes use of all Armes for our ruin.

Yet seeing my Armies reduced to that point, that I had no means to escape without giving battel, which must necessarily be fatal to both parts, I renounced for your sake the laws of nature, and am come to render my self up to your discretion. I call to witness the Altars, holy fire, and the Angel-guardians, which have seen me prostrated before them, of the sincerity of my intentions, and of the tears I have shed for you, having not leisure then to bemoan my self.

Afterward your Majestie sent my brother unto me, to give me assurance of your love; you called me forth, I am come, I have supplianly intreated, you have received me. I prostrated my self at your feet, you have raised me with so many favours and so many tokens of good will, that I could require no more for my safety. I ask, who hath changed your affection, who hath tarnish'd our joys, and withered the olives of peace, but she, who being not able to ruin me with weapon in hand, seeks to have my blood by form of justice.

Behold my accusation and crime; behold all that which hath made me to be cloathed with sackcloth, and chained with fetters ordained for Galley-slaves.

The father, who was of an ardent spirit, interrupteth him hereupon, and demandeth, where his wife was? Whether he had not sent her into Africk, to pass from thence to Constantinople? The Prince answered, He had onely projected this in his mind, not for any other purpose, but to advise upon the safety of her person, not knowing as then how matters would stand; and that accidents had taught him, he was wise enough in his counsels, but less happie then he imagined.

The King insisteth, and interrogateth, whether he had not treated alliance with the Emperour Tiberius?

ny? He thereunto replied, that he had never practised any other correspondence, but to draw from him some Troups for the defence of his life: and that so soon as he saw some overture of peace, he had dismissed them, resolving to make no further use of them. He then was pressed upon divers questions, to which he made most pertinent answers, shewing very evidently to the miserable father, the colours and pretexts which they made use of to ruin him, unless passion should cast a film over his eys.

In the end, seeing he could not convince his son to have practised any thing, since the accord was made between them both, he made a strong sally, & willed him freely to answer one word, upon which he would ground the whole proceeding, to wit, whether he were not a Roman Catholick? That is it, Sir, saith the Prince, which I avow, which I publish, which I protest. For verily it is a crime, which maketh the Judges become pale, and the Offenders laugh. The accusation whereof is a vow, all great soulls should profess, and the pain is a felicity which Martyrs have bought with their blood. I wish to die a hundred times, if it might be done, for the glory of that goodly title; so far is it too little, with one mouth to confess the praises of God. Command if you please, that my body be hewed and cut into pieces for the profession of the Catholick faith, and then I shall have as many mouthes as wounds, to praise my Saviour, and all those wounds shall be as gates of blood, to give passage to my soul to the place, where it is expected by so good company.

The father said thereupon, he was become a fool; and that no man hated life, but he who had ill imployed it. The son replied, The misuse had been in heresie, of which he repented him. And at that instant, the Guard received commandment to re-convey him to Prison, where he was so comforted with the visitations of God, that finding with much difficulty, means to send a Letter to his dear Indegondis, he wrote to her in this manner:

The sixteenth SECTION:

The Letter of Hermingildus to his dear wife Indegondis, and his generous resolution.

MY holy Mistress, from whom I have received the faith and true knowledg of God, I write these lines unto you, clouded with sackcloth, and loaden with fetters in the bottom of a dark dungeon, for the defence of that Religion which you have taught me. If I did not know by experience the invincible force of your heart, and the resolution you practise in affairs which concern the service of God, I had concealed my estate from you, that I might not contristrate objects sensible to nature.

But (most dear wife) you have a forehead too nolle to blush at the disgrace of the Crucifix, and a courage too well fortified, to refuse taking part in the livorie of the Saviour of the world. I protest upon mine honour I could never perswade my self, there might be contentment to suffer that which I tolerate. when your innocent mouth preached unto me the reward of suffering, wherewith your body had heretofore been gloriously covered. But since my imprisonment, I have felt consolations of God so tastful, that I cannot think it possible to relish in the world any other antipasts of Paradise. You are not ignorant, that my life and conversation, which hath been so long time plunged in errour and vanity, deserved not these benefits: but your most pure hands, which you so often have lifted up before Altars for my salvation, have obtained that for me, which much transcended my merit and all my hopes.

The King my father hath been pleased to hear me, and I have pleaded my cause in fetters with so great assistance from the Heavenly goddess, that I justified my self in all charges objected against me; and have put the matter into such a condition, that I am no further accused as a thief & homicide, but as a Catholick.

I speedily expect my sentence, and do not think I am put into the state wherein I am to save my life; but I undoubtedly believe this will be the last Letter you shall receive from my hand. I earnestly beseech your loyal heart, that as in this action which shall close up my days, I intend to do nothing unworthy of you, so on your part, act nothing unworthy of me; betraying the happiness of my death with tears, which would be little honourable to the condition whereunto God hath called me. I put into the hands of the Divine Providence, both you and your little Hermingildus, the onely pledge of our holy loves.

Be courageous, my dearest love, and after my death take the way of Constantinople; to render your self at the Palace of the Emperour Tiberius, who is a good Prince, and most Catholick. I recommend unto you my poor soul: as for the body, let that become of it, which shall please my father. If the alteration of times and affairs bring you back into Spain, there to hold the rank you deserve, my ashes will likewise rejoyce at the odour of your virtues. I hope my death shall not be unprofitable, and that God will make use of it for the good of the Kingdom. You know how many times I have heard you say, that you would have bought the salvation thereof with your blood; you have already in it employed one part, it is my turn to perform the rest upon a Scaffold: For in what place soever you are, I promise my self to be most particularly assisted by your holy prayers.

The good Princess received this Letter, with the news of his death, as we will presently tell you: but in this space of time, Recaredus, the younger brother of Hermingildus, extreamly afflicted, that having been a mediatour of this counterfeit peace, he saw it end in so deplorable a Tragedie, hasteneth to cast himself at the feet of his father; beseeching him with infinite abundance of tears and lamentations, either to give him the stroke of death with his own hand, or save the life of his brother. The father replied. He was a furious fellow, and a Traitour to his fortune, and that he ought to suffer justice to be done, which would give him a Crown. That his brother well discovered himself an enemy to his father and the State, since he would not for his sake renounce onely so much as a phantasie Religion; that he was only questioned upon this point, and that if he could perswade him to reason, he was ready to save his life. Recaredus, prepared himself strongly to gain him, and asketh leave to go to the Prison, which was allowed him.

The young Prince seeing his brother covered with sackcloth, and bowed under fetters, was so amazed at this spectacle, that he stood a long time mute as a statue; but in the end, breaking silence with a deep sigh: Ah brother (saith he) it is I, who have betrayed you; it is I, who have covered you with this fatal sackcloth, I, who have bound and fettered you with these cruel chains, made for ignominious slaves, not for your innocency. Brother, behold my poyuard which I present you, revenge your self upon my guilty head. I have been culpable enough, in that I have produced from a good intention so bad effects.

Hermingildus beholding him with a peacefull eye, answered: Brother, why do you afflict your self? Full well do I know your innocency. What innocency? replyed the other, if unadvisedly I be the cause of your death by my disasterous Embassage? But good brother, since you are reduced to this extremity, I beseech you forgo the name of Catholick: or, if that seem unworthy of your constancy, dissemble for some time, and content the King my father and yours, who requireth from you no other satisfaction.

The good Prince answered: Ah Brother! What have you said, you lately perswaded me to an act of piety at the peril of my life; think not now to induce me to an impiety, although it should concern all the lives and Kingdoms of the world. Behold here the time for you to reign, and for me to dye. I willingly dye for the honour I owe to my Religion, for which I gladly would suffer death a thousand times, if it were possible. I neither accuse you nor my father, whom I more compassionate then my self; and counsel you to render him all the duties of piety, in the decrepitness of Age whereinto he is entred.

As for our step-mother, I pray you rather to endure her nature, then revenge my death. It is the work of God to take knowledge of injuries, and for us to bear them. When my soul shall leave this miserable bodie, it shall ceaselesly pray for you; and I hope, most dear brother, you in the end will renounce this poor liberty, which entertaineth you in the sect of the Arians: and if dying men use to divine, I foretel, that being converted to the faith, you shall lay foundations of Catholick Religion in all this Kingdom, which I am about to moisten with my blood.

Recaredus used all the entreaties he could devise, never being able to shake the constancy of his brother, which much offended King Levigildus, & transported him into resolutions very bloody. Notwithstanding, those who might yet speak unto him with some liberty, counselled him to precipitate nothing in an affair of so great consequence; saying, there was no appearance that Hermingildus had undertaken any plot against the life and state of his father, since he came so freely to present himself upon his bare word: that those who find themselves guilty, use not to come to burn themselves, as Butterflies at the candle. That his countenance at this interview, was too sweet, his speech too proper, his deportments too candide, to cover so black a mischief; and as for change of Sect, it was no wonder, if the King having given him a Catholick wife, he had taken that Religion with its love; that it was a complement of a lover, which age would bend, experience sweeten, and prudence in the end deface: that he had at that time more need of a Doctour then an executioner, since the apprehensions of God were distilled into the heart by the help of tongues, not the dint of Swords.

The seventeenth SECTION.

The death of Hermingildus.

THe faction of Goizintha, transported beyond all considerations, ceased not to sound in the ears of the King, that Hermingildus was not an offender, whose power was to be neglected. That his crime was not such as might promise him impunity, that the laws of the Country had never tolerated such practices; that he had violated right both divine and humane, becoming a fugitive from his Country, an Apostata in his religion, a rebel to the power of his father; in such sort, that to render his wound incurable, he had changed all lenitives into poyson. That he had levied arms against his Sovereign, without regard of his age, his name, the majesty of the Kingdom, and the voice of Nature, and that there was nothing but the despair of his affairs, which had taken them out of his hands. That he held correspondence with the enemies of the State, to whom he was become an assistant and a companion: and now to make himself as impudent to defend a crime, as bold to execute it, had cast all the fault of his conspiracies upon the Queen, his Mother-in-law, and the marriage of his father; shewing himself so insolent in his misery, that there was nothing to be expected but tyranny from his prosperity: that it was to be extremely arrogant, even to stupidity, to seek to retain a chymæra of piety, contrary to the will of his father: and that never would he be so constant in his superstition, if he had not leagued all the interests of his fortune with the Catholicks, enemies of the Kingdom: that if order were not taken therein, they should be hereafter deprived of the power to deliberate on it, when they had given him all the means to execute it.

The credulity of the unfortunate father was so strongly assaulted by these discourses, that he resolved to go beyond himself: so that on a night, which was Easter Eve, he dispatched a messenger to the Prison, with an executioner, to let him know, he was speedily to make his resolution, to choose either life and Scepter, by returning to the Religion of the Arians, or death by persisting in the Catholick. That he had a Sword and a Crown before his eys, the one for glory, the other for punishment, the choice of either was referred to himself.

Hermingildus made answer, he had already sufficiently manifested his determination upon this Article; that he would rather die a thousand deaths, then ever separate himself from the Religion which he had embraced with all reason and full consideration. The Commissary replied; The King your father hath given me in charge, that in case of refusal, I should proceed to execution of the sentence decreed against you, What? saith Hermingildus. He hath condemned you by expres sentence (saith the other) to have your head cut off, in this same prison, where you are. Whereupon the holy man fell on his knees to the earth, and sayd:

My God, my Lord, I yield you immortal thanks, that having given me by the means of my father, a frail, brittle, and miserable life, common unto me with flies and ants; you now afford me on this day by these sentences, a life noble, happy, glorious to all eternity.

Then rising up again, he requested the Commissary he would by his good favour, suffer a Catholick Priest to come to him, to hear his Confession, and dispose him to death. He answered; It was expressly forbidden by the King his father: but if he would admit an Arian Bishop, he should have one at his pleasure. No (saith he) for I have detested, yea, and do still abhor Arianism even to the death: and since my father denieth me a favour which ordinarily is granted to the guilty, I will dye having no other witness but mine own conscience.

Which having said, he kneeled down again, and made his confession to God, praying very long for his father, his step-mother, all his enemies, and pronouncing also at his death, the name of his dear Indegondis, to whom he professed himself bound with incomparable obligations. Then afterward having recommended his soul to God, under the protection of the most holy Virgin, his good Angel, and all the Saints, he stretched out his neck to the executioner, which was cut off with one blow of an Axe.

So many Stars as at that instant shined in Heaven in the dead silence of the night, were so many eys open over the bloody Sacrifice of this most innocent Prince, from whom a wretched father took away, by the hand of a hang-man, the life which he gave him. Had his condition been capable of tears, even Tigers themselves would have deplored him, seeing so much piety, such faith, so much goodness, such worth eclipsed, in a blood so pretious, in an Age so flourishing, in a fortune so replenished with hope.

The news of his death hastned to finde out Indegondis, who was yet in Africa, where she also received the last Letter, which her husband wrote to her out of prison.

The servants that were about her person, began to make hideous lamentations, as if they themselves had been condemned to death. But the courageous Indegondis kissing the Letter of her dear husband, then opening it with singular reverence, and reading the last words, which he, as it were, had steeped in his blood: she cried out:

Alas! generous and faithful heart! you have done all that, which a good man might: you have manfully fought, you are happily arrived at the Crown. Nothing can be desired in you, but the imitation of your constancy.

Servants, why do you weep? This is the very day, wherein I am a Queen, and when I esteem my self the most most triumphant woman in the world, having my husband a Martyr in Heaven. Give me Roses and Flower-de-luces, that I may crown his image, and honour at the least with these testimonies a soul, which hath left unto us such sweet odours of virtue.

She had with her, her little Hermingildus, almost dead with the wearisomness of travel on the way, which indeed had been somewhat easie for the tenderness of his age. The mother beholding him; Go my son (saith she) follow your good father: God hath given you a favour in your Cradle, that he doth not to all Children, which is, to be banished for the faith, and to take part in the Martyrdom of him who begot you. Go little innocent, and rejoyce with others before the Altar of the Lamb: your mother shall not long stay behinde you.

Others say, he was sent prisoner to the Emperour Mauritius, but without ground.

The childe died shortly after, and the good Princess, having for a long time combatted in a brave manner against the apprehensions of nature, poured forth on a sudden thick sobs, and a main Tide of tears which distilled from her eys against her will, whereupon she mildely said:

Alas! my teares, what fitness can you finde to bemoan a Martyr? My God, it is done; the father and the son are already at rest, there remaineth nothing but to take the mother. Behold two parts of the world, Europe and Africk, which I have filled with my miseries. If you will that I yet pass into Asia, your will be done. But if I no longer be ought, but an unprofitable burthen to the earth, what do I here? I have spun out all the web which you gave me: I have ended all the hopes of the world; why stay you, O my God, to receive my soul, which I bear on my lips? She was heard; for in few days, being all wasted with love, travel, and desires, after an exemplar death, she found her Tomb in Africk.

What shall I say here, and what shall I do, to shut up this discourse? We have all certain natural softnesses in the bottom of our souls, and some humane apprehensions, which alter the force of our judgments My pen cannot almost pass over this History, and not commix the waters of mine eys with mine ink: and perhaps also (you my Reader) cannot peruse it without compassion. It seemeth unto you these chast loves of Hermingildus and Indegundis are too unhappy; that such virtues are cruelly handled; that such noble courages have met with a fortune sinister, hideous, & persecutive, even to the Tomb. You would gladly see these brave spirits, after so many tempests, such thunder-claps and whirlwinds, arrive at a Port of some large temporal felicity. You would behold them with Crowns on their heads, with Scepters in their hands, with Provinces flourishing in revenues, with prosperities perpetually smiling in their house, with loves free from disturbance, desires void of denials, affairs without trouble, greatness without change, pleasures without acerbities, and a long posterity fully laden with honours. It grieves you, that this poor Prince hath passed away as a pearl, parched up with lightning in its growth, or as an Eagle strangled in the shell. You bewail this Princess, that being born in France, she died in Africk, separated by the sword from a husband who loved her so tenderly, deprived of a son, who gave so many good hopes, abandoned by all her allies, but some poor waiting-women that buried her with sorrow so full of pitty, that it was of power to move the monsters of Africk to commiseration. Ah ignorant that we are of the works of God, perpetually fixed to the earth, and deprived of those sparkles of fire and light, which burn under the most generous breasts! Let us a little draw aside the Curtain, and see through so many clouds, one sole ray of the Sanctuary. What injury hath the Divine Providence done to Prince Hermingildus? If for a Crown which is the weather-cock of winds, if for a Scepter, which is the Reed of the times, if for a life, which is the Harbinger of death, it afforded him virtues, delights, and glories, which out-strip the flight of our thoughts, which dry up our mouthes, which out-run our desires, which surmount all our imaginations? What injury, if it make a Saint of him, whose name is couched in Martyrologies, whose memory liveth in writing, whose praise flourisheth in mouths, whose words are nought but honour, and works but blessings; whilest his step-mother Goizintha dies like a dog, and is buried in the opprobry of her name? What injury, if it have so handled the matter, that his father, touched with a lively repentance, hath justified him as an Innocent, deplored him as a son, invoked as a Martyr? If it hath sanctified his fetters, consecrated the tower of his prison, raised up his ashes above all the Crowns of the Kings of Spain? If it hath given him Altars on earth, and a Diadem of beatitudes in Heaven? Is it to have despised his virtues, neglected his sufferings, dis-obliged his constancy, and frustrated his travels? What would you have God to have made the virtuous Indegundis? A Queen, delicate, ambitious, covetous, haughty, which had not spit but in Gold, walked but on Roses, flown over the heads of men, and putrified in delights? How many such like are there, who have defiled their names with reproach, wearied the earth with their importunities, astonished posterity with their deportments, and peopled Hell with their crimes? But this Lady having been purified with the burning coals of tribulation, issued from the hands of God as a vessel of glory, to make her lustre resplendent in the sight of all Ages.

Ah Ladies, who read this piece, and who many times flatter your selves with the title of virtue, in some petty tracks of devotion, which have nothing but outward semblance: what example of piety see you here? What mirrour? What perfection? My eys dazle in beholding her actions, and my pen fails in writing her praises.

What a courage? that a young Maid not above fifteen or sixteen years of age, entreth into a Kingdom, with intention to conquer it for God, much otherwise then the Cæsars, who so many times have devoured it by ambition? What a prudence to tolerate the conversation of a step mother, whilest she meddled not with her Religion? What liberty of spirit, and what strength of words to defend her faith, so soon as she saw her self assailed in this virtue, which was more dear unto her then the apple of her eye? What patience to endure to be dragged along upon the pavement by the hair? to be beaten even to blood? to be thrown into the river? to be used like the dust of the earth for the honour of Jesus Christ, not challenging any one, not complaining, not seeming offended, nay, not telling her husband (into whose bosom she poureth forth her most secret thoughts) the affront she had received, for fear to break peace with a creature, who deserved the hatred of all the world? What wisdom, what grace, what eloquence used she in the conversion of her husband? What love for his soul? What zeal for his salvation? What care for his direction? What authority, to stop with a word the Armies of the father and son, instantly ready to encounter? What resignation of her own will in this separation from her husband? And what a heart of Diamond against a thousand strokes of dolours, to take thankfully a death so bloody, so tragical, so pitiful? To see her ſelf at an inſtant bereaved of a ſon and a husband, and of all things in the world, offering up unto God in all her afflictions, the obedience of her heart, prayers of her lips, and victims of all the parts of her body? What triumph, when after her death, her brother-in-law, who had participated of her good inſtructions, in remembrance of her and her husband, was absolutely converted to the Catholick faith, and changing the whole face of the Kingdom, repealed the baniſhed, reſtored the Biſhops to their Sees, Religion into force, Laws into Authority, and the whole Province into peace? What miracle to ſee ſage Indegundis on the top of all her Tropheys, whereof ſhe rendreth homage to God in the glory of Saints? How ought we here to render to her the offerings of our moſt humble ſervices?

Behold here the limits which I propoſed to my ſelf, ſo to give an end at laſt to theſe Hiſtories, having thought it more fit and ſuitable to my employments, to abbreviate my ſelf in theſe four models, then unboundedly enlarge them; yet it hath been ſomewhat difficult with me to make a reſolution to put forth this ſecond Volume, among ſo many duties of our ordinary functions being thereunto ſollicited by entreaties, which held, as it were, the place of commands.

And I may well ſay, I were ſtupid and ungrateful, if I ſhould not confeſs to have been much excited to proſecute this labour, by the honourable invitations which my Lord Biſhop of Belley hath uſed towards me in his works. I cannot ſet too high a price upon his recommendation in ſuch a ſubject: for he is verily one of the moſt able and flouriſhing wits, that ever handled a pen. To ſee the number of his books, one might ſay, he began to write ſo ſoon as to live; and to conſider their worth, it is a wonder, how ſo many graces and beauties, which other attain not but with much labour, encreaſed with him as in a ſoyl natural for eloquence. If there be any ſlight diſcourſes, who amuſe themſelves to argue upon ſome words of his writings, it is not a matter unuſual, ſeeing we are now in an Age, where there are ſome who revive the example of thoſe corrupted Grecians, that preferred a ſawce made by the Cook Mithecus, before the divine works of Phidias.

If this piece have given you any contentment, take the pains to read it over again ſometimes at your leiſure, taſting the Maxims therein with an utility worthy of its ſubject. For believe me, the precipitation now adays uſed in ſlightly running over all ſorts of books, cauſeth a certain indigeſtion in the minde, wherewith it is rather choaked, then nouriſhed. Reading is never good, if the underſtanding take not occaſion thereby to negotiate by meditation and indu[illegible], that which concerneth the health and ornament thereof.

To the King of Ages Immortal and inviſible, to God alone be honour and glory given, for ever and ever more. 1 Tim. 1.

THIRD TOME.

Written in FRENCH by NICHOLAS CAUSSIN, of the S. of JESUS. And Translated into English by S^r T. H.

LONDON,

Printed, Anno Domini MDCLXIII.

RIGHT HONOURABLE LADY FRANCES,
Counteſs of PORTLAND, and Baroneſs WESTON.

Right Honourable,

THE excellent endowments of your Soul, acknowledged even by envy, and admired by truth, together with your known propenſion to the reading of pious books, invites me to this Dedication, as proper for your ſweet retirements, and conſonant to my intentions, which only aim in ſome meaſure to expreſs my humbleſt reſpects to your Honour. The matters herein handled, are Inſtructions, apt to inform the minde by way of Maxims, learned diſcourſes made familiar to leſs able underſtandings, and choice Hiſtories exemplifying both, that ſo all ſorts of Readers, though of different capacity, diſproportionable judgment, may finde ſomewhat to entertain their curioſity. My ſcope (excellent LADY) in this Tranſlation, is through your Honours hand, and under ſo noble a Patronage, to convey the third part of the HOLY COURT into Engliſh light, which (as the firſt breathed air under the benign aſpect of her ſacred Majeſty) may alſo hope in this latter piece with like happineſs to be crowned with your Honours chearful acceptation. The height of my ambition is by this poor way to ſerve you, ſince more ample demonſtrations are wanting to my weak abilities; as likewiſe not to doubt your noble diſpoſition will be ſatisfied with ſuch my humble acknowledgments. The advancement of virtue, and depreſſion of vice is my Authour's ſcope throughout the whole Work, which he elegantly purſues, and victoriouſly atchieveth. Triumphs of that kinde beſt become his grave and ſerious pen, whileſt my task is faithfully in our language to imitate his living figures, though in dead and diſcoloured forms, and confidently to tell your Honour, that I will ever be

The moſt Obſequious Servant of

Your Commands,

TO

MONSIEUR, MONSIEUR THE PRINCE.

SIR,

THE excellency of the ſubject I handle in theſe Diſcourſes, makes me reflect on that of your Greatneſs, to offer you a Work, which being conceived by your Authority, muſt needs ſeek for birth under your favour. It is the third Part of a Court abſolutely holy, which not unlike the City S. John ſaw in his profound Contemplations, cannot aſcend from our manners to Heaven, unleſs it deſcend from Heaven into our manners. I likewiſe endeavour to faſhion it in Books, by the model of things Celeſtial, to imprint it on lives; and I now undertake the defence of truth, which conſtituting your ſalvation, and compoſing your happineſs, well deſerve to be the moſt ſerious employments of your minde.

It is true (Sir) all Maxims of State that depend not on the Maxims of God, are effects of carnal prudence, which end in fleſh; and all fortunes that reſt not on him, who with three fingers ſupporteth the Glob of the earth, rather purſue the way of precipices, then the path of exaltation. The wiſdom of the world loves nothing ſo much, as that whereof it is moſt ignorant: it runs after honour, not knowing what honour is; ever hungry and ſtill needy, nor having any other aim, but to make it ſelf a Miſtreſs over giddy ſpirits, to become the ſlave of all Paſſions. Which maketh me ſay, there are none but the blinde, who ſeek after it, the miſerable who finde it, the ſottiſh who ſerve it, and the forlorn who tye themſelves to its principles. But the wiſdom of Heaven, which I in theſe Maxims preſent you, is ſo tranſcendently ſublime above all humane inventions, as the light of Stars ſurpaſſeth the petty ſparklings and flitting fires of the earth; It is that which leiſurely marcheth by holy paths, to the ſources of day-light, and as being preſent before the Throne of God, beholdeth glory and felicity unfolded in his hands. It is the element of great ſouls, ſuch as yours; and when they once are throughly ſettled therein, they finde taſtfulneſs which turneth into nutriment, and nutriment which paſſeth to immortality. Your prudence may read in your own experience, what I expreſs in my Treatiſes, nor need you go any further then your own life, to meet with the proofs of theſe excellent verities.

You know (Sir) how the Divine Providence in the firſt flower of your age, drew you from ill ways, and ſnatched you out of the hands of infidelity, as a Conſtantine from the Palace of Diocletian, to ſerve as a Buckler for the Church, whereof impiety would have made you a perſecutour. This Providence knew ſo well how to ſeparate blood from manners, that it cauſed you to demoliſh what your Anceſtours had raiſed, and preſerving their dignity without touching their errours, to make of the unhappineſs of their judgment, the beginning of your felicity. From thence you ſee with what ſucceſs the hand of God hath conducted you to the height of this moſt eminent glory, wherein France at this preſent beholds you, as a Prince accompliſhed in the experience of affairs, and times, the Father of good counſels, the undertaker of great actions, endowed with a ſpirit which ſeems an eternal fire, and to be parallel'd by nothing, but the goodneſs of your own heart.

You live peaceable as in the right ſphere of true greatneſs, where you perpetually reflect on two Poles, God, and the King: you ſeek for the one in the other, and you walk to the God of life, by the moſt lively of his Images. His Arms are beheld to proſper in your hands, as well as his Edicts in your mouth. You have borne Thunder and Olives throughout France, under your protection, awful at one time, and amiable at another, but ever proſperous in both. Yea, fully to crown your happineſs, the Divine Goodneſs hath afforded you a houſe flouriſhing in riches and honours, which comprehendeth in its latitude, two Princes of the blood to ſerve as pillars for the State. It gave you a wife, who hath made of her fruitfulneſs, the Trophey of her Virtues, and entred by love into an Eclipſe, to become the Mother of lights, and bring forth children to bear the hope of Flower-de-luces. The eldeſt Son, whom your excellency hath committed as a ſacred pledge to our Colledge at Bourges, would trouble us to tell you from whence he hath taken ſuch, and ſo many ſplendours, and ſparkling flames of wit, which dazle the eys of thoſe who have the honour to be near him, were not you his Father. He is a Pearl, who maketh it appear by the equality of his Orient, that if Nature have equalled his birth to the greateſt on earth, he will equal his Virtues to his Extraction.

SIR, I ſpeak this ingenuouſly, that you may both behold in your own perſon, what I treat in my books, as alſo underſtand that true piety ſoweth the ſeeds of the moſt ſolid greatneſs. But beſides the relation this Deſign ſeems to have to the pleaſure of God over you, I finde much obligation to offer it you as a ſlender teſtimony of a ſingular gratitude in our Superiours and our whole Society, which would willingly ſuffer their affections to paſs through my Pen; if it had as much eloquence as the main body tenders reſpect and zeal to your ſervice. You have been pleaſed to make it known by your good purpoſes, to love it by election, defend it by Juſtice, honour it with your Opinion, encreaſe it with your Liberalities, and if your benefits be ornaments unto it, your judgment ſerve for Apologies.

I received a notable portion in your favours, whileſt you reſided in Bourges, where your Excellency called me to deliver the Word of God, and to confeſs your virtues in my diſcourſes, as I muſt acknowledge my diſcourſes to proceed from your virtues. It was by your converſation I perceived, that as there is nothing too high for your underſtanding, ſo there is not any thing too low for your bounty. God hath beſtowed on you the gift which the Scripture attributeth to the Patriarch Joſeph, to oblige hearts with ſweetneſs; not unlike the Engines of Archimedes, which made water mount in deſcending: ſo yours cauſeth not your humility to deſcend, but to make it re-aſcend to the ſource of the prime ſublimity. Which done, not preſuming any thing in regard of your Excellency, but daring all through your courteſie, I preſent theſe MAXIMS of the Holy Court, of which many will make their reading, others their precepts; but you will (I hope) frame your virtues of them on earth, to make them your Crowns in Heaven: So wiſheth

SIR, Your moſt humble and moſt obſequious Servant in our Lord,

N. CAUSIN. S. J.

The Deſign and Order of the BOOK.

I Finde (Courteous Reader) my Works do inſenſibly increaſe under the favour of thy good opinion, as Plants ſprout under the aſpect of the moſt benign Stars. I had confined my ſelf to that which concerneth the hiſtory of Courts, and ſtill reſt in the ſame reſolution: But ſaw a piece very neceſſary in theſe times, wanting in my Work, which was the Treatiſe of MAXIMS, and majeſty of our Religion.

I almoſt durſt not undertake it (ſo much the ſubject ſeemed to require judgment, preparation, and ability:) But God having inſpired me with a ſtrong conceit I might be favoured by thoſe to whom he hath given full power over me, ſubmitted the ſlenderneſs of my wit to the power of their wills, perſwading my ſelf a ſilly nothing may become a matter important in their hands.

You know, how having a purpoſe to frame a Chriſtian Inſtitution in the HOLY COURT for men of quality, I began with their obligation to Piety, and conſequently ſhewed the obſtacles muſt be vanquiſhed to arrive thither. Then I gave precepts of the principal virtues moſt concern them, which were waited on with the Hiſtories of Courts, abbreviated into four Models.

In this (that the good Court may triumph) I repreſent a Combat of two Courts, the Holy and Counterfeit; the Religious, and Prophane: wherein I unfold the victories of the chief Maximes of Chriſtianity, divided into three Parts, whereof the one treateth of the Divinity, the other of the Government of this preſent life, and the third, of the State of the other World.

You may behold how divine the ſubject is, and that the other Books were only to prepare you to theſe great lights, the rays whereof I diffuſed. I muſt needs tell you, that being ſurpaſſed by ſo many excellent men, who have worthily handled a pen, I have in this ſeriouſly ſought to go beyond my ſelf.

I have contracted large Subjects into little Tracts, which hath been no ſmall labour; there being not a Maxim whereof I could not have compiled an ample Volume: But imagining conceptions are like hairs, which more eaſily may be filletted up, then diſheveled; I have endeavoured to give you more ſubſtance in this Book, then Words and amplifications. And ſeeing all the ſubjects are very ſerious, I have ſweetned them with excellent Examples, to afford fit nouriſhment both to Eagles and Doves.

All which I now offer you in this, is more then my promiſe, thinking it better to give without promiſe, then to promiſe and not give. Your affections ſets an edge upon my induſtry, and if labour waſt the body for your avail, and reſerve works of the wit for poſterity, it ſhall be as a Cedar, which cauſing the death of the living, ſeems to give life to the dead.

This Tome being repleniſhed with important conſiderations, cannot be for him who curſorily reads it with thoſe delicious loyterings, which ſlightly furniſh out the Titles of Books, and thence derive nothing but wind. Give me (Gentle Reader) the contentment that God may be glorified in your manners by reading this, as I here ſeek to honour him in his Works.

HOLY COURT, AGAINST THE
PROPHANE COURT.
First Part touching the DIVINITY.

The first MAXIM.
Of Religion.

PROPHANE COURT.	HOLY COURT.
That matters of faith being invisible and uncertain, we must tie our selves to the world, which is visible and certain.	That matters of faith being most certain and very excellent, we should fix the whole order of our life unto it.

1. THere is nothing so reasonable in nature, as to desire good, nothing so eminent, as to know much; nothing so absolute, as to have the power of all: but there is not any thing so profitable, as to proceed to true wisdom by a mysterious ignorance, and to be in created light by blindnes. The soul becometh another world by the means of knowlege; or rather as God createth a world in essence, that frameth another in Idæa: But if truth and love do not co-operate therein, man tormenteth himself in his knowledges, and createth evils without end, from which he cannot free himself, no not by issuing out of life.

The Prophane Court (say you) leads you into a visible world, but it is to behold miseries in it: To a world certain, but it is to teach you that happines being therein uncertain, loss is undoubted. All we have in the world is base, caityf, and difficult, without knowledge of the true God. It is but a laboursom turmoll of affairs, an amazement of transitory pleasures, an illusion of deceitfull blessings, which trouble us, and starve us, in stead of satisfying our desires, or nourishing our hopes: But the knowledge of God is the root of immortality.

The happines to be born a Christian.

Scire justitiam, & virtutem unam, radix est immortalitatis. Sap. c. 15. 3.

I then require of you (O Reader) that in the beginning of this discourse you adore the wisdom of God over you, who hath selected you out of the Mass of so many Infidels, to inrole you in the number of his children, and hath drawn you from the confusions of so great darknes, to call you into the light of Christianity. Behold so many people covered under the veil of shadie night, born in errour, to live in bruitishnes, and die in despair of eternal salvation, and you are enlightned by the rays of God, illuminated by his wisdom, guided by his direction, covered with his protection, nourished with his blood, animated with his life, & are made participant of his felicity,

If you be desirous in some measure to observe the excellency of your faith and Religion, consider, the perfection of any thing is known by three principal notes; Essence, Operation, and Repose. All which you have visible in the wisdom of Heaven you profes. His Essence is of an infallible verity; his Operations miraculous, and his repose an unchangeable happines. For what assurance more solid, then to have a God Incarnate for Authour, who is come to cast the seeds of a golden Age, and adopt a new world in the blood of an eternal testament? Who can better teach us the secrets of God, then God himself? I cannot accounte him (said Varro) a skilful Master: who learns nothing of himself: And he hath understood all in the bosom of his Eternal Father, and from his own wisdom, which is no other then his Essence. He was promised from the beginning of the world, preached through all Ages, given as a pledge to the memory of all mankind, so long before his coming was appointed, his time, birth, life, and death. He came at his perfixed time, all environed with prodigies and miracles, all composed of virtues, making greatnes to proceed out of the lowlines of his humble and painfull life, as lightning-flashes break through the obscurity of night.

Three tokens of the perfection of a thing. S. Thomas 1. p. q. 6.

Solidity of our Religion.

Varro apud Vincent tom. 2. Illum quidem erudissimum elige, quem magis miratis in suis? nihil magnificum dixerit qui & se nihil dicerit.

2. What foundations think you hath he laid of your faith? Men believe men upon a little piece of paper, yea very often upon the breath of a silly word. And Jesus would not be believed, but by writing his Law with the rays of an infinite number of Prophesies, which were verified in his Person, with the blood of more then ten millions of Martyrs, who suffered for his doctrine; with miracles so visible & irreproachable, that they changed even executioners into Confessours, and Tyrants into Martyrs.

The foundations of faith.

To speak plainly, he might have tied you unto him, and not made use of so many things: For what is more essential for the foundation of a belief, then the revelation of the first Verity, which might have been known to us by fewer proofs? But behold his goodness, and how he dealeth with our infirmities, as to be willing to strike us so sensibly with reflection of the greatness of our faith, to win us to his direction. The Jews ran after a simple figure, and tied themselves to weak elements. The Gentiles are filled with childish toys, and dotages, which made the most learned amongst them to mock at their religion, and say, That should their gods have appeared alive, in such manner, as they painted them, they would be accounted Monsters. In the heart of Mahumetans, a tyrannous law is planted with sword and empalements; No man is permitted to dispute upon it, (so many ridiculous and shamefull things there are in it) which makes a soul recoyl in the very beginning, that hath never so little humanity. But Christian Religion hath appeared in the bosom of glory, ever holy, ever victorious, ever opposed by the wicked, and still triumphant, over impiety. It is enriched by its losses, glorified by its persecutions, established by its totterings, and honoured by its wounds. God for it ha h opened all the most learned lips, directed all the best pens, and for it bound himself with as many witnesses, as there are letters in the Scripture. Have not we then cause to proclame with Tertullian: O how happy are we, to say, God engageth his own faith by oath to confirm ours! And are not we worthy of all unhappiness, if we any whit distrust this Eternal Verity?

Sener. l. de superstitione apud S. August. l. 6. de Civitate Dei.

O beatos nos quorum causa Deus jurat! O miserrimos, si nec juranti Deo credimus! Tertul. c. 4. de pœn.

3. You perhaps will say, all it teacheth is very high, and that to be faithful, one must (as it were) cease to be reasonable. But tell not me, faith is opposite to reason: it is above, not against it; it commandeth our sense to obey God, it laboureth to raise, not demolish; or if it demolish, it is but by ruining rebellion, to establish obedience. What is more reasonable, then to subject your reason to God, and to suffer your self sweetly to pass along in the current of this puissant Authority, which hath drawn so many Ages after it, destroyed so many errours, gained so many battels, and won so many Crowns? Faith is a great gift, although it be the gift of the humble. It is the first life of humane understanding, the Jasper stone which serves for foundation of the City of God, the virginity of the soul, the source which watereth all the festivities of mankind. Why are you amazed, when God would have you believe that, which is above your understanding, and surpasseth your knowledge? It is a most happy ignorance (said St. Hilary) which rather deserveth reward then pardon, when one trusteth to the word of God, in that he cannot comprehend. You see how policy is guided by humane faith, without which, all the world were nought but disorder, and life a perpetual confusion: and yet you think it a strange matter, that God in his great policy exacteth a faith absolutely Divine, to serve as an entrance into your felicity. If you take away humane faith, and stick fast in the resolution not to believe any thing, but what you see, you will become a Monster, fit to be excluded from humane Society; you will disturb the beds of the most chast wedlocks; you will accuse the modesty of the sincerest women; you will make the children to be doubted, not onely by the fathers, but the mothers also, who are so often enforced to believe Mid-wives, and Nurses; you will almost make doubt, whether you have a liver, a heart, a spleen, or any lungs, nor will believe you have any thing, but that which you cannot behold without death. These are considerations which Saint Augustine and Theodoret pursued in the Treatises they wrote of Faith, by which they shew the necessity of humane belief, to pass on further to the Divine. Then what occasion have you to make your sense rebel against God, who becomes a surety for what he promiseth vs; since we every moment, must give credit to the fidelity of most abject persons in the actions of civil life? Who seeth not that to take faith from Religion, is to tear the Altar out of the Temple, the apple from the eye, and the heart out of humane body.

That to be faithful, is to be conformable to reason.

Necessity of faith.

Si quod nescitur, credendum non est, quomodo se fatuent parentibus liberi, quos parentes suos esse non credent?

S. August. l. 2. de utilitate credendi.

Do you not consider likewise, that it was an invention worthy the Eternal Wisdom, to draw us to him by three degrees, which are as three Heavens observable in nature, and above nature? The first is that of science, the second of faith, the third of glory. Science appertaineth not to the whole world: all are permitted to live well, but few to speak well. Some have not will for it, others means. Some have no inclination, others can never make application. Needs must then three parts of mankind be deprived of the knowledg of things most divine, and persevere in ignorance, according to the unhappinesse of accidents, without the help of faith which repleniſheth us with the knowledge of God. Besides, we finde sciences are extreamly sophisticate, as well through the weakness of our understanding, as the corruption of our manners. Academies are framed as Palaces of verity; yet it is never so ill handled, as in places where shew is made to adore it. Under the shadow of defence it is rent asunder, and as the ancient Teletias, it is strangled in making much of it. What inconvenience then do we find, if God, to remedy this misery, hath given us faith, which contenteth the whole world by its universality, as it assureth all well composed minds by its certainty. If the perfection of our nature had been limited within natural actions, divine faith had not needed to conduct us: But since God hath called us to a felicity above nature, were it not fit we were directed thereto by a supernatural knowledge?

Great Providence of God in the establishment of faith.

4. Consequently look on the Operation of Religion, the second note of its excellency: you shall see the fountain of Mordochæus, which in the beginning creepeth on with little noise through the Meadows, and in an instant turneth into a great river, and this river into light, and this light into a sun; but a sun which affordeth lustre, and water to all the world.

The powerfull operations of our Religion. Esther. 2.

The powers of the world which glitter with so much pomp, have this almost ever proper to them, to be either unprofitable, or malign. What did those great Philosophers, who framed worlds in their idæa's? What did the Plato's, Aristoteles, and Zeno's? Could they ever perswade any one silly hamlet to live under those goodly Common-wealths they instituted on paper? What did the Alexanders, Cæsars, & Pompeys with all their forces, but tend to the destruction of mankind? It is a strange thing, that the last of them caused a Temple to be built to Minerva, over the gate whereof he commanded to be engraven, that he had taken, routed, and slain two millions, one hundred fourscore and three thousand men; pillaged or sunk eight hundred forty six ships, made desolate one thousand five hundred thirty eight Cities, and towns. Behold how the great ones of the earth make themselves remarkable, as dreadful Comets, by the ruin of the whole world. But Jesus in establishing his Religion, would not be powerful but to do good, since, He is the Adamant (saith Salvianus) who hath drawn this mighty mass of Iron of all Ages with the hands of his love, & lively affections towards mankind.

How can the tree be better known, then by the fruits? And upon what may one more reasonably ground the judgement made of Religion, then upon the works thereof?

What

What have all other Religions taught, but to cut the throats of children, to embrue Altars of Idols with blood; but to create ordures, & abominations, to cover secret mischiefs with the veil of hypocrisie, to authorize fables, and canonize vice? But Christian Religion is that alone which brought piety into the world, where it was before unknown. It is that which hath crushed murtherous and adulterous gods under the ruins of their Temples, which demolished prophane Altars, suppressed sacrifices of humane blood destroied Amphitheaters, where they gloried to tear men in pieces, which confounded witchcrafts, tamed pride, quayled covetousnes, stopped the innundations of luxury, repressed extravagancies of ambition choaked enraged desires of avarice, & turned a land of Tigers, Leopards, and fiery Serpents, into a Paradise of delights. It is that which drew from Heaven all the virtues, whereof some had before been unheard of, others contemned, the rest persecuted. It is that which taught humility, chastity, virginity, modesty, temperance, justice, and fortitude. That, which discovered true prudence, which opened the sources of contemplation, which furnished out the Hoast of religious Orders, which brake so many chains of the world, trampled under foot so many Idols of gold and silver, seated poverty in the Throne of glory, erected statues of innocency, established purity even in thoughts. Is it not that which so many Martyrs, Confessours, Doctours, Virgins have done, whose triumphs we daily honour? Is it not upon these, that Jesus having vanquished so many monsters, imprinted the rays of his sanctity, which is preserved, and maintained, even in the corruption of Ages, in the persons of so many as God hath reserved to himself? Must we not confess, that a life led according to the doctrine of Jesus Christ, is a manifest conviction of all errours, and a little miracle in the world?

5. From thence when we consider by what means our Saviour hath wrought this establishment, which are found so contrary to all humane ways, and how he acteth in suffering, how he draws to him in rejecting, how he is exalted by his abasings, glorified by his ignominy, enriched by poverty, how he doth raise by destroying, how he lives by his death, and is eternized by dying. This is it which transporteth humane understanding into admiration of the greatnes of our Religion.

6. Finally, if you also cast your eye on this last The repose which our faith promiseth. perfection of Repose, you shall well understand, how Alexander, after he had conquered the Persians, being desirous to pass into the Indies, those who thought they were at the world's end, disswaded him, and said, It was time for Alexander to rest, where the Sun and the world ended. But our Religion goes much further then the Sun, and this inferiour condition of the world. It hath the total Universe for object of its travel, and the Kingdom of Heaven for its repose. All other Sects proposed pleasures to themselves for object of their pretensions, which might make them desire the body of a horse, or a hog, to enjoy it with the more advantage. But God, lifting us up to himself above the tracts of the Sun & time, promiseth the same delights which he hath for himself in the vision, possession, and fruition of that divine face, which makes all the Happy. (a) We know this house of morter and clay failing, wherewith we are covered, God hath prepared an eternal building for us in Heaven, not made by the hand of man, as the Apostle assureth us, and as we shall deduce towards the end of these Treatises. Thither it is our faith paceth roundly on, beholding with a purified eie, the lights of Heaven, a God invisible as if he were already visible. Unto this life it is we prepare our souls, and begin on earth to make the first essays of Beatitude.

7. I then demand of you (O Noblemen) whether Errours of the times. all this well considered, you ought not to abhor these petty undertakers, who seem to come into the world, not to receive rules of faith in it, but to prescribe them. They who cannot reform a silly fly in the works of nature, will make themselves Monarchs in the belief of our faith, and trick up anew this great work of Religion, which derives its accomplishment from God. They believe what pleaseth themselves to displease the prime Verity, and create a new Symbol in the chymæra's of their wits, to introduce an impiety into Christianity. Needs must they have a fling at the Bible, as if it were the book of a man; labour about the Fountain-heads of the four rivers of terrestrial Paradise, the speaking Serpent, Noah's Ark, the Tower of Babel, the red Sea, the jaw-bone and foxes of Sampson, as if the Omnipotency of God were not a pledge sufficient enough against all these weaknesses and curiosities of wit, which, saith Tertullian, are doctrines of devils, grown up to please the itch of incredulous ears. We must believe one Article, and leave another; believe the Trinity, and doubt of the Sacrament, Invocation of Saints, Purgatory, Images, and Ceremonies of the Church, as if it were not evident, that whosoever divideth faith, hath none at all. It is not much to the purpose to dispute of Religion, after the sweat of Confessours. blood of Martyrs, and so many millions of miracles. Never would belief be so sick, were it not preceeded by the death of virtue, all will be unhappy for them, who lose piety, the root of happiness. But what repose hath a Catholick, who may dying say; I trust to God for a gift, which cannot proceed but from God. I dye in the faith of Constantine, Theodosius, Clodovæus, S. Lewis, and so many millions of Saints. I go where all the wisest and most entire part of mankind doth go. I follow the authority of eighteen general Councils, wherein all Ages assembled together the wisest men of the world. I dy in the belief of the Church, which is professed throughout all the habitable world. The living and the dead. The stones and marbles of the Tombs of mine Ancestours speak for me: the stars will fall from the Heavens before my faith can be shaken.

And therefore (O Catholicks) strike at Heaven That zeal ought to be had towards Religion. gate by continual prayer, ask of the Father of lights a lively faith, a most sincere zeal towards your Religion, suffer not your judgment to change in the massy composition of body, plunge it not in sensuality, polish it for the great fruition of God, entertain it with consideration of his beauty, nourish it with antipasts of his glory. It only appertaineth to sensual souls, black, and distrustful, to suffer themselves to fall into pusilanimities and faintnes, which lessen the esteem we should have of our vocation towards Christianity. It only appertaineth to carnal spirits, and who want faith in the house of faith, to set the riches and affairs of the world above Religion. But you (O Great men) learn hereafter to value your selves, not by these frail and perishable blessings, which inviron you by that skin which covers you, by those false ornaments of life which disguise you, by all those beauties, which never are nearer ruine, then when they most sparkle with lustre. Learn to behold all humane things from the top of the Palace of Eternity, and you shall see them like rotten pieces, which possess a nothing of times infinity. Why do we here entertain our selves with earthly considerations, as fire, which absented from its sphere, is fed with fat and coals. Let us open our bosoms to these fair hopes wherewith the Religion

The PERSIAN CONSTANCY.

Drawn out of Theodoret, Caſſiodorus, & Epiphanius. Theod. l. 5. c. 38. Epiph. Scolaticus. Caſſiod. hiſtor. tripart. l. 10. c. 32. Baron. tom. 5. anno. 420. & alii.

IF the eſtimation of things eternal, do not as yet ſufficiently penetrate your heart, reflect on that, which ſo many valiant Champions have done, to preſerve a bleſſing, which you preſently poſſeſs by grace, and which you often diſ-eſteem through ingratitude. I will produce one example amongſt a thouſand, able to invite the imitation of the moſt virtuous, and admiration of all the world. In the time when Theodoſius the younger ſwayed the Eaſtern Empire, the Perſians, who had been much gained by the induſtry of the Emperour Arcadius his father, & afterward entertained by his infinite ſweetneſs and courteſie, lived in good correſpondence of amity with the Chriſtians, ſo that many of our Religion adventured themſelves in their Teritory, ſome to make a fortune in the Court, others for pleaſure, many for commerce, and the reſt there to eſtabliſh true piety.

Matters of Religion proceeded then very proſperouſly, and the moſt eminent men of the Kingdom ſhut up their eyes againſt the Sun, which this Nation adored, to open them to the bright Aurora of Chriſtianity. But as there are ſome who never enjoy any thing, ſo there are others who never have enough. Some Chriſtians not contented with their progreſſions, which were well worthy of praiſe, thought they loſt all, out of the deſire they had to leave nothing undone. Which is the cauſe, I much approve thoſe Ancients, who placed the images of wiſdom over the gates of great houſes, with this inſcription: Experience is my mother. So the wiſeſt and moſt experienced thought, nothing was to be precipitated, & that mean advancements accompanied with ſafety, were more to be valued then great ſplendours which drew precipices, and ruins after them. On the contrary, young and fiery ſpirits thruſt all upon extremity, ſuppoſing their power extended to the meaſure of their paſſion. Nothing is more dangerous in any affair, then when indiſcreet fervour takes the mask of zeal, or that a ſeaver of Reaſon paſſeth for a virtue. All his thoughts are deified, his foot-ſteps ſanctified, and although nothing be done for God, it is ſaid, all is for him.

Helinandus apud Vincent. Vſus me genuit.

Biſhop Audas, a man endowed with great and ſingular virtues, but extreamely ardent, and unable to adapt his zeal to the occaſion of times, needs would countenance the humour of the blind multitude, and went out in the midſt of the day to deſtroy a Pyræum, which was a Temple wherein the Perſians kept fire to adore it. Men quickly enflamed in matters of Religion, fail not to raiſe a great ſedition, which came to the notice of King Ildegerdes. Audas is ſent for, to give an account of this act: He defendeth himſelf with much courage, and little ſucceſs for the Chriſtians benefit: for the King turning his proper juſtification into crime, condemns him upon pain of death to re-edifie the Temple he had demoliſhed; which he refuſing to do, was preſently ſacrificed to the fury of Pagans. Theodoret blames him that he unſeaſonably ruined the Temple, and convinceth him by the example of S. Paul, who ſeeing in Athens many Altars dedicated to falſe Gods, contented himſelf with refuting the error, without making uſe of the hammer to deſtroy it, as well fore-ſeeing the time was not yet come: yet withal commanded this man, who rather choſe death, then to become an Authour of impiety in the re-eſtabliſhment of this Temple.

Audas deſtroyeth a Pyræum. Commotions for matters of Religion. Others Baranares, or Gorosnaves. Judgment of Theodoret upon this action.

The rage of Idolaters by the Magi (profeſſed enemies of our Religion) was not wholly extinct in the blood of Audas, but ſtirred up a violent perſecution, which almoſt proceeded to the undermining the foundations of Chriſtian religion in Perſia. Men were every where ſeen to be flayed and roaſted, pierced with bodkins and arrows, thereby becoming ſpectacles of terrour & pitty, to all thoſe who beheld them. Some were expoſed to waſps in the boyling ardours of the ſun: Others thrown into Caves, & places filled with infection, to be devoured by rats, and ſlowly gnawn by ugly vermine: Their members fell in pieces & their life daily diſtilled drop after drop, their faith unſhaken, which the ſword of perſecution ſought for even in their entrails. Their members were not tormented, for they had none but wounds, for they were all over covered with them: and as torments redoubled one upon another, gave no end to their ſufferings, ſo God found the means to finiſh their pain, and life by eternity of their crowns.

Terrible perſecution.

The King ſeeing ſo dreadfull tortures rather ſerved to publiſh the glory of the Combattants, then ruin their virtue, reſolved upon other cruelties, which being apparently leſs violent, were in effect much more pernicious.

There were among the Chriſtians, two Lords of prime quality, the one whereof was called Hormiſdas, the other Suenes, who being the two eies of the Court, and Standard-bearers of Chriſtianity, the endeavour of the Gentils was moſt violent againſt them to force them to abjure Religion. Hormiſdas is firſt ſummoned to return to the Perſian ſuperſtition, & being ſent for to the Palace, the King who much eſteemed him, both for his great Nobility (for he was of the blood Royal) as alſo for the ſervices his father had done to the Crown in the quality of the Governour of a Province, unwilling to looſe him, he made trial of all ſorts of allurements, to gain him to his opinion.

Hormiſdas, and the ſtrength of his will.

But the brave Champion ſtood firm in his beliefe, telling the King with many excellent reaſons, that deſtroying the faith of his true God in Perſia, he would bury the loyalty due to his Majeſty in the ruins thereof: which was the cauſe that Ildegerdes, inſtead of yielding the homage he owed to reaſon and truth became furiouſly chollerick, ſo that degrading him of honour, and confiſcating all his goods, yea, leaving him nought at all, but a poor pair of linnen breeches, he ſent him out to keep the camels of the Army; adding to this great inhumanity the moſt barbarous ſcorn could be invented againſt a gentleman, endowed with ſuch excellent parts. But this couragious heart, which had ſtudied the glory of the Croſs in the deep abyſs of the ignominy of Jeſus, drave camels before the eyes of an Army, wherein he had commanded with ſuch alacrity, as others govern Empires, and thought his nakedneſs more glorious, then the purple of Monarchs.

The King one day beholding him out of a chamber window among the camels, roaſted under the ſcorching Sun, and all covered over with duſt, felt his heart

mollified by the effect of his own cruelty, and calling him into his palace, after he had laid before him the worth of his extraction, and the noble employments wherewith he meant to honour him, he cloathed him with rich apparel, and conjured him by all the ways of friendship, to return to the throne of honour, by forsaking his Religion. But Hormisdas displeased with such discourse, took the robes were cast over his shoulders, & tore them in pieces in the Kings presence, saying: Sir, keep your gifts & impieties, & know Hormisdas will never do any thing unworthy his courage: which was the cause Idegerdes thrust him naked out of the Court, and sent him back again to his camels, where he ware out a long & painful martyrdom

Suenes persecuted.

The same storm fell at that time upon Suenes, one of the wealthiest and most powerful in the Kingdom, & who had a thousand servants in his family. Officers were sent to seize on his whole estate possessed by him, not to maintain riot, but cherish piety, so that in a short time, he saw himself reduced to beggery. But he weighing how Almighty God, who cloathed Heaven with beauties of light, & in the spring-time maketh a garment for the earth, bordered & adorned with so many millions of flowers, had for us put on nakedness, scorned all these violences, and said aloud, They were not near taking away the treasure of faith he bare in his heart, who attempted it on this silly moveable of fortune:

The King, purposely to afflict him the more, took all his children from him, to thrust them into servitude and fetters, if they would follow their fathers example: wherewith somewhat softened, seeing they snatched from between his arms those, who in the imbecillity of age, had more need of his example, then wealth, he kissing them, said: Children, keep constantly the faith of your poor father, and leave greatness and worldly fortunes to others. You shall ever be wealthy enough, if you persist loyal to God. Faith will wipe away your tears, will enrich your poverty, glorifie your chains, and immortalize the honour of your death. This persecution is a cloud that passeth, but we shall quickly behold a bright day, which neither admitteth end nor darkness. This constancy which should make all the world wonder, exasperated the infidels, so that dayly seeking out all the ways how to torment, and burn him with a soft fire, they advised to give the confiscation of all his goods to one of his servants, who had been the most treacherous, and cruel against his Master. He had nothing left but a wife, who possessed in his heart the place of those chast correspondencies, which the law of God afforded him, and she in beginning making a shew of willingness inseparably to follow the fortune of her husband, much comforted this generous soul, who thought nothing was his, but what he gained to Jesus Christ.

An excellent instruction for children.

Stranger persecution of a man.

But behold a strong battery to take from him the remainders of his consolation. The King caused this woman to be vehemently sollicited, to make a divorce from her husband, and to marry his servant: to whom he already had given possession of his great estate. This at the first a little startled the soul of this Lady, she yet having some humanity in her, but saw her self encompassed with many kindred and worldly friends, who suggested according to the maxims of impiety: That is was a folly to forsake a blessing so present, to run after a fantasie of felicity. That the command of Kings must be obeyed, who are visible gods on earth. That a husband despoiled of all his means, retaineth nothing of man, but body, nor can any longer be a husband. That she married him to live, and to give life to others by love, not to cut her own throat, and her childrens, through wickedness. That a man who renounceth honour, can no more pretend to nature. To conclude, that it is wealth, which maketh men, and that it was no dishonour to marry a servant, who is the favourite of a mighty King. We came not into the world to be masters of fortune, but to yeild to its Empire. What content can there be to walk up and down Towns and Cities like a begger, following a husband, the object of the worlds laughter, & reserve all is left of his miserable body to swords & flames.

Violent temptation of a woman.

She yieldeth.

So much were here ears beaten with such like discourses, that through a most unspeakable cowardice she forsook her religion and husband, to marry this servant, who seemed noble enough, since he had the golden fleece. The King seeing she had yielded, added for full accomplishment of inhumanity, that Suenes should remain in his own house, as a slave to his wife and servant. Behold here the extremity of all worldly miseries. Yield thy self up (said one) poor Suenes: seest thou not that of so many palaces, and such treasures, there is not left for thee so much as a house covered with stubble, of so many children, none to call thee father? Is it not time for thee to forsake thy faith, since she who slept by thy sides, hath left thee? wert thou among st the chains of Lestrigons, and Tartars, thou mightest breath a more wholesom air: But to behold thy self a slave to thy servant in thine own house, and to have perpetually before thee the infidelity of a disloyal wife for object, how is it possible, but to overthrow the most stable constancy in the world?

Admirable constancy.

But Suenes assembling together all the forces of his heart, said: O faithless and perfidious discourses! All is taken from me, but they cannot take away Jesus Christ. I follow him in liberty and bondage, in prosperity and adversity, in life and death: whilest one small threed of life remains in my heart, one silly spark of breath upon my lips, I will combat against the gates of hell, and all the laws of impiety. O the power of the spirit of God! O divorce from flesh and bloud! O spectacle worthy to be beheld by angels over the gates of heaven with admiration! A man to dy in so many indignities, such punishments, such deaths, without dying, without complaint, growing wan, or speaking any one word unworthy the lips of a Christian! What is it to be a puissant, but to brave all the powers of earth, and hell? What is it to be rich, but to place all your treasures in the heart to God?

II. MAXIM.

Of the essence of GOD.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That it is fit to obey Nature; all other Divinity being most unknown.

A Cynick Philosopher heretofore sought for a man with a candle at noon-day: and now adays the wicked seek God in a clear and full light, and when they have found him, become blind by their own lights, in that they see not him, who is not to be known

THE HOLY COURT.

That nothing is so known as God, although not acknowledged through our ingratitude but in the quality of the Judge punishing their offences. Out alas! what is man without God? Tertullian speaking of the countrey about the Euxine sea, saith, It is a Region separated from the comerce of men, as well by the providence of Nature, as the reproach of its brutishness. It is peopled by most savage Tertul. adverf. Marcion l. 1. cap. 1.

Excellent description of Tertullian.

vage Nations, which inhabit, if we may ſay ſo, a wandering cart, that ſerves them for houſe; a habitation, which though perpetually in motion, is leſs inconſtant then their manners. Their abode is uncertain, their life wholly ſavage, their luxury promiſcuous, and indifferent for all ſorts of objects. They make no ſcruple to ſerve in the fleſh of their Parents in a feaſt with beeff and mutton, and think the death of ſuch curſed, who dy, when they no longer are fit to be eaten. Sex foſtneth not women in this Country; for they fear of their dugs being young, and make a diſtaff ſerve for a launce, being otherwiſe ſo fervent in battle, that they had much rather fight then marry. The Climate and elements are as rigid, as their manners. The day is never bright, the ſun never ſmileth, nor is the ſky any thing, but a continued cloud. The whole year is a winter, and the wind ever North. Ice robs them of rivers, and if they have liquour, the fire affords it. The Mountains are ſtill covered with ice and ſnow. All is cold in this Country, but vice, which ever burneth. Yet I muſt tell you, (ſaith he) there is not any thing amongſt theſe wonders more prodigious, then wicked Marcion. For, where ſhall we find a Monſter more odious, or a man in nature more ſenſeleſs then him, who did not acknowledg the Divinity, and will have the cauſes, and ſublime reaſons given him of the Eſſence of God, which never were, nor ſhall be: for then there would be ſomewhat above God.

Humane arbitratu divinitas conſtatur: niſi homini Deus placuerit, Deus non erit. Tertul. Apol. c. 5. Nec quicquam refert, Deum ne geras, an aſſeras. Arno. l. 1.

The Emperour Tiberius having conceived ſome good opinion of Divinity in the Perſon of our Saviour, was willing to rank him in the number of other gods, but it was not executed, becauſe it muſt paſs by decree of the Senate: and God, who is all that which he is by nature, regarded not the judgement of men to authorize his Divinity. You were as good deny God, (ſaith Arnobius) as to make the truth of his Eſſence depend upon the weakneſs of humane reaſon.

God is better known to us then our ſelves.

1. I ask of you whether there be any thing in the world more preſent with us, and more familiarly known than our ſelf, our ſubſtance, our life, our being? It ſeemeth (ſay you) it is the moſt certain of our knowledges. Now if I ſhew, the ſcience we have of God is far ſtronger, more undoubted, and invincible, then the knowledg we have of our ſelf, I neceſſarily convince the ignorance of the Divinity, is ſtupid, ungratefull, and puniſhable with all the rigours of eternal juſtice.

I pray tell me, what ſo certain knowledg can you have of your ſelf? Have you it by the knowledg of Hiſtory, which is a reaſonable knowledg; by revelation, which is extraordinary; by propheſie, which is myſterious; by faith, which is infallible? I do not ſee you alledge any of theſe for confirmation of your own being, You have no proofs (ſay you) more certain, then your ſenſes. which you know notwithſtanding to be bruitiſh, deceivers, and deceived in ſo many objects. You hear your ſelf ſpeak, you ſmell your ſelf, you touch your ſelf; and for that you affirm you are, although you have not any knowledg of the better part of your body, by the moſt noble ſenſe within you, but by the help of a mirrour. Nay, you know ſo little of your ſelf, that ſcarcely have you obſerved the number of your teeth: and being far from the particular diſtinction of the interiour parts of your body, ſhall you enter into the great labyrinths of the facultyes of your ſoul, you would quickly finde out your own ignorance.

Compare now the ſcience you have of your ſelf, with the great proofs, which lead you to the knowledge of the Divinity. Firſt, we are born to know God, as the excellent Divine Alexander Alenſis diſcourſeth: becauſe if the ſoveraign Goodneſs be neceſſarily deſired by our reaſonable appetite, we muſt affirm the ſupream truth is no leſs capable to be known by our underſtanding: & as we are naturally inclined to the ſearch of this ſoveraign Good, which may take up all the agitations of our thoughts, ſo we feelour ſoul almoſt without any other reflection, ſtir'd upwith a generous deſire to be united to the 1. cauſe. We behold it through ſo many creatures, as through lattices, & it ſeems to ſpeak to us in as many objects, as we ſee works of his Goodneſs. It maketh us reſtleſs, it ſcorcheth us with an honeſt flame, which teacheth us there is a God, and that we are created for him, nor is there any other creature in all viſible nature, which laboureth in ſuch inquiſition, but man: This ardent inclination to this knowledg, is not a ſlight facility of ſcience, & we ſee conſtant ſtudy is ordinarily recompenced with the fruition of its object.

Alex. Alenſ. quæſt. 2. de cognitione Dei.

A ſingular conſideration of Alen.

2. I likewiſe hold, God of his part is very well to be known, having all the conditions which may make a thing known, as Eſſence, immutability, ſimplicity, brightneſs and preſence. If you there look for Being, which is a neceſſary object of the underſtanding, as colour, of ſight: God, ſaith S. Gregory of Nazianzen, is a creating Eſſence, an Eſſence comprehending all things. If immutability, Origen teacheth, the Divinity ſitteth on the top of beatitude, ever conſtant, never changeable: if brightneſs, God is all light, as the Scripture manifeſteth in ſo many places: if ſimplicity, Fauſtus Biſhop of Rhegium ſheweth, God is all what he hath; if continual preſence, Porphyry confeſſeth, he is every where, becauſe he is not in any part, as bodyes are. The Poet Orpheus in his myſterious poeſie, calleth him φάνητα, as one would ſay, lightſome and viſible, to teach us all the world is enfolded within his radiance. I will not hereupon inferr, that one may have in this world an abſolute and perfect knowledg of God, as of a thing finite; but I ſay, that amongſt ſo many lights, it is not admitted that any man ſhould be ignorant there is a God, Creatour of all things.

God moſt eaſie to be known.

Nazianzen. Iambico. 2. ἀκίνητον ἐν ἀκινήτῳ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀκινήτου ἀκίνητον ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀκινήτου ἀκίνητον ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀκινήτου ἀκίνητον world be created, (which it is not lawful to doubt) of three things we must affirm one, Either that it produced it self, or that one piece made another, or that there was one cause external, supream, not to be reckoned among the rest, which made all the parts of the universe. To say a thing made it self, is to affirm it was before its being, and to assever a proposition ridiculous to all humane understanding. But if to evade this manifest contradiction, one will maintain one piece made another; still must he come to a last piece, which was produced by it self, and so fall again into the same difficulty. Behold the reason why we must stick upon a general cause, out of the main mass of all causes, and which affording essence, sense, and intelligence to so many creatures according to the condition, & qualities of every one, remaineth eternal, and immoveable. Now he who says this, affirmeth there is a God.

Author libri de triplici habitaculo apud Aug. tom. 9. Nihil seipsum creat. Quod enim potentia, qui omnino non est, seipsum faceret. Deus immutatus, infectus, sine initio, sine fine, in aeternitate constitutus. Tertul. l. 3. adverſ. Marcion. c. 3. Instance upon the infinite number of the wicked.

4. But if some impious creature will notwithstanding perplex the evidence of this proposition, imitating Sorcerers, who cast mists upon the brightest morning, and say one thing produced another from father to son, but that this still mounteth upward in infinitum, and so think to make us loose our judgement and reason, in the labyrinth of infinities; First it is answered according to the doctrine of Philosophers: There is nothing in the world actually infinite & although an infinity of generations of men, beasts, & other creatures were admitted, still must you confess this infinite mass of me', was produced from a cause independent. For that which agreeth to each part of a species, and which is properly by it affected, agreeth likewise to the main of the whole species; as if it be proper to every man living to understand, & reason, it must be inferred, the whole species is intellectual, and rational: But in this infinite mass of men supposed, there cannot any one be assigned, who was not produced, not by it self (a matter we already have refuted) but from another cause independent of this supposed mass: and this cause is God, which we prove.

Force of reason.

5. Secondly (as lying is ingenious to ruin its own labours) they who suppose this infinity of generations & efficient causes, destroy all sorts of generations, when they think to establish them. For as a quantity cannot be divided into proportionable, and correspondent parts to the infinite, so there are no causes essentially subordinate one to another, which go into this infinity: There must necessarily be in such subordinations a first, which is a cause of a middle, and a middle the cause of a latter. Necessarily all these created essences, and which were but in potentia, presuppose essentially an actual essence, always subsisting, which is a support to all the rest, as the earth hath all the pieces of a building raised one upon another. It must be to bring you into the world, that your father acted after your grand-father, your grand-father after your great grand-father by a continuation, distinct & measured, as in a chain from the first link to the last. For were there not a first, a middle, a last; there could not be either order, or subordination; and were there no subordination, there could be no action. If infinite number of wheels must move to make a clock strike, it would never sound, because the swindge being to be given to all the other from a first wheel, this first wheel would never be found, because in infinity there is no first. And although it were found, it could not communicate its activity to the last; otherwise it must pass in a determinate time an infinite space, which can never be measured. If you depend from father to son, from an infinity of men, to be produced (as you say) you could not be a man, for you must have passed from infinite Ages, before you could come to the father, who begat you. And if one could pass over infinite Ages, see you not the infinite would be finite? So much you forget all truth, and reason in the chymæra's of your wit. And then what absurdity were it to grant to a Nature so poor, and limited, as is that of all corruptible things a consequence of infinite causes.

6. But let us withdraw from these thorns, and not urge at this time the reason which hertofore convinced Epicurus, and guided him, (brutish though he were) to the knowledge of the Divinity, when he figured to himself, that necessarily there was in the universe an excellent Nature exalted above all the rest and the best of all, and that this was God. Nor likewise let us alledge what was touched by Scotus, who saith, A pure Act being possible, and there being no incompatibility between essence, and purity of essence, it of necessity must be, because it formally excludeth all power, not yet actuated. Let us also pass over that of (a) Aristotle, taken from the necessity of a first mover, which Auerroes judgeth very effectual.

Cicero 2. de natur. Deorum. Quod necesse sit præstantem aliquam esse Naturam quæ nihil sit melius. Scot. in 1. dist. 2. q. 2. Si actus purus est possibilis, ergo existit, aliàs non est. Actus purus qui pugnat formalissimè cum quavis potentialitate. (a) Arist. 3. Phys. & 12. Metaphys.

7. I demand of thee (O brutish man) who so often blemishest thy knowledges by the impurity of thy life, can one say a man is hidden, who were he shewed by a thousand lights, discovered by a thousand voices, a thousand trumpets, represented by a thousand pictures? Nay, all creatures (who will carefully consider them) are lights, voices, images, which shine before the pavillion of the Divinity, which proclaim, which figure, which engrave it on our hearts with an eternal character. The lessons of the Divinity are common to all the world (saith Prosp:) we learn them in the leaves of elements, and in the volumes of time: We cannot but remember them, if we forget not our selves. We admire in Philostratus (b) an Athenian Herod, who appointed twenty four pages for his son, every one of which bare the title of the Greek letter, that he might learn his Alphabet by calling his servants. But O ingrateful man! God gave thee a million of creatures, which contribute to thy service, to teach thee his Name, who for his greatness cannot be unknown and for his goodness ought not to be neglected. I speak not now of all the wonders of the world, whereof use is made to prove the Divinity, because they are sufficiently seen, and that it is the ordinary place, whereon they dilate, who handle this subject. It is impossible, said Cleomede, that a man who will attentively consider five things, appearing in the fabrick of the universe; to wit, the contexture of so many, and so different parts, the order of productions, the relation one creature hath to another, their ends, and use, should not admire, and know this great All, is made by a Nature soveraign, predominant and Monarchal, which produced all things of unity, and caused them to re-enter into themselves by the same unity. So many rays in a sun, so many drops of water in a river, so many Rivers in a sea, so many branches and leaves on a root, so many sinews from the brain, so many veins from a liver, so many arteries from a heart, so many parts of a creature, so many motions of one principal, conspire together to make us understand this First of Unities. Two strings cannot accord upon a lute without the wit of a man, and so many things high and low, visible, invisible, weighty, light, great, little, hot, cold, living, not living, moveable, immoveable, sensible, insensible, can they agree without the spirit of God? The lines of Mathematicians drawn upon the sand of the sea-shore, make a man say who is in a desart Island, that men have passed by, because neither Bears, nor Lions have such like figures: and cannot these vast heavens, with all the rivers, and seas which moisten it, make us say, Necessarily God went this way? If from the great schole of the world, and the general voice of nature, thou dost pass to sciences, they do all bear on their brows the marks of the Divinity. The Mathematician shews thee the point, which maketh all lines. The Arithmetician, the unity, which causeth all numbers; to tell thee, there is a Creatour, who is the center, and beginning of all creatures: Geometry presenteth thee the compass with one stable foot in the center, the other moving, to shew thee the firmness of the Essence not created, and instability of all things created: Astrology proposeth unto thee its motions so regular, and measured; Musick its harmonies; Philosophy its reasonings; eloquence its discourses; Mechanick, its works and admirable industries, to let thee understand the effects of this increated Essence, which travelleth throughout all nature without losing any part of its eternal repose. The knowledg of a God is given to the soul, as a dower or inheritance of its birth: God shall never be hidden, never shall fail; shall ever be understood, ever harkened unto, perpetually seen. Herod and Nero knew him, being unable to free themselves from this science: The Polyphemuses did believe him in the obscurity of their caves, even when they were devouring the flesh of men, : conscience told them news of him, nor hath any man hitherto grown to so much fury, as not at some time to acknowledge his dependence in the affrightment of a mind troubled with the image of its crimes. Nothing will appear to be so well known as God, who makes all things to be understood: whilst in the mean time the ingratitude of men hath reduced him to this point in the world, that he is most forgotten by all.

Ingratitude of man towards God

8. It is the greatest of evils to be unwilling to know him, of whom you cannot be ignorant. Our ignorance is convinced by his lights, and our ingratitude overwhelmed by his goodness: and yet man asks if God govern all: why this, wherefore that, why evil, why wicked and wherefore so many miseries in the lives of mortals? He will know the causes of the will of God, which have no causes, but is the chief of all causes; and (doubly stupid as he is) he complaineth of evils which sprang from himself, and accuseth God of nothing, but because his mercy hath not at all times thunder in hand to chastise his crimes. He is enforced to confess a soveraign Being, to which he oweth all he is, and confessing serves him so negligently, that it were almost better to have no God, then to believe in one, and make him the object of his neglect.

Who will open again unto us the lips of Isaiah, to say once more, Hearken, O you heavens, which circumvolve over our heads, replenished with stars and lights: Hearken, O earth, which hast so often trembled with horrour of the crimes of so many Mortals? To say truely (saith the Creatour) had I no other title of recommendation towards man, but my self, my scepter, Empire, and dignity; honour & gratitude would ever be due to me: but hear what I have done: I have nourished children with incomparable sweetness: I have bred them, and borne them in the bosom of my providence, with unspeakable tenderness, yet was contemned by those, on whose foreheads I imprinted the rays of my glory. Forgetfulness alone is insupportable to love: but what shall we say of contempt? what of injury? There hath not been any excellency, or perfection in me, which was not invaded and checked, O man, by thy vices. Thou hast resisted the Immensity of my Essence by thy avarice and boundless ambition: my Infinity by thy inordinate concupiscencies, which tend to be infinite; my Immutability by thy inconstancy; my Eternity by thy love of transitory things; my Power by thy imbecility and remisness; my Wisdom by thy ignorance; my Perfection by thy wants; my Sanctity by thy vices; my Liberality by thy ingratitude; my Jurisdiction by thy tyranny; my Providence by thy stupidity; my Mercy by thy obstinacy; and my Justice by thy iniquity.

I no longer complain of Moors and Arabians, who persecuted me; I complain of being wounded in my own house by my unnatural children. If needs I must endure the contradiction of all the world, veryly, O Christian, thy hand ought to be the last lifted up against me. The Ox, bruitish as he is, acknowledgeth his Master; the Ass loves his crib, who oweth him: what say I? savage beasts, who have almost perpetually slaughter, and blood under their paws, are reclaimed by benefits, and thou becomest obdurate by my liberality. What is there more mischievous, more intolerable, then to see a servant rebel against a Master in his own house, when he lives of his granary, and shakes under his correction? It is not so great a matter to adore with a most submiss reverence, whom thou canst not comprehend, to moisten the earth with thy tears, and appease Heaven with thy penance, and say, (a) Wo the time I knew thee not! Wo the blindness that made me neglect thee! Wo the deafness which shut up mine ears against thy sacred words! Blind and deaf, I desperately threw my self amongst so many objects of creatures of the world, and beauties which onely served to deform me. Thou wert with me, I not with thee. and all, which cannot be without thee, separated me from thee. It is too late to begin to know thee, and too late to begin to love thee; but this will be never to have an end but in him, who concludeth all things.

The ſecond EXAMPLE upon the ſecond MAXIM.

The Power of the DIVINITY over Infidels.

Drawn from the Scripture, S. Hierom, upon Daniel and Joſephus, &c.

ANTIOCHUS the THEOMACQUE, Or Enemy of GOD.

IT were a very hard matter to find out a soul more prostituted to impiety, then that of Antiochus surnamed the Theomacque; and a heart more possessed with the fear of a Deity then Eleazars. For which cause, the encounter of times, and battels having so well opposed them, we will propose them in this History. This Antiochus, who rendred himself so notorious in holy Scripture, through the exorbitancie of his wickedness, seemed to have derived impiety from his birth; for the Antiochuſes, his Ancestours, caused themselves heretofore, to be surnamed the Saviours, and Gods of the earth.

Antiochus a politick man, who had no other God, but ambition.

He was of a spirit, fierce, close, and crafty, intelligent, bold, audacious, who shewed from his younger years to have no other Gods but scepters, no other Paradise, then fruition of Empires. His father Antiochus the Great, had given him this lesson: For he was an active Prince, but more judicious then his son, who never ceased to disturb his neighbour, and covertly attempt the Kingdom of Ægypt by arms, and subtleties, until such time that the Romans clipped the wings of his ambition, as well to stay the progression of his overmuch power, become formidable to the Empire, as to punish him for the dangerous correspondencies he held with Hannibal. He was enforced by reason of some agreements and transactions of peace to send his son to Rome in hostage, and that was this Antiochus we mention.

This

He was delivered for an hostage to the Romans.

This young Prince, who already had in his imagination designs of Empire, managed this occasion, and deriving his happiness out of the necessity of his fathers affairs, learned therein all the extent of supream powers on earth, and began to reflect on the Romans, as gods of the whole world. On the other side Scipio, and all the other great Captains, were forward to let the people behold this off spring of the Asian Kings, as a Lion enchained, and finding him vain enough they spared not slight complements, and court smoakes: but ever held in their own hands the highest point of authority, and drew profit out of all affairs.

Prudence of the Romans.

During his abode in Rome, his father Antiochus the Great, overwhelmed under the burden of his ambition, found the catastrophe of his pretensions in a tomb, and his eldest son Seleucus succeeded him, who had a short life, and an unhappy reign. At which time young Antiochus felt in himself a vehement itch of rule, more powerfully then any of his predecessours had done, for soon understanding his brothers death (who left him the Kingdom of Asia,) and knowing his sister Cleopatra, married to the King of Ægypt, was a widow, and the mother of onely one child, of whom he hoped to be easily rid, he ardently thirsted to joyn the two Empires, and unite them under his power. Now the Kingdom of Syria appertaining to this young Orphan, the son of his sister, he in the beginning entred thereinto with great modesty, in the quality of a Tutour, and Regent, & not a King, aforehand disposing the peoples minds by Attalus and Eumenes, who did him good service in this pretension. This wolf clothed in a lambs-skin thought to enter by the same ways into the Kingdom of Ægypt, and wrote thus to his sister, That it seemed the Gods had thrown him among thorns at the time when Kings of his age walked not but on violets, and roses. That being absent out of the Kingdom, he had received sad news of the death of his thrice honoured father, and immediately of the death of his well-beloved brother, whose days he wished might have been lengthned with his own years: But that nothing afflicted him so much as to see her a widow, burdned with an infant, whose hands were not so early fit to manage a scepter. Behold therefore the cause why he now undertook the government of the Kingdom of Syria, which was the possession of his Ancestours, and whereunto she had right by the title of dower. But otherwise though he were heavily surcharged with two Kingdoms, he was no whit discouraged to share with her also in the cares of Ægypt, since, besides charity towards his own, the continual practice of affairs he had at Rome, in the most knowing school of the world, it had acquired him some dexterity and experience in the sway of Kingdoms. That he would make her reign in the affluence and pleasures of a flourishing Court, and prostrate the whole world at her feet. That she should onely be troubled to see their submission, as the gods behold earth from heaven, and that he would be as faithful a Regent, as he had ever been a loving brother.

Cleopatra had been married to Ptolomeus Epiphanes, and cast a bait by the father, to catch the Kingdom of Ægypt, under hope conceived, that having studied in his school, she would beguil her husband, & bring Nilus to Euphrates: But she opening hereeys, found her flesh was much nearer then the smock, and ever upheld both her husband, and son, against her fathers plots. She understood the heart of her brother to be desperately subtle, and ambitious; and seeing she could not possess Syria, where he had strongly fortified himself, she easily admitted this his imaginary title of Regency, which she could no longer withhold: But for so much as concerned Ægypt, she made answer, That she very humbly thanked him for the compassion he had of her widow-hood and the Gods who afford the deepest roots to trees the most subject to winds, would furnish her with sufficient courage to suffer so boisterous shocks. As concerning the Kingdom of Syria, his providence had prevented the good opinion she conceived of him, being already resolved to put the Regency into his hands. But as for Ægypt, there was no necessity he should rob himself in the freshness of his youth, of the pleasures so fairly acquired for him, to undergo so many burdensom charges in a forreign Countrey, wherein he would not be honoured, as were the Ptolomees. That her people were somewhat jealous, nor would confide in external power; which might much discontent him in the sincerity he pretended in the manage of her affairs. That she was assisted by a wise Council, with whose aid she hoped to maintain her people in perfect peace, and raise her son to the height of the happiness of his extraction, and that it should ever be a singular comfort for her to be assured of the good affection he bare towards her estate, and to correspond with him in an unfained intelligence, Antiochus, who found not his expectation in his sisters letters, laid down the sheep-skin, to put on the Lions, and began to make open war, by invading the Kingdom of Ægypt, which was the cause Cleopatra instantly cast her self into the protection of the Romans, although she nothing doubted, but that her brother had thence sought support, and credit: But she on the other side knew they favoured justice, & willingly undertook the causes of widows and orphans. And verily the Senate of Rome, either through the integrity of their manners, or to ballance sceptors which swayed under them, and make none too great to the prejudice of their power, inclined to the widows part, and commanded Antiochus to retire out of Ægypt. He who knew how to court men, went about to gain Popilius Lenas, deputed by the Senate to determine this affair, requiring some delay to withdraw his forces leisurely, of purpose to spend time for the renewing his plots.

Equity of the Senate of Rome to support widows.

A notable act of an Embassadour.

But the other, a man resolute, and not to be paid with words, making use of a riding-rod which he had in his hand, drew a circle about Antiochus, and enclosed him within it, saying: There is but one word to be used, before you come out from thence; you must necessarily resolve, either on peace with your sister, or wars against the Senate & people of Rome. He seeing himself so strongly charged, gave way to their demands, and wrote to the Senate, That I esteemed the Peace which came from their motion, more glorious then all his victories, and heard their Embassadours, as if the Gods had spoken out of heaven to him Therein imitating the most supple Courtiers, who instead of shewing their discontent against power, give thanks for a beating. Howsoever, becoming enraged with rancour to se so rich a prey escaped out of his hands, he discharged all his choler upon the Jews, as those who make their servants suffer for the losses they had in game. He had a spleen against this Religious Nation both through the motive of his own impiety, and reason of State, suspecting them more to encline to King Ptolomee's faction. Behold why he entred into Jerusalem like an enraged Lion with huge troups, in the beginning pillaging the City and Temple, sparing neither the prophane, nor sacred, swallowed excessive riches, and plunged the fiery flames of his anger in the bloud and tears of four-score thousand people; some killed, divers sold, and many scattered, unable to satisfie his cruelty.

the desire of utter defacing the marks of Religion. The streets of Sion mourned, Priests were banished or massacred, the Altars demolished, Temples polluted with ordures, and uncleanness, by abominable monsters who renewed sacrifices to Belphegor, and Bacchus in the Sanctuary, heretofore impenetrable to mortal eyes. The abomination of desolation foretold by the Prophet Daniel, which was a statue of olympick Jupiter, was seen to be raised in the holy place, in sight of all the world. The books of the Law were sought out through all the houses, and committed to flames, the festivals changed into Bacchanals, all exercise of piety interdicted with whips, wheels, fires, so far that two poor mothers being found administring Circumcision to two little infants, were drawn through the City, having their lamentable off-spring hanged about their necks, and in that posture thrown into a ditch. The whole City was nought else but a spectacle of gibbets and slaughters, the Pagans by some false brothers, conspiring with much fervour to put the Kings Edicts in execution. Then was the time, Eleazars combat with the seven young Machabees appeared, which is excellently described in the Scripture, in Josephus, and the Fathers of the Church, that it were a thing superfluous to endeavour enlargement upon it, with a more ample discourse. I onely say, that if God permitted upon one side to be seen the unbridled soul of a man, professed an enemy of all piety; on the other, an admirable spectacle was beheld of fear and reverence, rendered to his Name by the faithfull.

Combat of Eleazar.

What a prodigie to see an aged man four-score and ten years old, of one of the prime families of his Nation, learned in the Law, of an Angelical aspect, to go smiling to punishment? And he cracking even their hearts with compassion, who sate as Magistrates upon his execution. Some perswaded him onely but to make shew to eat hogs flesh for the Kings satisfaction. But he reflecting on the true point of honour, The hoarines's (saith he) of this venerable hair wherewith my head is covered, having waxed old in the exercises of Religion, sufficiently teacheth me my duty. It is not fit for Eleazar to counterfeit impiety, but profess virtue. God forbid, I should forget the law of my God, dishonour the school and doctrine in which I was bred; or become a scandall to these young men, to whom God is now pleased to make a Theater of my Constancy: The honour of my passed life shall enter into the ashes of my Tomb, and my soul shall fly out of this body truly innocent, and not bear infidelity into the bosom of my Ancestours. Then they tormenting him under the lashes of whips and fervour of flames, he added: My All-knowing God, thou art not ignorant, that it being in my power to free my selfe from death; not to fail in thy fear, I faint in my life I make thee the depository of my soul, which issueth out of these torn members, chusing rather to die tortured on all sides, then to live one filly moment unfaithfull.

The Mother of the Machabees.

After Eleazar, went the glorious mother of the Machabees along, having the spirit of a man in a feminine body. She entred first of all into the combat, although she were the last that arrived to the crown, bringing seven sons with her to death, as to the true source of immortality. This blessed creature stood between two flames, the one of natural love, the other of charity towards God: Both combatted, but there was but one prevailed, that she might transcend all things under God.

As she lived in seven souls, so she was sacrificed in seven bodies: She saw the tongue torn out from one, the toes and fingers of feet and hands cut off from another, the skin pulled away all bloody from the head of this; that, thrown into a boyling cauldron; finally, she beheld them all equal in punishment, as she parallel'd them in love. Some while she delivered one to the executioners, another while she received the blood upon her garments, presently the mangled members in her arms; she fought in all, and for all, having no other fear, but of their deliverance. But she infinitely fearful for the youngest of her sons, shewed him Heaven, then her breasts, the one to have bred him, the other to glorifie him. When she saw him dead, then was the time she thought him born, and then with most courage she waited on his execution. O incomparable mother! (saith S. Augustine) who knew what it was to possess children, since she feared not to loose them. Mother of Martyrs, and eight times a Martyr, who equalled her triumphs to her childrens, and her glory to eternity.

August. serm. 109. c. 6.

In the end, Antiochus after all this butchery retiring, the living God, who pursued the tracks of this impious man, and who in his eyes bare the lightnings of his justice, raised Mattathias and his children, who with a silly handful of men, restored sanctification to the Temple, and liberty to the Citizens; having in four encounters defeated four Royal Armies.

Punishment of the wicked Antiochus.

This wretched creature, and who had no religion in him, though in appearance he made shew of that of the Grecians, went to Elymas to invade a Temple of Diana, where great treasures were kept: but was there so ill intreated, that he more hastily returned then came thither, laden with confusion, and in short time heard the discomfiture of his Armies, and victory of the Jews, whereupon he entred into so desperate fury, that he resolved to retire hastily again to Jerusalem, and to make of the whole City but one tomb.

But the hand of God had already designed his: for it happened being in his coach, his horses frighted extraordinarily upon the meeting and roar of an Elephant, gave him so boysterous a stroke, that thrown on the ground, he received a mortal wound, the fire and venom whereof crept so far into his hurts, that he seemed to burn alive like the damned, feeling inexplicable dolours throughout all his body, which became a nest of vermin, and having his soul turmoyled with Specters and Furies that gave him no repose. At which time the miserable Atheist coming to himself after a drunkenness of so many years, spake these words, JUSTUM EST SUBDITUM ESSE DEO, ET MORTALEM NON PARIA DEO SENTIRE; professing there was a Great God, to whom we must submit, and never with him contest; when being in the bed of death, he acknowledged impiety had been the original of all his evils, and that should God restore him to his health, he would fill Jerusalem with gifts and wonders, even to the becoming a Jew, and ever proclaim the glory of the Creatour. But the gates of mercy were already shut up against this disloyal man, who had no true repentance: his hour was come which made him die, all wasted with putrefaction insupportable to his Army, who could not endure the stench, troublesome to himself, and execrable to the memory of all mankinde.

Joseph Ben. Gorion.

The Prophets and holy Fathers mention him as a damned soul, and the figure of Antichrist, to teach the wicked out of the deportment of this man, that there is not any one withdraws from God, but flies from his mercy, and falls into the hands of his justice, which pursueth Libertines beyond the gates of hell.

III. MAXIM.

III. MAXIM.

Of the excellency of the DIVINITY.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That Great men are Gods on earth, whose favours we should adore.

Divers opinions of the Divinity.

THere is nor any thing hath more perplexed the minds of men since the beginning of the world, then the diverse opinions of the Deity; since the wisest, when they had spent all their abilities upon this question, found nothing more certain then uncertainty. One would wonder why the knowledge of the true God being so important for man, hath been so many Ages obscured and covered in a great abyss of darkness, even from those, who thought themselves the most clear-sighted in the knowledge of total Nature. But who sees not it is an evident punishment for sin, and a most just effect of Gods vengeance, who hath permitted truth to be hidden from man, because man would conceal himself from truth, even in the shadow of death, and nothing? They vanished in their thoughts (said the Apostle) and their senseless hearts were obscured.

Evanuerunt in cogitationibus suis, & obscuratum est insipiens cor eorum. Rom. 1.

But that which herein is very considerable, is, that God hath ever handled wicked men, like the damned: for the unhappy souls condemned to hell, have an idæa of the beatitude they have lost, which serves for an executioner: And infidels after shipwrak of faith, and truth, which they abandoned, fail not still to retain an opinion of the excellency of the Divinity, not knowing what it is, nor why they should stick to it. It was that wherein Pliny esteemed men more miserable, then beasts: For creatures not made for the knowledge and fruition of a God, are troubled at nothing, nor make any question thereupon, contenting themselves peaceably to enjoy innocent favours of Nature: but the curiosity man hath had through all Ages, to be informed of the state of the Sovereign cause, is a strong conviction of his infidelity. He findeth himself obliged to seek into the knowledge of God, which, as saith Tertullian, is the first vesture of the soul: but this knowledge flyeth him so long as he renounceth faith, innocency, and reason, the prime pieces of the intellectual life.

God in this life handleth the wicked as the damned.

Diversity of Gods. Plin. l. 2. c. 7.

From thence grew the great diversity of gods, heaped one upon another by the Gentiles. For poor humane nature overwhelmed partly by the greatness of this sovereign essence, partly also clouded by its own ignorance, misery, and sin, being unable to understand a God, most Only and Simple, with one sole touch of the soul, hath made an impertinent dissection of it, dividing it into as many parts, as there are errours on the Altars of Gentiles: whilest every one sought to adore that, which most flattered his imagination, or sensuality. They who were more spiritual, have deified virtues, as Chastity, Concord, Intelligence, Hope, Honour, Clemency, and Faith. Other more absurd, have tyed themselves to the worship of creatures, as the Ægyptians: Some, who questionless were sottish, have framed gods in humane shape, some old, others young, and many perpetually infants. They have made them male, and female, black, white winged, and deformed. They make some to rise out of a wind, others from the sea and divers from rocks. They who were more fearful, and superstitious adored the feaver, and tempests not for esteem of their worth, but through horrour of their malignity. They ware their gods shut up in rings, & many submitted to monsters, denying themselves repose, and repast, to satisfie their superstition. It is the misery which S. Augustine deplored in his City of God, after Pliny the Historian, and other Authours, who handled this subject.

God of flatterers.

But such as amidst this great obscurity of Sects, thought themselves more gentile, and refined in conversation, taking other ways, and leaving old superstitions, began to canonize Emperours, Princes, and the Great-ones of the earth, saying, There were no Divinities more visible, and propitious then these; seeing they dayly became the distributours of glory, and worldly fortunes. The Athenians, who vaunted to have the most subtile wits of the earth, quickly suffered themselves to fall into such like flatteries, whereof we have a very notable passage in Seneca, who telleth us, that Mark Anthony being a Prince extreamely dissolute, was instantly called god Bacchus by his flatterers, and soon came to such shameless impudence, as to suffer this title to be engraven upon his statues. Behold the cause, why entring into the City of Athens, all the men of quality, marching before him, and desirous to be acceptable with him, both through humour and affection of favour, they failed not to introduce him with the title of Bacchus: nay, willingly to over-value him above other people, they added the hearty offer of their Minerva in marriage, the Guardian-Goddess of their City, who had refused all the gods.

Remarkable punishment of flattery. Senec. Suasor. 1.

This Prince was not amazed at their complement for he presently replied, Their motion was grateful: But seeing Minerva was a great goddess, he must suitably accomodate her to her dignity, and therefore ordained they should find out six hundred thousand crowns to give her in marriage. An Athenian thereupon replied, Jupiter her father took the goddess Semele, without demand of any portion: But this was to little purpose, their flattery cost them so great a sum, that needs must they afterwards exact it with the peoples clamour, many of them affixing pasquils upon Anthonies statue, to deface false applauses by a just reproach. If all flatterers were punished in such measure, the number would be very small. But since they find rewards, where others received nothing but punishment, it is no wonder the Ages are wholly drenched into servile complacence. Never were Christian men seen to be more disposed to slavery. The great eye of Divine Providence is taken away, & all sense of Religion, to adhere to men of gold & silver: They cease not to deify the: & we may truely say, the favour of the rich and great-ones of this age is now adays become a false Divinity, which receiveth Incense, and Victims, almost from all hands. Notwithstanding he is cursed by the Prophet, who putteth his trust in man to the exclusion of God, & who thinking to fortify himself throughly in the course of humane affairs, makes to himself an arm of of flesh, and hay, to raise fortunes, which will vanish like phantasms.

For this cause I here purpose to present unto you some passages of Gods greatness, to oppose them against the abjectness and infirmity of the mightiest on earth, that so we may learn from this discourse to be replenished with a worthy estimation of the Divinity, and the knowledge of the nothing of the richest magnificences on earth.

The greatness of God compared to the Low condition of men.

All the praise of great things endeth in one ample word; & by how much the more an essence is simple, by so much the fewer words shall we need to explicate it. Of whom must we learn to speak of God, but of God himself? And what do we learn from him, but that he is what he is? That is to say, little, & that is to say, all. For, as S. Bernard hath excellently observed, call God good, call him great, call him blessed, call him wise, call him all you can, you find him included in this word. When God said, I am what I am, he said, He is all he is, Add hereunto a century of attributes, you shall not go far from the essence: If you speak them, you add nothing unto it: if you mention them not, you not at all lessen it.

God is who he is. S. Bernard, l. 5 de consid. Si bonum, si magnum, si beatum, si sapientem, vel quicquid aliud tale de Deo dixeris, in hoc verbo instauratur, quod est, Est. Nempe hoc est ei esse, quod omnia esse. Si enim talia addas, non recessisti ab esse; si ea diveris, nihil addidisti ad esse: si nihil dixeris, nihil de eo minuisti.

S. Denys gives a particular reason thereof, when he saith, that (a) essence is the first and last pledge of Nature, the most intimate, most necessary, most independent, most simple, and most perfect of all things in the world. Behold the cause, why the Celestial Father could say nothing better to the purpose of himself then (b) I am what I am.

(a) Greatnesse of essence.

Let us here then speak of the excellency of Gods Essence compriséd under these words: and oppose against it the frailty, and nullity of our essence, that penetrated with the greatness of the Omnipotent, we may be drenched in the abyss of low humility.

(b) Ego sum qui sum.

2. Our first abjectness, and which is of power to humble those who think themselves the most able in the world, is, that we have been an eternity in nothing. For if you mount, still ascending upward to the source of time, when you shal have reckoned millions of Ages, you shal find nothing but labyrinths, and abysses of this great eternity without end, & when you shal present to your thoughts all that time, which hath preceded, be it real, or imaginary, you wil be ashamed to see so many millions of years, wherein you had not so much as the essence of a rush, of a butterflie, or a silly gnat. That Rodomont, who threatneth to hew down mountains, & thunder-strike mortals, and thinks all the ample house of Nature was created onely for him, who swalloweth the world by avarice, and wastes it as fast by riot, thirty or forty years ago was not able to contend for excellency with a catter-piller. (c) What weakness, what confusion of humane essence! But thine (O Great God) hath no beginning: It hath seen all times unfolded from thy breast: It hath assigned them measure; and hath taken none from others for it self, but its Eternity. The beginning of the lives and reigns of all Cesars is reckoned, but of Gods years no man hath a register. He is neither young, nor old, ancient nor new: Content your self with saying, He is eternal.

(c) Hesterni quippe sumus, & ignoramus, quoniam sicut umbra dies nostri sunt super terram, Job 8. 9. Tertul. adver. Marc. l. 1. c. 8. Una & germana divinitas nec de novitate, nec de vetustate, sed de sua veritate censetur. Non habet tempus æternitas: omne enim tempus est. Deus si vetus est non erit, si est nequus non fuit.

3. The second point of our infirmity is, that after we have had being for a few years, we shall be (to speak according to the phrase of the world) an eternity in a tomb, as bodies confiscated by death, abandoned to worms, despoiled even to the bones, become dust, & consumed to be reduced into the mass of elements from whence we came. I affirm the soul is immortal, which many times serveth to immortalize its punishments. I affirm the body riseth again, although both being separated so long one from an other, no more make up a man. The Axiom of S. Bernard must be made good, Every man is reduced to be no longer a man. So many persons go daily in and out of the world, as smal drops of water into the seas. The ocean is no whit altered, either by their entrance in, or passage out. Seneca was astonished, how one could say there were Comets which presaged the death of great men. It is not credible (saith he) the universe should interest it self in the loss of particulars, yea, were it of Monarchs. We all bud forth like the leaf of a tree, and die as the leaf; neither our life, nor death any thing importeth this great All.

Humiliation of death.

Bernard. c. 3. de anima. In non hominum vertitur omnis homo. Esse quicquam in terris tam magnum, quod perire mundus sciat? Senec. l. 4. natur. qq. c. 1.

Behold, that which much abaseth the pride of the most vain-glorious, is, to think upon a beer, & tomb, and reflect on that ample grave, whereinto all mankind insensibly sinketh. That is it which Job called, the stone of darkness. That, which the Ancients named, the secret of horror. The greatest Princes of the earth resemble Alexanders stone, the most excellent of the world in the brightness of lustre: but so soon as it was covered with dust, it had neither force nor beauty beyond other stones. How great, rich, active soever they be, the dust of a sepulcher makes it appear they are nothing. But God alone hath immortality without dependence, because he is what he is. All that which may be, and not be, hath ever some time assigned when it was not, or wherein it shall no more be. One may at the least find an imaginary time, when the most eminent Powers were nothing, and for so much as concerneth men, it is no difficult matter to give them limits, to which, and in which they no longer shall be men: But of God alone we may truly say, his years not onely decrease not, but know not what is to increase. For the Eternity of God (to speak properly) is very long, and very short; very long in extent, for it spreadeth over all Ages; very short, because in an instant it possesseth all it can have in the infinity of times, being ever like the center of a circle, which looketh towards all the lines without stirring out of one place.

Lapidem caliginis. Job. 28. 3. Secretarium horroris.

Tu autem idem ipse es, & anni tui non deficient. Sæcula cuncta venient, ante omnia sæcula solus. Novatiani l. de Trin. c. 31.

4. Our third Annihilation is, that we have much more non-essence, then essence, according to Plato's argument: because if we have the essence of a man, we have not therefore the essence of Heaven, of earth, creatures, nor plants, although some similitude thereof. We are confined, and limited within a particular essence which comprehendeth a soul ignorant & unsatiable, a body feeble and frail; a strange connexion of a nature mortal and immortal; an alliance of a ray of the sun with a dung-hil, of a spirit prompt and subtile, with most infirm flesh. But God, who is, what he is, containeth in himself all possible essences, and which is more, containeth them under the sole form of the Divinity. The world is bright in the light of stars, resplendent in flames, subtile in air, streaming in eternal veins of rivers, stable on the foundation of the earth, rich in mines; fruitful in plants, displayed in flowers, and all because it is a world, and it a creature: but God in one sole indivisible, and under one sole form, concludeth the fervour of Seraphins, the science of Cherubins, the majesty of Dominations, the height of Thrones, the excellency of Principalities, the strength of Virtues, the superintendence of Arch-angels, the charitable offices of Angels, the greatness of Heaven, the beauty of stars, the splendor of lights, the activity of fire, the subtlety of air, the fruitfulness of earth, the eternal freshness of fountains, and all we may call great, beautiful, or pleasing. God, I say, comprehendeth them under this great title, I am that I am. That is it which made S. Augustine say: This and that is good: Take away this and that when you speak of God; and behold

Man hath more non-essence, then Essence.

Excellency of the simplicity and universality of God, in comparison of the world.

Ego sum qui sum. Bonum hoc, & bonum illud; tolle hoc & illud, & vide ipsum bonum si potes: sic Deum videbis non alio bono bonum, sed bonum omnis boni. Aug. l. 8. de Trinit. c. 3.

the Sovereign Good: so shal you see God, who is not good by a borrowed goodness, but the Good of all good.

Maximus Tyrius. Ora. de Deo. In Deo non aliud nisi Deus.

This first essence is lovely (said Maximus of Tyre:) And verily it is the chief of beauties. But how think you, is it lovely, like a meadow all strewed over with flowers, or as Heaven all enamelled with stars? Take away this meadow, these flowers, this Heaven, these stars, God is nothing of all created things, but it is he from whom all creatures derive being, beauty, goodness, force, unity, and lasting. I well know what he is not, but cannot say what he is. I am satisfied in speaking with S. Bernard: In the great God all is God, and there is not any thing in him, which is not himself.

S. Bernard. de consider. l. 5.

Finally our fourth misery is, that our essence being so short and slender, faileth not to be afflicted with so many mutations, so many vicissitudes, that we may say, there is almost nothing less in us, than our selves. All change (saith the Philosopher) beareth with it some image of non-essence, and therefore we who change every moment, are (as it were) nothing in nature to be trusted to. It is not known with what knot, with what chains men should be tied, or fettered, so variable, and inconstant these Proteuses are. Ages alter us, and in changing us, change themselves. Infancy becometh adolescency, adolescency is taken off by youth, youth by manhood, manhood by declining years, and those years by decrepit age. If you reckon well, you shal find every one of these mutations, is a species of death.

Mutability of men.

As time alters our bodies, a thousand other things make impression on our minds. Humours, passions, conversations, customs, accidents, vices, and virtues, so often transform us into other men, that one may say, we are the most natural pourtraicts of inconstancy in universal Nature. There is none but God can say: I am the God, who changeth not. There is not any the least shadow of vicissitude in the great abyss of light; as he is one without number, infinite without limits, eternal, free from floud and ebbe of time, so he is immoveable without augmentation or diminution. He stands immoveable within himself, and reneweth all various nature out of himself. He takes nothing of men, which he gave them not. Essence, is proper to him, as eternal to him.

Ego Dominus & non mutor. Malach. 3. 6. In se manens innovat omnia, & nihil accipit quod ipse non dedit, esse illi quod est semper-num, semper est propri-um. S Leo. ep. 93. c. 5.

It is a maxim in Theology, that simple forms, which of themselves constitute a Person, make no difference between the subject and nature; that is to say, God is his Deity, his life, his eternity, and all he is, without diversity. It is for things composed of divers pieces to be susceptible of any forms; and consequently of sundry mutations: But God being from all eternity a most pure Act, as he hath not any thing but himself, can have no difference with himself: He hath nothing in himself better than himself: He hath no part eminent one above another. For he is without parts; and all that agreeth to him under this title; I am what I am.

Non sui aliquid optimum, habet unum optimum, totus S. Bernard. l. 5. de consider.

5. If you are not yet satisfied enough enneerning the greatness of this sovereign Being, and demand something more particular, the Word will tell you in S. John what he learned in the bosom of his Father: God is spirit. All substance in the world, or above the world is spirit or body: but as the body is base and abject, so beauty, strength, power, abideth in the power and jurisdiction of spirit: It is the spirit which doeth all; which animateth, which acteth, which quickeneth, which governeth all the instruments of nature; which worketh great miracles in little bodies, and hath nothing so admirable, as it self. The better part in us is spirit; and God is nothing but spirit; all spirit, all intelligence, all reason, all light, (said S. Irenaus.) But what spirit, but God the Father and Creatour of spirits; who is as much exalted above the highest intelligences, as spirits are above bodies.

Deus spiritus est. Joan 4. Beauty of spirit.

Totus spiritus & mentis, & totus ratio, & totus lumen. Iren. l. 2. c. 56.

Our spirits resemble the fire of this inferiour region, a gross, and material fire, which cannot here live, unless you put it to wood, cole, grease, or such like. But the spirit of God is like the fire near to the celestial globes, which Philosophers hold to be tenfold more subtile than air, and not to stand in need of any nourishment in its sphere, but from its self.

If we consider the four perfections which give us a full Idæa of the divine Essence, to wit, infinity, immensity, immutability, eternity, this great Spirit possesseth them by title of essence. Strive not to comprehend him, for he is infinite. Infinite not in a certain manner, not by comparison of one thing with another; not in posibility, but absolutely, actually infinite: as an ample, and most glorious treasure of all offences, and perfections. Assign him no limits, for he is immeasurable, and extended through all measures without measure; not by a local extent, but an indivisibility of presence. He is high and immense. He is in the whole universe without confinement. He is out of all the universe, without any exclusion from it.

Perfections of God. Magnitudinis ejus non est finis. Psal. 145. Excelsus, & immensus. Baruc. 4. Intra omnia sed non inclusus, extra omnia sed non exclusus. Isidor. de summo bono. c. 2.

Represent him not to your self under many forms, if you desire to figure him in his Nature, for he is immutable. Enquire not of his age, for it exceedeth eternity, such as you may imagine it, The present day passeth not with him, and yet he is in it, since all things are in him.

Non peragitur in eo hodiernus dies, & tamen peragitur, quia in eo sunt ista omnia. August. 1. Confess c. 9. Sanctimonia, & magnificentia in sanctificatione ejus. Psal. 95. 9.

But if we regard the three excellencies, which in your opinion more concern divine manners, to wit Wisdom, Goodness, and Sanctity; I not only affirm he is wise, but I say he is the abyss which swalloweth all wisdoms: I do not only say he is good, but the source of goodness, nature & bounty; a source never emptied but into it self & which continually streameth out of it self: I do not only say he is holy, but the root, the object, the example, & form of all sanctities

Finally, if we behold the eminencies which illustrate him, in respect of the eye he hath over exteriour things, as are power, jurisdiction, providence, justice and mercy; this Spirit is so powerful, that he can all, but impotency; so predominate, that there is not any thing from heaven to hell, which boweth not under his Laws; so provident, that he hath a care of the least butterfly in the ayr, as well as of the highest Cherubin of the Empyreal Heaven; so just, that his ballance propendeth neither to one side nor other; so merciful, that he pardoneth all. O great God! Great Spirit! How terrible art thou to our understandings, and how amiable to our wils! Thou commandest by words, thou ordainest by reason, thou accomplishest by virtue all which is, and giving birth to all things, only reservest to thy self Eternity. Let it not then be strange, if strucken with those rays which dazled the eyes of Seraphins, we yield to thy greatness, and rather choose to enter by love into thy knowledg, than by knowledg into thy love.

6. Let us also in conclusion reflect on this munificent Spirit, who repleniseth all the world with his bounty, spreading it over all creatures with incomparable sweetness. Do you not think you behold the great Ocean, which incessantly furnisheth the ayr with vapours, and waters for all the earth, dividing himself to so many objects, yet perpetually entire in his greatness, & ever regular in the measure of his eternal passages. He is singular in essence, but very divers in his titles and effects; and making his circuit round about the world, every one gives him names after his own manner. Some call him Indian, others Persian some Arabick, some Ethiopian, and some Britanick; others others surname him with epithets quite different, every one deviseth what he list, and in the mean time he ceaseth not perpetually to pass on his way, and not content to encompass the whole Earth as with a girdle, he cleaveth the mountains of Calpe from Abyla (those famous pillars of Hercules) to enter thereinto, and bedew the world with his pleasing streams. He runs a long way, he makes a great circuit; he advanceth delicious Islands in the midst of his bosom: one while he swelleth upon one side, presently retireth back from another. He is angry, he is pacified: he bears and swalloweth vessels: he engulphs earth, he killeth flames; he sometimes by long wandering passages goeth under the world, and purifying his waters, distilled through those large sources, maketh fountains and rivers to moisten mortals. And, that nothing may be wanting to his greatness, he mounts up to Heaven, there to beget clouds, and entertain store-houses of waters, as in Cobweb lawn, to give afterward the spirit of life to trees, to plants, and all the productions of nature. Oh how admirable is he! Yet is all this but a silly drop of dew in comparison of the divine Essence. God who is all in all things, being not able to be sufficiently known by us, in the simplicity of his Essence, is called by many names, signified by an infinite number of figures, represented in divers attributes, and inexplicable excellencies: Yet say we all we can of him, we affirm he never is so well esteemed, as when we account him wholly incomprehensible: He not onely environeth the world with his presence, but beareth it within his arms, and bosom: He formeth it in his Idæa's, he accommodateth it in his dispose, he penetrateth it by his virtue, maintaineth it by his wisdom, and establisheth it by his power. He is without, yet not excluded from it; he is within, yet not contained; he is under, yet not drenched, he is above, yet not advanced. He confirmeth Scepters and Crowns, he raiseth Cities, Provinces, and Monarchies, he erected States; he circumscribed laws, he directeth virtues, he enlightened stars in Heaven, he engraveth the beauty of flowers in the meadows; and travelleth throughout all nature, without taking pains; ever present, yet always unseen; ever in action, yet always in repose; ever searching, yet not needing any thing; ever loving, yet never burning; ever amassing, yet never penurious; ever giving, yet never losing any thing; drawning to himself, yet hath nothing without himself. Good God, what say we, when we say GOD.

Yet thou (ô sinner!) thou yet wilt lift an armed hand against thy Lord, against a God omnipotent, who notwithstanding will not appear potent towards thee, but to do thee good. Blind and insensible fugitive from the sovereign Essence in the region of nothing, and whither wilt thou go, not to find the reproaches of thy crimes? A caytif pleasure, a wretched gain, a satisfaction of vengeance, dissolute company take God out of thy heart, to resign thee as a prey to thy passions. Thou wilt adore the favours of men, that are like the rain-bow in heaven, and which having made ostent of so many splendours, and varied paintings, leave us nothing but water and morter. Thou wilt build fortunes upon a foundation of quick-silver, upon a frail reed, upon a man, who beareth all the figures of vanity. Thou wilt seek for Paradise in the Capitol, as said Tertullian. Thou wouldst find sovereign beatitude in the Courts of great men, and perpetually estranged from heaven & the living God, thou graspest nothing but Chimæra's of honour, and feeble images of content. The strength of Pharaoh (saith the Prophet Isaiah) shall be thy confusion, and the confidence thou hast in the shadow of Ægypt, shall be the reproach of thy countenance.

Cœlum in Capitolio quæritis, aversi ab ipso Deo & cœlo. Apol. c. 4. Isaiah. 30. 3. Decalvare, & tondere super filios deliciarum tuarum. Mich. 1.

Shouldst thou not now forsake all thy superfluities? Oughst not thou to wear sack-cloth, and carry ashes of penance, having buried the children of thy delights (loves and vanities,) which so far transported thee into the forgetfulness of eternal blessings? If God be the Essence of Essences, why dost thou please thy self with making so many nothings, by committing sins without number, infidelities without consideration, and ingratitudes void of shame? If God be a Spirit, why holdest thou thy self perpetually fixed to carnal pleasures, which flatter to strangle thee? Look on worldly ambitions, and thou shalt see them bordered with precipices: Reflect on delights, and thou shalt find them strewed all-over with thorns: View the ways of sin, and thou there shalt observe nothing, but remorse. Ought not we at this time to resolve upon consideration of the greatness & goodness of God, to bear a reverence, and an eternal love towards him? a reverence, by faithfully keeping all his laws, and commandments, and holding his will more dear, than the apple of our eys; a love, by dayly offering our selves, if it were possible, a hundred times for him, in as many Sacrifices, as our soul hath thoughts, and body members? My God, make me from henceforth to enter into the bottom of my soul, and to silence all these troublesom creatures, all these inordinate passions, which so often bereave me of the honour of thy sight. Appease their storms, and surges, that I may silently speak to thee, and enter with thee into the great abyss of delights, which thou reservest for souls the most purified, that there I may be rapt in contemplation of thy bounties, may be absorpt in consideration of thy beauties, and may wholly dive into thy heart by sacred ardours of thy love.

The third EXAMPLE upon the third MAXIM.

Of the weakness of man, and inconstancy of humane things.

Drawn from Josephus, 18. book of his antiquities, and S. Luke. Act. 12.

AGRIPPA.

WHo saith Man, says all vanity: He is a wretched creature (affirms that Ancient) whom fortune tosseth as a tennis-ball, whom misery, and envy poize in a ballance, whom time despoyleth, death takes away, and of whom inconstancy makes a continual metamorphosis. He entreth into the world by the gate of sin, with a body as frail, as his spirit is barren: weakness of mortal members, and stupidity of heart are given him as a portion of his birth, and a necessity of his condition. If you (as yet) be not perswaded of this verity, and more esteem to confide in the world, and to frame to your self an arm of straw, then to seek support from him who sustaineth with three fingers of his power, the whole globe of the Earth, King Agrippa (of whom S. Luke maketh mention in the Acts of Apostles, and Josephus in the eighteenth book of his Antiquities) is able to give you a fair lesson of it.

Arist.

Bernard. l. 2. de consider. c. 9. Fragili corpore, mentis sterili, cui infirmitas corporis, facultas cordis cumulatur tradatur et sortis.

You have heard in the History of Herod, how this unnatural Prince put his two sons to death, lawfull children by the chast Mariamne. This Agrippa of whom I speak, son of the youngest, named Aristobulus, came into the world with great priviledges of nature, dexterous, courteous, amiable, pleasing, born to court and entertain the favour of the world, Judea was a Theater too streight for his great Spirit, he burnt with impatience to be seen in the Court of Tiberius Cæsar, where his mother was already become become gracious with one of the greateſt Princes of the Empire, Antonia, mother of the great Germanicus, and the Emperour Claudius. It was no hard matter for him to ſatisfie his deſire: For behold him preſently at the Court of Rome, where he cloſely adhered to the perſon of Druſus, the Emperour Tiberius his ſon, honoured by all the world as ſucceſſour of the Empire.

Amities of great men barren.

Agrippa ſo well knew how to gain this great Prince, by the ſweet charms of his converſation, that he could not live without him: but as Tyberius was a frugal man, ſuffering his ſon not to fall into any exceſs, ſo Druſus was full of free affection towards his favourite, the effects whereof were yet very ſlender. In ſuch ſort, that Agrippa entertaining correſpondence with the ſon of ſo great an Emperour, more pleaſing than profitable for him, dayly conſumed as the butter-flyes in the flames of this greatneſs; ſo profuſe was his expence above his ability. The mother was extreamly troubled at it, and reſtrained (what ſhe might) her ſons purſe; but he ever found ways to open it again, till ſuch time as ſhe dying, and the ſon ſeeing himſelf at liberty, he flew into exorbitant expences, and became indebted a third, or a fourth part, more than he was worth.

A pretty touch of Lewis the twelfth, to Francis the firſt.

This is it which ordinarily overthroweth young men, who expect great fortunes, and mighty favours. They think to be preſently in the midſt of the City, when they afar off ſee the hand of the dyal. They ſuppoſe they poſſeſs bleſſings, which will never be had; they promiſe, are engaged, much turmoyl, and paſſionately hoping, ruin all their hopes. Behold a little the goodly ſupport may be expected from men of the world. Druſus the Emperours ſon, who bare all glory in bloom, is taken into the other world, without making any mention at all of his favourite: Agrippa falls from the chariot of favour, and found there was nothing got by the ſervice of his Maſter, but debts, and diſcontents.

Affliction of a Courtier fruſtrated of his hopes.

He reflects on the father, to ſee if any ray of compaſſion will dart from his eyes: But Tiberius commanded him to be gone from the Court, ſaying for a full reaſon, he could not endure to look on what his ſon had loved, without renovation of his memory, and grief. The young Prince returneth into Judea, where, though the grand-child of a great King, he found himſelf ſo needy, that he wiſhed to die, not having wherewith to live.

Poverty the chief ſcourge.

There is nothing more bitter to men of quality, amongſt all the ſcourges of the world, then poverty, which ever draweth along with it four evil companions, dependence upon another, contempt, ſhame, and miſery. This generous heart thought that death would better his condition: But Cypre his wife, a good Princeſs, chaſed away his melancholy humour, and deſcending ſo low, as the ſhame of begging for him, procured ſome little money, that he the more ſweetly might paſs this miſerable life: for verily he ſometimes lived at Herod the Tetrarchs charge, ſometime upon Flaccus, Lievtenant of Syria. But this kind of life being beggarly, and waited on with much reproach, he grew impatient, and reſolved to return to Rome, to bury himſelf in the ſhadow of favour, ſince he could not touch the body of it. The poor Princeſs his wife, ſeeing there was not any would lend him mony, unleſs ſhe bound her ſelf for him, did it courageouſly, expoſing her perſon to all the perſecutions of creditours, to help her husband.

Loyalty of a wife to her huſband.

Miſeries of a man indebted.

But a man much indebted is like one poſſeſſed, round beſet with a Legion of devils, no ſooner went one out, but ten tormented him. Agrippa ſaw himſelf aſſaulted by creditours, Provoſts, and Sergeants, which more terrified him than arms, or warlike Engines. The moſt powerfull of them all, was a Controuler of the Emperours houſe, who required a huge ſum of money from him, whereof he was accountable to Tiberius his Exchequer. To this he anſwered very coldly, he was ready to ſatisfie, if he pleaſed to be patient but till the next day: but that night, he ſtole away, and went towards Rome, to draw more near to the flame muſt burn him. Notwithſtanding before his coming, he wrote to Tiberius, who was in his Iſland of Caprea, to ſound the likelyhood of his welcome. The Emperour who long before had his wound throughly skinned, for the death of his Son, wrot back again very courteouſly, giving him aſſurance of welcome; and the truth is, he found Tiberius, who entertained him with extraordinary favour, and lodged him in his palace. All his buſineſſes went well, had it not been this Controuler, (whoſe ſhadow he ſtill ſaw before his eyes) wrote ſpeedily to the Emperour, That Agrippa was endebted to his Exchequer in great ſums, which he had promiſed to diſcharge preſently, but fled like a faithleſs man, and diſcovered by his proceedings there was nothing but impoſture in his actions.

Generous act of Antonia.

This unlucky letter at the firſt deſtroyed all his credit. For the old man, who for all his friendſhip was reſolved not to looſe a denier, cauſed him ſhamefully to pack out of his palace, and forbad his Guards, to admit him any entrance before he had ſatisfied his creditours.

The miſerable Agrippa, ſeeking out a God of money to make his vows unto, went directly without any fear to the Princeſs Antonia to acquaint her with his misfortune, and beg her favour. The Lady was ſo generous, and bountifull towards him, that ſhe diſcharged the debt, lending him money in remembrance of his dead mother, and for that he had been breed with her ſon Claudius, beſides ſhe took ſingular pleaſure in his humour.

Flattery of Agrippa.

This man whoſe fortune ebbed and flowed, ſaw himſelf ſuddenly raiſed, ſo that entring into amity with Caſar, he made a ſtreight league with Caligula, by the expreſs commandments of Tiberius, who appointed he ſhould follow him. Theſe were two notable ramblers, whom chance had ſo very well coupled together, as well for conformity of their humours, as the encounter of their hopes. They began a life wholly ſportive, not thinking on the time to come, but to hope well of it, nor dreaming of any thing, but that which might make them merry.

Agrippa perſiſting in his ordinary delights, undertook one day as he went in coach with Caligula to ſpeak of Tiberius, ſaying, That he was as old as the earth, and that it ſeemed death had forgotten him: That it was high time he payd tribute to nature; as for himſelf, he wiſhed nothing elſe in the world, but quickly to ſee Caligula, Prince of the world in his place, well knowing he ſhould lay hold on a good portion of the felicities which all men were to have under his Empire. He found not, that Caligula, although ardently deſirous to ſee himſelf ſuddenly Maſter, ſhewed to take any pleaſure in this diſcourſe, ſo much he feared the Emperour Tiberius. He kept his thoughts in his heart, not truſting his tongue with them, leaſt ſtones and buſhes might have ears.

It happened by chance, that Eutyches Agrippa's coach-man heard all his Maſter ſaid, and was ſome ſpace of time without ſhewing any appearance of it, but afterward being brought before the Provoſt of the City, at his Maſter Agrippa's requeſt, for a pilfery committed by him him in his house, he said he had many other things to speak, which concerned the Emperours life, whereupon the Provost carried him to Capree, where Tiberius plunged in his infamous pleasures was sometime without seeing him. Agrippa who would needs excuse himself before he was accused, wholly forgetting the discourse he had held with Caligula, earnestly pressed this servant might be heard, so far as therein to employ the credit of Antonia, who was very powerful with Tiberius. The Emperour answered, Agrippa need not fret himself so much in this affair, and that it might perhaps be too soon decided for him. This put more disturbance upon him then he had before, so that to satisfie him, Eutyches needs must be sent for, who urged his accusation very coldly, upon which Tiberius who spake but half a word, and said nothing to Macro Captain of the Guards, but Take, take him, neither naming whom, nor how. Macro that thought not of him at all, who was spoken of in this business, stood much amazed, not knowing whom he meant, which made the Emperour repeat the word again in choler, saying plainly: I command you seize on the person of Agrippa, so that instantly he was taken almost in Caligula's arms, and put to the chain before the Palace-gate, with other Criminals brought thither.

His Prison.

It was then very hot weather, and he being extreme thirsty, saw a servant of Caligula's named Thaumastus, passing along, who carried a Pitcher of water; he called him, entreating he might drink; which the other presenting with much courtesie, he having drunk said: Assure thy self, I will one day well pay thee for this glass of water thou hast given me; if I get out of this captivity, I will make thee great.

Strange prediction.

Thereupon leaning to a tree, an Owl in a strange manner perched over his head, which a certain prisoner (an Almaign by Nation) a great Southsayer perceiving, foretold him (as Josephus relateth) that this bird would prove a good Augur, and that he should overcome all his affairs: but when he saw her the second time, let him expect death within 5 days. Note that these kind of predictions proceed from a cunning sleight of the Devil, nor are their issues ever very prosperous for such as look after them.

Notwithstanding Agrippa seeing himself in this condition, despaired not of his fortune, he is carried to prison, the good Princess Antonia (whose heart was transfixed) not daring in any sort to speak to Tiberius for him, whose humours she too wel understood. All she could do was to recommend him to the Captain, that he might be well used & lodged, to let him take the baths, & have some indifferent keepers.

He remained there some space with much anxiety, when one day as he entred into the baths, Marsyas one of his servants brought him news of Tiberius his death, whispering it in his ear in Hebrew, to this purpose, The Lion is dead The Centurion who guarded him, seeing them talk together in great secret, would needs have his share, and understanding what it was, became so joyful that he merrily supped with his prisoner. Yet other reporting this bruit was false, the Centurion entred into such inraged choler, that finding Agrippa in his bead, he made him arise, fettered him, thought to kill him, for the displeasure he conceived to have so easily witnessed the joy of his heart. But his anger was soon appeased, the death of Tiberius being most certain.

Admirable change of virtue.

Caligula his successour burnt with desire to go instantly to Rome to deliver his good friend: but Antonia counselled him not so much to hasten this affair, least it might be thought he did it to brave the decrees of the deceased; which he found to be discreet advice. Behold the cause why after some days were past, he gave the royal purple, and diadem with his own hands to our Agrippa, adding thereunto a chain of gold, of like weight with that of iron, wherewith Tiberius had fettered him, and caused him to sway in Judea, giving him the Kingdom of Philippis in its whole extent. A year after he got leave of the Emperour to visit his Kingdom, where every one beheld him with much amazement, seeing him return with a Crown, in that place where he had been reduced almost to beggery. Wherefore not to be ungrateful for benefits received from God, he offered his gold chain in the Temple, and made Thaumastus, who gave him the cup of water, Controller of his house; such power hath a slight good turn well placed over a generous soul.

When he had reigned about four years, Caligula, the little God of his felicity, after a general inundation of all the vices in the world, is slain by Chereas, which taught him, great men of the earth are weak reeds, that in an instant fall by the breath of God. Every one thought his whole fortune was ruined; but the Emperour Claudius his Successour, with whom being young he had been bred, set him above wind and tempest, adding to what Caligula gave him, all Judea and Samaria.

Behold how the Kingdom in the end returned to the race of Mariamne, of which it had been dispossessed, and how Providence rendreth insensibly, a justice most sensible. Agrippa seeing himself unexpectedly so exalted, endeavoured all he could to gain the love of his people, to entertain justice, and commerce, to raise goodly buildings, and to prepare at certain times publick sports and recreations. But let us still pursue at the heels this frail greatness of men, which having touched the Stars, is lost in abysses. This unfortunate Prince so much desired to become acceptable to his Jewish people, that through excess of this thirst, he embarqued in an ill business. For being arrived at Jerusalem, at the time when the Church began, which was outragiously persecuted by the Jews, to please them, he cut off the head of S. James, brother of Saint John, and at the same instant caused S. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, to be taken, whom he fettered with heavy chains, of purpose very speedily to sacrifice him to the rage of the giddy multitude, had he not been delivered miraculously by the help of an Angel.

But the unhappy Agrippa perpetually adhering to men, and not fearing to purchase their favours at the charge of innocent and sacred blood, soon found himself over-whelmed under the burthen of his greatness: to teach perfidious Princes, the great ruine of their fortunes often proceedeth from the persecution of the servants of Jesus Christ.

The seaventh year of his reign, setting forth magnificent Games at Cæsarea, the second day of the entertainments, he appeared in full Theater before the Ambassadours of Tyre and Sidon, in a robe of cloath of silver, on which the Sun reflecting his rays, he was presently beheld resplendent as a Star, and being about to open his mouth to make a speech, his flatterers began to cry out with loud applauses, It was the voice of a god, and not of man, wherwith he entred into a desperate vanity, and Josephus says, that at the same instant he saw the Owl, wherof the Southsaying impostour spake, which presaged his death, when suddenly he cried out to his Courtiers; Behold the God you have made, who ceaseth to be a man, you have placed me among the Immortal, but I go to take place among the dead.

He felt, whilest he spake this, the gripes of a violent lent Collick, which inforced him to be carried from the Theater to the Bed, and from the Bed to the Tomb. The rumour of his malady being divulged, the people conceived so great a grief thereat, that men, women, and children entred into his Chamber covered with hair-cloath, bewailing him, and praying for his health. He beholding them in the extremity of his pain, wept bitterly, bidding adieu to his family, and people: then remaining for the space of five days in extreme dolour, he yielded up his soul, to serve as an eternal example to posterity of man's weakness, and the inconstancy of humane things.

IV. MAXIM.

OF THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That our support should be from our selves, without expectation of any thing from the Providence of God.

THE HOLY COURT.

That the foundation of Humane life, subsisteth in the Providence of God.

The belief of a Providence is the sweetness of life.

IT is an unspeakable comfort to have the eys of God for witness of our sufferings, and when we in justice suffer with courage, to know our patience is inlightned with those aspects, which make them thrice happy, The valourous Champions, who contended in the Olympick Games, the spectacle heretofore of the whole world, in that proportion they felt their skin to smart, their blood to drop, their bones crack, were comforted to see upon one side, the Judges of their Combates sitting to consider their merit: and on the other, Crowns placed aloft before them, the lustre whereof reflected into their eys, to charm their pains by the hope of glory.

From thence we derive an undoubted Maxim, that it is an unspeakable comfort to the faithful, who indure some incommodities rough and thorny, to know there is an eye of Divine Providence, which not only seeth them, but becoming a pledge for their travels, promiseth to their perseverance assured recompence.

His Goodness.

2. I observe the admirable providence of God, in that being perpetually questioned by the diffident spirits of Libertines, it ever subsisteth, bearing in it's bosom who would destroy it; and which is more, is established by the proofs, wherewith they indeavour to ruine it. I at this present lay aside the reasons, which have so often been refuted. I speak nothing at all of the consent of the wise, of the Heaven's motions, of the necessary dependance of creatures, of the Architecture of the Universe, of the order and end of every thing, of miracles, of predictions, of spirits, of examples, and so many other arguments ordinarily used to prove Divine Providence. I only maintain one thing, which perhaps will seem strange, but is most undoubted, that the same reasons whereof the wicked make tropheys to evict this belief from the faithful, are Arrows which recoyl back upon themselves.

Manifest proof of Providence.

All that which makes them murmur, and cry out against the government of a Supreme Cause, is, that evils are seen in the world, which would not be, if a God, all good, all wise (as we affirm) took care of things temporal. To which I answer, we ought to believe a providence, since there is evil in the inferiour order of the world, which we inhabit, & the profit we derive from our evils, endeth in the knowledge of the sovereign good. For I ask, from whence know we evil to be evill, but by the existence of it's contrary? Had there never been health in the body, we had never known what sickness were: but when at any time we saw a man sound, fresh, and lusty, who suddenly lost his appetite and sleep, by reason of shakings and heats felt over all his body, he is said to be sick, because the order of the good constitution he before injoyed, is changed and over-thrown. Likewise, when we see some evil to happen in the world, we presently say, it is ill, because it is against the order of good: and therefore the very wicked who complain, cannot so do, but by affirming and acknowledging an order, from which this evil is wandered. Now wheresoever there is order, there is necessarily direction and providence, since we see one cannot so much as tell unto four, and reckon some number one after another without the help of reason. You commit a sin, and feel, it instantly brings some remorse with it: what teacheth

Providentia ab ratio ordinis remoti ad finem.

Rom. 7. 7. Peccatum non cognovi, nisi per legem. Nam concupiscentiam nesciebam nisi lex diceret: Non concupisces. Psal. 63. 8.

you it is sin, if not the Law? I entred not into the knowledge of sin, but by means of the Law. For I knew not what concupiscence was, if the Law had not told me: Thou shalt not covet, said the Apostle.

Now what is law, but an order, and a sovereign reason engrafted in intellectual nature, which commandeth, and ordaineth things that ought to be done, with expres prohibition of their contraries. What is it else but an eternal rule which guideth the world by the knowledge of do, and not do: an ordinance most holy, which prescribeth all honest things, and banisheth all vice.

Sagitta parvulorum facta sunt plagæ eorum, & infirmata sunt contra eos linguæ eorum.

From thence ensueth, we cannot complain of the least disorder, without confessing this eternal Providence, which establisheth all orders. O the wonders of God! who causeth the arrows of those who invade his wisdome, to return against such as shot them!

An answer made to complainers against Providence.

3. Some complain there are things poor and abject in nature, which are to no purpose; because bruitish man will not know their use, for fear he therein find his own ingratitude. They would have God make the world all of gold, as that Painter, who unable to pencil the beautiful Helen with so great diversity of parts, and conformity of members, filled his table with drapery, which seemed rich, but was little to the purpose. Who seeth not the truth of that singular axiom of S. Thomas, that never would there be perfect goodness in things created, were there not some order and degrees in the same goodness. All the grace and beauty of the world would be lost, if the multitude, and disproportion of so many things were taken away, which by an admirable discrepance, and discord infinitely agreeing, consent in the good of this great All: In this it is, wherein the musick of the great God consisteth, and you will disturb it: This is his Table diversified with many colours, and you will deface it: This is his Common-wealth, divided into sundry offices, and you will ruin it.

S. Tho. contr. Gentes. l. 3. c. 71. Perfectio bonitatis in rebus creatis non inveniretur, nisi esset ordo bonitatis.

Evils of nature.

After this so laudable diversity is blamed, the evils of nature are decried, serpents & poisons are exclaimed at, and all other creatures thought mischievous. Blind that you are, who see not, an evil well placed in the world, is not an evil. Fire which burneth straw, makes gold and silver shine: water which drowneth men, dayly gives life to fishes. If you take his poyson from the serpent, you bereave him wherewith to live: and what shal we say, that there may be found such among men, who have turned poyson into nutriment. Every creature is good for some use. Let us not then accuse the wisdome of the Creatour, but only correct our imprudence. Another, saith he, complains not there are evils, but they are ill disposed, since good men have the greatest part of them. It is an old quarrel, and which hath so many times been sufficiently refuted, with more vigour of reason, than correction in manners. The heavens, and stars are accused, when a good Prince hath lost a battle, and that having all his life time pursued innocency, ill success hath waited on his standards. Some complain that another, being so just, is plunged in a miserable suit, that the sea which drenched innocents, favoured Pyrates; that hail fell upon the field with crosses and benedictions; and that death sparing so many unprofitable and guilty heads, took away that excellent man in his prime. Ignorant that we are of the blessings, and evils of life! Have we then taken the character of Christianity under condition to be happy in all worldly occasions? It is reason since God gave us eternal blessings, he should likewise satisfy us in all these petty trifles? We say the just are not the more happy, because they do not always gain the most in play, and traffick, and that they are not the most favoured with good success in the world: as if a favourite fed with viands from the Kings own dish, should complain the King afforded him not the bread was distributed amongst his Dogs. We would that God having so charily taken us into his protection for our eternal salvation, should also charge himself to deliver us all our packets. This innocent (say you) is oppressed, and this wicked man is prosperous. How know you Gods counsels over both the one and other? This gold (saith S. Augustine) of one side is purified in the furnace, and on the other, that fish you thought happy, hath already the hook in his throat. God hath so long expected your penitence, and you cannot one moment reasonably wait on him. The decrees of his providence resemble letters written with the juice of a Limon, which never are read, but by the help of fire. That day when he shal come to Judge the World in flames, will make all appear, which the weakness of our wits cannot comprehend. But without expectation of so long a term, there needs but one Session; there needeth but the quarter of a mans life to teach many examples of divine Providence.

Let us stick still to the verity pronounced by the ancient gloss upon the book of Job: Temptation is not a night for elect souls, but an evening, which darkneth, not extinguisheth light. Let us cleave to the resolution, which Tertullian teacheth us: We have engaged our souls by a solemn oath to this warfare of tribulation. Let us not betray our faith, to betray our glory. The Ægyptian Thorne was ever esteemed in the contexture of Coronets, and still a sharp affliction patiently borne, hath been highly valued in the Diadem of constancy.

Glos. In Job. Tentatio in electis, non est nox sed vesperа, quia lucem obscurat, sed non extinguit. Tertul. ad Scapul. Animas nostras authorati in has pugnas accessimus.

Of the permission of sins.

4. If peradventure one spirit be convinced upon this article by a million of example, which shew, if virtue for a time hath been afflicted, yet God in the end crowneth it with immortal garlands; he fals upon the permission of sins, and you find Libertines so abominable, and unnatural, as to accuse God to have too much goodness and clemency to tolerate their disorders? Why doth man complain of the evil whereof he is the Authour? If a leg be lame, or crooked, the moving virtue which of it self giveth force and vigour, is not blamed, but the distortedness, and the debility of the part. Why do we not at least use God in the same manner? When we behold a deformed and exorbitant will, let us not say this great Mover commits this irregularity; for he ceaseth not to dispose all creatures to good, but confess the defect is the evil will, which resisteth its Creatour.

Homines magis subsunt ordinem divinæ Providentiæ, quam res naturales, quia propinquiùs ordinantur ad Deum, sicut ad finem. Hieron. Ferr. l. 1. de Triumpho crucis. c. 11.

What wrong doth God unto us, if he being Governour of this ample City, called the World, will not force any man, but gives every one leave to live according to his condition? He suffereth stones to abide in their own inclination, creatures in their instinct, men in their liberty. He ceaseth not to teach them good, to prescribe and give them means to perform it, and if they do otherwise, they derive from their evils, either justice or repentance. What wrong then doth he, if he make man free, to become the more like himself.

Faustus. Reg. l. 2. de Grat. This Authour hath been opposed upon the point of Grace: but he may be favourably interpreted upon many things, since he was afterward reputed holy, as Baronius saith.

Have you not seen the notable discourse written by Faustus Bishop of Rheggio, where Wisdom, Power, Bounty, and Justice, plead before God one against another, touching mans liberty. Power feared, if he were let loose, he might abuse this free-will to his own ruin, and said, he must give all except the power to undo himself: but in the end it was concluded that that which was best and most excellent, should be granted him, to wit, liberty not to be thrown into into the world like the ſtock of a tree, but have leave to do good and ill, that his extraction might be rendred the more elate, and his actions the more glorious: That power would make him more noble; wiſdom, prudent; goodneſſe aſſiſt him in his combats, and juſtice crown him in his victories.

Talem faciamus quem in dexteram partem non trahat neceſſitas, ſed voluntas, qui malum ratione intelligat, bonum virtute perficiat. Talem faciamus cui bonitas in natura, malicia ſit extra naturam, &c. S. Tho. contra Gent. l. c. 7. Bonum totius præmittet bono partis. Ad prudentem igitur gubernatorem pertinet negligere aliquem defectum bonitatis in parte, ut faciat augmentum bonitatis in toto.

Such let us make him, ſaid Wiſdom, that he may haſten to the choice of the better part, not of neceſſity, but of meer good will, that he underſtand evil by reaſon, and do good through virtue. Such let us make him, that goodneſs may appear in his nature, and malice out of his nature. Such let us make him, that he may have good in will, and evil in power: And the firſt ground of his glory may be the power of ſin, and the will not to act it.

Were it a matter very reaſonable think you, that God ſhould ceaſe to do good, becauſe man would take occaſion to do ill? Know we not it is a maxim of well ordered policy, never to neglect the publick for inconveniencies, and defects of ſome particulars. We are not ignorant, free-will is one of the moſt excellent treaſures of reaſonable nature, & why ſhould God deprive his workmanſhip of it, under colour that ſome particulars would abuſe it? Ought we not to content our ſelves to behold in the hiſtories of all the Nations of the world, how God purſueth, chaſtiſeth, deſtroyeth both evil, and evil men, ſometimes openly, ſometimes covertly, to reward good men in the end, and reſtore virtue to her throne, of which the inſolency of the wicked ſeeks to diſpoſſeſs them. Let us then for this reaſon adore the Providence, and acknowledg the propoſition I here have proved, that the diſorders condemned in nature, averr, there is a firſt order and a primitive rule, without which nothing can be well diſpoſed.

Foundation of the verities of Divine PROVIDENCE.

Maxims of Providence. Tuſillum, & magnum ipſe fecit, & æqualiter illi cura eſt de omnibus, Sap. 6. Nonne duo paſſeres aſſe venient, &c. Matth. 10. In ipſo vivimus, movemur & ſumus, Act. 17. (a) Ὅλος ἐν ὅλῳ κύκλῳ ἐπίσκοπος. Clem. Alex. (b) S. Dion. de Cæl. Hier. c. 4. πάντα τὰ ὄντα μετέχει προνοίας (c) Auguſt. de Trin. l. 3. c. 4. Nihil fit ſenſibiliter, & viſibiliter quod non de interiore inviſibili, atque intelligibili ac ſummi Imperatoris, aut jubeat aut permittatur.

THere remaineth, having ſuccinctly refuted the objections of prophane ſouls, to inſtruct and ſettle the faithful in this belief, which is one of the greateſt conſolations of life; and for which cauſe I affirm the doctrine of Providence is grounded upon Scripture, upon holy Fathers, and upon reaſon: Upon the Scripture, which give us aſſurance in ſo many places.

Wiſdom plainly telleth us, That God made little and great; and as there is nothing ſo vaſt, may eſcape his Immenſity, ſo there is not any thing ſo ſmall, which is deprived the bleſſings of his bounty. His Providence governeth all things from the beginning of the world, and ceaſeth not to diſintangle this great web of Ages. The tree loſeth not one of his leaves, the head one of its hairs, the air one little bird, without his ordinance, as the Eternal Word teacheth us. We derive life, motion, and being from his boſome, in which he beareth us without wearineſs, and preſerveth us without loathing. All the world is a large (a) dioceſs, whereof he is the Biſhop, and eternal Prelate, who indefatigably watcheth over his flock, as ſaith Clemens Alexandrinus. (b) So ſoon as a creature is in being, it is moiſtened with ſources of the divine Providence, ſaid S. Dionyſius. And according to the opinion of S. Auguſtine, (c) Nothing is ſenſibly and viſibly done in the world, which cometh not from the interiour, inviſible, and intelligible cabinet of this great Monarch, whether it be commanded, or permitted.

Now obſerve, this divine Providence is compoſed of three heads; Knowledge, Diſpoſition, and Government. Knowledge ſeeth and conſidereth all things: Diſpoſition ordaineth the connexion of parts, and correſpondency both of the one, and other. Government embraceth all things which concern the end, as well to divert the obſtacles, as advance the progreſſions. God hath all theſe three points supereminently. For as for knowledge, it is moſt perfect, as we will preſently demonſtrate. Diſpoſition is ſuch, that all the whole univerſe in all its parts is ruled like a paper with Muſick lines. Which made Syneſius ſay, (d) the world was the harp of God, and the divers orders of nature were the ſtrings of it. And Junilius an African biſhop, who flouriſhed in the ſixth Age, diſcourſing very ſubtlely upon this ſubject, ſhews the relation there is between the civil world and nature, comparing the ſeven daies of the week, with the ſeven ages of the world. The government of it is ſo perpetual and viſible, that Ariſtotle himſelf (e) confeſſeth, the communication of the firſt being, maintained all creatures in ſtate, and that without its benigne influences, this great All would return to nothing.

(d) Syneſius Hym. 4. Ἀλλ' οὗ ὑμὴν ἀπαύστου μάλα, μέλουσι. Junilius in Geneſim, niſi ſit Beda. (e) Ariſt. Epiſt. de principio.

6. But if you ask upon what foundation of reaſon this doctrine is built, I anſwer, it is ſupported by four powerful columnes; Science, Goodneſs, Juſtice, and the Power of God. His Science is infinite, and incomprehenſible. For he moſt diſtinctly beholdeth all things which have been, are, ſhall be, and may be, in their proper eſſence, which is the efficient, final, exemplar, and fundamental cauſe of them. You muſt not require how this divine Spirit may ſuffice ſo many things; ſince all things in compariſon of him, are no more then a drop of dew compared to the Ocean. He knows all, becauſe he created all; becauſe the world is no world by any other reaſon, but that God hath known it was a world. The vapours of the earth never weary the ſun, it could not breath forth ſo much, if he digeſted not more: ſo the knowledge of all objects of the world cauſe no wearineſs in God, becauſe all therein is finite, and his ſcience is, as is his eſſence, infinite.

The foundations, & four pillars of it. Knowledg of God. Pſalm. 146. Sapientiæ ejus non eſt numerus. Deus in omnia ſufficit. Diſſimulator, & prævaricator perſpicaciæ ſuæ non eſt. Tertul. l. de pœnit. c. 1.

7. To this ſcience is joined a great goodneſs, which is the cauſe God loved all he created, and conſerveth it with a certain tenderneſs of affection, and ineſtimable ſweetneſs. The Empire of man ordinarily is harſh, and violent. He diverteth the courſe of waters, he dryes up fountains, he ſubmitteth Lions to the yoak, he placeth turrets on the backs of Elephants, he changeth metals, he counterfeits precious ſtones, he ſophiſticateth total nature to accommodate it to his pretenſions: but God not forcing the inclinations of things created, applyeth himſelf to each according to the qualities of its eſſence. He ſhineth with the ſun, and burneth with the fire. He makes ſhowers with the clouds, pearls with the ſhells, the dew of heaven, gold, and fruits with the earth.

His goodneſs.

We underſtand there are three ſtreamings of this bounty: the one by generation, the other by ſpiration, and the laſt by creation. The two firſt are eternal, the laſt is temporal, by which he drew the world out of nothing, and having produced it, maintains it both in general and particular, affording even to the leaſt fly, all accommodation according to its nature, and condition. He is not like thoſe Oſtriches, which lay their eggs on the ſand without hatching them: but compareth himſelf to the Hen in the Goſpel, which toileth and laboureth inceſſantly, either to hatch, feed or train up her young ones: ſhe waxeth lean, ſhe famiſheth her ſelf, becomes angry, briſtles up her ſelf for her precious brood, and taketh that upon her for love, which ſhe cannot have by nature. It is a ſhadow of the goodneſſe of God, who ceaſeth not to provide for our neceſſities, to love us as his children, to defend us as the apple of his eye. I was (ſaid he by his Prophet) as the foſter-father of my people. I bare them all between my arms, they never vouchſafing to open their eyes to my protection. Yet will I draw them to me by the bands of Adam, which are the chains of my charity.

Hoſea. 11. Et ego quaſi nutritius Ephraim portabam eos in brachiis meis, & neſciebant, quod curarem eos. In funiculis Adam trahebam eos, in vinculis charitatis, Exod. 2.

Behold in Exodus the little Moſes who floateth on Nilus in a cradle of reeds: the mother for fear of the rigour of men abandoneth him to death, the ſiſter followeth him with her eyes to ſee what will become come of him: but her weakneſs could do nothing to warrant him from danger. God in the mean ſpace becomes the Pilot of this little Barque, he conducteth it without ſails, without rudder, without oars, he bears it upon the waves, he makes it arrive at a good haven. He draweth out this Infant, who was as a Victim expoſed, to make of him a God of Pharaoh, one day to drown in the red Sea the poſterity of thoſe, who would have drenched him in Nilus.

His Juſtice

8. Add to this immenſe goodneſs, juſtice, an inſeparable virtue of the Divinity, which ſeems to oblige God to preſerve and direct what he created. But it is to judge moſt abjectly of this divine underſtanding, to ſay as did Averroes, he abuſed his magnificence, and ſoyled his dignity, if he buſied himſelf in the manage of ſo many trifles. S. Ambroſe judged better when he ſaid; If God wrong himſelf in the government of the world, did he not himſelf a greater injury in creating it? For to do, or not to do, what one is not obliged unto, hath no injuſtice in it; but to abandon a creature, after it is produced, is a ſtain of inhumanity. And if we regard the juſtice, which appertaineth to the government of men; what malignity and proſtitution of mind were it to think, ſouls the moſt native, having ſome ſpark of juſtice, yet God (who muſt be ſovereign perfection) would ſuffer the world to be expoſed to fortune, or delivered over to tyranny, as a prey and a booty, without any care of it, or inquiry into injuſtices? There is not any Age which could not furniſh out a million of proofs againſt the miſchievous beliefs, if we would open our eys to conſider them, but our diſtruſts and puſillanimities blind us, and alienate us from knowledge of thoſe truths, which God reſerveth for the moſt purified ſouls.

Amb. l. 1. offic. c. 13. Si injuria eſt regere, nulli major injuria fuiſſe quam aliquid non feciſſe, nulla ſit injuſtitia, non curare quod feceris. Summa inclemantia.

His Power

9. To conclude, the laſt column which ſhould ſettle our faith in the verity of Divine government, is the magiſtral power God exerciſeth over all the world, which he ruleth, tempereth, and directeth with one ſole thought; much otherwiſe then did heretofore thoſe practick wits, who vaunted to animate Statues, becauſe they by certain engines gave them motion. Wretched and blind that we are, ever bowed down to the earth, and perpetually deveſted of thoſe great lights of Saints! We meaſure God by the ell of men, we cloath him after our faſhion, and we hold impoſſible to the Divinity, what our underſtanding cannot comprehend. Shall we never ſay with the Prophet Jeremiah: O moſt ſtrong! O only great, and only potent! the God of Hoſts is thy name. Thou art great in thy counſels, incomprehenſible in thy cogitations, and thy eys are upon all the ways of the children of Adam.

Ὁ θεὸς πάντων τὴν κίνησιν τῷ κόσμῳ. Ariſt. l. de mundo.

Hier. 32. 19. Fortiſſime, magne, & potens! Dominus exercituum nomen tibi, magnus conſilio, & incomprehenſibilis cogitatu, cujus oculi aperti ſunt ſuper omnes vias filiorum Adam.

We daily ſee upon men, who are but worms of the earth, ſo many tokens of God's power. A King ſpeaketh, and a hundred thouſand ſwords haſten out of ſcabbards at the ſound of one ſyllable. A Maſter of a family builds, and at one ſilly beck, behold ſo many Artificers, ſo many Mules and Horſes, ſome draw materials out of the bottom of Quarries, others carry them in waggons, ſome make morter and cement, others hew ſtones, ſome raiſe them aloft, others lay them, ſome play the Carpenters, and others poliſh marbles. There are ſome who work in iron, and others in braſs: all is done to the liking of one man, who is poſſeſſed of a little money.

Do you never conſider God as a great King in an Army, as a great father of a family in a houſe, who by his ſovereign power governs all he created, not with a toilſome care, but an incomparable facility? He gave in the beginning of the creation an inſtinct to all living creatures, and there is not any thing ſo little a Spider, which coming into the world, bringeth not its rules, its books, its light, it is preſently inſtructed in all it ſhould do. God ſpeaketh interiourly to all creatures in a dumbe language, with a powerful impreſſion, a ſecret commandment: he gives a ſignal into the world, and every one doth his office, every one laboureth regularly as in a Ship, and all things agree to this great harmony of Heaven. The little Nightingal in the forreſts, makes an Organ of her throat, ſometimes breaking her notes into warbles, ſometimes ſtretching them out at length. The Swallow is buſie in her maſonry, the Bee toileth all the day in her innocent theſts, the Spider furniſheth out the long train of her webs, and makes more curious works with her feet, then the moſt skilful women can weave with their hands. Fiſhes play their parts under the water, beaſts of ſervice labour in their duty, ſmall grains of ſeed, though dead and rotten, give life to great Trees, which advance to the clouds. There is nothing idle in all Nature, nothing diſobedient but Men and Devils, who imploy their liberty to reſiſt him, whoſe power is as juſt, as it is eternal.

Deus ipſe, univerſa ſua perfecta magnitudinis & pulchritudinis includit, interimus ſemper operi ſuo vadens per omnia, movens cuncta, vivificans univerſa. Tertul. l. de Trin. c. 2.

10. Let us then concluding this diſcourſe, adore the Divine Providence which holdeth the Helm of the Univerſe. Let us behold it as a Watch-tower, furniſhed with a thouſand fires that abundantly inlighten this Ocean whereon we ſail. Let us behold it as a burning Pillar in the wilderneſs of this life. Let us behold it as our Pole-ſtar, and never looſe ſight of it. It is our ſupport, our ſweetneſs, our comfort. It is that which cooleth our ardours, drieth our tears, breaketh our fetters, and diſſipateth our annoys. If we be in darkneſs, it is the light, if we be anxious, it giveth counſel. If we be in a labyrinth of errours, it is the thread, which guideth us. If in danger of ſhipwrack, it is the Haven. And if we be at the gates of death, it is life.

Away with all curioſities, Southſayers, Sorcereſſes, and ſuperſtitions, unworthy the name of a Chriſtian. Fie upon deſpair, and minds affliction. Let us learn in all things which appertain to us, ſpeedily and effectually to fix our ſelves on the will of the Omnipotent. Let us continually ſay, God ſeeth this affair, ſince nothing eſcapeth the quickneſs of his eye: He loves me as his childe, becauſe he is goodneſs it ſelf: He is juſt, becauſe he is the meaſure of all juſtice: He is potent, becauſe there is not any thing can reſiſt his will. Let us expect awhile: the trouble I indure, is but a flying cloud, and God will do all for the beſt: Let us ſay with Saint Auguſtine.

Auguſt. de civit. Dei c. 2. l. 2. Duc me, ſumme pater, veſtri moderator Olympi, quacunque placuit, nulla parendi eſt mora. Adſum impiger. Fac nolle, comitaber gemens, malisque patiar, facere quod licuit bono.

O ſovereign Father, who governeſt the vaſt frame of Heaven, I ſubmit to thy direction. Lead me on the right hand, lead me on the left, turn to what ſide thou pleaſeſt. I follow thee without reply, or delay. For what ſhould I get by reſiſtance, but to be dragged weeping; and to bear, becoming evil, what I might do ſincerely, becoming good.

Let us learn to ſleep ſecurely in this conformity to the will of God, as a little Infant on the Teat of his Nurſe. It is at the ſight of this Providence, that Jonas buried in the belly of a Whale, and covered under the Ocean's waves made a Chappel of the devouring gulph, which was to have been his puniſhment, ſpeaking affectionately to God: (b) Behold all thy waves and abyſſes paſs over my head, yet I deſpair not to behold thee in thy Temple.

over the earth, the winds were unfettered, the pillars of the world tottered with fatal convulsions, whilst men and houses were torn in pieces to serve as a pastime for the Sea, and that yels of beasts mingled with the cries of so many mortals ecchoed round about, lastly when all the world swam, he rested in an incomparable tranquillity, adoring the counsels of Gods justice. Sacred Providence! we prostrate on the earth adore thee, vindicate us from the bondage of our passions, make us die to so many dead things of mortals, that we hereafter may live in thy delight.

The fourth EXAMPLE upon the fourth MAXIM.

Divers observations upon Providence.

LEt us a little withdraw our minds from discourses to the consideration of examples, like those who labouring on some curious works, refresh their eyes with beholding the verdure of meadows, or luster of Emeralds. Volumes might be compiled without end by him who would follow the footsteps of divine Providence, in so great a labyrinth of times, and Histories so innumerable. But it is not my purpose in these abbreviations, where I endeavour to suppress much, and well express a few things.

If you behold this Providence in nature, there are eternal miracles, which astonished the wise, animated all voices, gave matter to all pens, and filled all the books in the world. On what side soever we turn our eys, we meet this great Mistress with a hundred arms, and as many hands, which incessantly travel to do us good. It enlightneth us in the beauty of stars and lights, it warmeth us in flames, it refresheth us in the air, it delighteth us in the enamel of meadows, it moistneth us in the streaming of crystal fountains, it profiteth and enricheth in the fertility of fields, so many trees and shrubs, such diversity of fruits, such wholesome hearbs, such a great quantity of viands so well divided into all the seasons of the year, so many living creatures, some whereof come from the water, others from the earth, the rest from the air, every part of the world bringing its tribute; so many medicinable waters, so many rivers which afford such delicious shores to the land for commerce, and all humane accommodations.

Providence of God in the ordinary works of nature.

Vid. Senec. l. 4. de benef.

I now let all this pass, and coming to matters more particular, demand of you who was the cause, that in the Canary Island, called Ferro, when it is roasted with droughts, and heaven affordeth no succour by showers, nor rivers by waters, there is found a huge tree, which seems to change all the leaves thereof into as many petty fountains: for every one distilleth water, and all render it in such abundance, that it sufficeth both men and their flocks? Who doth all this good husbandry, but the divine Providence? And who is it supplies scarcity of rain in Egypt, and commandeth Nilus to over-flow the fields in his limited time, to bear in his inundations the wealth of Pharos, but it?

Particular providence over divers countries. Jesuites. Martellus.

Who maketh Antidotes grow in places, where poysons spring, but its wisdom? If Africk have many serpents, there are Psylles, which destroy them. If other countries breed store of snakes, there are Asben flowers, which drive them away. If Egypt have a Crocodile, it affords an Indian rat, which bursteth it. There are likewise trees to be found which having venemous roots upon one side, yield a remedy on the other. By what hand are framed so many wonders of nature, which make books incessantly speak, but by that of this great Work-man?

Historia Sinarum part. 4.

But if you on the other side will consider it in protection of men, what doth it not by the ministery of its good Angels? I see upon one side in histories the little King Mithridates involved in lightning flashes, whilst he innocently sleepeth in his infant cradle, the flames consuming his cloaths, and linnens, and not touching his body at all. To whom think you should I attribute this?

Admirable protection of men in rare accidents.

On the other side I ponder the prodigy so loudly proclaimed in the Greek Anthology of a shipwrack, equally surprizing a father and a son, which took away the life of the father, and gave the son leave to arrive in a safe harbour, having no other vessel but the corps of his deceased father, who gave him life by his death, as he had afforded him birth by his life. Who did this but the Master of Life and Death?

Philippus Anthologia Græc. l. 1.

Besides, I read in the relations of Muscovia, set out by the Embassadour Demetrius, that a country Boor, being by chance clammed in the hollow body of a great tree full of hony, and finding no means to come forth of his licorish captivity, behold a Bear hasteneth to the same tree to eat of the hony, whereof these beasts are very greedy: which observed, the poor forlorn creature, not discerning what this might be, but catching hold, (as one almost drowned) of any thing which good luck offered him, grasped the Bear, who feeling himself taken, laboured hard to fly through fear conceived, and draweth out the peasant by an admirable accident, wherein it was no easie matter to say, which of the two was most affrighted. Who directed this but the eye of Providence?

Demetrius Legatus.

I admire also in the earth-quake of Apulia, that happened the year, 16 7. the last day of July, (where one writeth, that in the City of S. Severin alone, ten thousand souls were taken out of the world) how in the horrour of such infinite ruins and sepulcher of so many mortals, a great bell fell so fitly over a child, that it incloseth him, and doing no hurt, made a bulwark for him against any other danger; who ballanced the motion of this metal, but the fingers, which distended heaven.

Will you pass to particulars of Empires? You will be rapt with admiration, when you come to consider the beginnings, progressions, and events of every one. You shal see them spring like smal veins of water unknown, and with time to take such encrease, as to become huge rivers, large enough to over-flow the fields. Sometimes it will seem to you, they are only set upon a needles point, and are ready to ruin; in the mean space there is an invisible hand, which supporteth and re-establisheth them by their proper fals. You admire, how God so long suffers ungrateful, and perfidious Nations to draw them unto him, and afterwards the measure of their sins filled up; if they must be destroyed, it is but to cause others to rise out of their ruins.

Providence over Empires.

The Assyrians after the Reign of thirty eight Kings, changed into Medes, and Chaldeans: the Medes after the sway of nine Kings, and three hundred and twenty two years, ended in Astyages: The Chaldeans after two hundred and nine years in Darius the Mede. But they like two rivers, united in the person of Cyrus, to make great the Monarchy of the Persians. The Persians after two hundred thirty years, and fourteen Kings, dissolve into the Grecians: The Grecians are multiplied to Ptolomey's, and Seleucides. All are finally swallowed in the Roman Empire. Rome lost it self after one thousand two hundred twenty nine years, accounted from the foundation foundation to the Emperour Augustulus, who is observed, as the last Monarch before the great wrack, which made the Empire a prey to so many Nations, that had fed it with their bloud. From the division of the Roman Empire, sprang our French, Spaniards, English, Goths, Vandals, Lombards, Polacks, Ottomans, and such other Powers.

Providence over the Church.

If from thence you advance your thoughts to the government of the Church, which is the principal work of God, and reflect upon it from its cradle to the present Age, entertaining in your memory its infancy, encrease, travels, persecution, glories, and crowns, you will stand amazed at the bottomless depth of the counsels of the Divine Providence.

Diarium Historicum.

What mother ever had so much care, and tender affection over her little infant sleeping in the cradle, as this Providence for the Church and Christianity? It is a remarkable thing, that at the same time when Nebuchadnezzar ruined the Temple of Jerusalem in the East, the Capitol was built in the West, to plant there one day the Cross; and that Rome in the space of one hundred forty two years, having been six times taken, and ransacked by Alaricus, Genfericus, Odoacer, the Heruli, Theodoricus, Belisarius, and Totilas, when one would have thought it brought to nothing, was ever preserved by God to be the source of lights, and the mother of all Churches.

How many times hath God tied secret virtues to the standards of Christians? How many times made winds and tempests to fight under their Ensigns? How often hath he opened for them lands inaccessible, calmed stormy seas for them, changed desarts into Paradises of delight? Petty handfuls of souldiers to discomfit huge Armies, take Towns impregnable, cleave rocks, and hew through mountains, to do the work of Giants, and find facility in all which humane reason conceived impossible?

Read Paulus Æmilius, and Guilielmus Tyrius upon the conquest of the holy land; and you shall see, that birds of the air seemed in pay with Godfrey of Bouillon: For who can be but astonished to hear it told, how when he besieged Jerusalem, the Sultan having taught pigeons to carry messages, dispatched one of them with a letter which she bare under her wings, to give advice to the besieged? But good hap would have it, that a Hawk, seazing on her, just over the Christian army, took her, and made her to let fall what she carried, to inform ours of the enemies design. How many such like accidents shew us the care God hath of his, and that he never suffered them to be overthrown, but to vanquish their vices, and to humble their pride by the counterpoise of forraign Powers.

Strange accident.

What may we say of Councils? What may we likewise think of great bodies of Justice? How many times have we seen counsels discovered, and resolutions, of which it seemed no creature had a thought? God governed the hearts and tongues of those, who sought to abuse them against him, a great Spirit swayed all those members assembled, and secretly did its work to the admiration of the whole world. One same motion guided within compass all those stars, as in Archimedes his sphere, and accorded them by their proper contrarieties. Great God! have we not cause to say what he did in Seneca; Throughly to punish the wicked man who woundeth the Divine Providence, I ordain nothing, but that he understand the wrong he hath done to a good father.

Of Accidents.

THE PROPHANE COURT.	THE HOLY COURT.
That all is done by chance, by necessity, or humane providence	That all is done by the will of God, except sin.

Three squadrons against Providence.

THE enemies of Providence use all kind of Engins to oppose their own happiness, and crack their own eye-strings, that they may not behold the great eye, which pursues the wicked even into the shades of death. I find the Chaldæans made three squadrons, that we may speak with holy Job, wherewith to assail this great Mistress of the world. Some hold all is done by chance, and that nothing but Fortune predominateth in the actions and affairs of the world: others will subject all to the laws of fatal necessity: the third put their whole confidence in carnal prudence, which not unlike reeds, takes away their support, and leaves them remorse.

Happy he, who amongst so many straights, shelves, and ship-wracks, can hold the right way, ever casting his eye towards Providence as his Pole-star, and never loosing sight of it, that he may never loose himself. Let us now endeavour to ruin these three Companies of Chaldæans by the arms of Scripture, holy Fathers, and Reason.

The misery of impiety.

It is a pitifull thing to see a giddy soul, which seeketh God, and will not find him, making so many errours as paces, so many stumbles as steps, and as many sacriledges as there are creatures in the whole world. The Prophet Esay complained in his time of those who dressed up Altars to Fortune, and made Sacrifices to her. But this Sect took with time so great encrease, that it filled the whole earth. For blind Gentilism beholding so many sundry accidents in the life of man, the cause whereof they could not penetrate, imagined there was a certain Deity, blind, unequal, and furious, which distributed all conditions, and held good, and bad luck, as day and night in its hands. This Idolatry of Fortune was so general, that Plinie durst say: Fortune alone is invoked throughout the world, in all places, at all times, in all languages, none talk but of her, she onely is praised, she onely accused: she gives all presents, makes all expences, and if you well weigh the great book of the accounts of our life, you shall find, Fortune filleth all the leaves of it.

Plin. l. 2. c. 6. Toto mundo, & locis omnibus, omnibusque horis omnium vocibus fortuna sola invocatur; una nominatur, una accusatur, una agitur res, una cogitur, huic omnia expensa, huic omnia feruntur accepta, & in tota ratione mortalium sola utraque pagina facit.

tenting themſelves with one ſole Fortune, made many, which had no other foundations of their Deities but Chymæra's of brains bereaved of reaſon as S. Auguſtine ſheweth us in his fourth book of the City of God. One was called Fortune the firſt born, becauſe they held it was the beginning of all things: the other was all covered over with dugs, and was termed Mammoſa, in teſtimony of its fruitfulneſſe. One was called Fortune the ſtrong; the other feminine, the other a virgin, the other inconſtant, the other ſtable. One was for certain days, another for all times: One for Emperours, all of gold, which they kept in their chambers as a relick, and another for the people, of wood or earth.

Aug. l. 4. de civit. Dei. c. 2.

Laſtly not ſo much as young men, but adored a barbed Fortune, that their firſt beard might grow in good faſhion. Good God! what ignorance, what a cloud! See we not how groſs theſe ſuperſtitions are, ſince the bloud of Jeſus waſhed away the ſtain? Notwithſtanding the world is filled with ſlaves of Fortune who ceaſe not to impute all proſperities, and adverſities of life to the hazard of chance.

That Fortune is in the power of Providence.

2. Now to decide this point: we muſt know Fortune is nought elſe, but man himſelf, when without thinking upon it, he makes himſelf the accidental cauſe of an effect not pretended.

Ariſt. de cauſis Fortuna eſt cauſa per accidens in his quæ per electionem alicujus gratia ſunt.

A man through deſpair ſought for a halter to hang himſelf, and ſtirring the earth in an unuſual place met with a treaſure: it was ſaid to be fortune, yet is this fortune nothing elſe but man, who in ſearching gave occaſion to this effect, which followed, though never by him intended. In reſpect of man this chance is abſolutely caſual, in reſpect of the prime cauſe which is God; it is a Providence. Behold a man cruſhed under the ruins of a tree, he expected not this tree ſhould fall, and therefore it is his fortune: But God, without whoſe diſpoſe one ſole leaf of a tree droppeth not off, had foreſeen this fall from all eternity: which enforceth us to affirm, that all fortunes of men are encloſed within the power of Providence.

A notable doctrine of William of Paris, Guilielm. Pariſ. 1. part. de univer. part. 1. c. 34.

It is a notable doctrine of a great Biſhop of Paris who ſaith, God, Father of all eſſences, begetteth and eternally ſpeaketh his Son, or his Eternal Word, and that in this Word he once ſaid all he would do, and all which ſhould happen: in ſuch ſort, that there is not any accident, order, or mean in this great connexion of Ages, enchained one within another, can eſcape the vivacity of his eye, and the extent of his Providence. There it is he hath ordained all the bleſſings of nature, grace, and glory: There it is he hath ſeen all the evils of offence, yet willeth he not, nor can he will, they ſhould be of him, or by him, as being unworthy his ſanctity, his glory, and goodneſs. But as for the fortunes and misfortunes of men, baniſhments, bands, priſons, maladies, afflictions, proſperities, riches, honours, treaſures, glories, and crowns, he hath appointed them according to his divine pleaſure, to be inſtruments of good deſires, and glorious actions. Wherefore let us never ſay, good and ill haps of the world come by chance, without Gods diſpoſe.

Mea ſunt omnes ferarum ſilvarum, & pulchritudo agri mecum eſt. Mecum ſunt divitiæ, & gloria, opes ſuperbæ, & juſticia. Per me Reges regnant, & legum conditores juſta decernunt. Si clanget tuba in civitate, & populus non expaveſcet, ſi erit malum in civitate quod Dominus non fecerit. Pſal. 49. 10. Prov. 8. 18. Amos. 3. 9

To me, ſaith the Great God in the holy Scriptures, belong all the beaſts in the forreſt, & I behold the beauty of the fields diſcloſed from my boſome. With me are riches, glory, pomps, wealth, which reſt in the protection of my juſtice. It is by me Kings hold the reins of Empire in their hands, and Law-makers open their lips to pronounce Oracles. The trumpet ſounds in the midſt of the City, and the people tremble, not knowing the cauſe of their miſery: But there is no evil of puniſhment in the City, which I have not cauſed for moſt juſt reaſons.

(a) The ſecond ſquadron of our Chaldeans taking a quite contrary way to this, will bruitiſhly maintain all things are done by a fatal neceſſity, which ſome attribute to ſtars, others to divine preſcience. Foraſmuch as concerneth ſtars, it is a diſtinct queſtion, which would well deſerve a much longer diſcourſe, than this preſent deſign permitteth (b). We have ſhewed in ſome other former tracts, and will alſo manifeſt once again, how vain, and frivolous the ſcience of Horoſcopes is, being taken in that heigth, whereunto the vanity of ſome impoſtours hath raiſed it, not here intending to condemn thoſe who handle Aſtrology within limits permitted by the Church. Let us now be contented to ſay it is a ſavage ignorance to ſeek to infer from the courſe of planets an abſolute neceſſity upon mens actions: ſince even judicial Aſtrologers the moſt fervent and obſtinate, durſt never proceed ſo far. All ſay the ſtars make impreſſions of certain qualities upon bodies, and minds, but that they may be diverted by precaution: which gave authority to the famous axiom of Ptolomy, cited by S. Thomas in the book of deſtiny, affirming, (a) the wiſe man ſhall rule the ſtars.

(b) Vanity of Aſtrology.

(b) Tertullian in the treatiſe of Idolatry, ſaid pertinently, that evil Angels are made prime maſters of the curioſity of Horoſcopes; and that as they were baniſhed from Heaven, ſo are their Diſciples from the earth, as by an extenſion of the divine ſentence. He addeth, that man ſhould not at all pretend to the Kingdom of Heaven, who makes a practiſe to abuſe both Heaven and ſtars. It ſeems God purſueth thoſe, who addict themſelves to ſuch vanities, as fugitives from Divine Providence. And it is very often obſerved, that great-ones who are enſnared in the ſervitude of this curioſity, have felt violent ſhocks, and many times moſt dreadfull events. (c) Henry the ſecond to whom Cardan, and Gauricus, (two lights of Aſtrology) had foretold verdant and happy old Age, was miſerably ſlain in the flower of his youth, in games and pleaſures of a Turneament. The Princes his children, whoſe Horoſcopes were ſo curiouſly looked into, and of whom wonders had been ſpoken, were not much more proſperous. Zica King of the Arabians, to whom Aſtrology had promiſed long life to perſecute Chriſtians, died in the year of the ſame prediction. Albumazar, the Oracle of Aſtrology, left in writing, that he found Chriſtian religion, according to the influence of ſtars, ſhould laſt but a thouſand four hundred years: he already hath belyed more than two hundred, and it will be a lie to the worlds end. The year 1524. wherein happened the great conjunction of Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars, in the ſign Piſces, Aſtrologers had foretold the world ſhould periſh by water: which was the cauſe many men of quality made arks in imitation of Noahs, to ſave themſelves from the deluge, all which turned into laughter. The year 1630. was likewiſe threatned by ſome predictions, with an inundation ſhould drown half mankind, which proved falſe by a ſeaſon quite contrary. It was foretold a Conſtable of France well known, that he would dye beyond the Alps, before a City beſieged, in the 83. year of his Age, and that if he eſcaped this time, he was to live above a hundred years; which was notoriouſly untrue, this man deceaſing in the 84. year, of a natural death. A Mathematician of John Galeazzo Duke of Milan, who promiſed himſelf long life according to his planets, was ſlain at the ſame time when he prognoſticated this, by the commandment of the ſame Duke. Another Aſtrologer of Henry the ſeventh, King of England, adviſed this great Prince to take heed of Chriſtmas night, was asked, whither his own ſtar would ſend him that night: to which he anſwered, to his own houſe in ſecurity of peace: Yet was he inſtantly ſent to the tower to celebrate the vigil of this great Feſtival. One might reckon up by thouſands, the falſhoods, miſeries, and diſaſters which wait on theſe ſuperſtitions.

Exiſtimant tot circa humana capta tumultuantem Deos. Aurelius.

Who can then ſufficiently deplore the folly of one, who forſaking the great government of God, the fountain of wits and treaſure of fortunes, makes himſelf a ſlave of Mercury, or Saturn, contrary to the voice of Scripture, deciſion of Councils, Oracles of holy Fathers, Laws of Emperours, conſultations of the wiſe, experience of people, and conſent of all the moſt ſolid judgments?

Againſt the neceſſity inferred of preſcience.

We will not labour to ruin a doctrine forſaken both by honour and reaſon: We only ſpeak againſt thoſe, who will infer a neceſsity derived from divine preſcience, by force of which, ſins themſelves, according to their underſtandings, are directly cauſed by the decrees of heaven. It is the opinion of Velleius Paterculus, who ſaid, deſtiny did all the good and evil in the world, and that it was a miſerable thing to attribute that which proceedeth from above, to the demerit of men, and to make the ordinances of heaven to paſs, as crimes of mortals. This Maxim was defended by Hereticks even to fury, and it is a wonder men have been ſo wicked, as to burden the prime ſanctity with all the ordures of the world.

Ita efficitur, quod eſt miſerrimum, ut quod accidat, etiam meritis accidiſſe videatur, & caſus in culpam tranſeat.

We well know, if deſtiny be taken for the ordinance by which God eſtabliſheth the lives of particulars, and ſtates of Empires, it is nothing elſe but the Divine Providence whereof we ſpeak: but good heed muſt be taken from concluding ſins within the liſt of Gods will, who only being pleaſed to permit them, cannot in any ſort eſtabliſh or will them. And it is here an impertinent thing to ſay, All God hath forſeen ſhall neceſſarily happen, otherwiſe he would be deceived in his foreſight, which cannot be affirmed without blaſphemy: but he foreſaw all future things, they then of neceſſity will happen. Who ſees not, it is a childiſh toy, and that this captious argument muſt be overthrown by ſaying, All which God hath foreſeen neceſſarily, happeneth by neceſſity, and all he foreſaw indifferently, happeneth by indifferency. Now ſo it is, that of all which dependeth on our liberty, he hath not foreſeen any thing neceſſarily, but indifferently: We muſt then conclude, that all is done by indifferency, not fatal neceſsity. harken to the excellent deciſion of S. John Damaſcen.

Damaſc. l. 2. Orth. fidei. c. 32.

God foreſaw all things; but he determineth not all things; He well foreſaw all which is and ſhal be in your power: but he determines not, becauſe he willeth not ſin, nor will likewiſe conſtrain any man to virtue. (b) Plato in his Common-wealth deteſteth all opinions, which ſeek to introduce into the beliefs of people, propoſitions unworthy of Gods goodneſs; namely thoſe which make him authour of ſin, adding, we muſt not endure to hear it ſpoken or written by any man in a well rectified Common-wealth.

Omnia quidem Deus præſcivit; non omnia tamen præfinit. Præſcit enim ea quæ in noſtra ſunt poteſtate, non autem ea præfinit, quia non vult peccatum, nec cogit ad virtutem.

(b) Plato. l. 2. de republica. Θεὸς οὐδενὸς αἴτιος.

Who knoweth not, that ſuch are the cauſes, ſuch the effects? If the cauſes be neceſſary, the effects likewiſe are enchained within the limits of neceſsity: If they be contingent, they are all in indifferency. Now the preſcience of God (to ſpeak properly) is not the cauſe of our actions, unleſs it be by meer accident and occaſion; then it cannot make them neceſſary. Is it not true, that the great eye of God equally beholdeth things paſt, preſent, and future? And as our eye maketh not things preſent by beholding them, ſince a wall is neither white nor black by force of my ſight, and as our memory makes not things paſt, by repaſsing them by their ſpecies, ſo the preſcience of God makes not things future by forſeeing them: they are not, becauſe God hath foreſeen them; but he foreſaw them, becauſe they ſo ſhould happen.

O man, if thou beholdeſt him who made thee, thou mayeſt have been good. But if thou contemplateſt him, as him who knew thee before the beginning of Ages, thou haſt enforced him to make an evil judgment upon thee, becauſe thou haſt made thy ſelf evil.

Pauſ. Reg. de gratia. c. 2. l. 2. Si ad faciorem, homo, reſpicis, bonus eſſe potuiſti. Si ad præcognitorem, in me præſtitum tuorum ordine, ut de te malum tranſiretur, compleſti.

Our action, although it be not the firſt dated in execution, at the leaſt in the Idæa and order of nature it always foregoeth the divine preſcience: if we regard its firſt intentions, we may all be honeſt men; if we conſider our proceedings, we conſtrain him to foreſee of us, what is in us. If preſcience imported any neceſsity, we might conclude God were neceſſitated in all the actions he doth throughout the world, becauſe he eternally hath foreſeen them all, which were moſt impious. Let us not then ſay: But if God hath ſo foreſeen it, it will happen by an inevitable neceſsity: for there are three ſorts of neceſsities; one moſt abſolute, as that of the Eſſence of God; the other natural, as light in the ſun, heat in fire, the third is a neceſsity conditional, as is that, If God foreſeeth ſuch or ſuch a thing, it ſhal happen: I ſay, it is a neceſsity of ſuppoſition, for you preſuppoſe he foreſaw it, but inſtantly you learn he foreſaw it not, but becauſe it ſhould be; and that his preſcience is no more the cauſe of our actions, than our memory of the taking of Rochel, and wars with the Huguenots.

2. Squadron of nice ones according to humane prudence.

4. After this brain-ſick band, another riſeth, which comprehendeth the ſubtle and more refined wits, according to the judgment of the world, who ſuppoſe all good ſucceſs proceeds from prudence and humane induſtry, without the helping hand of God. They are ſuch, as according to the ſaying of the Prophet, ſacrifice to their nets, who kiſs their hand as an independent worker of great actions, who ſavourly taſte all they do, like Bears, ſaid to lick their paws, when they have eaten hony.

Habac. 1. 16.

An obſervation of the Greſiam upon the dependence we have from on high. Mentem tunc hominibus adimit ſupera illa mens, qua cujuſcumque fortunam mutare conſtituit, conſilia corrumpit. Velleius. l. 2.

Greek Authours tell us, Mercury was bred by the houres, to teach us, all wiſdome and humane eloquence not guided nor ſupported by the meaſures of heaven, can neither have nouriſhment, nor ſubſiſtence. There is no one more blind than he who thinks himſelf clear-ſighted in affairs without the prudence of heaven; all ſucceeds ill with him, and he findeth by experience, that God begins the change of fortunes by the corruption of counſels. The reaſon thereof is very manifeſt, ſince we know all created ſpirits, work not but by the dependence they have upon the increated Eſſence, as alſo that all Intelligences have ſo much excellency, as they have relation to the firſt Intelligence, which is the Word of God.

Weakneſs of humane wiſdome.

If we conſult with our own thoughts and knowledge, as being near of kin to us, we ſhal find they have three ill properties, which is, they are heavy, timorous, and uncertain: as heavy, they creep on the earth; as timorous, they glance at all objects, and reſolve on nothing; as uncertain, they are perpetually floating. There is none but God, who raiſeth them by his exaltation, ſetleth them by his ſtability, and ſtaieth them by his immutability.

Vanity of Politicians, without Gods direction.

All they, who diſunited from the eternal Wiſdom, think to proſper in governments, honours, worldly affairs, are Icaruſes, that ſeek to counterfeit birds with waxen wings; the leaſt ray proceeding from the throne of the Lamb will burn them, and make their height ſerve for no other uſe, but to render their their falls the more remarkable. If they be lettered, they shall stead them as forrests do thieves, to cover their crimes, and if they have dignities, they shall be unto them, as the golden and silver precipices of the Emperour Heliogabalus, which were not devised but to make his ruin the more memorable. Doth not the Apostle preclaim aloud with a voice of thunder to the posterity of all Ages: I will pull down the wisdom of the wisest according to the world, I will rebuke the prudence of the most subtle? And did not holy Job repeat the like Oracles upon the dunghill, saying: God often times giveth success of Affairs most shamefull to the most able Counsellours, and he reduceth Judges to a certain stupidity of understanding? Hath not the experience of Ages shewed so often in the histories of Pharaohs, Herods, & all such like, that there is no greater wisdom in the world, then to be an honest man? To be wise is to use wisdom, and to make it serve for direction, as the eye for sight.

5. Let us draw three conclusions from these three propositions we have deduced; The first whereof shall be, never to do like those vulgar and abject souls, which is to curse, and detest our condition and fortune, as it were an effect of some false Divinity, and not a Divine Providence. Remember daily within your self those words: Nothing is done on the earth without cause. God hath disposed all with weight, and measure.

1. Conclusion against those who curse fortune. Nihil in terra sine causa fit Job. 5. Omnia in mensura, & numero, & pondere disposuisti. Sap. 11.

Recal into your thoughts the singular consideration of Boetius: (a) We must patiently suffer all which is done within the circle of Providence, seeing we have bowed our necks under its Laws, by the condition of our birth. (b) So soon as you are born, you enter within the jurisdiction of Gods ordinance, you have undergone the yoke to receive good or evil fortune, as he shall please to appoint. I ask, if you should resolve to give law to him from whom you ought to take it, were you not most unjust, & unhappy? Most unjust, because you would incroach upon Gods inheritance; most unhappy, because you could not kick against the prick, but to hurt your self the more. Were you embarked in a vessel, you must go not according to your own will, but the course of wind, and tide. If you learned the trade of husbandmen, you must cast into the earth, to reap again what will come of it, & you should sometimes have barren, sometimes fertile, and fruitful years. You have entred into humane life, which of its nature is replenished with inconstancies, and vicissitudes: one while there is good, another while evil hap. Let fortune roul as God shal please, nothing with him is hazardous. Would you be so hardy, as to tie your self to the wheel of a chariot perpetually running, to stay the course which the Divine Providence affords it? You desire, say you, a stable fortune in the world, and understand not, that were it so, there would no longer be either world, or fortune, since the condition of these inferiour things is in continual mutation.

(a) Boet: de consol. Æquo animo tolerat oportet, quicquid intra fortunæ aream geritur, cum semel jugo colla subduxerit. (b) An excellent resolution upon worldly accidents.

When you see the wicked flourish in honour, riches, and reputation, say not the prosperity of a wicked man is heavens sin, that God walketh upon the vaults of his palace, and abandoneth the care of worldly affairs. Expect a little, Justice will come, although many times with a leaden pace. How know you, whether God will convert this man by surcharging him with prosperities, to confound his ingratitude? How know you, whether resolving to deprive him for his crimes of eternal blessings, he gives him some use of temporal benefits in recompence of some moral virtues he hath heretofore exercised? Rather say to God: Oh God, how profound are thy thoughts, and how inscrutable to the ignorant, and foolish! Expect the day which will draw aside the curtain, and make you see all the secrets of the world. God expecteth it with so much patience in his eternity, why will not you expect it in your mortality?

Dorum crimen Sylla tam felix. Senec. ad Marcia. Psal. 91. 6. Nimis profunda facta sunt cogitationes tua: vir insipiens non cognoscet, & fatuus non intelliget hæc. Vis tu esse longanimis & patiens, junge te æternitati Dei, & cum illo expecta quæ infra te sunt. August. in Psal. 91.

6. The second conclusion shall be, never to adhere to this brutish and savage opinion, which puts a fatality upon all the actions of men and all events. Beware of the foolish discourse of him, who says, If my hour be come I shall die, and if not, I have nothing to fear. For see you not according to these unbridled maxims, all deliberation, all prudence, all order of humane life must be taken away? Were here a fatality, we need no more talk of ships to pass the seas, nor medicines to cure maladies, nor bread to feed the hungry. A man besotted with this folly, might free from danger, walk on the waves; for if his destiny bear him, he shall never perish by water; He need not at all make use of medicine, for his death can neither be delayed, nor hastned. What avails it so much as to eat? For if he must die of hunger, whatever he do he shall fail, and if his destinie threaten him not that way, he shall live in full assurance. Behold here prodigious dotages. But God, hath he not fixed the number of my years, as saith Job: You keep a reckoning of his years and months: you have set him limits which cannot be broken?

2. Conclusion against Fatality. Job. 14. 5. Numerus mensium ejus apud te est, constituisti terminos ejus, qui præteriri non poterunt.

I affirm, God knows the number of your days, and hath determined them: Hath he not on the other part obliged you to your conservation by the Law of nature? Since you have no revelation from above, that God wil have you die in such or such a fashion, you ought to preserve your life to the last breath, and if through rashness you run among precipices, shipwracks, and musket-shots, without obedience, without reason, without discretion, you are the murtherers of your selves. God hath foreseen you must die at such an hour, and of such a death: but he hath likewise foreseen it would happen unto you through a most perverse will, and an enraged temerity, which sought to tempt the Counsels of the Omnipotent, against all the maxims of verity. Know you not, God hath set fire and water before you, and that you may take which of them you please? Liberty of Free-will is absolutely given to man to become a Master over all his actions, with a constancy of mind, either voluntarily to keep and conserve good, or to resist evill with the like freedom, said Tertullian.

Tertul. adverſ. Marc. c. 6. Tota libertas arbitrii in utramq; partem concessa est homini, ut sui Dominus constanter occurreret, & bona sponte servando, & mala sponte vitando.

7. The third conclusion will teach us to settle our labour by heavens direction in a good temperature, so that we stand not with arms a-cross when we should travel, expecting from Gods hand what we ought not to expect with our cooperation: and that on the other side we take heed, not so to presume of our own abilities, as to ascribe thereunto all good successes which happen. For both the one and other is hateful before God. We know what the Sage Greek said to a Carter plunged in a myre, who called aloud on Minerva, not seeking to stir himself: My friend, with Minerva you must stir a hand. God is very ready to aid you, but you must on your part use correspondence. Set up sayl, and God will give you wind, till the earth, and you shall receive Heavens benediction. But if you think to please your self with an ill rectified devotion, and not to care for the affairs of your family, will you not be like those barren trees, which make a noise with their leaves under the breath of winds, and never bear fruits? On the other side, beware of thinking to be happy by means meerly humane and politick, without Heavens direction: For so doing, you will build upon quick-silver, phantasms of greatness, which will afford you illusions in this life, to

3. Third conclusion against humane prudence, and lazyness. Σὺν Θεῷ καὶ χεῖρα κίνει.

Nec consilio Prudentiæ vincitur, sagaci, divinæ providentiæ fatalis dispositio subverti vel reformari potest. Apul. Metamor. 9.

Hæc fatis superi certâ ratione regunt. Sil. Ital. l. 5.

(b) Bernard. de cõsider. l. 5. Tob. 6. 3. Ad te Domine faciem meam convertо, ad te oculos meos dirigo. Peto Domine ut de vinculo improperii hujus absolvas me, aut certè desuper terram aspice me, &c.

drench you in the other into eternal confusions. When you have done all which justice and conscience dictate, leave successes to God, and know there are strokes from Heaven that cannot be vanquished, either by prudence of counsels, or any humane remedies. We are to be answerable unto God with our good desires, not powers; the petty gods of the earth can do nothing against the Decrees of Heaven. Take these words of S. Paul, not as ordinary, but as oracles of an immutable Verity: (a) Prudence of flesh is death: but prudence of Spirit is peace and life.

If you have good success in ought you do, thank God, and look on him (saith (b) S. Bernard) as an Omnipotent Will, a virtue full of affection, an eternal light, a sovereign beatitude, which replenisheth all here below with the abundance of his ever-honoured bounty. But if in doing all you can, you find main oppositions, and irksom afflictions in the world, say as the chast Sara did, seeing her self injured by her servant: O God, I turn my face to the place whence I expect my consolation. I fix mine eyes on thee, because thou settlest all my hopes. I beseech thee deliver me from the fetters of this disgrace, or deliver me out of this world. Thy counsels are impenetrable to the weakness of my understanding; but I am well assured of one thing, that he who faithfully serves thee, shall never be deceived. If his life be assaulted with afflictions, it shall reap Crowns. If it be exposed to the ardour of tribulations, thou wilt stretch out an assisting hand. If thou exercisest it under thy chastisements, it shall be to make it find out the path of thy mercies.

The fifth Example upon the fifth MAXIM.

Of the Providence of GOD over States and riches of the World.

EULOGIUS.

Drawn from the observation of Paul a Greek Authour.

THe Divine Providence is a marvellous workman, which ruleth here below over the heads of mortals, it laboureth in this great mass of mankind; it takes men of earth, to make them of gold, and of those men of gold, makes men of earth. It commixeth slaves and Kings, and causeth the one, not thinking of it, to spring from the other in the revolution of times, as Plato said. But we who know not all its secrets, sometimes blame the works of it, which should rather stir up our admiration, then be subject to our censure. One complaineth the wealth of the world is not well divided, and that the wicked have ever the greatest share. Men who oftentimes know not how to part with a finger breadth of land, but by disjoyning most intimate charities, would make themselves distributers of the worlds fortunes, as if they looked more narrowly into the world, then he that made it.

Paul. Syllegus. l. 3. c. 48.

I will here set down a memorable history, drawn out of a rare Grecian Authour, named Paulus, who compiled many narrations, learned from the best of his Age. He recounteth how in the time of the Emperour Justin the elder, about the year 528. after the birth of Christ, there was in Thebais one named Eulogius, a stone cutter by his trade, of poor means, but very rich in virtue. Which maketh us say, Poverty resembles the Island of Ithaca (as said Archesilas) which though rough and bushy, failed not to breed the bravest men of Greece, whom she made use of, as a school for all the exercises of virtues.

Poverty the Isle of Ithaca. Πενίαν μὲν ἀγαθῶν ἀνδρῶν ἀποφόρον. Stob. serm. 93

This man, who at that time had no other wealth on earth but his hands, spared not to store up treasures of good works, as pledges in Heaven. He feared God, was devout, chast, sober, abstinent, courteous, peaceful, charitable, and embraced eminent virtues in a mean fortune. It is a strange thing, that notwithstanding his labour, which was hard enough, he fasted most part of his time even to Sun-set, and with the little money he got by the sweat of his brows, relieved the poor. He walked like Abraham before pilgrims, he washed their feet, and received them into his little house with all possible charity. Then seeking out needy persons of his own Parish, to give them some refection according to his ability, he extended his compassion even to beasts, not suffering any thing to escape his bounty. One would have said, seeing all this poor trades-man did, he had been some rich Lord, such abundance appeared in so low a poverty.

Virtues of a good poor man.

It happened, that a holy Hermit called Daniel, who lived in great reputation, for the excellent endowments of his soul, passing along that way, sojourned in the poor cottage of Eulogius, who received him like an Angel descended from Heaven. He, who was a most spiritual man, looking very far into the Mason's life, found therein such eminent perfection, that he well perceived devotion many times lodged with little noise in a secular life, and that God, who is a great Master, had servants every where.

Daniel the Hermit made a rash demand;

This so enflamed him to the love of those virtues he observed in his hoste, that returning to the Monastery, he exercised great devotion, as fasting three whole weeks together, with intention to obtain an ample estate from God for Eulogius. Fervour so transported this good man, that he considered not, that God, who preserveth us to health, loveth us not to curiosity, and that the banquets he made for his greatest servants, as Elias and S. Paul the Hermit, when he for them opened the treasures of Heaven, were only bread and clear water of fountains. Notwithstanding, he without intermission, importuned Heaven by his prayers, complaining, God who was most just, gave riches in excess to so many sinners, to puff up their pride, and foment riot, when the poor Mason, who deserved rivers should stream nothing but gold for him, was invaded by harsh poverty, which tyed up his hands from virtue. But he persisting day and night to beg the fruit of his request, heard a voice from Heaven, which commanded him to lay aside so indiscreet a request, saying, If his Eulogius left his poverty, he would forsake his conscience. But he pertinaciously persevering in the pursuit of his desire, through a goodness wholly blind, answered, He well knew the contrary, and that this good man would never become evil with the blessings of God, but would rather make them mount up again to their source. That were he made rich, it would be but for the poor, and that wealth would change nothing in him, but to make him the more profitable for all the world: adding thereto, he would answer for him body for body, and soul for soul. God, who was willing to let the Hermit find by very sensible experience the temerity of his request, permitted the Mason in an instant to become a wealthy and able man. For digging in the earth, he there found a very rich treasure, which made him even in an instant bury his piety. Behold him changed into another man. He, who before perpetually sang the praises of God among the wants of poverty, like a little Gold-finch among thorns, groaned under the burden of this gold, grew pensive, anxious, sad and suspitious. He forgot piety and himself, to converse with this gold. In the end, he resolved to steal out of his Country, where he was very well known and to travel to Constantinople, the Port of all Nations, οὐχὶ βλαπτόμενος γὰρ.

Change of fortune causeth change of manners.

ons, there to unfold the change of his fortune with the more liberty. Yet had he some discretion, not instantly to appear in full view; but to polish, and trick up himself, making some apprentiship in the school of the world, and of civil life, to correct all that which the defect of his birth had left in him, either of rudeness or imperfection. And being of a good understanding, and handsom presence, he put himself in the conversation of honest men, and drawing near to the fountain of light, began to haunt the Court, to fashion himself for arms in the Emperours Regiments, where being full of crowns, and daily having opportunity to oblige souldiers, he so well knew how to gain hearts, and purchase the good opinion of all the world, that mounting step after step, he was in some few years made Captain of the Guard to the Emperour Justin. Behold him transported from the element of terrestrial men, into a new sphere, to converse with Gods.

Riches the mother of vices, and neglect of God.

There he was seized on by a dead drunkenness, which change of fortune usually causeth in weak understandings. He no longer looks back on his extraction, but to hide the defects of it. He no more remembers ancient amities, but quite to deface the marks of them. He neither knew God nor men, but for his own ends and services. He walketh up and down the City of Constantinople like a God in a Comedie, wearing rubies, and dragging silk after him, and he who scarcely had iron to forge a hammer or a trewel, will no longer spit, but in gold and silver. Prayer is a trouble to him, fasts are torments, ceremonies of the Church amusements, and constraints. This eclipse of devotion is waited on by a desperate exorbitance of feasts, game, and love. The more shameful his birth was, so much the more he makes himself ostentous and magnificent, to divert all the suspition of it. It is the fashion of many Great-ones derived from inferiour rank, to drown their former condition in profuse riots, and to do as that Roman, who sought to cover by streng h of gold and silver, his fathers cottage, who was but a sheepherd.

Vision of Daniel the Hermit.

Being engulphed in these vast delights, the Hermit, who knew not what was become of his Eulogius, had a frightful vision, wherein he saw himself suddenly brought before the Tribunal of God. He seemed to stand trembling before this awfull Throne, environed with Angels of fire, who held instruments of terrour in their hands. The Judge sitting with incomparable majesty, looked on him with an insensed eye, and shewed him a man buried in roses, and wasted with riots, saying unto him: Is this then the care thou hast had of thy brothers soul? Afterward turning to the Angels, executours of his justice, Strike (said he) and spare not this respondent. The poor man halfe dead with fear, presently understood this out-cast shewed him, was Eulogius, who having found great riches by his means, led a riotous life at Constantinople. He presently threw himself at the feet of the Judge, humbly beseeching him with tears & groans, to suspend the rod of his indignation, on condition he would reduce his friend unto duty.

He went to Constantinople, and spake to Eulogius.

Verily, he failed not instantly to hasten to the place where he was, and found him in this ample City, the most eminent of the Eastern Empire, in glorious equipage, perpetually near the Kings person, or so overwhelmed with visits, affairs, and delights, that it was a whole moneth before he might speak to him, though he daily much endeavoured it. In the end, it was Gods will one day he was admitted into his Cabinet; when beseeching him to send away his people, for the importance of the business he was to treat, that done, he presently made himself known remembring Eulogius of his former poverty, his trewel, and masons life; adding, that by his prayers he came to this eminent fortune, he confidently blamed him for his ingratitude, and infidelity towards God. The other who took no contentment, that amidst his golden glitter and silk, the old rag of his first fortune should be remembred, brake off the discourse, and shamefully driving him out of his Cabinet, asked his waiters, what they meant to bring a fool and a melancholy lunatick before him; which was the cause the unfortunate Father Daniel was so loaden with blows, that he thought he should have been slain in the place. Yet all bloody, he crept out of the chamber as well as he could, and lifting his eyes up to heaven, humbly besought God, steeping every word in his tears and blood, to send Eulogius not more riches and honours, but disgrace and poverty, knowing it was the onely means to reduce him to reason.

This quickly came to pass as he wished. For the Emperor Justin dying, Eulogius was removed both from the favours he hoped, and those he possessed, which disposed him to a bitterness of heart against Justinian, then seated in the Empire. But it being dangerous to suffer ill affection towards the Prince, to encroach upon the heart, he already was so giddy, that nothing wanted but opportunity to undo himself.

Fall of Eulogius.

Behold here a hideous treason plotted against the new Emperour, which aimed to ruin the whole state of the East, & to bury Constantinople in its ruins: Hypatius, & Pompey, nephews of the Emperour Anastasius, who preceded Justin, had also pretences for the Empire, which having been little countenanced, either through want of time, or defect in their merit, failed not to be reproduced in this new State, wherein Justinian's affairs, seemed, as yet, much unsetled. These Rebels had drawn to their side huge factions of mutinous spirits, and envenomed the peoples mind, by decrying what they could the government of Justinian, under the shadow of exactions of excessive sums of money, levied on all sides. So that in short time, the whole City was seen in arms, and filled with malecontents, who under colour of defence of publick good, committed shameful outrages, and pillages unpunished.

Rebellions and seditions direful for people.

The people never fail to favour rebellions, and to second the evil purposes of the factious, for that is the way to put ones self between two dangers, and to be exposed as a prey to all violence. The Emperour seeing the malignity of this storm, and well understanding he could not divert it but by strong resistance, dispatched the Regiments of the Heruli to over-run the Rebels. They being rough gamesters, made a great massacre of the people, whilst the blind iron made no distinction between forreigner, and native. This served more to exasperate minds transported with extremities, saying: They no longer must hope for safety, since the Prince had sold their lives to Barbarians.

The sedition was so much enkindled, that women and children became parties, ceasing not to throw stones and fire from on high out of windows upon the Emperours souldiers. They seeing themselves charged on all hands, entered into an inexorable fury, which was waited on by so strange a butchery, that it in an instant covered the streets with blood & dead bodies. The Patriarch beholding all this misery, had recourse to the arms of heaven, since earthly Powers could do nothing, so that he presently advanced a procession of Ecclesiasticks, who bare the books of the Gospels, and Images of our Saviour. But the Heruli became then enraged Elephants with the ſight of their bloud, nor could they look on any Image but of revenge, or entertain any Goſpel but the ſword. They onely called force to counſel, when reaſon was baniſhed, and acted all which violent rage might in an unlimited power. You would have ſaid, ſignal had been given for fire and ſword, to commix and confound all that might be diſordered. Crimes were freed from chains, for laws, and Religion, which uſeth to become a veil for protection of ſuppliants, had no obſtacle in it to ſtay the heat of this fight.

The Emperour, who only required to pacifie the ſedition, needs would call the people into the Theater, to ſweeten and inform them of his intentions: but the rebellious cried out inſtantly, it was to deceive, and the more eaſily to enſnare them: and the exceſs of their wickedneſs having taken away the hope of pardon, they took Hypatius, and lifted him on high upon a target, to pronounce him Emperour in ſight of all the world. The whole City ſtood five days in ſo horrible confuſions, that it ſeemed a very image of hell.

In the end, God favouring the right of lawful Princes, Juſtinian found effectual meanes to diſarm rebellion, attracting ſome by great liberalities, and diſ-countenancing the reſt; he ſo changed the face of affairs, mingling likewiſe force with induſtry and favour, that he cauſed Hypatius the imaginary Emperour, to be taken with Pompey his Aſſociate, and condemning them to death, diſſolved the whole conſpiracy, which had before been ſo fatal to the people that thirty thouſand remained dead on the place. Eulogius was far engaged in the faction of Hypatius, ſo that ſaving his life by flight, all his goods were confiſcated. The miſerable man not knowing of what wood to make his arrow, returned to his former trade, and hid himſelf in great obſcurity, to make it a veil for his crimes. Notwithſtanding, moved with remorſe of conſcience, he began in this alteration of ſtate, to make a virtue of his neceſſity, and to ſacrifice his body to penance, which had been vowed to ſenſuality. The Hermit Daniel afterward met him by chance, and perceiving him much milder, and more tractable then he was at Conſtantinople: How goes the world with you, Eulogius, (ſaid he) having been the King in a Tragedy, what part play you now?

To which, all over-covered with ſhame, he replied, His ingratitude had abuſed the bleſſings of God and men, yet for all this not leſſened their goodneſs and that if Father Daniel would once again pray for him, not to reſtore him to the Court, where he too long lived in the death of his innocency, but a little to ſweeten the ſharpneſs of his poverty, he would be grateful for it all days of his life. The Hermit anſwered: Confide not in me, my friend, the experience of your follies hath made me wiſer then I was. Though poverty be irkſom, it is an evil neceſſary for you. Remain in the condition, whereunto your birth diſpoſed you, and ask not riches again, which would only ſerve to make you nought.

GReat things are not unlike the ſources of Nilus, whereof the Ancients ſaid, nature made them rather to be looked after, then found: ſo many great wits have been employed to enquire the cauſes of Predeſtination, yet all have confeſſed: It was an abyſs of the riches of Gods wiſdom and knowledge, whoſe judgments are incomprehenſible, and ways not to be tracked.

Maxims againſt fatality.

Fear not the judgements of God, which of themſelves are nought but juſtice and goodneſs; but fear your works, which have ſo little aſſurance, and ſo much iniquity. Say not your ſalvation is a thing done, and that God having determined it from all eternity, without calling you to counſel, good works can do nothing to advance your happineſs, nor bad to encreaſe your unhappineſs. Know, God, who of his meer bounty calleth you will neither ſave nor damn you, but by juſtice. Think not, it is deſtiny or neceſſity begins this buſineſs: God by his grace hath put the mould and cizars into your hands, to faſhion your ſelf ſuch as you deſire to be reputed. Firſt ſecure your ſelf of your ſelf, by contributing to the graces which prevent you: He who is good to himſelf, ſhall never find God evil.

(a) Notable ſaying of Tertullian.

The great judgement of Tertullian ſore ſtalled the diſputation of men, when he ſaid: (a) It was neither a good faith, nor very ſolid, to referre all to the will of God, and ſo flatter the world, by ſaying, nothing is done in the world without the Ordinance of God: but we muſt underſtand there is ſome power in us, which God himſelf expecteth, to accompliſh the work of our ſalvation. To ſay then, The great God hath determined of us in his eternity, without making any reflection upon our works, Is to make a pillow for the ſloath of ſome, and to prepare a precipice for the deſpair of others. Let us not in this article make God ſo liberal, that he gives us bleſſings wherewith we may take occaſion to be evil, and think his mercy will countenance our ſluggiſhneſs. He ſleepeth too much at eaſe, who thinks to carry his happineſs behind him. (b) What care would you have a man take of his ſalvation, who thinks it depends not at all upon his care, and what deſpair will not ſtrike down a feeble brain, who ſhall imagine all his travels do nothing for his avail towards beatitude, ſince the concluſion of his good or ill hap, were eſtimated without any conſideration of his merit? A labourer would not trouble himſelf to till the ground, which were infallibly condemned to barrenneſs, or to a certain proportion of fruit, and his induſtry to be idle. And who would care to poliſh his ſoul, if his glory were confined without any regard to his free-will? All labours would ſeem nought but wretched acceſſories; and good works, but frivolous amuſements.

True doctrine of Predestination.

2. But when we fix our thoughts upon this verity, which sayes predestination to be a divine Providence by which certain persons are mercifully drawn out of the Mass of corruption, and picked out to be exalted to eternal beatitude by wayes infallible, and that it is chiefly done by the mercy of God, who decreeth in his eternal counsel to prevent us with his grace; and that according to the correspondence we therein ought to use, he judgeth of our good or ill hap: we call it a proposition conform to the doctrine of the Church, advantageous to the glory of God, and infinitely availeable for repose of conscience. These are three points upon which we must insist upon this discourse.

Three points of reasons of this doctrine.

S. Paul, and S. Augustine interpreted in the matter of Predestination.

And first, there is no cause to become jealous upon the words of S. Paul, and Saint Augustine, who seem sometime to attribute all to the meer will of God, without admitting any consideration of our good works. For we must weigh with our selves these two great men, like two huge seas, that through impetuous power of water, swel so upon one brink, that they seem for a time to leave the other dri'e. But as the Ocean, after he hath largely dilated himself upon one side, returns within the limits God prescribed him; so these men falling upon contumacious spirits, who rebel against truth, return into a peaceful equality to build the house of God. The one sought to overthrow a Judaical opinion, which maintained the eternal happines of Predestination was of necessity tied to the blood of Abraham, to Circumcision, to works, and ceremonies of the old Law; without observation of which, the Jews acknowledged no salvation. Behold the cause why the excellent Apostle, who saw in this a contempt of grace, and a manifest foil given to Gentilism, which he had taken into his protection, strongly insisteth and argueth with a torrent of reasons to confound this arrogance of the Hebrews, who boasted the reliques of a dying law, and ran after it with Chymæraes. From whence it comes to pass that all the reasons he produceth, have no other aim but to exalt the mysteries of redemption; and to shew, that the origin and beginning of our salvation consisteth in the grace of Jesus Christ, who calleth us to Christianity of his meer mercy, without consideration of the observation of the Mosaical law, or other works, which preceeded this calling.

Rom. 6. 23. Ephes. 1. 4. S. Aug. l. de prædest. Sanctor. c. 19.

And it is in this sense he saith, grace is life eternal, because it is by it's means we obtain beatitude, and in this sense that he assureth us God chose us before the worlds creation to be Saints, to wit, according to the same interpretation of S. Augustine, we were selected in the idæa's of God from all eternity to participate in the grace of the Gospel, we thereto contributing nothing on our part. For the first grace being the beginning of all merit, cannot be produced by merit. Finally, it is in the same sense he maintaineth God loved Jacob, and hated Esau before they had done good or evil. For it is to be understood he gave temporal favours, and spiritual graces likewise to Jacob, which he gave not to Esau, although he had bestowed on him favour sufficient for his accommodation. Otherwise if one would bring this passage to the point of predestination to glory, who seeth not we must conclude, that as Jacob was predestinated to eternal beatitude without any consideration of good works, so Esau had been reprobated without any regard of his demerits: which is most false, and condemned by the Church. Let us then undoubtedly hold, that all passages of S. Paul, which he alleadgeth in this point, have no other scope, but to exalt the free gift of redemption, and fruits of the Cross of Jesus above all legal ceremonies.

Rom. 9. 11.

3. And as for S. Augustine, he labours mainly to ruine from the top to the bottom the opinion of Pelagians and Semipelagians, whereof the one said we were chosen to glory immediately by the good works we do by our own natural forces; and the other to exercise some corrective upon this opinion, which seemed too rigid, have written, the works of nature dispose us to grace, and grace to glory. Now our eminent Doctour undertaking to humble this proud nature, which they sought to raise to the prejudice of grace, and the blood of our Saviour, gives many assaults, wherein he hath no other aim but to teach us, this Predestination, which he calleth preparation to grace, is not due to the merits of our free-will; but that God by his mercifull bounty poureth it into our hearts, to be the beginning of good works, to which he affordeth life eternal, crowning the favours himself inspired; and in this regard, he with S. Paul exalteth good works, which are productions of that seed of grace, which the Holy Ghost sowed in our hearts. Doth not the Apostle say (a) God predestinated those he foresaw would be conformable to the Image of his Son; where four of the most famous Fathers of the Church S. Cyril, S. Ambrose, S. Chrysostom, and Theodoret, no otherwise understand this passage, but that predestination to glory, followeth the prescience of good works? And what would S. Augustine affirm, when he said (b) the will of God could not be unjust, and that predestination proceeded (besides the grace of God) by most secret merits, which were discovered to this divine eye, that discerneth all the actions of men?

S. August. onely pretended to ruine the opinion of Pelagians.

(b) Quo voluntas Dei injusta esse non potest: venit enim de occultissimis meritis. Apud Mag. lat. dist 41.

4. Is there a soul so replenished with contradiction, which averreth not, That what God doth in a certain time, he determined to do it in his eternity? Now Faith teacheth us, he in that time by him determined, rendereth life eternal to the just for reward of their merit, as himself pronounceth in S. Matthew. (c) And therefore it is necessary to confess, God before all Ages was resolved to give the Crown of glory, not indifferently, but in consideration of good life, and laudable virtues. And for this it is to no purpose to say, the end of our intentions goeth before the means, whereby some infer, God first decreed beatitude, which is the end, then considered good works, which are the address to this end: For I answer, when the end possesseth the place of salary, as this here doth, the merit is always presupposed before the recompence. And although the Master of a Tourneament wisheth the prize to one of his favourites, yet his first intention is, he shall deserve it by his valour. God taketh the like inclinations in this great list of salvation; he wisheth all the world palms, but willeth it to them, who well know how to make use of the helps of his grace.

Manifest reason.

(c) Matth. 25.

Answer to objections.

Thus the most ancient, and gravest Fathers of the Church thought; this sentence they agreed on before the impostures of Pelagians in the golden Age of the Church through a most purified ray. And to this purpose Tertullian said: (d) God, who is very good of his own, was ever just of ours. And S. Hilarie said most perspicuously: (e) That Election was not an effect of judgment indiscreet, but that from the choice of merit, proceeded the distinction made for glory. S. Epiphanius expressed the like opinion, That there was no exception of persons in the proceeding of God, but that it passed according to the merit, or demerit of every one. Behold what we may gather from the soundest tradition of the Church.

The doctrine of the most ancient Fathers concerning predestination.

(e) Hilar. in Psal. 64. Non res indiscreti judicii electio est: sed ex delectu meriti discretio est.

(f) But

(f) But if we now weigh the second Article whereon we insist, which is the glory of God, it is an easie matter to see this opinion, which appropriateth a certain fatality of divine decrees, without other knowledge of cause, agreeth not with this immense bounty of God, nor the sincere will he hath to save all the world: It is not suitable to his justice, nor to his promises, or menaces he makes to virtues, or vices: besides it tormenteth minds, weakens the zeal of souls: and throweth liberty & despair into manners.

(f) The second point of reasons. That God is glorified in that he hath our works for predestination to glory.

Why should not a miserable reprobate have cause hereupon to say: Ah, my Lord! where are the bowels of goodness and mercy, which all pens testifie, all voices proclaim, and laws establish? Is it then of honey for others, and of worm-wood for me? How cometh it to pass without any knowledge of merit, you drew this man from the great mass of corruption, to make him a son of your adoption, a coheir of your glory, and have left me as a black victim, marked with a character of Death? What importeth it me, that in this first choice you made, you did not condemn me without knowledge of cause? to think no good for me, was to think ill enough for me. Was I then able to row against the torrent of your power? Could I intrude into your Paradise, which you have fitly disposed like the Halcyons nest, whereunto nothing can enter but its own bird? You have built your Palace of a certain number of chosen pieces, in such sort, that the account thereof being made, and proportions valued, one small grain might not be added to encrease the number. What could I do in this dreadful exclusion, but accuse your bounty, and deplore my unhappiness?

The complaint a Reprobate may make.

Behold what a reprobate soul may object: and it were bootless to answer, that a bruit beast might complain in this fashion, that God had not made it a man, or the like might be alledged for infants, who dy without Baptism: For as concerning beasts, nothing is taken from them, rather much given, when from nothing, being and life is afforded them with contentments of nature; and as for little infants, they endure no evil, and are no more disturbed to be deprived of the sight of God, then was Nebuchadnezzar for the Scepter of Babylon, when he in his infancy was bred among shepheards, thinking himself the son of a Peasant, and wholly ignorant of his Royal extraction. But to say, A man who dies at the age of discretion, and is delivered over to eternal flames, was condemned by God, without any other fore-sight of his works, is it not a cruelty, not worthy of ought but Calvinism? as if a father might be excusable in marrying one daughter richly, and cutting the others throat, to set her on a pyle. He who would judge wisely, must fly the very shadow of an opinion so damnable, and all which may seem to favour it.

Aug. de verbo Apost. ser. 11. Si posset loqui pecus, & dicere Deo, quare istum fecisti hominem, mepecudem? Answer to objections. Glosa in Danielem

6. Now as concerning the Doctrine which establisheth Predestination upon grace and prevision of good works, it seems to strech far towards the point of Gods greatest glory. It discovereth us his science in attributing unto him an infinite survey over all the actions of Adams children before all Ages by which it seasonably fore-saw all that was to be done, by all particulars, in so great a revolution of times: It in an instant affordeth us this most innocent knowledge, seeing we learn by the same way, that the prescience which God hath of our works, is no more the cause of our happiness, then my memory of the fireing of Rome, which happened under Nero; or then mine eye of the whiteness of snow, and fresh verdure of meadows by its simple aspects. Nothing hapneth because God fore-saw it, but God fore-saw it, because it should so happen by motion of our free-will, and not by the laws of necessity.

The fruits of Gods glory derived from our Maxim.

Quinon est præscius omnium futurorum non est Deus. Aug. de civit. Dei l. 5. c. 9.

Moreover, the Justice of the great Master is very eminent in this action; for we do not say he works at random, and seeks to make boast of his power in the misery of mortals: but with the Scripture, that he separateth light from darkness with a diamond, to wit, a most strong and resplendent knowledge of the merit and demerit of men. What sense is there to make a power, which takes its glory from ignorance, and is potent in contempt of reason? Is not this to make all terrible, even to its own favours? What sense is it to appoint a Judge to satisfie the whole world according to desart, and to make him sign Decrees irrevocable in favour of some one, before knowledge of all merit? Cannot we make him potent, unless we make him unjust?

A notable passage. Adamanta discrevit in cem & tenebras. Eccles. 16. 14. Secundum 70.

Add also, that in the seeling we have of Predestination, the mercy of the most mild Father shineth with visible marks. For we do not make him to damn him through a negligence of thoughts, and coldness of affection, which cannot be in a God so active, or a heart so loving: but we believe his goodness extendeth to Cain and Judas, and would they have endeavoured, they had the means to gain beatitude, which never fails any man, if he want not correspondence.

Goodness of God

In the end, we likewise acknowledge in this point the most prudent government of God, who will have nothing idle in nature, nor grace. He could enlighten us without the Sun, and afford us fruit without the earth: but he will his creatures operate, and that one unfold the rays of his substance, another supply with the juice of its bosom. In like manner, he is pleased we make his grace to profit us, to raise our riches out of his favours and derive our glory from his bounty. He will give a title of merit to our happiness, to advance the quality of his gifts. He will crown in us, what comes from himself, as if it were wholly ours. Why shall we shut up the eys of his wisdom? why ty up the hands of his liberality? An Ancient said, He more esteemed the judgment of certain men, then their proper benefits. God will, we value both in him, that we enjoy his bounty by favour, and his judgement by merit. The actions of the Sovereign Monarch are free from controul, as his gifts from repentance.

Si voluisti Esau, & concurrisset, & Dei adjutorio pervenisset. Aug. ad Simp. l. 1. q. 2.

I will leave you now to conclude, what quiet we may have in our consciences upon the matter of Predestination. I leave you to think, whether a good soul have not cause to say: O be the Divine Providence praised for evermore, since it so worthily hath provided for me. I cannot adore its counsels, unless I love its goodness. It sweeteneth my pains, it comforteth my cares when it teacheth me, my eternal happiness depends on him and me; on him, who loveth me tenderly, and on me, who cannot hate my self, unless I derogate from my essence, after I have failed in all virtues. Courage then, we roul not under this fatality which writeth laws on diamonds, and ties us to inevitable necessities. The fodder is not cast, we have yet the mettal boyling apace in hand; we may appear on the mould of virtue, we may make our selves such by the grace of God, as to put our salvation in assurance, our life into repose, and death into crowns.

Third point. Repose of conscience.

I cannot fear God with a slavish fear, since he is nought but goodness: but I will ever dread my works, since I am frailty it self. Let us hereafter live in such sort, as we would be judged. Let us consecrate our life to innocency, and banish all sin. Let us undertake piety, humility, obedience, alms, and devotion towards the Blessed Virgin, which are most assured marks of Predestination. Let us not presume of our own forces, nor despair likewise of Gods mercy. If we stand upright, let us still fear the declining of nature, which easily bendeth to evil, and if we stoop, let us quickly raise our selves again, making all avail to our salvation, yea, our proper falls. We have a great Advocate in heaven, who openeth as many wounds for us, as we have inflicted wounds on his body. We have inflicted them through cruelty, and they will receive us through mercy, serving us towards Heaven for a chariot of triumph, as they were to us on earth a mirrour in life, and a sepulcher in death.

The sixth EXAMPLE upon the sixth MAXIM.

Of the secret Power of Predestination.
PROCOPIUS.

Marvellous secret of Predestination.

PRedestination is an admirable secret, wherein experience teacheth us, there is nothing which the happy ought not to fear, nor any thing the miserable may not hope. Stars fall from the firmament, to be changed into dung-hils, and dung-hils of the earth mount up to Heaven to be metamorphosed into stars. The graces of God insinuate themselves by secret wayes, and the impressions of the will are extreamly nice: all that past, is a dream, and the future a cloud, where thunders murmur in the dark.

Historia Patrum orient. & Rader.

We tremble when we read in the History of holy Fathers, that an Hermit, grown white in the austerities of Religion, understanding a notable thief had gained Heaven by a sigh he cast forth in the instant of his death, was much displeased, and presently became nought, because God was good, blaming his mercy, to try his justice: for one sole censure made him loose forty years of penance, and drew his foot out of Paradise, to deliver his soul to hell. I purpose here consequently to produce a singular conversion, that you may admire, and fear the secret wayes of God. Simeon of Constantinople is the Authour of it, who enlarged it with many words, but I will abbreviate it into good proportion, which shall render it no whit the less effectual.

Actor. 12.

Procopius presented to Diocles.

The Emperour Diocletian having pacified Egypt, sojourned sometime in Antioch, of purpose to destroy the name of Jesus Christ, in the same place where the faithfull began to be called Christians. Theodosia, a great Lady, came to him, bringing her son along with her, named Neanias, in very good equipage, with purpose to prefer him in Court, and satisfie her ambition. To make her selfe the more acceptable, she freely protested, her deceased husband died a Christian, that she had often attempted to work him to forsake this superstition, adverse to Gods and men, and that being unable to prevail upon his inveterate obstinacy, she had manured this young plant, (speaking of her son) carefully training him in the service of the gods and Prince, with infinite detestation against Christianity.

Diocletian, who was much delighted with such accidents, loudly praised the Lady, and casting his eye on Neanias, he found him of handsom shape, good presence, understanding, and valiant, whereof he conceived great hope he might prove hereafter a principal instrument of his desires. That which also pleased him the more, was, that putting him on the discourse of his education, he said his father did all he could to win him to Christianity, but that he ever stuck to his mothers side, not enduring the impertinencies of a Religion, which professe h a son as old as his father, a mother without a husband, a childbirth joyned to virginity, a God crucified, a Cross divinized, and such other extravagancies, whereat he set himself a jeering with so much tattle, that he gained the Emperours heart.

Scoffs have this proper in them, that they penetrate very far into jocund minds; and though they proceed from a soft spirit, they often make more impression, then iron. The Emperour so well liked his humour, that he gave him a charge in the City of Alexandria, with two Companies to forrage round about, and cleanse the Country from the sect of Christians. The mother conceived much joy thereat, and the son, who seemed already to touch Heaven with a finger, put himself into action for accomplishment of his Commission.

Admirable Conversion.

But, O the bottomless depth of Gods judgments! Behold he going about to surprize, is surprized, and of a Lion is become a Lamb, and of one victorious, a victim. He being near the City of Apamea in Syria, the earth shook under his feet, the air was inflamed with lightning, and thunders roared in the clouds, a voice came from Heaven, which said unto him: Neanias, whither goest thou, and to what purpose is this equipage? He, although much astonished, answered it was for the Christians, The voice replied, Is it then to me you go? But he, having the hardness to ask it, who are you, saw a Cross in the air, and heard these words: I am Jesus the Crucified, Son of the living God, and you shall hereafter be a vessel of election for me. This vision beat him down, to raise him like S. Paul, and of a persecutour, in a moment made him a Confessour. He secretly sent for a Goldsmith, and causing him to make a rich Cross, he embraced it, he kissed it, and carried it hanging about his neck, to engrave it in his heart.

In stead of persecuting the Christians, he turned his arms against a race of Saracens, who over-ran the Country, and ravished maids to satisfie their bruitishness, which filled houses with terrour and tears. The Cross gave great success to his arms, and in short time having chased away this pernicious faction, he went to the City of Antioch, being already fully instructed in the points of his religion.

Interview between Procopius and his mother.

The mother, who knew not what had passed in this matter, entertains him with much joy, not satisfying her self either with his sight, or in congratulating his triumphs. But he, who no longer cared for any thing under God, said: I have obtained other victories which you know not. And what? replied the mother. Madam, I have vanquished my self by the grace of God, and departing hence a Pagan, am returned a Christian, desiring nothing more in the world of you, but since you gave me birth, you will take example from me. How, my son (sayes the mother) you are disposed to be merry. No, replies he, and drawing out his Cross, behold, said he, the marks of the Religion I profess. She much amazed, drew him aside into her closet, and asked him, who had recommended this abomination to him, and whether he were become a fool? There are none but fools (said he) who with reverence look after deaf and dumb gods; the time is come these feeble Deities must be abjured, and all the works of darkness: and speaking this, he ransacked his mothers closet, which was very sumptuous, breaking and throwing down the golden and silver idols, and withal saying, these silly entertainments were onely good to make money of to distribute among the poor.

Theodosia

Revenge of Theodosia.

Theodosia was so offended at this act, that without any regard of blood, and nature, she went to the Emperour, and related all had passed, resolving rather to deliver her sole son to executioners, then to lose the satisfaction of her revenge. Diocletian as much surprised with astonishment, as enflamed with anger, having praised the mother for her zeal, wrote to Justus Governour of Palestine, and commanded him to seize on the person of Neanias, and to seek by all means to reduce him to obedience, and in case of refusal, to take away his sword, and proceed against him with all the rigour of punishments ordained for Christians.

The Governour having received the Emperours Mandate, went with his Guards to the house of Neanias, and signified the tenour of his Commission, withal delivering into his hand the Emperours Letters, wherein perceiving some blasphemies against our Saviour, he tare them in pieces, and said to Justus: Execute your Commission; I have a body to suffer, but not a soul to betray my Religion. The other conjured him by all the wayes of friendship, to take pity of his age, and not become an enemy to his own life and fortune, adding, temerarious counsels are sources of irrecoverable evils. But the valorous Champion drawing out his sword, threw it at the Judge's feet, professing he was wholly gained to Jesus Christ, whereupon he fettered him, and led him to Cæsarea.

Constancy of Procopius.

His sufferings for Religion.

In few daies he was brought to the Palace, to answer upon accusations objected, which he most freely averred, persisting in the confession of his faith with admirable constancy, which was the cause, the Judge proceeding according to ordinary forms exercised against the faithful, made him cruelly be beaten with rods in sight of all the world. Diocletian thought by these shameful and barbarous wayes, to stifle Christianity: but these outrages practised upon men of quality, enkindled the courage of Christians, and sowed seeds of Martyrs. Many Pagans were seen, who deplored this punishment, beholding a young Lord whom they had lately seen triumphant in courtesie, in arms, and valour, delivered into the hands of hangmen, to be used like a thief. The Martyr perceiving the peoples tears, said; Fathers, and Brethren, bewail not my sufferings, lament your own errours; my pains will pass away, but the torment of infidelity shall be everlasting. Then lifting his eyes to Heaven, he fervently besought God to fortifie him in his combats, to whom he resigned the total glory. Justus seeing him more courageous then he wished, sent him back unto the prison, where he was comforted with the sight of Angels, and it is said, our Saviour himself appearing, baptized him with his own hands, and gave him the name of Procopius, and heartened him, bravely to finish his combats.

The next day he came forth of Prison, like the Sun out of clouds, his body reflecting lustre and Majesty, when they thought him spent with excess of torments. The whole City was filled with rumour, and many souldiers secretly coming to the Bishop Leontius, were converted to faith, whereof the Governor advertised, made them presently to be beheaded, fearing to exasperate the Bands, if he longer deferred their Execution. Procopius having once again been tormented, before he was brought back to prison, recommended these first victims to Heaven by his prayers, whose example was quickly waited on by twelve Ladies, full of honour, who made open profession of faith. Justus thinking it was a feminine heat, which would be quenched when torments were applied to their bodies, caused them cruelly to be tortured, commanded their sides and arm-holes to be burnt, yet they persevered, singing and praising God in the ardour of the most exquisite torments.

Theodosia mother of our Martyr, being present at this spectacle, felt her self touched to the quick: for the spirit of God entred powerfully into her. It suddenly took off the film, which in her had clouded the light of reason, making her see into the bottom of her soul, at which she conceived much horrour.

Change of Theodosia.

Alas then, said she, within her self, who ever lodged a heart so barbarous as thine, in the body of a woman? All the blood thou seest shed, distilleth now to satisfie a revenge thou conceivedst against thine own blood. Thy son is in prison all rent and torn, and if he yet have not rendred up his soul, he keeps it on his lips, expecting (perhaps) thy last words. If thou art not yet satisfied, go bathe thy self in his wounds, and pull away that little life nature gave him by thy means, and which cruelty taketh from him by thy practises. Ah Theodosia, the most rigorous of women, and the most unfortunate of Mothers, though thou hast abjured nature, renounce not the God of nature. Hear the voice which speaketh in thy heart, and render thee to that Jesus who begins to resign thee up to thy self. Why wilt thou not do, what they all before thine eyes? They have neither hearts of steel, nor bodies of brass, more then thou: but more resolution, because far greater faith. And why shouldst not thou be faithfull, by imitating their example. If thou hast provoked God's mercy, thou hast not wasted it. Let us go to Heaven by the purple way, since the Providence of Heaven presenteth it unto thee. The blood of thy poor son yet speaks to thee in so many tongues, as there are drops of it shed in the streets. Let us follow him, and never think that done too late, which soon shall work thy eternal salvation.

She feeling the combat of these cogitations in her heart, suddenly cryed out, as in an extasie: I am a Christian. The Judge, who feared this act, gave semblance to hear nothing of it, but she redoubled her voice so loudly, and made so solemn a profession, that it was impossible for him to dissemble it: so that seeing she would not desist from this resolution, he was enforced to send her into the prison, where her son remained.

Procopius beholding her to come fettered with other Ladies, was infinitely joyed at this spectacle, and cryed out aloud:

Madam, my dear mother, who brings you? To whom she answered: Loving son, the cause which put you here, brought me hither to be the companion of your death, since I am the murderess of your life. I have betrayed blood and nature, and delivered my bowels to executioners, to satisfie passion. Vertue and honour being lost, nought else remains for me, but the happiness to dy with you for Jesus Christ. It is, Son, at this instant, I must accomplish the words you spoke to me at your return, that I should take example from you, as you birth from me. O God, most honoured Mother, behold here a great touch from Heaven, (said Procopius*) I have nothing more to wish in the world, since I this day behold you the precious conquest of* Jesus Christ. It is at this time, when being a Mother by nature, you shall likewise be a Mother to me by the example of your pity: You are come to the point whether God would have you, and all that is past, was but to augment the glory of your conversion. Let us go by the way of blood, to the place where the soul of your good Husband, and my dearest father, expecteth us.

His imprisonment and martyrdom.

These two hearts wholly dissolved into the love of God, spake in thought, having not language enough to express their affection. Theodosia being in a short time after baptized by Leontius, was led to execution with the twelve Ladies, where she appeared as the singular ornament of this holy Quire, leaving her head in the place, where she had first confessed Jesus Christ, with a constancy so heroick, that she drew drew teares from all the world. Procopius having been tumbled up and down at divers Sessions before the Tribunals, whipped, roasted, broyled, salted, torn in all his body, the strength of his courage no whit shaken, stretched out his neck to the Executioner, and yielded up his fair soul to God, learning in the conversion of his mother, and his own, the Divine power of this great Predestination.

VII. MAXIM.

Of the Divinity of JESUS.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That God will be served in any kinde, and that every Sect hath reason in its Religion.

THis Maxim of the Prophane Court, is an old dotage of obsequious spirits, who having no zeal for faith, and likewise less courage against impiety, do in appearance approve all Religions, and follow none. That is it which made Symmachus say, God was a great secret, and that it was no wonder every one sought after it, and spake according to his weak endeavour of it, some in one fashion, and some in another: That is it also which made Maximus Madaurensis write, He was too great to enter whole and entire into the understanding of man; but must be taken piece-meal, every one contenting himself to adore some Symbol of God, which seemed most convenient unto him.

Behold the shortest way can be taken to arrive at gross impiety; for it is to make a Roman Pantheon of Religion, where you shall have a thousand imaginary Divinities, without one least glimmer of the knowledge of the true God. Lies for some space accord together, although they spare not to oppose one another; but true Religion hath this property, to tend wholly to Monarchy, and if you speak to it of tolerating other Sects, as if they were reasonable, it is to thrust thorns into the feet, and put straws into the eys of it.

2 Cor. 6. Jesus hath nothing to do with Belial, the faithful with the unfaithful, nor the Temple of God with the Synagogue of Devils. All Religions which wander from the ray of Christian and Catholick verity, are but Chymæra's of piety, spectres of wisdom, and flames, which lead these souls into an abyss of fire and darkness. There is but one Redeemer, to whom are due all services and adorations. And it is my desire for your comfort to shew you, that the Authours of all Sects, having in the end appeared so monstrous, it only appertained to the Eternal Son of the Father Celestial, to bear the testimony of all creatures for the homage of his Divinity.

Of the revelation of the WORD INCARNATE, and how all Creatures bear witness of his Divinity.

THe great God, whom the Prophet Isaiah called the hidden God and who according to the saying of the Psalmist, had spread round about his Throne a veil of darkness impenetrable to mortal eys, was unscarsed in the Crib, in the first of his days in such sort, that you need lift up but simple cloaths to know him. The Word Incarnate so visibly replenisheth all the world with its knowledge, that a man must be blinde not to see its lights, and stupid to resist its love. We will content our selves at this time to express three proofs; The one drawn from the voice of insensible Nature, the other from reasonable Nature, and the third from divine reasons.

THE HOLY COURT.

That none but Jesus is Author of truth and salvation, to whom all Creatures bear witness of his Divinity.

It is an admirable thing to see, that Heaven and the elements have been willing to bear a part in the great harmony, which hath manifested the Word Eternal to the world involved in times, and the increated Wisdom included in the body of an infant. If we will look into signs from Heaven, I may say, that at the approach of this Nativity, the Sun appeared incompassed with a marvellous Rainbow, willing thereby to give notice, the time of reconciliation was near, and that the great Mediatour, who should reunite all things in his Person, came to sanctifie the world by an universal peace. Voice of Nature. Oros. l. 6. c. 20. Sust in Ang. c. 95. Senec. l. nat. qq. Dio. l. 45.

I might alledge what was witnessed by Entropius in his sixth Book, and by Eusebius in his Chronicle, how three Suns were seen to shine at one time afterward united and incorporated in one sole Globe: in my opinion, so to denote three substances, to wit, of the Word, the Soul, and flesh conjoyned in the sole person of our Saviour. I could say, how at that instant the Sun was invironed with three circles, the one whereof bare a Coronet of ears of corn, to testifie the plenty, which the Word Incarnate should bring into the world. I could add what Albumasar the Chaldean wrote in his Introduction, sixth Treatise, and first Definition, touching the apparition of a Virgin in the first aspect of the sign Virgo. But let us rest satisfied, that Heaven spake aloud, making use of a new Star, as of a tongue to declare the living God, and that this apparition became so famous, that even Infidels had authentick testimonies thereof, as we may see in the narration of Chalcidius, a Platonick Philosopher. And it is strange, that Pliny (a) himself speaketh of a certain Star with silver rays, infinitely resplendent, which shewed God in a humane figure Three Suns. Plin. l. 2. c. 31. (a) Plin. c. 25. l. 2. Fit & candidius cometes argentea crine refulgens, ut vix contueri liceat, specie humana Deos effigiem in se ostendens.

If we speak of the Air, know we not it was illustrated with a great and Divine light, which Saint Luke called (b) the glory of God. If we speak of waters; Tradition teacheth us, a Fountain was seen to spring in a poor Stable, which was honoured first with the birth of the Son of God (c). If we speak of the Earth, hath it not contributed to the revelation of the Word, when it made some of its Trees bow, to adore the Saviour (d)? Did it not bear flowers visibly imprinted with the most noble characters of the living God, as Rovillius depainteth the Granadil? The Birds of the Air have rendred their homage by (b) Gloria Domini circumfulsit eos. (c) Baronius. (d) Sozomen. l. 5. c. 2. Rovillius de plantis. Joan. 1. 32. Matth. 17. 27.

the means of a dove, which appeared in the Baptiſm; fiſhes in that, which ſerved as a Steward, and Caſh-maſter to Jeſus Chriſt. Four-footed beaſts were remarkable in the crib, becauſe we have learned from the Prophet Iſaiah, the Ox hath known his Maſter, and the Aſs the crib of his Lord.

(e) Voice of Prophecie.

2. (e) If we paſs from the voice of nature, to voices divinely humane, as are predictions; what is there more admirable than the univerſal conſent of propheſies? He who ſhould tell us, that a moſt beautiful ſtatue of white marble had been ſeen in a Temple, all framed of pieces laid together, made by ſundry artizans in divers Ages, in ſuch ſort, that one began the head of this ſtatue, having no other determinate deſign; the other not ſeeing the head which was made, nor knowing it to be done, made a body, another an arm, another a hand, another a leg, another a foot, in the end, every one made his part, purſuing the ſame courſe; none of theſe excellent Maſters knowing ought of his companions works: Notwithſtanding, that all theſe pieces, wrought in ſundry Ages, by ſo many ſeveral hands, and in provinces ſo far diſtant one from another, being ſet together, it was found every piece was ſo curiouſly compoſed, and fitted to the entire body of the ſtatue, that it might be ſaid, All theſe Sculptours had long agreed together for the accompliſhment of ſuch a work.

If then this diſcourſe in the Idæa's of men, have any place in the truth of Hiſtories, as many have thought, muſt we not ſay ſome Intelligence governed the minds of all theſe Artizans, to cauſe them inſenſibly to conſent in all the dimenſions of this Maſter piece ſo excellent and exact?

Let us here ſay the like, when we behold the great model of the Word Incarnate, which God placed in the frontiſ-piece of his works, to be admired and adored by all intellectual Nature. We find Prophets divided one from another, the diſtance of many hundred years, different in age, humour, condition, ſtyle, invention, order, and connexion, who could neither ſee one another, nor agree together in any kind, as were David, Daniel, and Iſaiah: yet all without mutual knowledge laboured in the Hiſtory of the great Saviour of men; one ſpeaketh of his birth, another of his life, another of his doctrine, another of his manners, another of his miracles, another of his death, another of his victories and triumphs. When we take pains to gather together, and conſider all theſe pieces, we find them meaſured and fitted with ſuch proportion, that we are enforced to affirm, it is not a work of mortal hands, but an enterprize of the Spirit of God.

Excellent propheſies touching our Saviour. 49. Geneſ. Non auferetur ſceptrum de Juda, &c. Donec veniat qui mittendus eſt.

Who inſpired the Patriarch Jacob, that propheſied ſo many years before all Prophets, that the Meſſias, who was the hope of all Nations ſhould come, when the Scepter of Judea was taken out of the hands of Judah's race: which was fulfilled punctuall in the time of Herod, who put the true Heirs of this Royal Line to death, to ſatisfie his ambition, and content his tyranny? who dictated to the Prophet Daniel, (a) that after the Edict of King Artaxerxes, granted in favour of the re-eſtabliſhment of the Temple, there ſhould be 70. weeks to the birth of Chriſt, that is to ſay, the ſpace of 490. years, which was found true by calculation of the beſt Hiſtoriãs Who made the Prophet Aggeus ſpeak with this thundring majeſty, and worthy the lips of the God of Hoſts, WITHIN A SHORT TIME I WILL MOVE HEAVEN, EARTH, AND SEA, THE DESIRED BY ALL NATIONS OF THE WORLD SHAL COME, AND I WILL RPLENISH THIS HOUSE WITH GLORY? Was it not the ſame Spirit, which afterward wrought thoſe great myſteries we ſee; who then ſhewed them to his faithful ſervants? it is he who guided the pen of Iſaiah, when he proclaimed the Meſſias ſhould be born of a Virgin: he, who revealed to the Prophet Micha, this birth ſhould happen in Bethlehem: he who opened the eys of Zachary, to ſee him in the triumph he afterwards made in Jeruſalem: he, who deciphered to David all the particularities of his paſſion in the ſecond Pſalm. This great conſent of Prophets without deſign or art, aſtoniſhed the Jews, who had the Scriptures in their hands, and could reckon up all the verſicles of their Bible. They well ſaw, it was the uncontroulable voice of Prophets, but their vanity had ſo blinded them, that they rather wiſhed to have no Meſſias, than to acknowledge him poor according to the world, although his very poverty had been reckoned by the Prophets in the number of his greatneſſes.

Strange teſtimony of Gentiliſm.

3. Perhaps it will appear to be leſs ſtrange, that the Hebrews, who were a choſen people, had ſo many revelations touching the Word of God. But who will not be rapt with admiration, to conſider the words, which the wiſeſt, the greateſt, and moſt glorious of Gentiliſm, left to poſterity, concerning this myſtery? I ſpeak not of Triſmegiſtus, of Pythagoras, of Numenius, nor of others, whoſe writings may be called in queſtion. I ſpeak of Plato, Ariſtotle, Cicero. How came that into Plato's mind, which he ſo eloquently afterward couched in the fourth book of his laws? to wit:

(a) That God ſhould be to men the rule and meaſure of all things, and principally if it were ſo, or ought to be ſo in any part of the world, that there were a Man-God.

(a) Ὅτι θεὸς μέτρον τῶν χρημάτων μάλιστον, καὶ μᾶλλον

From whence think you came it, that Ariſtotle, who proceeded ſo adviſedly in all his Maxims, let this word fall:

(b) That it was no unbeſeeming thing for the Gods immortal, to reveſt themſelves with humane nature, to deſtroy the errours, which were crept into the world?

(b) Οὐκ ἄτοπος, ὡς φασὶν, ἀνθρωπόις δεῖν.

(c) That the time would come, there ſhould be no other law at Rome, than at Athens: but that amongſt all Nations, and in all times, there ſhould be one ſame, eternal, and immutable law, one common Maſter, and Emperour over all, which ſhould be God himſelf, the inventour, teacher, and introducer of this law: and that he who obeyed him not, ſhould flie from himſelf, as a deſpiſer of his own nature. But in this alone, that he would not obey, he were grievouſly chaſtiſed, although he might eſcape all other puniſhment.

It were a thing ſuperfluous, to alledg here the verſes of the Sybils, which it is known were ſo expreſs, that many of the principal of the Gentiles were converted to Chriſtiãity, by reading the teſtimonys theſe divine women, rendered of the Word incarnate.

We all likewiſe know, God to make this argument the more viſible, permitted a little before the Nativity of our Saviour, that Virgil, the moſt eminent of all Poets, compoſed that his excellent work, where he expreſſeth in Latin verſe the conceptions of Sybilla Cumæa, and ſpeaketh plainly of a child which ſhould be ſent from Heaven to pardon the ſins of men, and fill the earth with bleſſings. And to ſhew this was not alone in the minds of particulars, we read that towards the reign of Auguſtus, Julius Marathus foretold, Nature ſhould bring forth a King for the Worlds Empire. Which ſo amazed the Senate, according to the relation of Suetonius (d) the Hiſtorian, that they forbad to breed up children which which ſhould be born within the time this South-ſayer had prefixed. Doth not Joſephus alſo make mention of the prediction, which ſaid: Nations come from Judea ſhould become Maſters of the univerſe? The Romans underſtood not this language, but applyed it, ſome to Auguſtus, others to Veſpaſian, until ſuch time as truth drew aſide the curtain, and made the accompliſhment of theſe predictions, perſpicuouſly appear in the Perſon of our Saviour.

Joſeph. l. 7. c. 11. de bello Judaico.

Nay not ſo much as Porphyrie, yea Mahomet, and devils, but give ſome Elogie of honour to Jeſus. Porphyrie in the Treatiſe he made of the bleſſings of Philoſophy, ſaith: It is a great matter that devils themſelves have ſpoken in favour of Jeſus, confeſſing him to be endowed with ſingular piety, for which cauſe he entred into poſſeſſion of moſt happy immortality. And Mahomet: That the ſpirit of God bare record to Chriſt the Son of Mary; that the ſoul of God was given him; that he is the Meſſenger, Spirit, and Word of God; that his doctrine is perfect, and enlighteneth the Old Teſtament. O God of the univerſe, how powerfull is verity, to derive teſtimonies in favour of his Word from the very lips of the moſt prophane!

Porphyrius, περὶ τοῦ λογ. φιλοσοφ.

Alcoran. Azoar. 1. 4. 11. 13.

4. Let us adde alſo ſome divine reaſons in this brevity, whereunto we have voluntarily confined our ſelves. Who ſees not that humane underſtanding, conſtrain'd by the conſideration of myſteries, doth homage alſo to the Incarnation of the Son of God? Where is that darkneſs which can hinder the bright day of faith? What can Infidels ſay? That this myſtery is impoſſible? Impoſſible, how? Either on Gods part, or mans, or from the repugnance of humane underſtanding with ſuch like propoſitions, becauſe by their ſaying they involve contradictions. How, would it not be poſsible to God, he being Omnipotent, Immenſe, Infinite? How, according to the confeſsion of ancient Philoſophers, can he repleniſh all the world with his Divinity, and is not able to accommodate himſelf with enough of it to divinize his holy Humanity? Is it becauſe we ſay it is united to the Word in this myſtery, in a quite other faſhion, than the Spirit of God is with the world? I admit it: For the union of it is truly perſonal. But muſt it not be confeſſed, the Word in this divine Eſſence, as under title of efficient cauſe, it hath an influence infinite over all the effects of the world, and as under title of final cauſe, it hath a capacity to limit and meaſure all the inclinations of creatures; ſo under title of ſubſtantial bound, it may confine and accompliſh by its perſonality all poſsible Eſſence? Why ſhall we tie the hands of Divine bounty in its communications, ſince it binds not our underſtanding in its conceptions?

Reaſons of ſeemlineſs.

Is it not a ſhamefull thing, that man will eſtimate, and ſet a value upon the Divine Eſſence? If God pleaſe not man, he ſhall not be God. Should we ſay, man is incapable of this communication? And how is it, that the holy Humanity reſiſted the Omnipotency of God, to the prejudice of his own exaltation, ſince it is found as ſoon in the union of the Word, as in the poſſeſsion of Eſſence? See we not in nature, that the rays of the Sun draw up vapours from the earth, and incorporated with them, do create Meteors in the air, not any one making reſiſtance to his exaltation? What contradiction can there be in our underſtanding againſt ſuch a maxim, ſeeing it appears the moſt famous Philoſopher ſaid, This union of God with man, might be very fit, and Plutarch alſo ſpeaking of the communication of the Creatour with the creature, pronounced theſe words, That God was not a lover of birds, nor other living creatures, but a lover of men; and that it is a very reaſonable matter that he communicate himſelf to his loves, and delights?

Plutarch. in Numa. Θεὸς δὲ φίλορνις, ἢ φιλόσηρ, ἀλλὰ φιλάνθρωπος.

But this would ſeem to abaſe the divinity. Hear what Voluſianus ſaid: I wonder, that he, to whom this whole univerſe is ſo ſmall, can be ſhut up within the body of a little child, having a mouth open to cry, as others.

Voluſianus. Miror ſi iniva corpus vagientis infantiæ latet cui parvæ putatur univerſitas, &c.

What uncomelineſs is there, if God be united to a little body? Have not Plinie (a) and Seneca (b) ſaid That nature was never ſo admirable as in little bodys, and that it was a ſlavery in Great-ones, to be unable to be little? I wonder the Sovereign Lord of all things is ſo long abſent from Heaven, and that all the government of the world is transferred to ſo little a creature. From whence proceedeth this amazement, but from the baſeneſs of our thoughts? If we ſaid, God being made man, ceaſed to be God, and were deſpoiled of his Empire, greatneſs, Eſſence, there would be ſomewhat wherwith to queſtion this Myſtery: but when we ſay God came to Man by inclination of a Sovereign bounty and mercy, not leaving himſelf, when we ſay humane nature is received into the Word, as a ſmall ſource into a huge river, and not looſing its Eſſence, is fixed upon the perſonality of the Word it ſelf, is it not to honour the power, majeſty, and wiſdom of God?

(b) Servitus magnitudinis, non poſſe fieri minorem. Senec. Homo quippe ad Deum acceſsit. Deus à ſe non deciſsit. Auguſt.

5. In what were the Divinity abaſed? Can it be in doing a work ſo noble, ſo ſingular, ſo divine, that it deſerveth to entertain the thoughts of men and Angels, through times and eternity? what is more ſpecious, and more ſweet, than to repreſent to ones ſelf the Perſon of our Saviour, who in himſelf makes an alliance of all was moſt eminent in ſpiritual and corporal nature, to wit, of God and man; verily, ſay I, one compoſed of an unheard-of compoſition, to render the majeſty of his father palpable, and viſible, to the hands and eyes of mortals? What dignity, to behold in the world a Man-God, become a part of the world, to poſſeſs the Spirit of God from all eternity, who propoſed this perſon as the end of his communications, the bound of his power, the firſt-born of all creatures; who held all Ages in breath for him, all hearts in deſires, all minds in expectation, all creatures in propheſies? The Book of God hath written me in the beginning of its firſt page, ſaid the Word with the Pſalmiſt.

In capite libri ſcriptum eſt de me. Pſal. 39. 8.

All creatures of this great univerſe, all predictions and conceptions of theſe two great books, the world and the Bible, tended to the accompliſhment and revelation of the God-Man, who ſhould ſet a golden head upon all nature intelligent, ſenſitive, and vegetative. All creatures were but leaves, and flowers that promiſed the great fruit which the Prophet calleth, The fruit of earth ſublime.

Iſaiah. 4. 2.

We muſt religiouſly ſpeak what deſerveth to be heard with reverence: It is for this incomparable man that God created the world, and all creatures are but as ſilly rays from the Diadem of glory, which covereth his head.

Religioſè dicendum, reverenter audiendum eſt, quia propter hanc hominem gloria & honore, coronandum Deus omnia creavit. Rupert. l. 13. de glor. Trinit. & proceſſ. Spi. Sancti.

What a ſpectacle to ſee them all wound up as the ſtrings of a harp, to praiſe and declare unto men the Name of God, to behold the nine Quires of Angels enter into this conſort, and every one of them to honour this firſt Eſſence, by ſo many diſtinct perfections; notwithſtanding all to confeſs their ability, cannot reach that degree which the Divine greatneſs meriteth? And thereupon behold here the Word Incarnate, which paſſing through all the ſpheres of nature, grace, and glory, enter into the new ſphere of the hypoſtatical union, where it appears as a rainbow imprinted with all the beauties of the father, he manifeſteth them to men, and making himſelf an adoring God, a loving God, an honouring God, he adoreth, he loveth, he honoureth God, ſo much as he is adorable, amiable, and honourable, through all Ages for evermore.

Let us unfold our hearts in the knowledge and love of the word revealed. Let us adore this great sign, this eternal character of the living God, for whom all signs are. Let us make a firm purpose not to pass over a day of our life, wherein we afford him not three things due to him by titles so lawful; Homage, Love, Imitation. Homage by adoring him, and offering him some small service directed according to times, in acknowledgment of the dependence we have of him, by an intire conformity of our wills to his. Love, by loving all he loves, and hating all he hates. Imitation, by ever bearing some mark of him upon our flesh, according to the Apostle's precept, who said: Glorifie, and bear God upon your body. And to conclude, let us often say;

Feed (O Lord) thy poor begger with continual influences of thy Divinity, I ask and desire with all my heart, thy love may penetrate, repleniſh and transform me wholly into thee.

The seventh EXAMPLE upon the seventh MAXIM.

The Triumph of JESUS, over the Enemies of Faith.

JULIAN the Apostate.

Recedentes à te in terra scribentur. Hier. 17.

ALl those who forsake the Word of God are wretched men, blotted out of Heaven, to be written on earth, and whose names the earth it self being unable to preserve, abandoneth to forgetfulness, or contempt, and very often to execration. This is manifested by many sensible proofs in the examples of the Emperour Julian, who betraying his Religion, and dishonouring the character of Christianity, made himself one of the most miserable Princes that ever was under Heaven, leaving his soul as a prey for Devils, his enterprizes to ill success, his life to a most bloody death, his person to the scorn and hatred of men, and his memory to the detestation of all Ages.

Qualities of Julian, which shew, that without true Religion all is unprofitable.

Notwithstanding he wanted no eminent qualities, which might have raised him, had he not forsaken the source of heighth and glory. Birth gave him Constantius, brother of great Constantine, for father, Basilina, a most noble Princess for mother, an Emperour for Uncle, three for Cosin-germans, Constantinople for his native soil, and to serve for a Theater of great actions. He had a good wit, strong body, tongue eloquent, conversation pleasing, and courage masculine. There was not any science in the world whereof he had not some tincture, he most prosperously mingled Arms with Letters, and appeared as courageous in the front of Armies, as in learned Scholes.

He very little esteemed his body, so much was his soul divorced from his flesh: worldly riches were nothing at all in his hands, nor did he value them, but to give them. He said, it was for those who had no spirit to beg praise from the body., that he was ever handsom enough who was chaste, and that if Painters made fair faces, Chastity, beautiful lives. His counsel was, to avoid love as an enraged Master, according to the saying of Sophocles, to live in the command over proper passions, and free enjoying of himself. The Gentlemen of his Chamber, and all domesticks, who most nearly looked into his life, gave assurance, never was any thing more chaste. He slept little, fed very soberly, continually afflicted his body, accustomed it to travel, in such manner, that he was seen in the snows of Germany, and broiling ardours of Persia, perpetually in the same state.

After indefatigable toils of the day, he betook himself by candle-light to studies of the night. He almost never lay but on the bear boards, and waked at an hour prefixed, not needing any one to give him notice. He expected so little service about his person, that being at Paris, which he called His Well-beloved City, in the time of a sharp Winter, when the Seine was frozen, scarcely would he suffer a fire to be made in his chamber, so discourteously he used himself. He hated Riot, Superfluities, Balls and Comedies, and if needs he must sometime permit them, it was more to reprove, then behold them. He afforded good and speedy justice, his heart was patient and temperate towards the people, whom he freed what he could from tributes, making his impositions accord with the ability of particulars, and saying, He would leave his treasures to be kept by his good friends, which were his subjects.

Is it not a lamentable case, that so great a man was so miserably lost, with so many excellent parts, for want of preserving the best, which is piety. It is true, that almost all our Historians have written of him with much rigour, dissembling what was good in him, to render him the more odious: but for my part, I am of opinion, the greatness of Christianity more appeared therein, if having shewed the ornaments of Nature which this Prince had, we make you plainly see, all that very ill succeeded with him, and that we cannot finde any other source of his misery, but his infidelity.

The causes of his corruption.

The judicious Readers shall here observe the cause of his ruine, and consider the first education of children is an impression very tender, which being not well managed in the beginning, filleth the whole life with disorders. Tutours are the fathers of spirits, said S. Irenæus, as having more influence over the resemblance of souls, then carnal fathers over bodies. Ill luck would have it, that little Julian being left young in the guardianship of his Uncle Constantine, was recommended to Eusebius of Nicomedia, to be instructed in faith. Now this Eusebius was a Wolf in a Lambs-skin, who counterfeiting to be very Catholick, ceased not by his credit, to advance Arianism: so that this young Prince fashioned at first by so ill a hand, could not entertain belief and reverence towards the Person of our Saviour. Heresie is the key of Atheism, and when a soul is disposed to contempt of its gracious Mother on Earth, it easily learns no longer to acknowledge a Father in Heaven.

Tutors are fathers of spirits.

Ecebolus an hypocrite.

He being so ill grounded in the elements of faith, was put under the discipline of a Rhetorician, named Ecebolus, who turned with all winds, and admitted Religion according to the times. For when he saw Christian Emperours reign, he for ceremony seemed a Christian. If Pagans swayed, there was none more insolent then he. If Empire returned again to Christians, he placed himself in Church-porches, beseeching every one to tread on him, as a thing contemptible. He above all hearkned to, and honoured Libanus, one of the greatest Sophisters of his time, but a Pagan till death. He had a spirit mild, and very indifferent upon articles of Religion, he equally received Christians and Pagans into his school, & permitted S. Basil himself to preach to his schollars: but omitted not silently to contrive the means how to reestablish the Altars and Temples of the Gods. He reflected on Julian as the Palladion of Gentilism, and bound him fast to his own person by the charms of his eloquence, to apply him to his counsels.

All

School of Julian.

All the little piety which Julian might have learned from a man who had none, began to wither away in a school, where all was known but God. Apollo there possessed the name of Jesus, Diana of Mary, Aristotle and Plato were the Prophets, Isocrates the Preacher, and the names of Tritons were there better understood, than of S. Peter and S. Andrew the fishermen. This new disciple took such a tast of eloquence, that it made him forget devotion: he would have given a whole Province for an Epistle of Libanius, and it seemed to him, he who was King of words, might become a King over hearts, and Empires. His spirit of fire took nourishment on all sides, and devoured as well Cedars as thorns. He as yet retained some affection towards the knowledge of sacred things, but curiosities predominated in his mind. He penetrated all he could, into the secrets of sciences, to loose the mystery of faith.

It is the beginning of infidelity, to deifie a man by the tongue, and to think the Kingdom of God consisteth in words. Who hath not faith and virtue, satisfying himself with learning and sciences, resembleth those Indian trees, which bear musky Pears, whose smell is very odoriferous, and tast pleasing; but yield a pestilent juice, wherewith they use to envenom arrows.

How he became depraved.

Julian still manuring his studies, and neglecting piety, became very vain, greedy of slightest applauses, a great talker, a profuse scoffer, extreamly curious to know things future, doubtful in faith, temerarious in search of things divine, wedded to his own opinion, obstinate in his errours, and lastly an enemy of Christianity.

Judgment of S. Gregory Nazianzen.

S. Gregory saith, he then observed in him an inconstant wit, a fickle head, a wandering eye, unsteddy shoulders, roaming feet, vehement laughter, garbs and countenances immodest, questions ridiculous, answers much worse, and many other things which promised nothing good in him. Maximus, a Pagan Philosopher and a Magician, concluded his corruption, pouring into the bottom of his soul the blackest impiety that might be.

He was twenty years a Christian, and ten projecting the change of his Religion, still much tottering; yet never daring to let it break forth, for fear of the Emperour Constantius his cousin, who was very suspitious, and one who never would have suffered this alteration of Religion in him. He kept him much under, without train, officers, mony; saw him very seldome, and used him with severity: so that Julian feared the Court like fire, and never durst lift up his eies before Constantius, whom he called the hangman of his family.

Fear, which is an ill Mistress of duty, held him in under the mask of Religion whilest the Emperour lived, who nothing at all misdoubting his wicked purposes, associated him to the Empire very solemnly. For, having in a great assembly of his States pronounced a brave Oration upon the choice he made of him, he with his own hands gave him the Purple Robe, calling him Brother, and conjuring him to set his shoulders equal with his, to support the burden of Empire; and to knit this amity with a stronger knot, he gave him his sister Helena in marriage, who was not long lived. All ceremonies of dignity and wedlock done, he sent him to govern the Gauls, where he performed many brave feats of arms against the Almaignes.

He is a Christian for policy, and was an Infidel in his soul.

Then was the time when in so great liberty he was utterly depraved, yet still so reserved, that although already a Pagan in soul, he durst not pass great festivals without going to Church, and performing all the ceremonies of Christian Religion, as he did on the day of Epiphany whilest he was in France, according to the observation of Ammianus Marcellinus. He vaunted in an Epistle he wrote to the Athenians, that he had three times passed the Rhene, pacified the Gauls, subjugated all the rebellious towns, delivered twenty thousand prisoners out of the hands of Barbarians, & sent much matter of triumph to Constantius. But whether it were that vanity, by which he extolled his slightest prowesses, made him odious; or whether such as envied his glory, did him ill service with the Emperour, all he did, had not that great splendour which he passionately desired in all his actions.

Marcel. l. 21. Prowess of Julian among the Gauls.

Constantius, who ever dreaded this his nature, much like a standing water, caused him to be narrowly looked into at first by trusty men; but he by little & little shook off this yoak, and made himself to be beloved, as much as he might, among the Gauls; as well the natives of the country, (who were pleased with the freeness of his humour) as the souldiers, whom he secreetly won with fair promises and large hopes.

Subtilty of Julian to invade the Empire.

In the end, whilest the Emperour, who was an heretick, began the persecution of the Eastern Church, this man prepared a faction against him in the West. For imagining he was already strong enough, he caused himself to be proclaimed Emperour by secret practises, feigning otherwise to refuse all he desired. He began to play this goodly game with impatient ardour, being then at Paris, for there it was where the legions of souldiers, encompasing him at the shutting in of evening, called him Augustus with loud cries: whereupon he at first made a shew he would fly, & hide himself: but at break of day he appeared, gently reprehending the souldiers for what they had done, and apparently seeming to refuse the title of Emperour. They, who were hired to undertake this attempt, cried out so much the louder, as he the more denied the honour offered him. He in the mean time, to omit nothing in this dissimulation, held forth his hand like a suppliant, & intreated this might not be, wherewith they seemed offended, unless he speedily embraced what they presented. He was requested, that to content the Legions, he would instantly grace himself with a diadem. He answered, It was an ornament he never thought upon, nor regarded it at all. Some thereupon cried out aloud, he might do well to put his wifes dressings upon his head. But he replied, it were no good presage to adorn a Cæsar's head with womans attires. Whereupon some said, he must then make use of rich horse-trappings to counterfeit a diadem. But Julian opposing it, said: He neither would be a Woman, nor a horse.

The Count Maurus, who had the word, pulled off his chain, and put it over his head, the souldiers redoubling their acclamations with much alacrity. When altogether unable sufficiently to dissemble this juggling, he not only accepted this Diadem, but promised to each souldier five crowns of gold, and a pound of silver, and then presently dispatched an Embassadour to the Emperour with expres letters to this purport:

Embassage of Julian.

That the souldiers had saluted him Emperour, which in the beginning he much disliked, endeavouring to repres them as well by authority, as fair speeches, but they persisted so obstinate in their enterprise, that he should have incurred the peril of his life, had he not given them satisfaction. Behold the cause wherefore he was enforced to take the diadem, with all possible repugnance. But that he more esteemed the judgment and approbation of Constantius, than all the Empires in the world, and besought him not to hearken to envious spirits, who laboured to embroil them, to advance their own ends; but that regarding his birth and loyalty, he would confirm him in the honour conferred, protesting to be nothing the less pliant to his commands, and that the period of his obedience, should be the end of his life.

Constantius

Constantius fell into such a fury upon this news, that he deigned not so much as to see his Embassadour, but sent him presently a letter of disclaim, which he desired might be read to the Army, commanding forthwith to lay down the title of Augustus, unless he would leave his life. Julian, who already had passed the Rubicon, hazardeth the business, and advanced towards Italy with his troups: wherewith the Emperour infinitely irritated, made an Oration in the midst of his Army, shewing to the souldiers the treason and wickedness of Julian, in terms very pressing, and saying, He went to require a speedy satisfaction, well knowing, God condemneth the ungrateful with an everlasting judgment. Hereupon every one cryed out, he must needs march on to fight with the traitour and rebel: and verily the Emperour hastened thither by great journeys, at which time he felt himself seized by a feaver so ardent, that he burnt like an oven, and was besides so troubled all night with dreams and horrible visions, which told him his good Angel had forsaken him, and that it was time to leave life and Empire: which he did, being chastised by God for his cruelty towards Catholicks, and by his death, left Julian in full possession of all. He instantly pulled off the mask, and caused the Temples of the gods to be opened, persecuting Christians, not so much by the brutishness of Diocletian, as with subtle wiles of a wise Politician.

Numen pervasi sæpe furoris damnat ingratos.

Death of Constantius.

But behold the invincible force of our Religion, and how unhappiness is necessarily tyed to all their designs who forsake the true God. He was resolved to shut up the name of Christian within a narrow nook of the earth, calling us by the name of Galileans. But God limiting the enterprizes of this impious man, and not confining his own name, hath covered with the beams of his own glory and knowledge all the parts of the habitable world, and contrarywise the name of this deplorable Prince is ignominious: For although Emperours the most bloudy against our Religion are named without addition, never almost is Julian pronounced, but that for a note of eternal infamy the Apostata is added. He set out an Edict by which he deprived Christians of the knowledge of letters. Yet God hath permitted millions of Writers to spring up in Christianity, whilst other superstitions, as Judaism, Gentilism, and Mahometism, being now fallen into extream ignorance, there is none but Christianism, the mother of sciences, and mistress of mankind.

Punishments of Julian remarkable.

He resolved to re-edifie the temple of Jerusalem, and having given the commission thereof to Alipius, bals of fire were seen to issue from the foundations, as fast as they laid them, which made the design as frivolous, as the place was inaccessible. He extreamly affected honour, yet change of religion made him so contemptible, that the most abject people mocked at him, saying, he must shave his beard to make halters, and that he spent so much in sacrifices, that he would unfurnish the world of sheep and oxen. He sought to give himself authority, yet were his laws spiders webs, continually broken by his subjects. In the end, to imitate Alexander, he would undertake a war against the Persians; but after infinite many toils, he was there strucken by a blow from Heaven, which quickly concluded his life, and shut up his mouth by the blasphemy we have heard, when, filling his hand with bloud which distilled from his body, he threw it against heaven, and said: Thou, O Galilean, hast vanquished.

This miserable Prince, who thought by the help of his false Gods, to command the waves of the sea, and to walk upon Stars, being pulled from the Empire at the age of thirty and one year, and the first of his reign, was carryed on a beer, as a sad spectacle for all those who adored his fortune. His death was waited on by the bone-fires of Persians, and joy of Christians, whose chains this day were dissolved, his memory was buried in execrations and horrours, nor were there any, yea, of pens the most sacred, who had not gall for him: so true it proves, that a man who hath defiled his sanctification, and sets Jesus aside, findeth hell every where, as in all things he sought to oppose the Divinity.

VIII. MAXIM.

Of the Perfections of JESVS, which make him amiable.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That we should love things visible, not troubling our selves with invisible.

Διὰ ὀφθαλμῶν ἀκρασίαν. Clem. Alex. Nutibus oculorum abusi. Isaiah 3. 16. Basene's of worldly loves.

ALL the greatest evils in the world do ordinarily proceed from the ill manage of love, which exceeding the limits prescribed by God, causeth every where a deluge, to occasion afterward disasters. Sensual men perswade themselves, one cannot love but by the eyes: And verily they are those, who according to the saying of Clemens Alexandrinus, begin the skirmish in all the battels of worldly love. And if we follow the opinion of the Prophet Isaiah, we shall term them The feet of the heart, since by them it goeth to objects of bodies, to which it inclines.

Astomorum Gens vestita frondium lanugine, halitu tantum vivens.

But, O good God, how wretched are these loves of things visible! since they idolatrize a little skin, and resemble the people called Astomes, who are cloathed with leaves, and live on smoake. The carnal man, who dayly crucifieth himself upon so many crosses, as he entertaineth thoughts for the creature he loveth, is taken by the eye, with a little exteriour skin, called by the Physitians Epidermis. Pull that away from this body, which gives him so many martyrdoms, he would think that a monster, he now adoreth for a Goddess. Is not this a strange weakness of judgment, and must we not confess the eyes so inflamed in their pursuits, are very scanty in their fruition, reserving to themselves no other object, than thin colours, which put upon them so many illusions, to occasion so many flames?

THE HOLY COURT.

That all love is due to Jesus Christ, by reason of his incomparable excellencies.

I hold, every judicious man will be enforced, through

Love of invisible things most penetrating.

through the sole consideration of nature, to affirm the most noble loves, yea, the greatest are employed on things invisible. For behold, a woman, who with a most lively and fervent affection loved her husband, be he taken away, and carried to a tomb in the flower of his age, and greatest splendour of his fortune, she presently becomes passionate at it, more through necessity, than election: It is not (to speak truly) the body she loveth; for should that be left to her discretion, it would in a short time become insupportable. What is it then she esteemed most in this person? The spirit, which imprinted the character of its beauty and vigour upon this mortal flesh: yet that notwithstanding she seeth not at all, nor ever did, which maketh us believe, her love was of a thing invisible.

We love excellent men, though separated from us by so many lands and seas, yea, by death it self, because we have seen some ray of their wits upon paper: We love virtues, which have neither bodies, nor colours; yea, the Amorists of the world confess, they often feel vehement passions, not for the nobility, riches, or beauty of such women as they court; well imagining, there are other of them much more accomplished in all kind of perfections, who notwithstanding make no impression upon their minds. What is it then they love? That, which they cannot see, speak unto, nor think on; so true is it, that the most penetrating arrow of love, proceedeth from things invisible.

But if that be acknowledged in natural objects, how much more by just titles, should it be in things divine, which have attractives so much the more noble and entire, as they have qualities more solid and eminent. I will here shew, God hath set a Jesus composed both of visible and invisible, upon the frontis-piece of the Temple of Eternity, as a lively Image of his greatness, to draw to himself the love of Angels and men.

Excellencies in the Person of our SAVIOUR.

Works of Great men. 2 Reg. 18, 18. Vocavitque titulum nomine suo, & appellatur manus Absolom. 3 Reg. 10. 18. Non est factum tale opus in universis regnis. Baron. Annal. Just. 31. Cedr. l. 4. c. 30.

1. GReat ones naturally delight to do works, wherein they heap together the most visible marks of their power. So Absalom made a proud monument to preserve his memory, which he called the hand of Absalom. So Solomon made a magnificent throne all of ivory, covered with plates of gold, environed with statues of Lions, very gracefully set out, and the Scripture assureth us, there never was such a piece of work through all the Kingdoms of the world.

So Justinian the Emperour made the Altar of Saint Sophy of gold, silver, and precious stones, out of all the rarities in the world, which he caused to be melted, and incorporated into one mass; a wonder never till then known, nor used. So we have many times heard talk of the seven wonders of the world, which are at this time, but seven silly Fables upon a piece of paper.

Singular work of God Incarnate.

I now demand of you, if mortals, who can do nothing immortal, do notwithstanding endeavour to leave contracted works to posterity, for witness of their greatness, what should the Father of glory and sovereign Monarch of the whole world do? Were it not a thing very reasonable, and befitting his Majesty, that having distended the rich pavillion of the Heavens over our heads, which is notwithstanding no other than the works of his own hands, (as the Scripture speaketh) he made a monument, wherein he might employ the strength of his arm, and assemble together all the most delicious attractives of his beauty, and the most conspicuous characters of his power? And this verily is it he did in the mystery of the Incarnation, affording to the earth, a Man-God, of whom we cannot discourse, but must say what S. Hilary did: My understanding feareth to touch the discourse of this great Word, and I have not a word which trembleth not to be uttered before such a divine light. Let us imitate those sacred creatures of the Prophet Ezechiel, which clasp their wings when they hear the voice of God in the firmament: Let us hearken, and say with reverence what Saints did of the excellencies of the Person of Jesus Christ.

Hilar. 2. de Trinit. Fidium mens vereatur attingere, & trepidat omnia sermone prodere.

2. If we seek his name in the Prophet Isaiah, he teacheth us, he is called ADMIRABLE. If we look for his beauty in the writings of the Wiseman, he instructeth us, it is THE BRIGHTNESS OF ETERNAL LIGHT. If we consider the band of two natures in the Person of the Redeemer, and so much riches and treasure arranged in good order, we shal find the Prophet Zachary compareth them to a Pomegranate. If we reflect on his Divinity, it is THE ANGEL OF THE FIRST FACE, according to the Evangelical Prophet. If we weigh his continuance, HE IS THE ELDER OF THE DAYS, AND FATHER OF AGES. If science, HE IS THE INTERPRETER, AND ORACLE OF DIVINE MYSTERYS. If the harmony of his wisdome, HE IS THE HARP OF THE LIVING GOD, in the thirty sixth Psalm. If his office, HE IS THE ETERNAL BISHOP OF SOULS, in S. Peter. If his effects, HE IS THE RESTORER OF AGES. All lips are opened with singular prerogatives in honour of the Saviour, and are all dried up in the abundance of his praises.

Excellent qualities of Jesus Christ. Isaiah 9. Candor lucis aternæ. Zach. 12. Adadrimmon, malogranatum. Κατὰ 70. Isaiah 64. Revelator secretorum. Genes. 41. Ægyptius. 1 Pet. 2.

It seems Constantinus Manasses said well in his Ecclesiastical Annals, when he named the Word Incarnate, the universality of perfection: For it is there where God have engraven as on Gold, the last draughts of his love, power, wisdom, consummation of his designs and counsels over men. And it is that, which, according to my opinion, moved the grave Authour William of Paris, to say, it was the Face of the last beauty. Now know, that to understand this title, it is necessary to consider an axiom of Saint Thomas, which saith, The great diversity of creatures in all the orders of the world, hath no other aim but to represent the Divinity by some image whatsoever. And in so much as the Sovereign Essence is infinite, it was expedient to produce many things, that the one might supply the others defects, and all conspire to express some character of Divine perfections. So that God beholdeth himself figured in such variety of beauties, as appear from earth to Heaven.

Jesus a concurrence of all perfections. Παντὸς-& Facies ultima pulcritudinis. Guil. Paris. 1. 2. de univer. p. 1. c. 26. Divina assimilatio est causa diversitatis in rebus. S. Thom. 9. part. 2. q. 102.

But all these beauties being unable to pourtraict him to the life, he painted himself in the mystery of the incarnation, which is the true table, his design, his work, wherein he included his Essence, and all his Excellencies, and in which he bounded, and limited himself, it being impossible to make any thing more worthy, or greater, than a God humanized, and a man deified.

Coloss. 1. 15. Imago Dei invisibilis primogenitus omnis creaturæ, quoniam in ipso condita sunt universa, in ipso complacuit omnem plenitudinem inhabitare Per eum & in eo est constitutus Deus, & ejus. Tertul. Apolog. c. 2.

He is the visible Image of a God invisible, the first-born of al creatures, because in him, & by him, al things were made, & it pleased the heavenly father, that in his Person alone a plenitude of all perfections should inhabite.

The Valentinians said, God the Father of the universe, is in his Paradise as in the midst of a garden ennamelled with flowers, and that these flowers were the Intelligences, whom he enlightn'd with his lights, sanctified with his virtues, animated with his aspects, and quickned with his own life. That he beheld beheld himself in all, and saw therein some draughts of his beauty very well expressed, yet notwithstanding they being most insufficient in comparison of the first Essence, it pleased the Eternal Father to make a Man-God, to be the King of all these Intelligencies, which they termed, Aeons; and for this purpose they added, That having taken the most exquisite beauties from all the flowers of this divine Garden, he fitted and enchased them in the great work of the Word Incarnate. It were too prophane Theology to take it outwardly by the letter, and it is no wonder if Tertullian mocked at it, objecting to them they made Æsop's Jay, or Hesiodus his Pandora, of the Redeemer. But if we speak according to true Divinity, we say, this God-man containeth in eminency all the virtues and beauties of Angels, to the end, he may in and through all, hold the primacy. But to give at this time some limits to a discourse, which of its nature runneth, as it were, into an infinity, we say, that as the first Adam falling, was infected with sin, darkned with ignorance, ruined in power: so the second Adam bearing himself as the restorer of humane nature, took three eminent qualities upon him, wherein all his excellencies conclude which are, Sanctity, Wisdom, and Power.

Vt sit in omnibus primatum tenens. Coloss. 1. 19.

Three excellencies of Jesus, wherein all other are concluded.

His sanctity. Exod. 24 8. Ille vero sumptum sanguinem respersit in populum, Hic est sanguis foederis quod pepigit Dominus nobiscum. Sancti quasi sanguine tincti.

And to begin with Sanctity, we find the word, Holy, was heretofore properly given to three sorts of people. First, to those who were purified by the blood of the Hoast, wherewith they were sprinkled, for so were the expiations of the old Law performed, to figure the effusion of the blood of Jesus Christ. Saints were anciently those who were chafed and sprinkled with blood of the victim, immolated in the Sacrifice, say Schole Divines. 2. This name was appropriated to those who alienated themselves from secular life, and affairs, to serve God. 3. Such as in this separated life, lived much purified from the dregs and contagion of sensuality. This being so, who seeth not the excellent title of sanctity wholly appertaineth to Jesus Christ, because he purgeth all the Mass of mankinde, not only by the sacred effusion of his blood, but likewise being sequestred, and separated from his mother's womb, to the honour of his Heavenly Father, he led a life in the most eminent height might ever be imagined. His sanctity hath three incomparable Prerogatives. First, it is a sanctity not of participation, but of essence, to wit, of necessity and independency, sanctity being as intimate unto God, as his Divinity. That is it S. Dionysius Alexandrinus, would say in the disputation against Paulus Samosatenus, that the sanctity of S. John Baptist, and all other Saints, was the work of God: but this in Jesus was the nature of God himself. Secondly, that it is the original and exemplar cause of all sanctities in the world, which borrow all lustre of lights from the first sanctity. Thirdly, that it hath been through all times in freedom from sin, as well because the created sanctity of Jesus Christ, was governed by the increated sanctity, as for that it was moistned with sources of capital Graces, and inseparably tied to the beatified vision. O Eternal word! how worthy art thou to be called by the Prophet Daniel The Holy of Holies, worthy the Seraphins should sing for thee eternally the Trisagion, Holy, Holy, Holy, worthy to bear the seal of Sanctity, and to imprint thy characters upon all the Saints. I will establish thee (saith the Scripture) as the true seal of the world, because I have chosen thee.

Ἰωάννου μὲν ἅγιον ἄνδρα σύνης, Ἰησοῦ δ' ἁγίης φύσις.

Vigetur Sanctus Sanctorum. Dan. 6. 24.

Posam te quasi signaculum, quia te elegi. Agg. 2. 2.

4. The great and eminent wisdom is united to sanctity; for as very well saith S. Bonaventure: As all plenitude of grace was in Jesus Christ, so there was a plenitude of wisdom by a necessary association. It was a wisdom increated on the part of the Divinity, a wisdom beatifying, capital, infused, experimental in the holy Humanity, acquired unto it from treasures of infinite sciences; in such sort, that it had knowledge of all things created, past, present, future, possible, impossible, discovering the most small Atomes from the highest Heavens to the lowest depths.

His wisdom. Sicut in Christo fuit omnis plenitudo gratiæ, ita & omnis plenitudo sapientiæ. S. Bonavent. Theol. verit. c. 15. l. 4. Verbum Dei Patris, Deus de Deo, lumen de lumine, sapientia de sapientia, novit omnia, una novit Pater, sed ei nosse de Patre est, sicut esse. Aug. l. 15. de civit. c. 14.

The Word of the celestial Father, God of God, light of light, wisdom of wisdom, knoweth all the Father knows: but knowledge cometh to him from the Father, as well as Essence. It is the River Tygris whereof the Scripture (a) speaketh, which overfloweth in the beginning of seasons; the river which spreadeth it self into divers Channels to moisten all the wise, which are the plants of his garden. His thoughts are of larger extent then the Sea, and his counsels far deeper then abysses.

The two Testaments, as well Old as New behold Jesus Christ, as the Cherubins did the Propitiatory: but there is as much difference between the Old and New, as between the grain of corn, and the ear, according to the saying of Job the Monk, in Photius. The doctrine of Jesus Christ surpasseth all other doctrines, because it hath its force and root in the Cross, as S. Hierom speaketh (b): Jesus fortified all his doctrine by the merit of his Passion.

(b) Omnem doctrinam suam patibulo roborabat. Hier. ad Agiasiam.

Add, that as wisdom is observed in the order and œconomy of great affairs, when they are well proportioned to their ends, so there cannot be a matter either more important, then that of the eternal salvation of men; or which hath been managed with more choice, order, and success; or which hath succeeded by means more distant from the tracts of humane wisdom. The science of Jesus Christ hath inlightned the most ignorant with the knowledge of secrets unknown to Philosophers, and his word hath been as the eternal seed of so many sundry books, as were hitherto published, and which will encrease to the consummation of the world. And although the most able Philosophers, had they been persecuted by Tyrants, would not willingly have lost a tooth for defence of their Maxims, yet the wisdom of our Saviour is such, that having possessed the heart and hands of those who profess it, causeth them to pour out all the blood of their veins, and to use so much courage for preservation thereof, as it afforded them lights in its establishment.

His power. Data est mihi omnis potestas in cœlo, & in terra. Mat. 28. 18

5. From thence consider, it is his absolute power over all things, and note, if you please, that it is manifested principally in three Articles. First, the facility of prodigies and miracles, which appeared in Jesus Christ. For this large house of Nature, which we call the world, had no other motion but from his will, and he therein commanded so universally, that he seemed to hold the Heavens and Elements under hire, to be instruments of his wonders. He lighted new Stars at his birth; he eclipsed the ancient Sun at his death, he walked on waters, as on marble pavements, he caused the earth to cast up the dead four days after. We finde many of Pharaoh's Magicians have done false miracles; but it was, saith S. Augustine, by speedily applying active natural things to passive. We finde Saints have done true miracles, but in the quality of Ministers. It only appertaineth to Jesus Christ to do them with an original power, which hath its source in his bosom; with an absolute command, which receiveth not any modification in all nature; with a simple will, which needeth no other instruments. It only belongeth to him to do them for the full manage of the world's government, and to transmit them into the person of Saints, to the consummation of Ages.

In

In the second place, I say this power marvellously shineth in the great Empire of the Church, which his heavenly Father hath put into his hands to build it, raise it, cement it with his blood, illuminate it with his lights, nourish it with his substance, to make laws in it, establish Sacraments, eternize sacrifices, create Pastours and Priests, and invisibly to rule in it by a visible head, a power not to be shaken even unto the gates of hell; to exercise a jurisdiction over souls, to bind them, to unloose them, pardon sins, change harts, ordain their predestination according to his will. Finally, this great power appears in that he first of all opened Paradise, his soul being exalted from the first day of his creation to the vision of God's essence, and afterward passing through all the heavens, to place himself at the right hand of his Father, and put his Elect into the possession of the Kingdom, he had purchased by his blood. Have not we cause to cry out thereupon, and say: O happy he, whom you have chosen to raise him to the Hypostatical union! He shall dwell in the Palace of the Divinity, and we shall be filled with the blessings of thy house. Thy Temple, which is his sacred Humanity, is infinitely holy.

Beatus quem elegisti & assumpsisti, habitabit in atriis tuis, replebitur in bonis domus tuæ: sanctum est templum tuum mirabile in æquitate. Psal. 64.

Temple of Justinian.

It is said, Justinian having finished the magnificent Church of S. Sophie, which he built with so much industry and charge, such numbers, and such a general contribution of endeavour, of riches, and power of the whole Empire, placed therein a statue of Solomon, who seemed to be astonished, and to hide himself through shame and confusion, to see his Temple surpassed by that of the Emperour. It was a vanity of a worldly Prince: But we in verity, would we represent what passeth here, should paint both Moses, and all the Prophets absorpt in a profound reverence, in the consideration of the Temple of the Church, and the wonders of Jesus Christ.

6. Let us for conclusion of this discourse, adore that which we cannot sufficiently comprehend, and endeavour to bear an incomparable love to the Person of our Saviour, for the excellencies we have expressed. But if you require the practise of this, I say it is reduced to three heads, which are, to adhere, to serve, and suffer. The first note of faithfull affection appears in a strong adherence to the thing beloved, so as the Scripture speaking of love, says it causeth one soul to clasp unto another. If you begin heartily to love Jesus Christ, you will find you shall think upon him almost insensibly every moment, &, as saith S. Gregory, every time you fetch your breath, there will come a pleasing idea of God to fil your soul with splendours and affection. You will feel a distast and unsavourines of heart against all earthly things, so that it will seem to you, that the most pleasing objects of the world, are mingled with gall and wormwood. You will seek for your Jesus in all creatures, you will languish after him; all which beareth his name and memory will be delightsome to you, you will speak of him in all companies, you will have an earnest desire to see him honoured, esteemed, acknowledged by all the world. And if you perceive any contempt of his Person, which is so estimable, you will think the apple of your eye is touched. Your solitude will be in Jesus, your discourse of Jesus, Jesus will be in your watchings, and in your sleep, in your affairs, in your recreations, and you wil account it a kind of infidelity to loose sight of him but an hour. Love is a great secret, very wel understood by Abbot Moses in Cassianus, Let our soul (saith he) sigh and think it self sequestred from the soveneign goodnes, so soon as it looseth never so little sight of the divine presence, accounting it a spiritual fornication to be seperated one sole moment from beholding Jesus.

Practise of the love of Jesus reduced to 3. heads.

1. To adhere.

Conglutinata est anima ejus enim ei. Gen. 34. 3.

Numquid quem diligit anima mea, vidistis. Cantic. Sapiret, ac tanties sit a summo bono anima nostra sentiat discessum, quoties ab illo intuitu deprehenderit separatim, fornicationem judicans vel momentaneum a Christi contemplatione defectum.

For the second degree, as it is not enough in worldly amities to have affections, languors, and curious lip complements, but you must necessarily come to some good effects, and considerable offices, which are the marks and cement of true affection; so you must not think the love of Jesus consisteth in slight affectations of idle devotion. He must serve who wil love; his wil must be wedded, his command entertained and executed, his liveries put on, and we wholly transformed into him by imitation of his examples. S. Augustine to confound the weakness of our love towards God, pertinently maketh use of the practise of prophane loves. Behold (saith he) these foolish and dishoneſt Amorists of the world. I demand, whether any one surprized with the love of a woman, attireth himself any otherwise, then to the liking of his Mistres. If she say, I would not have you wear such a cloak, he puls it off: I command you in the midst of winter to take a summer garment, he had rather shiver with cold, then displease a miserable creature. But yet what will she do if he obey not? Will she condemn him to death? Will she send him executioners? Will she thrust him into a dungeon? Nothing less, she will onely say, if you do not this, I will never see you more. This word alone is able to make a man tear himself in pieces in the endeavour of complacence and service. O soul confusion of our life, and prostitution of spirit! A God, who makes a Paradise of his aspects, and a hell in his separation from us, promiseth never to behold us with a good eye, unless we keep his commandments: nor can his menaces but be most effectual, since he hath sovereign authority in his hands. He deserves to be served above all things: service done to him is not onely most pleasing, but after this life gaineth recompence. In the mean time we rather choose to live the slaves of creatures, and dwell under the tyranny of our passions, then to embrace the yoke of God. Were it not fit we hereafter order the small service we do to God as well in our prayers, as actions, in such sort, that there be neither work, word, nor thought from morning till night, which hath not all its accommodations, and is not squared within the rule God desireth of us, with intentions most purified, and indefatigable fervours?

Numquid illa tamen damnatura est? Numquid adhibitura tortores? num, quid in carcerem missura? Hoc solum ibi timetur, non te videbo, faciem meam non videbis.*

Finally, the last character of love is to suffer for Jesus, the father of sufferings, and King of the afflicted. The Kingly Prophet said: I shall be satisfied when thy glory shall appear to me. Another translation importeth, I shall be well pleased, when I shall behold my self marked with the characters of thy sufferings. Jesus Christ in the great sacrifice of patience made in the beginning of Ages, supplies the person of a great Bishop, putting on flesh wholly imprinted with dolours, a heart drenched in acerbities, a tongue steeped in gall: Round about him are all the most elevated and courageous souls, who all wear his livery, and both constantly and gloriously dispose themselves to this great model of dolours. Would we at the sight of so many brave Champions lead a life lazy, languishing, and corrupt? Know we not all creatures of the world groan, and bring forth, that all elements are in travel, & in a ceaseless agitation? The air it self, (say Philosophers) is perpetually strucken with the motion of heaven, as with a hammer or whip, that this benummed mass may not hatch any poison. Rivers are cleansed and putrified by the streaming current of their waters. The earth is never in repose, and the nature of great things, is generously to suffer evils. The clock goeth on by the the help of its counterpoise, and Christian life never proceedeth in virtue, but by counter-ballance of its crosses. Our souls are engaged by Oath to this warfare so soon as first we enter into Christianity, said the noble Tertullian. Suffering is our trade, our vow, our profession Love, which cannot suffer, is not love, and if it cease to love when it should bear, it never was what it professed.

Animus noſtras actiuitati, in bac pugnat acceſſionem. Tertul. ad Scap.

A lover said in Olympius, that when he was onely some little moment absented from the creature he most loved in the world, all the best seasons were irksom, all discourses troublesome, and the greatest delights turned into bitterness. Flower de-luces seemed cole-black in the meadow, when he beheld them in his pensive solitude, roses the most vermillion grew pale, gilli-flowers lost their lustre, the very bay-trees which resist winters cold, could not withstand the sadness caused by this absence; but in a moment they all appeared quite withered to him. Viands with him had no relish, wine tast, nor sleep repose. But so soon as this creature returned, all was animated by her absence. Flowerde-luces became white again, roses resumed their vermillion, gilli-flowers their beauty, lawrels their verdure, wine and viands their tastfulness, and sleep its contentment. But if there happened any harsh and painful accidents, which he must bear for her sake, they seemed a Paradise.

All worldly loves speak the same; yet are we unwilling to say, or do any thing for this excellent Word of God, which is endowed with a beauty incomparable, exalted above all the beauties of the sons of men. This Jesus, who maketh a Paradise spring from his eys; This Jesus, who distilleth honey from lips of roses, for the comfort of his elect; This Jesus who causeth Nations to tremble under the force of his word, as under flaming arrows, and is attired with the conquest and tropheys of souls.

Behold him on the bright empyreal Heaven, crowned with a diadem of honour, and revested with celestial purple, who regardeth us, who beholdeth us and never ceaseth to draw us unto him. So many brave spirits have followed him, amongst torrents, thorns, and flames, which they found repleni shed with a sweetness, that charmed their pain in the sight of their best beloved.

It is this sweetness turned the stones of S. Stephen into flower-de-luces, and changed the burning coles of S. Lawrence into roses. For it, S. Bartholomew despoiled himself of his skin as freely as of a garment, and S. Catharine hastened to the wheel armed with keen rasors, S. Teela to Lyons, S. Agnes to the wood-pile, S. Cicely to the sharp sword, and S. Apollonia suffered her teeth to be torn out with as much ease, as the tree suffers his leaves to fall away from him. O the sweetness of Jesus, who makes all the valiant, and knoweth how to turn doves into eagles of fire! Shall we never understand, what it is to love him, towards whom all generous hearts sigh, and for whom all charities are crowned with immortal garlands?

The eight EXAMPLE upon the eight MAXIM.

Of the admirable change of worldly love into the love of Jesus Christ.

St. BONIFACE.

Drawn from the Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory.

IT is a thing very rare, to see worldly love suddenly transported from the visible to the invisible, from the temporal to eternal, from errour to truth and from wretched passion to perfect charity. Notwithstanding Histories furnish us with some examples, and we often observe, those who were very sensible in worldly affections, when they found a good object, were more fervent & couragious in the love of God. Such was the heart of Saint Augustine, such likewise of generous Magdalene. For both of them knew so well to make use of their losses, that they seemed to have served their apprentiship unto creatures, to learn how the Creatour ought to be beloved.

Worldly lovers being converted, are the most fervent in the love of God.

Architects, when they build vaults and arches, make certain counterfeits of wood, which they call Centries, to serve as preparatives for their designs: but so soon as they thereon have raised true and solid works, they destroy fiction to admit verity. Much so it happeneth to souls as yet sensual; they are taken with sleight affections, which many times are not dishoneſt, but ever light, and far distant from perfection. Yet therein is to be learned what we should do for a God immortal, since we undertake so much for a mortal man. But Jesus insensibly building his architecture in these loving hearts, ruineth all these feignings of amity, there to establish his love.

A goodly comparison.

This which I say, is evidently to be seen in the person of Aglae, and S. Boniface, whose acts I will here produce, to give instruction how to sanctifie worldly love by the love of Jesus Christ. This Aglae was a Roman dame, of prime quality, having a delicate wit in a beautiful body, and powerful passions in a great fortune. She had been married, but becoming a widow in an age as yet furnished with verdant freshness, grace, and beauty, she had not buried all her affection in the tomb of her husband.

Aglae a noble dame.

After she had a little wiped away the first tears, which nature exacteth as tribute in such like accidents, she quickly plaid so much the Courtier in her slight sorrow, that she seemed greatly to desire, as soon as might to be, to finish what she had never well begun. She failed not to be sought unto by many gentlemen, who saw her to be accomplished with all parts desired in an eminent marriage; and although she denied not to like their services, yet making no resolution to marry, she was all for her self, and for none else; so much she feared to take a master, instead of a husband.

She is a worldly widow.

It is nothing commendable in a Christian widow, to make a shew no longer to have a heart for the world, so to draw all the world into her heart, to change a moaning life into perpetual chatter, and turn her widow-hood into a petty Empire. Aglae was not yet entred into vice, but pleased her self so much to afford the love of her person, and receive none, that ere a ware she was surprized, and having disdained masters, saw her self become the slave of a servant.

Superstitities of widows.

She had a Steward in her house named Boniface, a witty man, and of a good presence, who managing the affairs of his Mistris discreedly forgat not his own. He so well knew how to please her, to conform to her humours, to feed her with glory, whereof she was very ambitious, to free her from cares, and fill heart with joy, that he already possessed no ordinary place in her favours: besides that, he was handsom, he had a singular grace in jesting without offence to any, to utter good conceits, and entertain his Mistris with all the delightful occurrents of the City. Love entreth in very far by this gate. It is not always beauty which surprizeth; for if it be nor joyned with promptness of wit, and discourse, discourse, it is a bait which floats on the water without a hook.

Dispositions to love should be avoided.

Familiar conversation with an Officer so pleasing, was no slight snare in the house of a young widow, who lived easily, and loved pleasure. It is not without cause Saint Hierom would not endure to see about widows, servants so frizled and quaint, fearing least love might render them Masters over their proper Mistrisses. Aglae began with pretty love-tricks, which are the little idols of affection, not observing, that all these gentle dalliances in a carriage too free, still thought to be constant in innocency, are not without danger. But by succes of time she felt her passion so much enkindled towards this Steward, that she neither thought, spake, nor lived, but for him, not daring to discover her fancies, so much is vice ashamed of its own conscience.

Aglae in love.

Boniface, who had an intelligent and ready wit, well enough imagined from whence these extraordinary favours proceeded, which he received from his Mistris; but the more he saw her grow passionate for him, the more he persisted in his duty; whether that he in the beginning would divert this affection, which he perhaps thought not firm enough, or whether he was willing to kindle the fire by a slight resistance. His Mistris beholding him more serious in this matter then she wished, let him plainly enough understand, that having had the stewardship of her estate, he should have the like of her heart, and entertained him with more courtesie, then was fit for a man of his employment and condition.

She in the beginning managed her affections with much discretion, following the advice of Boniface, who knew how to hide the matter; his fortune not making him loose the remembrance of what he had been; nor passion, providence in what he might be.

Disorder of love.

Notwithstanding, it being a thing very difficult long to restrain fury, all composed of fire and violence, the favours of Aglae so plainly appeared, that they no longer could be hidden from the world, which is a hundred ey'd Argus. She occasioned speech of her, even to infamy, with so much noise and scandal in the City, that it much abashed all such as had relation to her. But being of a haughty humour, which rather useth to irritate passion by censure, then amendeth manners, she neglected what was said of her, since she stood free from controul: For love, which had bereaved her of innocency and gravity, despoiled her likewise of the care of reputation, (one of the greatest miseries may happen to a wretched soul.) She well saw her kindred neither had the will or power to hinder her pleasure, which made her change close affection into manifest whoredom.

Love is weakned by too much easiness.

Love sometimes is weakened by over-much easiness of entertaining of it. It is like the Polypus, which finding nothing to oppose nor devour, eateth it self by gnawing it's feet, and fins. So this passion, finding no more resistance with which it ordinarily is cherished, lessened, and lost it self. Aglae began at first to be weary of the frequency of this infamous familiarity, then recalled again into her heart the sense of honour, next of virtue, and lastly, God more fully touching her soul, set her in open view to her self, and made her entertain a great distast of this inordinate life.

Boniface on the other side, felt his conscience much galled, and thought on nothing but to break his chain, which he often begged of God, giving many alms in the height of his uncleanness. Aglae called him to her in this disposition, and said: She was resolved to make an end of the exorbitantes of her life, that it was in conclusion to weary heaven and earth too much by her sins, and that if love had wounded her, repentance would cure her, God having left her no other remedy upon evils past, then sorrow to have committed them. As for the rest, as he had followed her with so much facility in wickedness, it was no reason he should forsake her in the way of repentance. That she was a woman, he a man, that his sex obliged him to take at the least so much courage as her self, in a matter which concerned eternal salvation, and that desiring to equal him in this resolution, she should have the happiness above him to have prevented him.

Admirable conversion.

Boniface replied, She might confidently do what she thought good, he would ever account it his glory to wait on her in so good a purpose, and that God could not do him a greater favour, then to change the commandments of his Mistris into precepts of salvation.

Devotion of Aglae in enquiry after Martyrs.

The Lady answered, She found nothing more necessary then to implore the mercy of God by the blood of his Martyrs, and therefore he should take a voyage into the Province of Cilicia, where daily many such were made, and bring her thence some relicks. The Steward, who could not forget his sweet nature, said unto her: Madam, you would much wonder, if from the Country of Martyrs I return a Martyr, and that my body be brought back to serve you for relicks. Aglae replied, Mock not, but do speedily what I tell you, and think your self most happy to be at the feet of so many glorious Confessours.

He failed not to put himself quickly on the way with men and money, handkerchiefs, and perfumes for performance of his purpose, and handled the matter so, that he was speedily in the City of Tharsus, at that time the Theater of Martyrs. Scarcely was he arrived, but he heard twenty Christians were led forth into a publick place to be martyred, and being already changed into another man, who breathed nothing at all but the glory of God, he stole from his company, and went presently into the open place, where perceiving the Martyrs, he brake through the throng, hastned to kiss their chains and wounds, moistening his eyes with their blood, and earnestly beseeching them to pray unto God for him.

Boniface Martyred.

The President Simplicianus, seeing this young stranger meddle so far in a matter whereunto he was not called, commanded him to withdraw: but he speaking with a generous confidence, and publickly professing what he was, he caused him to be apprehended, and to be put to the torture, where he was roughly handled: for the executioners not content to have pulled off his skin with iron pincers, thrust slivers of pointed reeds between the flesh and nails, which caused most exquisite torments. Notwithstanding the valorous Champion had no other words in his mouth in the extremity of his torments, but:

My Saviour Jesus, I give thee thanks for the favour thou hast done me to day, by letting me suffer for thy sake. It is good reason the body which hath so much offended thee, bear somewhat for thee. If executioners exercise my torments, augment the assistance of thy grace, & crown my combat with a faithful perseverance. He spake with so much fervour, grace, and devotion, that those present were much moved thereat, which the Judge perceiving, commanded molten lead to be poured into his mouth, to enforce him to a cruel silence: but that not succeeding as he imagined, the people mutined, and brake down an Altar, set up there for sacrifice to idols, whereat the Provost was somewhat astonished, and thinking it not fit at that time any further to incense them, he sent all the Martyrs back into prison.

The next day he went to the place with more violence and terrour, and thinking to terrifie Boniface, he ſhewed him a cauldron of hot ſcalding pitch, threatning withal to burn him, if he obeyed not the Emperours Edicts. To which the Martyr anſwered, There was neither fire, ſword, nor any horrid torture able to ſeparate him from Jeſus Chriſt; he then ſhewing himſelf very reſolute, without leiſure given to ſay any more, was plunged into the cauldron, from whence he by miracle came forth entire, to the admiration of all the world, which began to work great converſions among the people.

Simplicianus fearing a ſecond ſedition, cauſed his head ſpeedily to be cut off with an ax, and to conſummate a glorious Martyrdom. In the mean ſpace they who were of his company, ſought round about for him, at which time they heard there was a young Chriſtian ſtranger to be executed, who had ſhewed very much conſtancy in his puniſhment. They thinking nothing leſs then of him, ſaid, it was not their Boniface, who ever would more readily be found among Courtiſans, then the executioners of Tharſus. Yet coming to the place for curioſity, they found his head upon one ſide, his body on the other extreamly amazed at what was paſſed. They bought his body for five hundred liures, and having it in their hands, they asked him mercy with weeping tears, for the raſh judgement they had given to the prejudice of his virtue.

Upon this, they had nothing ſo much in their deſires, as to carry back the body to their Miſtriſs Aglae, ſuppoſing they could not give her any relicks, either more undoubted or acceptable. The holy woman had already had a revelation from the mouth of an Angel of the glory of Boniface, and being on the way to encounter him, ſo ſoon as ſhe met him, ſhe proſtrated her ſelf before his body, and ſaid:

Speech of Aglae to Boniface.

My dear Boniface, I ſhed not tears over thee, they would fall too low to bewail ſuch a death, as thine. Thou wenteſt out a penitent from me, and returneſt a Martyr, thou art become a Maſter from the firſt day of thy apprentiſhip, thou haſt vanquiſhed, ere ſcarce ſeen, the enemy; yea, the Crown wherewith thou ſoughteſt to gloriſie other Martyrs, is fallen on thine own head. Ah how many bloudy gates were to be opened to thy generous ſoul, to afford a large paſſage to its triumphs. Iron hooks which have diſſevered thy holy members, have united thy heart to Jeſus. Reeds thruſt under thy nails, have confirmed thy conſtancy. Boyling cauldrons found in thy heart a love more fervent then their flames, and the ax which ſeparated the head from thy body, placed a Crown on thy head. I behold thee with an eye wholly rapt with the beauties of thy glory. I a thouſand times kiſs thy wounds, and take part in thy tropheys, and ſanctifie my ſelf by loving thee, as a Martyr of Jeſus Chriſt. What then remains, O bleſſed ſoul, but that I imitate thee? and though executioners forbear my body, never to ſpare my pains. That all my life may be but a martyrdom, and that there be not any part in me, which ſerves not as a victim to the ſacrifice of my patience.

Aglae, having performed her duties, and cauſed a Church to be built, dedicated to God in memory of the Martyr S. Boniface, entred into a Monaſtery, and perfected her ſelf in the glorious travels of penance, finiſhing her courſe near her well-beloved, and entombing her aſhes at his feet.

THE SECOND PART OF MAXIMS. Of the HOLY COURT.

THE DESIGNE.

WE have directly looked towards God in the firſt Part, deducing Maxims which moſt nearly conſern the Divinity. I now deſcend in this Second, to thoſe which touch the direction of this preſent life; and conſider them in three reſpects, whereof one tendeth to the ſervice of God, the other to our neighbour, and laſt ſtayeth upon our ſelves. In the firſt, I treat of Piety, againſt all counterfeit devotion. In the ſecond, I ſhew we muſt carry our ſelves towards our neighbours with juſtice, ſincerity, and ſweetneſs, excluding our own ends, diſſimulation, and cruelty. In the third, I entertain what concerns the ordering of our ſelves in proſperity againſt Epicureans, and in adverſity againſt impatience, upon accidents of humane life: wherein I endeavour throughout effectually to obſerve the diſorders which Plato and Ariſtotle noted, were the cauſes of the deſtruction of Families, Cities, and Empires.

THE SECOND PART.

Touching the Direction of this present Life.

IX. MAXIM.

Of DEVOTION.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That if Devotion must be used, we should embrace that which is in fashion, accommodating it to our ends.

IT is a matter very considerable, that Devotion is subject to many more illusions then all other virtues, of which we have proof enough from our own experience, although we could find no other foundation in reason. But if the judicious Reader desire to know the cause, I will tell him, that as nothing hath been so much turmoiled and counterfeited as Religion, which hath in all Ages been disfigured by such variety of Sects: so it is no marvel, if Devotion, which is according to S. Thomas, as the branch of this tree, find the like contrarieties.

The cause wherefore Devotion is subject to so many illusions.

Bodies most delicate, are sooneſt corrupted by extream impressions: so this virtue, which is of a temperature very subtle, since it is as it were the cream of charity, may easily be perverted by the evil manage of it. Add, that the wicked spirit seeing this exercise is very necessary for us, seeks to envenom it in its sources, to the end we may draw poison from those things which might be our remedy.

Besides, men either through superabundance of idleness, presumption of ability, through love of their own conceits, or desire of novelty, multiply their inventions upon this matter, and many make golden calves to themselves in Bethel, in stead of the Cherubins of Jerusalem. The Lacedemonians ever attired their gods according to the fashions and humours which then swayed in their City: Every one delights to dress up devotion by the pattern of his passions.

Golden Calves taken for Cherubins. The practice of the Lacedemonians.

I affirm one cannot worthily enough praise the practise of so many devout souls, which live in singular purity, either in Religious or Civil life: And I may say, it is an Hoast of the living God, as terrible in his mildness, as he is sweet in his terrours. I honour all the bodies, yea, the particulars, with the honor their deserts have acquired. But as the strongest truths fail not to be invaded by some obscurities, so it is no wonder, if in the ordering of virtues, some defects creep into the life of particulars, which should no way prejudice the integrity of the general.

Of Dark Devotion.

Gross and afflicting Devotion.

THere is a dark Devotion, which is rude and stupid, another nice, a third transcendent, and a

THE HOLY COURT.

That we must be devout for God, and that if Devotion be not solid, it is no longer Devotion.

fourth sincere and solid. I call a stupid devotion, that which establisheth all virtue in indiscreet and immoderate austerities, which very often kill the body, and extinguish the total vigour of the mind: that, which without any obligation of the Church, or of some particular Order, or sage direction, ties it selfe to straight and rigorous observations, rather for satisfaction of self-will, then through any other sense of piety, and which placeth in this act all Christian perfection, not minding so many other duties, which strictly bind us to matters more considerable.

We have heard the Idolaters of the Eastern parts kill themselves with recital of a fearfull number of prayers to their Idols, roul in the scorching sands, clog themselves with fetters, and slash themselves with razors, thinking by these ways they may arrive to the top of sanctity. Nor can we likewise be ignorant what is sufficiently declared unto us by holy Scripture, that many of the Ancients were much inclined to these superstitious devotions, establishing therein all the order of spiritual life, in such sort, that they perpetually afflicted their bodies, and in the mean time suffered their hearts to sway in empty vanities, burning avarice, rigours, and cruelties towards their neighbours wholly insupportable.

Such was the devotion of Pharisees, so often rebuked, and condemned herein by the lips of the eternal Truth. For when you saw them walk in publick, you beheld men lean and disfigured, who bare scrowls of parchment on their heads, wherein they wrote some sentence of the Law of God, and tied thorns to the border of their gowns, to prick and torment their heels; whilest the heart uncontroulably committed all disorder. Such also was the devotion of certain superstitious, reproved by the Prophet Isaiah in the 58. Chapter, where God speaketh, saying unto them: Who ever hath bin about to exact such fasts from you, and such devotion as you practise? to afflict the body a whole day together, bow the head, lie on sackcloth and ashes? Is this then that which you call fasting, and can you think days and times spent in such actions are very acceptable to God? I will teach you another kind of fast: Break off those bargains you have made with such iniquity, tear in pieces pieces the bundles of unjuſt and inſupportable obligations, let the poor go at liberty, who are overwhelmed with wants. Take the yoke from them which they can no longer bear, give food to the hungry, lodge pilgrims, and wayfarers in your houſe, cloath the naked, and diſdain not your fleſh.

3. This dark devotion hath three things, whith make it much to be ſuſpected, and are the cauſe it is not well proportioned to the manner of life of ſolid ſpirits, First, when it is extreamly ſubject to novelties, ſingularities, and pride, which proceed from fooliſh confidence in ones own judgment. Many, who are wiſe according to their own way, reſemble the Bat, which employeth the chryſtalline humour of his eyes, to make large wings to himſelf, but yet very uſeleſs: ſo they conſume all the lights and inſpirations of God, to create wings of pride and vanity, which onely ſerve them to fly in the night and ignorance of themſelves. Now, it is well known to all, that the moſt fatal plague in matter of Religion and devotion, is the deſire to ſeek direction from ones own opinion, which the learned Gerſon very well obſerved, when he ſingularly well ſaid: (a) If you ſee one walk in the way of proper judgement, although he had already one foot in Paradiſe, take this foot and withdraw it. For it were better to walk in the ſhades of death under the conduct of humility, then to have a Paradiſe in the pleaſures of proper fantaſie. Drunkenneſs is taken by wine (ſaid the Prophet) and pride by its own opinion.

Three bleminſhes of anxious devotion.

The Bat employeth her eyes to make her wings.

(a) An excellent ſpeech of Chancellour Gerſon In vitis patrum libro de diſcretione, littera S. fol. 171. citatus à Richardo Alto.

Et quomodo vinum potantem deripit, ſic erit vir ſuperbus Habac. 2.

Such there are, who after infinite many pains paſſed over in religious Orders, have miſerably loſt themſelves, following the curſed ignis fatuus of their own opinion. Had penſive devotion no other blemiſh it were always much to be feared: but beſides I affirm, that as fiſher-men fiſh in a troubled water, ſo the Devil fiſheth in the melancholly of a perplexed ſoul, principally when it is tyed to ſuperiours, which govern conſcience. We know by the Scripture and Fathers, the importunities and ſmooth practiſes of the evil ſpirit to undo us. Satan every where hath laid his nets before us, the whole earth is nought but a ſnare; ſnares in riches, ſnare in poverty, ſnare in meat, ſnare in drink, ſnare in eating, ſleep, words, works, in all our actions: but we muſt confeſs there is no ſnare more miſerable, nor of greater force, then ſadneſs and melancholly: becauſe it is that which bloweth out the candle, which puts out the light of the mind, and by this means makes ſport for the enemy of our felicity.

Excæcavit enim oculos noſtros laqueos infinitos, & omnes vias noſtras variis replevit deciplis ad capiendas animas noſtras: Ecquis effugiet? Laqueus poſuit in divitiis, &c. Aug. ſolil. Caſſian. collat 2. de diſcretione

Doth not Caſſianus obſerve, that an Hermit named Heron, who had ſweat for the ſpace of fourty years under the habit of Religion, and grown white amongſt ſo many glorious palms, yet ſuffering himſelf to fall into a devotion dark, anxious, and ſolitary, was ſo deceived by the ſubtlety of Satan, that at the latter end of his days, he threw himſelf into a pit, from whence he was drawn half dead, nor was it poſſible to make him ſay, he had done ill in this act ſo exorbitant and deſperate: proper judgement having ſo bewitched him in this ſadneſs, that all his own reſolutions ſeemed oracles unto him?

Horrible iſſue of a hollow devotion.

And although a ſoul ſeldom falleth into ſuch extremities, notwithſtanding for a third inſtance, we may bring a proof taken out of S. Thomas, who ſaith, That ſeeing ſadneſs is the moſt venemous of all paſſions, becauſe it gnaweth the root of the heart, which conſiſteth in a certain alacrity and largneſs, ſpreading it ſelf from the fountain of life through all the members, it is impoſſible that any man who ties himſelf to a penſive and melancholy devotion, can long perſevere in the way of virtue.

4. On theſe ſame gronnds ſuperſtition is raiſed, which through errour feareth all it ſhould love by virtue, and ſcarcely knoweth God, but by violating his clemency through a falſe preſumption of his ſeverity. What ſenſe is there to enter into devotion as if one were lifted upon a rack to be tortured, and to think there is no piety in the world, if the body be not torn and the ſpirit beaten down.

Superſtitio amandos timet, quos colit, violat Senec. Epiſt. 114.

One muſt be crucified in his thoughts by vain apprehenſions, infinite many ſcruples muſt be nouriſhed, ſins imagined which never were ſins, and conceits fed, that if one have walked on ſtraws a-croſs, a great ſacriledge is committed. Some impoſe a thouſand fantaſtical obſervations upon themſelves, ſome inflict voluntary tortures; and you ſhall find of them, who leading a life wholly innocent, make themſelves hells in their own conſciences, watchings wither them, dreams terrify them, and if the leaf of a tree wag, it is a ſpirit which comes to ſurprize them, nay, if ſome fatal bird croak in the obſcurity of night, it is the voice of a dead man, who bids them prepare to paſs into another world.

Oh alaſs! Is it poſſible a ſoul which hath never ſo little feeling of the Divinity, can think God, infinitely merciful, is as a Minos and Rhadamant, mentioned in Fables, who ſpitefully comes to pry into all our actions, to number all our ſteps, takes pleaſure to prepare puniſhments for us, and to raiſe his tropheys on our ruins. Is it ſo hard a matter to believe a good directour, who perſwades the contrary, as that for want of a little inſtruction, labours in religion ſhould be undertaken without relaxation, diſturbances without repoſe, and miſeries without comfort?

Affected Devotion.

Quaint devotion.

Effeminate and nice Devotion is of another ſtrain, for it hath not learned to kill the body for the life of the ſpirit; but ſeeketh out witty ways to accord God and the world together, and under pretext of piety, to take thoſe pleaſures which may flatter the moſt refined ſenſuality. We now adays ſee many women of quality, who engroſs this ſecond order, and who being little interiour, open themſelves with profuſion to all, whatſoever hath in it exteriour oſtent. Some fall into it for ſatisfaction of their own wills, others by ſervile imitation and complacence to the humour of powerful perſons, who like the great Orbs of heaven, draw along the lower planets; ſome through intereſt of fortune, others for colour of piety, and the reſt by amuſement. I know ſome who therein proceed ſincerely, and did the wicked and Libertines underſtand the purity, excellency, and ſanctity of ſo many good ſouls, who handle devotion as it ſhould be, of which the Church is at this preſent furniſhed with a good number, they ſhould be raviſhed with ſight of the inteſiour, and take their lives to be a perpetual miracle. But we muſt confeſs, there are many devotes, who wander from theſe purer paths, to run after a fantaſm of pie-

ry; and although I here note defects, I would have virtuous souls know, my censure no more toucheth them, then thunder the stars in heaven.

All exteriourly.

The first endeavour of this sophisticate devotion, consisteth in making an Oratory or little household Chappel, in building a little magazin of relicks begged on all sides, with more curiosity then Religion, setting candlesticks and pictures in order, in providing rich ornaments, in inventing new fashions of crewets, in weaving girdles, and dressing up a little mercery of trinkets. And though these actions which concern the care of Altars are very laudable, yet are they often very much perverted, both by the intention, which is vain, and execution most indiscreet. We many times finde in these cabinets so religious and curious, a Venus with our Lady, a Cupid near S. Michael, and a pair of beads hanging on the toes of some little giddy marmouzet. This is to renew the practise of that Lady named Marcellina, of whom S. Augustine speaketh in the book of heresies, who mingled the pictures of our Saviour, with those of Pythagoras. Furthermore these places, which seem dedicated to piety, so follow the humour of their Mistris, as they are accommodated to all: and if they in the morning have seen a Priest celebrate Mass, they will make no difficulty to entertain a Ball that very evening. All this devotion is pompous and proud in its furnitures, there is not so much as hair-cloaths, & disciplines but are made of silver, rather to see the bright lustre of it, then feel the smartings. It hath mysteries and marvellous intrications, which many times look on the earth under a veil of sky-colour.

Aug. lib. de haref. c. 7.

The pomp, and practises of it.

It seems to many, the aim of piety is nothing else, but to seek out all its petty accommodations and contentments in the world, to have liberty to do all, game-courtship, costlinesse of apparel, a carosch to ones self to flutter through the streets; whilst the essential parts of marriage are contemned, affairs of the house neglected, and a husband enforced to murmur, who doth express more impatience in an hour, then the other gaineth devotion in ten years.

If question be made of choosing a ghostly Father, there are of them, who much delight in change; and if Seneca said, that Roman Ladies in the time when divorces were permitted, reckoned their husbands by the number of Consuls, who altered every year, one may more justly say, that some devotes measure their Confessours by the course of moons, by taking almost every moneth a new. Other stick so close to one, and set him in so high account above all humane things, that according to their opinion, he alone hath the grace, Sacraments, and blood of Jesus Christ in his hands. But if they must be deprived of him, there is no more piety nor religion for them in the world: the paths of Sion mourn, Churches and Altars are but wildernesses, and the hope of salvation hath lost its lustre.

Seneca lib. 3. de benefic. cap. 16.

Such services and diligence must be used to a slight conscience, as if it were a huge Common-wealth. After the tediousnesse of a confession, which maketh those to lose patience, who were most resolute to attend it, you must give & receive frequent visits, spin out discourses, and eternal prattle: one cannot suppose they are all of God, who is more honoured by silence; one would hardly believe a soul should need such polishing, which appeareth not to be so much refined in the knowledg of things divine. One thinks this devout creature through superabundance of charity, beareth all the sins of the house, another, that she tells all the tales in the City, & those who easily suspect what themselves do without difficulty, imagine there are other ties, which I had rather conceal.

This devotion is not foolish according to the world, but having learnt to make an arrow of any wood to hit the mark of its interests, she maketh use of a Confessour, pliant and mercenary for this purpose. If any be found in the world, who stretch their conscience, who teach to withhold goods ill-gotten, to sooth humours, entertain libertines, and lodge sin almost in the bosom of Theology, these are sanctified spirits, and Prophets in fashion.

There is enough done, if there be outward shew enough. If some small alms be drawn out of those great treasuries of gold and silver, and that she communicate often. For since some Priests are satisfied with saying Mass but once a year, it is come to pass that certain devotes, as if they meant to supply their defects, take almost so many Communions as there be dayes in the year. God forbid I should blame an exercise so holy, which cannot be too much recommended, but it troubles me they go to it without any feeling of that awfull Majesty, and seek access to God, as unto fire to make it tractable. Frequent Communions, which ought not to be permitted but with great discretion as a reward of the most solid virtues, are turned into pillage according to the greedy humour of a spirit, giddy and inconstant. There needeth but the want of some small circumstance to stay a Priest, and hinder him from saying Mass: but these devotists pass all over, and some of them have found the way, to accord the Communion and a Comedy upon one and the same day.

What will ensue of this, but that such women may draw water from the fountains of our Saviour, like the Danaïdes in the hell of Poets with a sive. They often bear profanation to Altars, to bring back vengeance, and know not the many evils which assaile them, proceed from the contempt of holy things.

After so many Communions, these souls profit in spiritual life, as the little Cavalier shewed at Rome, who laboured much in running in a wheel, and at the end of his travel, had gone no further then when he began. When was it that a dozen of Communions have taken from them one hair of vanity? Are they less pompous, less powdered, less frizled, more reserved, more chast, more discreet? You see to come from thence wily spirits, who perpetually byass all to their own ends, who busie themselves in affairs, who betray the most holy amities, who practise little furies of choller, who render themselves inexorable in the most civil requests, who have hearts of ice towards the miseries of mankinde, who make tributo of all, and deifie all in themselves, yea their own follies. I speak this, to make the solidity of solid devotions the more appear, which are practised in the Church, answerable to treatises written by blessed Sales, and my Lord Bishop of Belley.

Caliped.

6. You may easily judge by such proceedings, how weak and frivolous all these manners of serving God are. But if you thereunto will apply the light of reason, you shall observe, that any thing is so much the more solid and firm, as it hath foundation and support upon the Divinity, because Eternity only appertaineth to the Divinity, which rendreth things lasting. Now this Eternity, which is in God, as in its source, distilleth by participation into those things which adhere, & are most perfectly united unto him. Behold the reason why we must conclude, that true devotion, which hath much union with God, hath so much the more subsistence. Bees bred of the body of a Bull, bear upon them a little resemblance of a Bull; and the tree in the seed, whereof you shall have some characters engraven, will many times represent them in its leaves and fruits. Every thing naturally

Reason of the nullity of this devotion.

tendeth to the imitation of its original. What marvel then, if true devotion which is derived from the eternity of God, being unable to have eternity of it self as a creature, hath at leaſt a band ſtrong and durable: whereas quite contrary, this apiſh devotion being merely terrene, hath no true root in God, nor can draw any nouriſhment from thence, whereupon enſueth, it muſt dry up and wither. Every plant which my heavenly Father planted not, ſhall be rooted out, ſaid our Saviour in S. Matthew.

Omnis plantatio quam non plantavit Pater meus, radicabitur. Mat. 15.

A ſoul ſolidly Chriſtian, reſembleth the Palm, which beareth its ſtrength on the top: it hath all its vigour in God, and of God. He is the ſource and end of all good works. And if God chance to fail it, the whole fabrick of ſalvation falls to the ground. Beſides, this devotion becomes ruinous, becauſe it wholy depends on conſolations derived from creatures mutable, ſhort, unable to content a ſoul only made for God. Every creature proceedeth from nothing, and if you diſengage it from the preſervation of the firſt being, behold it is forthwith in its nothing, it cannot furniſh you with any thing but wind, to feed you like a wretched Chameleon, which is the cauſe the creature that ſticketh unto it, remains ever hungry. And this is it which S. Auguſtine hath divinely ſpoken: My God, my life, and my happineſs. It is fit I confeſs my miſery unto thee, after ſo many filly trifles of temporal conſolations have ſeparated me from thee, who art an eternal and an immutable good, I am diſſolved, and have been poured through the conduit-pipes of my ſenſes, parted and divided into ſuch and ſo many objects, and I have every where found hunger, thirſt, and penury in plenty it ſelf. For nothing was able to fill me, ſince I could not perceive in my ſelf a Good, ſolid, ſingular, inſeparable, which contenteth all deſires, and ſatisfies all appetites.

S. Paulinus — Deus in omnes operis ſui & ſui.

Aug. ſoli. Et in Deum vita mea beata, hoc eſt miſeriam meam confiteor tibi, &c.

Add, that in ſearching for petty ſenſual conſolations, they are not always had, but one often meets with repulſe, with affliction and gal, from whence comes to paſs, that falſe piety, which is tied to theſe curious niceties, as they fail, it looſeth all ſupport and vigour.

Iſaiah 36.6. Ecce confidis ſuper baculum arundineum.

All theſe kinds of devotion reſemble the bird called by the Grecians Clotide, a counterfeit ſwallow, which doth nothing but chatter with ſuch loudneſs, that ſhe deafens all the world: ſhe much loveth the warm and clear air; but ſo ſoon as ſhe feels the firſt approach of winter, ſhe is ſtark, creeps along, and hangs the wings as half dead: ſhe will paſs the ſeas with other ſwallows to ſeek out heat, and yet ſhe flies ſcarcely one day but repents it. To return back ſhe is aſhamed, follow ſhe cannot. It remains ſhe become prey to ſome unhappineſs. Behold juſtly the image of this plaiſtered devotion. If the falſe ſwallow be a chatterer, this devotion is often nought elſe but babble. If ſhe ſeek for warmth, this is nouriſhed with temporal proſperities and ſenſual comforts. If the one be ſo quailed with cold, the other bears the leaſt adverſity with ſtrange impatience. If the one making ſhew to follow, the reſt ſtays in the way, how many ſouls ſee we, who not having well run their race in matter of devotion, nor taken God for their ſcope, reſt in inconſtancies, agitations, troubles of mind, and in the end break with God.

Tiuol. 1.c. 25.

Of Tranſcendent Devotion.

Tranſcendent devotion.

I Paſs to the third kind, called Tranſcendent Devotion, which practiſeth to purſue unuſual ways, and to refine all other devotions by ſubtlety of wit. Common things, which are often the beſt, are not for its purpoſe. It can abide nothing uniform and temperate; but muſt of neceſsity raiſe much noiſe and oſtent, to make it ſelf known. It affecteth unheard-of obſervations, extracted methods, Chymerical words: you would ſay, it is a rich trader, who hath a ſhop of ſpirituality, and huge magazins ſtored with ſpecious titles; but when you come to look narrowly into it, you ſhall find there ſo many leaves and bark, ſo much vanity and empty merchandize, that this which at firſt ſo affrighted the ſimple, ſerves afterward for an object of ſcorn to the wiſeſt.

We are not ignorant there are kinds of excellent ways to treat with God, reſerved to ſouls the moſt eminent, and that it were a raſh attempt to condemn myſtical Theology, wherein ſo many worthily religious have proſperouſly proceeded. We know the exerciſe of prayer goeth by degrees, and that according to Richardus de Sancto Victore; the firſt, is thought, the ſecond, meditation, and the third, contemplation. Thought ordinarily is inconſtant and indeterminate; Meditation is confined and limited to certain points; Contemplation flieth like an eagle with more liberty, and picks up (as ſaith Syneſius) the flowers of increated light, to colour and illuminate it ſelf the more. Thought is a ſimple impreſſion on things divine, Meditation is a more exact ſearch into the Maxims of our faith; but Contemplation is an immoveable aſpect of this firſt Verity, which ſeedeth & ſatiateth the ſoul with the ſweetneſſes of God.

Sublime prayer.

Rich. l. 1. de contempl. c. 2.

Syneſ. in hym. ἀγνοθεα παρ᾽ ἡμῖν.

This Contemplation alſo is divided into divers degrees. For there is one ordinary, which maketh uſe of imagination and of ſenſible ſpecies drawn from the ſight of objects, though it ſubtilize and purifie them by the help of the underſtanding. There is another termed immediate & perfect, which goes directly to god, without any mixture of fantaſies, or aid of creatures; but if it be much diſcharged from all things create, it is called dark contemplation; becauſe the ſoul being in it wholly dazled, & (as it were) blinded with rays of the divine Eſſence, frameth not to it ſelf any ſenſible idæa of God, but beholdeth him by the way of negation, baniſhing all repreſentations & reſemblances of creatures, the more firmly to adhere unto the ſimplicity of the firſt Being. But if it proceed in a ſuperiour manner, then it mounteth to the contemplation, termed the moſt eminent, which is the whole-ſiſter of the beatified viſion, and the laſt heaven whereunto S. Paul was rapt, a ſphere totally enflamed with ſeraphical love, where the uſe of ſenſe and exteriour man, ſeems quite annihilated, and the ſpirit tranſported to the ineffable converſation with the Divinity.

Divers degrees of contemplation.

S. Ambroſ. l. 3. de virginibus. Influentibus divinis cæleſtibus puris peregrinatur affectus, & uſus illi exterioris hominis exoleſcit.

Now we muſt obſerve upon this diſcourſe, what the learned S. Thomas ſaid, That whileſt our life is ſhut up in this mortal body, its manner of actuating proceedeth by ſimple and ordinary ways, which conduct us to the Creatour, by contemplation of creatures: and if any one underſtand ſpiritual things in this ſublime nakedneſs, which is diſcharged of images, it is an admirable way, & ſurpaſſeth all humane things. Firſt, it is neceſſary to have a pious affection to matters divine, thence we paſs to meditation, from meditation to ordinary contemplation, which is attended by admiration and admiration by a certain ſpiritual alacrity, and this alacrity by a certain fear with reverence, and fear by fervent charity diffuſed into the exerciſe of good works. Theſe are the moſt aſſured ways to walk in ſpiritual life.

S. Thomas in 3. dist. 34.

The ordinary manner of proceeding in things divine.

But theſe tranſcendent ſouls will in the beginning liſt a man up from the earth and make a Seraphin of him from the firſt day of his apprentiſhip. To meditate well, is nothing elſe but to make a review of our ſelf and actions, to adapt them to the commandments of God, and counsels of Jesus Christ. You must fly fervently even to the third Heaven, and remain there rapt, without knowledge whether one be on this side, or that side of the world. But alas! how many times happeneth it these Eagles descend from this false imperial Heaven, to fish some wretched Frog in the Marsh of this inferiour Earth?

Illuſions of this tranſcendent devotion.

After all these large temples of prayers, gilded with so goodly words, we see in the Sanctuary a Pourtraict of a Rat, a soul faint and pusillanimous, shut up in self-love, tied to petty interests, imperiously commanded by so many tumultuous passions, which play their prize, whilest the spirit slumbers in this mystical sleep and living death.

They will in the beginning go equal with the seraphical souls of Saints, who arrived at this purity of prayer by great mortifications, and most particular favours from God. But they imitate them so ill, that instead of being suited with great and solid virtues, they retain nought but ostentous forms, and a vain boast of words.

What importeth it a devote, who cannot tell how to govern her house, to know the retire, introversion, extroversion, simplification, dark prayer, mystical sleep, spiritual drunkenness, tast, fire, quiet, the cloud of glory, and so many other kindes, which serve to disguise devotion? Know we not many spirits of young women lose themselves herein, and seeking too much to refine ancient piety, have made it wholly to vapour out in smoak, finding themselves as void of humility, as they were puffed up with presumption? From thence often proceeds the curiosity of matters ravishing and extraordinary, to gain to themselves the reputation of great spiritual persons, and to sooth themselves with the opinion of a false sanctity. When one is once gained by a false pretext of errour, it is no hard matter to be perswaded all we think on is a Vision, all we say is a Propheste, and all we do is a Miracle. The evil spirit finding souls drunk with this self-love, hath played strange pranks, which may be read in Epiphanius and Cassianus, and whereof it would be an easie matter to produce many examples, were it not much better to deplore, then recount them.

The word of God altered in chairs, by the extravagant opinions of hearers.

8. This vanity not satisfied to harbour in the minde which bred it, extendeth to the chairs of Preachers, where the curious and phanatical spirits of Auditours would willingly hatch Chymæra's for such, as are yet but young beginners in the mystery. One will have, that use be made of thoughts transcendent and extraordinary, and many times extravagant, intangled with a perplexity of periods, which leave nothing but noise in the ear, and arrogance in the minde: the other, who is most ignorant, startles at this quaint Theology, and seeks to wrest mysteries, and dis-joynt men's judgments, thereby to draw upon all sorts of people discourses of the Trinity and Incarnation, involved in visionary imaginations, and turned about on a counter-battery of affected antitheses; and if this be not as ordinary in all sermons, as was the Delphick sword, which heretofore served for all purposes in Sacrifices, it is to be ignorant in the ways of souls elect. The other delighteth in doctrines unheard of, in a vast recital of Authours and forrein tongues, as if he went about to exercise Devils, and not instruct Christians: some one boasts to alledge neither Scripture, Fathers, nor any passage whatsoever, for fear of marring the plaits of his periods; he makes trophey to take all within his own fancy, and to borrow nothing of the Ancients: As if Bees, who rob flowers in the garden to make honey of them, were not much better then Spiders, who spin their wretched webs out of their own substance. There are of them, who desire to bundle up an endless train of fantastical conceptions, without Scripture, or reason, who seem to tell wonders and rarities most ravishing, but if any man will weigh them in an equal ballance, he shall finde vanities, only big with noise and wind. They who have the itch of ear, are devoted to the beauty of language, and bestir them rather to talk, then speak in a sermon. They adore discourses replenished with a youthful eloquence, and devested of wisdom, having no sinews for support, and less sting to transfix a heart.

Sapientia, atque facundia componi. Tertul. l. de anima c. 3.

Good God! how knowing would Preachers be, did they understand (as saith S. Paul) how to speak, both on God's part, before God, and in Jesus Christ, as being shut up within the Word, before they bring forth a word; and Auditors should be well instructed, if they all heard (as saith S. Paulinus) with the ear through which Jesus Christ entreth. To preach God, hatred of vice, and love of virtue, with a discourse firm and rational, and first of all to perswade himself, what he wisheth others may practise; this is the mark whereat all preaching should aim. We have cause to praise God, that he hath rendred our Age very fruitful in men able and sufficient in this kinde, to whom I bear such respect, and whom I so much admire, that I seek not to censure them. It were to be wished the younger sort would rather frame themselves by their examples, then to be surprized with an itch to please certain ears, and so many unjoynted judgments.

All such as judge of Preachers only by the garb and exteriour shew, use to deifie their vices; and it is a note one doth not always please God when he seeks over-much to please those who like nothing but extravagancies. Care must be had of City-bruits and vulgar opinions, as the Eagle regardeth flies. Light never blushed to be despised by Rear-mice, and a prime spirit is not troubled at the sinister judgments which the ignorant make, so that he learn to cast up his reckoning with God, for whom he laboureth. Onions hinder the attraction of the Adamant, and all these popular opinions do nothing but disturb a spirit on which they make impression.

Solid Devotion.

9. LEt us dis-involve what we may, the devotion of Sacraments, Books and Sermons, from these sophisticate forms, which varnish the lustre of it, and let us learn to seek it in the purest sources and fountains of our Saviour.

True devotion. 1. Cor. 13. Θρησκεία τοῦ θεοῦ μία ἐστὶ, μὴ εἶναι κακόν. Hermes.

True Devotion, if you desire to know the condition of it, beareth the same liveries which S. Paul gives to Charity: It is patient, it is not offended with any thing, but that which tendeth to the displeasure of God; it digesteth all acerbities, turning them into its colour and taste; it is sweet and benign; it hath emulation, but for virtues, it doth nothing unfitly; it hath not any thing to do with the puffings of vanity nor ambitions, which invade worldly spirits; it seeks not its own ends, it is not moved with anger to see it self despised, it thinks no ill, it rejoyceth not at iniquity, but enlargeth it self chearfully in the truth, it suffereth all, it believes all, it hopeth all, it endureth all. It is a devotion always joyful, always content, ever active in its dutie, not prying through curiosity into others affairs. It hath thoughts innocent, an eye simple, hands clean, little noise, and much fruit. A Devotion which complaineth of none, is troubled at nothing, which speaks little and doth much, which hath more good effects, then slight complements, more silence then eloquence, more humility in the interiour, then ostent in the exteriour, which flyeth on all the actions of life, as a Bee on Flowers, and converteth them all into honey. Oh what a Treasure of peace, what a treasure of love, what a treasure of glory is this devotion.

There needs but one great word to express great things. Disquiet not your self upon the multitude of precepts and books, to know how you may arrive to this excellent virtue, which sowethe the seeds of perfection in the heart. The first step you must make towards it, is the knowledge of the will of God. Know what he would have of you, what you of him, in what manner he expecteth it, and what desire you have to please him.

An Epistle to Demetrias, written by an Ancient, and translated by a great personage of this Age.

That man offendeth in serving, who understands not how he should serve, and it is ever a main part of obedience, to learn how you must obey. There are things forbidden, and things commanded, some permitted, others advised. God forbids the evil, commandeth the good, permits the indifferent, adviseth the perfect.

Who puts himself in a way of devotion, puts himself in a way of perfection: but who flieth above nature, ought not for all that to destroy the law of nature. To say one is devout, and fails in the duties of common charity, which commandeth us to do to our neighbours, what we would have done to our selves, is to have fair titles, and feeble actions.

That man is not exempt from the law, who would do above the law, and there is not any more obliged to avoid things not permitted, than he, who for the love of God denieth himself such as are permitted. Devotion is not practised to excuse sins, but to perfect virtues.

A soul truly devout, hath three aspects, which repleniſh the whol capacity of the duties it professeth; one upon God, another on it self, the third upon a neighbour. It serves in common piety, and above common piety: that applieth it to all the ordinary actions of our Christianity, and the other disposeth it into a more sublime commerce than the common, yet contemns not the common. It hath its retirement, its prayers, its meditations, guided & digested, not for satisfaction of will, but edification. It keeps all the senses well governed in great equality, the tongue under the rule of discretion, the heart in a secure peace; and towards a neigbour carrieth hony in the mouth, charity in the hands, and example in all its actions, which make it live in all the antepasts of Paradise.

Non est census super censum salutis corporis, non est ebis diamentum super cordis gaudium. Eccles. 30.

As there is no corporal riches comparable to health, so there is not any spiritual wealth in the world, that comes near the alacrity which God distilleth into a heart truly and solidly devout, freely unloosened from earth, to be resigned to Heaven.

The oyl of consolation (said Hugo) drieth up in worldly vessels, but as for the consolation and joy which is drawn from Devotion, it is so exuberant, that there is no vessel here below able well to contain it. It is necessary the heart break into sighs, and dissolve into desires for the presence of God. I call your consciences (O devout souls) to witness, that I were eloquent if I could make to pass through my pen, what you feel in your hearts. I affirm, that if there be any life in the world, which is able to nourish and foment the joy whereof I speak, it is the Christian life, holily and purely led according to the rules of the word of God, and I borrow the proofs of what I say, from the great wit Tertullian, who in the Book he composed of games and sportive entertainments, sheweth by lively and urgent reasons there is no game nor recreation in all the world can be compared to the soul of a Christian, whose conscience is a portative Theater, where incessantly are presented many admirable shews. All, which is powerful and energetical to glad a well-composed soul, and to entertain it in eternal delights, is eminently found in the exercises of piety. if the chief source of peace and alacrity, be to be throughly reconciled to God, is it not in this Angelical Devotion? Is it not in piety, that an entire reconciliation is made with our Master, that the stool, the ring, and shoes of hyacinth, are put on to walk in the paths of his commandments? If there be nothing so majestical, so delicious, so pleasing, as the contemplation of truth, whereon our soul liveth, as the eye on colours, the Bee on dew, and the Phenix (as is said) on the thinnest vapours of the air; is it not here, where after so many errours, so many fantasies, so many illusions, which turmoyled our minds in the disturbances of the world, we enjoy in purity and plenitude the consideration of the most noble Maxims of spiritual life? If it be a sweet and sensible repose, having obtained remission of sins of the life past, to return into the peaceful harbour of a good conscience; is not here the rock where so many waves are broken, where so many little currs, which cease not to bark in the bottome of a troubled conscience, are appeased; and where the soul becomes a calm sea, beautified and curled with the rays of an enamoured and smiling Sun? Finally, if there be no greater pleasure in the world, than to despise temporal pleasures, and to trample under foot the vanities which Monarchs themselves have set over their heads, where are they despised, but in this school of virtue, where mortification of passions is learned, and the exercise of goodly and heroick actions, which give the soul an antepast of Heaven in this mortal life, and an enfranchisement from fear of death? How can a devout soul which lives amongst so many helps, so many remedies, so many comforts, give the least advantage to one black and cloudy thought of the world? What can we find out able to contristrate us amongst such succours and lights? O a thousand times happy soul, which having chased away all these illusions of vanity, beholdest with a clear serene eye the ever to be adored rays of this verity!

The ninth EXAMPLE upon the ninth MAXIM.

Of Solid Devotion.

SOlid Devotions resemble those rivers which run under the earth; they steal from the eyes of the world, to seek for the eyes of God, they study solitudes and retirements, they are wholly shut up within themselves, and it often happens, that those of whom we speak least on earth, are the best known in Heaven.

I verily think among all the great examples which may be produced of piety in Courts, there will not any one be found more sincere, or more strong, than that of S. Lewis, as it appeareth by all the acts of his life, namely, that which was written by his confessour. It is an easie matter to judge his was a most holy life, because the most disinteressed, he having no other aim, but to dissolve his person, his Kingdome, his wife and children, into the will of God, to make the world no longer to be ought else, but a Temple of the Divinity.

S. Lewis the true Table of the most solid Devotion.

Requiescat anima mea, memor sui Dei, & delectatus sum, & exercitatus sum, & defecit spiritus meus. Psal. 76.

Tertul. de spectaculis. Hæc spectacula sancta, perpetua, gratuita, Quid jucundius quàm Dei patris, & Domini reconciliatio, quam veritatis revelatio, quam erroris cognitio, quam tantorum retrò criminum venia? &c.

The Divine providence drew him out of his Kingdom with an Abraham's faith; gave him among so many lands and seas, the conduct of Moses; and to set a seal on him of all his greatness, caused him to end his life with the patience of Job. We find many Princes who embraced piety, one after one fashion, another after another, and who have covered great vices with great virtues: but it is a very hard matter to find one either more universal in al actions of virtue, or more free from blame in the point of innocency, than our S. Lewis. David ows all he is, more to penance, than to innocency. Constantine the Great, before before he was a Christian, saw himself most unhappily stained with the bloud of his allies. Theodosius the elder, was inflamed with choller, which cost many people of Thessalonica their lives. Arcadius persecuted S. Chrysostom, at the solicitation of the Empress his wife. Honorius his brother, who was very pious and innocent, and nothing warlike in him, and ever better knew what the white cock named Roma did, in whom he took pleasure, then the capital City of the world, whereof he was Emperour. Theodosius the younger, entertained love or hatred, according as his Eunuchs and women dictated.

Belisarius, one of the bravest Captains which the earth ever bare, had a very commendable souldier-like piety; but did all at the will of Theodora the Empress, observing her passions, even to the taking the Pope, and putting him into prison by her command. Narses who succeeded him, did wonders and subdued Totila, the most valorous King which ever reigned among the Goths, he was very devout to the Blessed Virgin, to whom he attributed all his victories, but withall so insolent, that to be revenged for a word of disdain, which his Mistress the Empress of Constantinople spake, he gave Italy over as a prey to the Lombards.

Finally, to conclude this Relation, and to speak of that which more nearly concerneth us, Charlemaign was the greatest Emperour of the world in matter of religion, valour, policy, liberality, sweetness, and affability; but the love of women, though expiated by sharp penance, set blemishes on this Sun, which the memory of ensuing Ages, hath much ado to wash off. It is a strange thing, that God chastised the sins of the father in his own daughters, who had very little care of their honour, through too free an education and indulgence of the Emperour, who spared the punishment of his own sins in another.

There hath not been almost in all the Monarchies, but one S. Lewis, who was so like to virtue, that if it upon one side appeared incarnate to mortal eyes, and on the other shewed this great King, there would have been much ado to know which were the copy, and which the principal. He had three things very recommendable in him, religious wisdom in the brightest lustre of the world, humility planted even upon the rubies and diamonds of the Royal Crown, courage and valour invincible, in a devotion incomparable.

Who would see a manifest token of his wisdom, let him behold now his spirit in the greatest concussions of worldly accidents stood ever in the same posture, without any whit forgoing the ordinary exercise of his piety. One sole action of his life, which was his taking in Ægypt, made what I say well to appear. This good King having lost a great battel, which ruined all his affairs, saw the wide fields covered with the bodies of his servants, and Nilus overflowing with the bloud of his French, himself surprized and taken by his enemies, and led into the Sultan's Tent among clamours, out-cries, infernal countenances of Saracens, and all the images of death, able to overwhelm a soul of the strongest temper: notwithstanding though his heart were steeped as a sponge in a sea of dolours and compassion, ever making use of reason, he entred into the Barbarians pavillion, not at all changing colour, and as if he had returned from his walk in the garden of his palace, he asked his pages for his book of prayers, and taking it, disposed himself to pay the usual tribute of his oraisons in a profound tranquility of mind; which I conceive to be very rare, since there needeth oftentimes but the loss of a trifle, to stay devotion, which is not arrived to the point of solidity.

But if you therein seek for a perfect humility, consider what passed in the Council of Lyons, and see how he laboured to depose the Emperour Frederick the second, who was ruined in reputation in the opinion of almost all the world. Other Princes who have not alwaies their hands so innocent, but that they readily invade the goods of others, when some religious pretext is offered them, would have been very ambitious to be enstalled in his place whom they meant to despoil, but the universal consent of great men, judged this throne could not be worthily supplied, but by this great King: yet he notwithstanding declined it, as a wise Pilot would a rock, and thought better to choose the extremity of all evils of the world among Saracens, than to mount to the Empire by such wayes.

But that which is most considerable in the matter we handle, may be observed in his valour, never weakned by his great devotion: for he was one of the most courageous Princes in a cold temperature, and with reason, that was then under Heaven. It was courage, which taking him from the sweet tranquility of a life wholly religious, caused him to leave a Kingdom replenished with peace, contentment, and delights, to go to a land of Saracens, and live in all incommodities imaginable to nature. It was courage, which caused him so many times to expose his royal and valiant person, not onely to the toyls of a desperate voyage, but to the strokes also of most hazardous battels; witness, when at his arrival in Ægypt, the coast being all beset with Saracens, very resolute to hinder the passage of his ship, he threw himself first of all from the ship into the water, where he was plunged up to the shoulders, with his target about his neck, and sword in hand, as a true spectacle of magnanimity to all his Army, which encouraged by the example, came to the land, as the King had commanded. The greatness of the sun is measured by a small shadow on the earth, and there many times needeth but very few words to illustrate a great virtue. So many excellent pens have written upon his brave acts, and made them so well known to all the world, that it were to bring light into day, to go about to mention them.

If some say, He is to be as a pattern for Kings and Lords; Ladies, who should manure devotion as an inheritance for their sex, shall never want great lights, and worthy instructions, if they will consider those, who being more near to our Age, should make the more impression upon their manners. Divers Ladies excellent in piety.

If we speak of the endeavour of prayer, look upon Barbe Zopoly Queen of Polonia, who continuing days and nights in prayer, all covered over with sackcloth, affixed good success to the standards of the King her husband, and for him gained battels. See the reverend Father Hilarion of Costa.

If account be made of the chastity of maidens and sequestration from worldly conversation, reflect on Beatrix du Bois, who being one of the most beautifull creatures of her time, and seeing the innocent flames of her eyes too easily enkindled love in the hearts of those who had access to her, put her self upon so rough a penance for other's sin, that she was fourty years without being seen, or to have seen any man in the face.

If you speak of modesty, let wanton Courtiers behold Antonietta de Bourbon, wife of Claudius, first Duke of Guise, who after the death of her husband, was cloathed in serge, and went continually amongst the poor with her waiting women, to teach them the practise of alms.

If charity be magnifi'd toward persons necessitous, cast your eye upon Anne of Austria, Q. of Poland, who accuſtoming to ſerve twelve poor people every Munday, the very ſame day ſhe yielded her ſoul up to God, when ſhe had ſcarcely ſo much left as a little breath on her lips, asked ſhe might once more wait on the poor at dinner, and that death might cloſe her eys, when ſhe opened her hands to charity.

If the inſtruction of children be much eſteemed, fix your thoughts upon Anne of Hungary, mother of eleven daughters, and admire her in the midſts of her little company; as the old Hen-Nightingale, giving tunes and proportions of the harmony of all virtues, and ſo breeding theſe young creatures, that they all proſpered well with excellent and worthy parts.

If you delight in the government of a family, which is one of the chieſeſt praiſes of married women, take Direction from Margaret Dutcheſs of Alenton, who governed the whole family with ſo much wiſdom, that order, which is the beauty of the world, found there all its meaſures, and that if the domeſtick ſervants of other Lords and Ladies are known by their liveries, ſhe cauſed hers to be known by their modeſty.

If you deſire auſterities, look with reverence on the hair-cloath and nails of Charlotte de Bourbon, the King's Grand-mother; and behold with admiration Frances de Batarnay, who during a Widowhood of threeſcore years, was twenty of them without ever coming into bed.

If you praiſe chaſt Widows, who can paſs without an Elogy, Elizabeth widow of Charls the ninth, who in a flouriſhing youth being much courted by all the great Monarchs of the world, anſwered, That having been the widow of a Charls of France, ſhe had concluded all worldly magnificencies, and that nothing more remained for her, but to have Jeſus Chriſt for a ſpouſe. And verily ſhe ſpent the reſt of her days in a converſation wholly Angelical, amongſt religious women, whom ſhe had founded.

If conſtancy in the death of kindred have place, let the leſſon be hearkned unto, which Magdalen, wife of Gaſton de Foix gave, who having ſeen the death of a husband, whom ſhe loved above all the world, and afterward of an only ſon remaining the total ſupport of her houſe, made her courage to be as much admired among the dead, as her love was eſteemed among the living.

And what ſtyle would not be tired in ſo great a multitude of holy and ſolid devotions, and who can but think the choice becometh hard by abundance? unleſs we will ſay, ſuch as have been the moſt perſecuted, were the moſt eminent. Where it ſeems it is an Act of the Divine Providence, to have many times given to vicious & faithleſs husbands, the beſt wives in the world, as Mariamne to Herod, Serena to Diocleſian, Conſtantia to Licinius, Helena to Julian the Apoſtate, Irene to Conſtantinus Copronymus, Theodora to the Emperour Theophilus, Theodelinda to Uthar, Thira to Gormondus King of Denmark, Charlotte de Albret to Caſar Borgia, Katherine to Henry of England. This Lady was infinitely pious, yea, beyond limit. It is good to be devout in marriage, and not to forget ſhe is a married wife, much way muſt be given to the humours of a husband, much to the care of children and family, and ſometimes to loſe God at the Altar, to finde him in houſhold cares.

Good wives of bad husbands.

Katherine of England. Flor. Remond.

But this great Queen only attended the affairs of Heaven, and had already ſo little in her of earth, that ſhe ſhewed in all her deportments to be made for another manner of Crown, then that of Great Britain. She for the moſt part ſhut her ſelf up in the Monaſteries of Virgins, and roſe at midnight to be preſent at Mattins. She was cloathed from five of the clock, not decked like a Queen, but contented with a ſimple habit, ſaying, The beſt time ſhould be allowed to the ſoul, ſince it is the better part of our ſelves. When ſhe had the poor habit of Saint Francis under her garments, which ſhe commonly ware, ſhe reputed her ſelf brave enough. The Fridays and Saturdays were ever dedicated by her to abſtinence: but the Eves of our Ladies feaſts, ſhe faſted with bread and water, ſhe failed not to confeſs on Wedneſdays and Fridays, and in a time when Communions were very ſeldom, ſhe had recourſe thereunto every Sunday. In the fore-noon ſhe continued ſix hours in prayer; after dinner ſhe read two whole hours the lives of Saints, and ſpeedily returned to Church, from whence ſhe departed not till night drave her thence. This was to eat honey and Manna in abundance, in a condition which had too ſtrong ties for the earth, to be ſo timely an inhabitant of Heaven.

Whileſt ſhe led this Angelical life, her husband, young and boyling, over-flowed in all ſorts of riot, and in the end came to this extremity, as to trample all laws, both divine and humane under foot, to repudiate his lawful wife, who brought him children to ſerve as pledges of marriage, and wed Anne of Bullen.

Since this love, which made, as it were, but one Tomb of two parts of the world, never have we ſeen any more dreadful. The poor Princeſs, who was looked on by all Chriſtendom as a perfect model of all virtue, was driven out of her Palace and bed, amidſt the tears and lamentations of all honeſt men, and went to Kimbolton, a place incommodious and unhealthy, whileſt another took poſſeſſion, both of the heart and Scepter of the King. So that here we may behold virtue afflicted, and a devotion ſo conſtant, that the ruines of fortune, which made all the world tremble, were unable to ſhake it. She remained in her ſolitude with three waiting women, and four or five ſervants, a thouſand times more content, then had ſhe lived in the higheſt glory of worldly honour, and having no tears to bewail her ſelf, ſhe lamented the miſeries ſhe left behinde her. There is yet a Letter left, which ſhe wrote to her husband a little before her death, plainly ſhewing the milde temper of her heart, and the force of devotion, which makes the moſt inflamed injuries to be forgotten, to procure conformity to the King of the afflicted, who is the mirrour of patience, as he is the reward of all ſufferers,

My King, and deareſt ſpouſe, Inſomuch as already the hour of my death approacheth, the love and affection I bear you, cauſeth me to conjure you to have a care of the eternal ſalvation of your ſoul, which you ought to prefer before mortal things, or all worldly bleſſings. It is for this immortal ſpirit you muſt neglect the care of your body, for the love of which you have thrown me head-long into many calamities, and your own ſelf into infinite diſturbances. But I forgive you with all my heart, humbly beſeeching Almighty God, he will in Heaven confirm the pardon, I on earth give you. I recommend unto you our moſt dear Mary, your daughter and mine, praying you to be a better Father to her, then you have been a husband to me. Remember alſo the three poor maids, companions of my retirement, as likewiſe all the reſt of my ſervants, giving them a whole years wages, beſides what is due, that ſo they may be a little recompenced for the good ſervice they have done me, proteſting unto you in the concluſion of this my letter and life, that my eys love you, and deſired to ſee you, more then any thing mortal.

of PROPER INTEREST.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

Every understanding man should do all for himself, as if he were his own God, and esteem no Gospel more sacred, than his Proper Interest.

THis Maxim of the Prophane Court, is the source of all evils, the very plague of humane life, and one may say it is the Trojan horse, which beareth fire and sword, sacage and rapine in its entrails, from thence proceed ambition, rebellion, sacriledge, rapine, concussion, ingratitude, treachery, and in a word, all that which is horrid in Nature.

Disloyalties that spring from this Maxim.

Self-love, which should be contained within the limits of an honest preservation of ones self, flieth out as a river from his channel, and with a furious inundation covereth all the land, it overthrows all duty and deep drencheth all respect of honesty. Men, who have renounced piety, if they peradventure see themselves to be strong and supported with worldly enablements, ackowledge no other Gods but themselves. They imagine the Jupiter of Poets was made as they: they create little Sultans, and there is not any thing from whence they derive not tribute, to make their imaginary greatness encrease. When this blindness happeneth in persons very eminent, it is most pernicious; for then is the time, when not being awed by the fear of a God Omnipotent, they turn the world upside down, to satisfie miserable ambition. And such Princes there have been, who have rather profusely lost the lives of thirty thousand subjects, than suffered so much land to be usurped upon them, as were needful for their tomb.

Practise of worldly men. Ingratitude.

Others, whom birth hath not made Cæsars, extend their petty power what they may. They observe men, sound their means, their abilities, their capacities, their wits and dispositions. They accommodate all to their own pretensions, they pull a feather from one, a wing from another; they flatter, promise, charm, and descend even to slavery, to mount up to the honours they aim at, no more afterward regarding their fortune who holp them, than a nightly dream.

Kingdome of particular interest.

The world is replenished with ungrateful and barbarous souls, who cannot so much as endure the sight of those, who formerly spent themselves in their service, thinking their presence a reproach of their crime; and there are such to be found, who will make no scruple to sacrifice the blood of their best servants at the Altar of their Fortune. Others, who cannot reach to the height of worldly ambition, bend themselves with all their strength to money, whereof they make a Deity, and run with full speed to the gainful hopes of houses. For this, friends dissolve the most stable amities; for this, allies tear one another, families divide, Cities and houses burn; and when I more nearly consider it, I find it is a blessing from God, that women do not often bring forth twins, for they would perpetually contend in this world, yea, in their mothers bellies, who should have the most land, even before they enjoyed air to breath in.

THE HOLY COURT.

That proper Interest is a tyranny framed against the Divinity, and that a man who is the God of himself, is a devil to the rest of the world.

Of so many noble sciences manured by our Ancestours, there almost remains nothing for us, but wretched images. There is an industry esteemed in the world above all other, called the sleight of hand, which shews how to draw all to ones self, to be enriched with the spoils of others, and to devour many little serpents to become a huge dragon, as saith the Greek sentence. Now observe here three principal points, which conclude the perverseness of this Maxim, the first whereof is tyranny, the second sacriledge, and the third disaster.

Ὄφις, εἰ μὴ φάγοι ὄφιν, δράκων οὐ γενήσεται.

Reasons against this Maxim, and first its tyranny.

First, it is a manifest thing, that tyranny, which invadeth the state and jurisdiction of the living God, is most impious and audacious: yet the sect which makes profession now-adays to serve God with exteriour ceremonies, and proper interests in the interiour of the heart, tyrannically usurpeth a right upon the eternal power of the Sovereign Master, which is to reflect upon ones self in all things, as his end and sovereign good. From whence you may very well conclude, his undertakings cannot be but tyrannical. Yet more to enlighten our thoughts and strengthen reason, know there is an axiom of Divinity. That God, as he can know nothing beyong himself, love nothing but in himself; so he doth nothing but for himself. For in doing for himself, he doth all for us, since we have not any thing which tendeth not to him as to the scope thereof, which subsisteth not in him as on its basis, which reposeth not in him as in its center. So doth S. Thomas understand that notable word of Trismegistus, Unity hath produced unity, that is to say, God only, Sovereign, and absolute, created one world, not many, and thence reflected his fervour upon himself, making all for his love and glory. Wherein he ceaseth not to oblige us, since we have neither love, grace, glory, greatness, or contentment, which cometh not from him. I find the interpretation of this passage much more reasonable thē theirs, who made Mercury more skilful in the Trinity, than all the Prophets: which is confirmed by the Author of the Ægyptian Divinity, who in the fifth Book, fifth Chapter, hath an excellent Maxim: The first Agent acteth not for any end, having nothing more able than himself, for which he can act.

Agens primus propter finem non agit, quòd ea nobilius non sit propter quod possit agere. Quod non est ex hoc, sed tantum est hoc, illud vere est id, quod est. Boet. l. 1. de Trinit.

It is not so with man. For if he will well rectifie his actions, he must act for an end, and for the Sovereign End, which, as saith the worthy Boetius in the first Book of the Trinity, is not composed of this, or that; but is simply what it is, without any dependence: and pursuing this end, it is necessary he proportion the means to the butt he aimeth at; for from thence resulteth that which they call good election, which is a science the most rare and necessary of the whole world. Now this wretched Maxim overthrows order so divinely established, and mortifieth what it may in the mind of man, the consideration sideration of the dependence he hath on God. It will enjoy that it ought to use, never to enjoy the Divinity. It diverteth all creatures from the mark to which Divine Providence directeth them, and draws them from the use ag eed upon in Heaven; to appropriate them on earth to the prejudice of the Creatour.

All which is most excellent in creatures, is not for creatures who possess it. Light is in the Sun, but not for the Sun; waters are in the Ocean, but not for the Ocean. God, who gives brightness to the one, and rivers to the other, would that both tend to the commodity of men, thereby to pass on to the glory of the Sovereign Being. The Creatour (said an Antient) made all the most noble creatures for to give themselves, so much hath he banished worldly avarice. Kingdoms are not so much for Kings, as Kings for Kingdoms; for they are made to do them good, and to preserve them, as the goods of God himself. So soon as one is born with fair and worthy parts, he is born for the publick, and he who would retain to himself what Providence gave in common, commits a Sacriledg in the great Temple of the God of nature: if he perpetually reflect on himself in all things, and draw all to himself, as if all were made for him, he opposeth his judge, and makes himself a corrival to sovereign Majesty.

Besides, ponder here the greatness of this first Being which is invaded, the better to understand the violence of this tyranny. To whom would you compare God? (saith the Prophet Isaiah.) God, who graspeth the vast extent of seas in his fist. God, who weigheth Heaven with all its globes in the hollow palm of his hand: God, who supporteth the heavy mass of earth with three fingers of his power: God who poizeth mountains in his ballance: God, before whom the world, with all the huge diversity of its Nations, is no more than a drop of dew, or the cock of a ballance in the hand of a goldsmith: God, before whom all Monarchies are but dust, and men but silly Grashoppers. Were all mountains like to Libanus on fire, and turned into victims for his sacrifices, it would be nothing in respect of his Majesty.

Qui appendit tribus digitis molem terræ. & libravit in ponderemontes, & colles in statera, &c. Isaiah 40.

Since then, you little worldling, you politick spirit, will side against God, divide his Empire, raise an Altar against his, preferring your ends to his prejudice, what do you call it if not tyranny, since it is to enterprize upon the goods of your Sovereign, who hath not any thing indispensable from his laws, no not so much as nothing it self?

2. Reason. It is a great sacriledge to make a Divinity of proper interest.

Nay, if you afforded God some honourable association (though that were tyrannical) it would be more tolerable; but you allow him a wicked petty interest of honour, of gain, for companion, which you plant in your heart, as on an Altar, and daily present it the best part of the sacrifice. It is to injury a superiour, to compare an inferiour with him. It is said, the very feathers of the Eagle are so imperious, they will not mix with the plumage of other birds, if they do, they consume them with a dull file. And think you to mingle God who is an incomparable Wisdom, a riches inexhaustible, a purity infinite, with feeble pretensions, which have frenzie for beginning, misery for inheritance, and impurity for ornament?

Feathers of the Eagle imperious. Plin. l. 1. c. 3.

The most barbarous Tyrants, as the Mezentiusses, found out no greater cruelty than to tie a dead with a living body; and you fasten thoughts of the world, dead and languishing, with God who is nothing but life. This is not a simple tyranny, but a sacriledge. The Civil Law saith, you must not appropriate to your self sacred gold or silver, nor transfer to prophane uses, what hath been dedicated to God; the like whereof is expressed in Laws Ecclesiastical. According to which axioms, S. Augustine said to Licentius, if you had found a golden chalice, you would give it to the Church. God hath granted you a spirit of gold, and I may likewise say, a heart of gold, when he washed and regenerated you by the the waters of Baptism: and now so far are you from rendring to your Sovereign Master what is due to him, that you make use of that heart as of a vessel of abomination, to sacrifice your self to devils. One sacrificeth to love, another to revenge, a third to worldly vanity. As for you, behold you are altogether upon particular ends, which take all the victims from God, to throw them into the gulf of avarice.

Osea 5. Victimas declinastis in profundum.

A man who hath conceived this Maxim in his brain that his affairs must be dispatched at what rate soever, hath nothing of God but for ceremony; he hath created a Temple to a little devil of silver, who sits in the middle of his heart. It is the object of all his thoughts, the bayt of all his hopes, and scope of his contentments: there is his Tabernacle, his Oracle, his Propitiatory, and all the marks of his Religion. I wonder why in Ecclesiastes, where the common Translation saith, All obeyeth money, another very ancient letter, and derived from the Hebrew phrase, hath, Money rendereth all oracles, for that is it which properly the word respondere signifieth. But I cease to admire, when I consider the course of the world: for in truth I see money is like a familiar spirit, such as heretofore Pagans and Sorcerers kept in secret places, shut up in a casket, or in some broken head, or the body of a serpent: when they became any thing irresolute, they consulted with their Idol, and the devil counterfeiting voices through wood and metal, gave them answers.

Lignum offenſionis eſt aurum ſacrificantium. Eccl. 11. 17.

Now adays the Devil mony is in the coffer of the covetous, as in a Chappel dedicated to his name: and the Infidel, if he have any business to perform in his family, thinks not at all to take counsel of God upon it, nor to appeal to conscience; but refers all these enterprizes to the devil of silver, who gives him forth crooked Oracles. Shall I buy a Benefice for one of my sons, who hath no propension to the Church, but it must be provided, in what sort soever? The little devil answers, Buy, seeing you have mony. Shall I corrupt a faithless Judge, whose soul I know to be saleable, to gain an evil spirit? Do so, since you have mony. Shall I be revenged upon such a man, whom I hate as death, by suborning false witnesses, and engaging them by strength of corruption in a bad cause? Yea, since mony gives thee this power? Shall I buy this Office, whereof I am most incapable, for never was I fit for any thing, but to practise malice: Yea, since it is mony, which doth all. Shall I take Naboth's vineyard by force and violence, to build and enlarge my self further and further, upon the lands of my neighbours, without any limits of my purchases, but the rules of my concupiscence? Yea, since thou mayest do it by force of mony: Shall I carry a port in my house-keeping, which is only fit for Lords, sparing nothing from expence of the palate, nor from bravery, in such sort, that my lackeys may dayly jet up and down, as well adorned as Altars on Sundays? Yea, since thou hast the golden branch in thy hand. Finally, this is to say very little, but if thou hast ready mony, desire all thou wilt, it shall come to pass. For thou hast Jupiter shut up in thy coffer, (said the Satyrist.) See you not much infidelity, a great contempt of God, plain Atheism? Moreover, that which likewise makes this manner of proceeding more detestable is, that Ζύλον προσκόμματος συνάξωμεν ἀνδρί. Pecunia obedient omnia, Pecunia respondent omnia Eccles. 10. 19.

3. Reason. False pretext of interests.

that beſides its Empire incompatible with God; it inſinuateth with ſuch ſubtleties and pretexts of Religion, as if it were moſt devout. Black ſouls of Sorcerers, given over to all manner of execration, make open war againſt God: they ſay, they are altogether for Beelzebub, and keep the Sabbath to yield him homage, and have renounced all the functions of Chriſtian piety: in recompence wherof they raiſe miſts in bright mornings, by the power which the evil ſpirits gives them, that herbs and trees may die, or ſuch like; for their witchcrafts extend but to bodies. But this furious paſſion of intereſts which now adays ſo powerfully ſwayeth, beſides that it ſucketh the blood and marrow of the people, and bewitcheth ſouls which come near it with manifeſt contagion, appears with ſemblances of religion and true Chriſtianity: although it be impoſſible to ſerve two Maſters, according to the words of the Saviour of the world, and to accord the Devil of proper intereſts with the Maxims of Jeſus.

Enemies the moſt dangerous are ever the moſt covert, it were better almoſt to fall abſolutely into diſorder, then to be fleſh and fiſh, hot and cold, to halt ſometimes on Baal's ſide, another while on the Temple of Solomon's part, and never to ſerve God, but with a ſhoulder; yea, with all manner of hypocriſie. I wiſh thou wert hot or cold, but inſomuch as thou art luke-warm, being neither hot nor cold, I will vomit thee out of my mouth.

Vtinam frigidus eſſes aut calidus. ſed quia tepidus es, & nec frigidus nec calidus, incipiam te evomere ex ore meo. Apoc. 3. 4. Reaſon. Benedictio Domini divites facit, nec ſociabitur ei afflictio, Prov. 10.

To all objections of Scripture and Saints, framed againſt this Maxim, we have but one only anſwer: It is the world, we cannot live otherwiſe, the Goat muſt brouze where he is tied. He who would live as an honeſt man, and not be according to the faſhion, ſhall ever be poor. To which I anſwer, It is ſo far otherwiſe, that one cannot be rich, perſiſting in integrity, that, who will well examine families & houſes, ſhall find riches the moſt ſtable, moſt honourable, and delightful, were ever on virtues ſide, as we may ſee in the examples of Abraham, Jacob, and David, if we will not learn it by our own experience. The bleſſing of God make the rich, and drives affliction from them.

But quite contrary, the fortunes which proceed by crooked and ſiniſter ways, bring moſt dangerous effects along with them; for before their coming, they cauſe toils and unſpeakable anxieties: but being arrived, they expoſe a man to publick ſcorn, in ſteed of making them worthy of regard; ſince they inſenſibly are conſummate, and in the end, alwaies reſerve to him who poſſeſſeth them, treaſures of anger and vengeance. Would you ſee the proof of all I have ſaid? Look on the travel beſtowed in purchaſe of ill gotten goods, and you ſhall find it was for that, the Saviour of the world called riches, thorns; becauſe thorns bare a fragrant flower, but the fruit is very bad, and which is more, they ſerve for a retreat to Vipers. A ſilly gain, which in the beginning ſmiles to the eye, is the flower of the thorn: but when it is ſwallowed with great convulſion of mind and body, it proves an ill fruit, as likewiſe being involved in an impure conſcience, it is as the viper among thorns. Will you therein obſerve publick ſcorn and indignation? When you behold a man of baſe condition, who by unlawful ways is come to great fortunes, he is looked on as the flea, which an Artificer fettered with a chain of gold, to make matter for gazers. O the flea (ſaid one) it is well for her, ſhe wears a golden chain, the baſeſt of vermin, bears the beſt of mettals! Is ſhe not very miſerable, to have her liberty ſo enthralled? Why was ſhe not content to be a flea, and not to become a Lady? Yet was this ſilly creature innocent; but whoſoever exceſſively raiſeth his eſtate by injuſtice, deſerves he not well to be the object of all the aims of ſlander, and the anger of God? Our Lord (ſaith the Scripture) ſhall wither up the roots of proud Nations.

Radices ſuperborum gentium arefaciet Dominus. Eccleſ. 10. Reſiduum locuſtæ comedit bruchus, & reſiduum bruchi comedit arugo. Joel 1. Plin. lib. 2. cap. 103.

Will you ſee the progreſſion and concluſion thereof: the Graſhopper, according to the ſaying of the Prophet Joel, hath a ſhare herein, to wit, in bravery and riot of apparrel; the other part falls to the glutonous fly, which is the ſuperfluity of diet; and the laſt is eaten by ruſt, as are unprofitable treaſures of the covetous, who almoſt all reſemble the fountain of Jupiter Hammon, ſo cold in the day time, one cannot drink of it, and ſo hot by night they dare not touch it. In the day of proſperity, they have bowels of ice for the miſeries of the poor, and in adverſity their goods are all on fire, pillaged, burnt, and carried away, by thoſe who leaſt deſerve to enjoy them.

Finally, the day of Judgment muſt be undergone, to expiate many times by long torments, the goods we can no longer enjoy. Do we not underſtand how the God of vengeance ſpeaks to the rich of the earth, who are rich in iniquity? To thee I come, the great Dragon, who lodgeſt in the midſts of Rivers of God and Silver, and ſayeſt, Theſe rivers are mine: I will put a bridle into thy mouth, and will faſten to thy ſcales ſo many little fiſhes, as thou on every ſide haſt entrapped by ſo many injuſtices, ſo many concuſſions, ſo many falſhoods; and I will take thee out of thy element, out of thy honours and riches, which thou haſt abuſed, and I will thruſt thee into the deſart on the ſand reproachful, as thou art, faint and deſpoiled, nor ſhall any man compaſſionate thy miſery. Oh, how poor are they always, who are rich with iniquity.

Ezech. 29. Ecce ego ad te Draco magne, qui cubas in medio flaminum & dicis, meus eſt fluvius, ponam fraenum in maxillis tuis, & agglutinabo piſces flaminum tuorum ſquamis tuis, & extraham te & projiciam te in deſertum.

(a) But what if ſerving God faithfully in his vocation he muſt be poor? O poverty, which didſt receive the Son of God born, as between thine arms, in a wretched ſtable, and who ſaweſt him conclude his innocent life in ſo great nakedneſs, that it had no other veil to cover it but the blood which guſhed from his wounds; muſt it needs be, that having been ſo much honoured by the King of Monarchs, and all Saints, who waited on him, thou here below ſhouldſt be reputed as the dregs of nature, the ſcum of the world, the fury of humane life? muſt Chriſtians come to that paſs, rather to deſire to be eſteemed crafty, robbers, and excommunicates, then poor? No man (ſaith Minutius Felix) how poor ſoever, comes to the poverty wherin he is born; we ſhould poſſeſs all, had we learned to deſire nothing: but the rage now adays frequent, to appear in the world what one is not, the madneſs which maketh frogs deſire to ſwell like bulls, is the cauſe many ſtile a reaſonable fortune with the title of poverty, whileſt a thouſand and a thouſand who live in the world, in the midſt of extreme miſeries, had they hit upon thy fortune, would think themſelves equal in point of felicity to Ceſar's.

(a) 5. Reaſon. Againſt too much horrour of poverty, which nouriſheth the fervour of intereſts.

Nemo tam pauper poteſt eſſe quàm natus eſt, omnia ſi non concupiſcimus, poſſidemus. Minut. Felix.

One eſteems himſelf poor, if he have not thirty, forty, fifty thouſand crowns to buy an Office, which is a fearful exorbitance of our Age. One accounts himſelf poor, if he have not five & twenty thouſand crowns to give with a daughter in marriage, when the daughters of France had not heretofore above ſix thouſand. One imagineth he is poor, if vails of an Office make not thirty or fourty thouſand livres of rent, when the Chancellors of France had not in former time ſeven thouſand. O inſatiable avarice, the Cerberus, and gulf of mankinde! whither haſt thou tranſported our manners & underſtanding? No, no, there is not any man truly poor, who is furniſhed for neceſſities, without which life is intolerable to nature: and that which affrighteth (ſay you) is the gnawing care of house-keeping, which shortneth your days, and drencheth your life in gall and tears.

Against the pusillanimous.

Weak and faithless that you are towards the Divine Providence; do you not yet behold, your distrust, your humane respects, your impatience is the source of all the evils which engulf you? Little birds that flie in the air and clouds, silly butter-flies which flutter through the meadows, painted with the enamel of flowers, and flowers themselves which are but hay, repose with all sweet satisfaction, under the royal mantle of the great Providence that covers all. Birds by his help, find grain fit for them. Butter-flies suck out the dew and juice of flowers; and flowers which live but one day, unfold themselves with beauties, that nothing yield to Solomon's magnificencies. There is not any creature so little in the world, which lifteth not up its eys to the paternal hand of God, distilling dew and Manna, and is never frustrated of its hopes. There is none but you (O wretched creature) who having a reasonable soul, stamped with the image of God, suffer your discretion to contribute to the excess of your miseries; do you not well deserve to be poor, since God is not rich enough for you?

Whose are the children which give you occasion of so much care? Is it you (O mothers) who have stretched their sinews, spun out their veins, numbered and knit their bones in your entrails? God hath made them, God will direct them, God will bear them on the wings of his providence, God will dispose them where you imagine not. But you would not have them suffer any thing; why then did you produce them into the number of men, if you be unwilling they should participate in the burdens of men?

Resolution of great courages in poverty.

If you and they falling from a flourishing estate, should be reduced to beggery, could you imagine you might be forsaken by the providence of God, yea although you under-went the strokes of warfare, which his beloved Son did here on earth? What shame would it be for you, if even those who have been in the world as great as Monarchs, are come to this estate? Belisarius, who thunder-struck three parts of the world by the lightning of his arms, who had possessed all which a great virtue might deserve, all which a great fortune might give, having seen himself engraven on gold and silver, almost equal to the Emperour Justinian his Master, came to that pass through extream disfavour, as to stretch out his hand for alms, yea, did it couragiously, braving his unhappiness by an abundance of virtues: And you, who are much short of his quality, deject your spirit in a slight humiliation befallen you. Rusticiana wife of Boetius, one of the most glittering beauties of Rome, in publick miseries saw her self reduced to such poverty, that she was cloathed as a country woman, no whit therewith dismayed, yea, appeared before the face of Kings in defence of her husband massacred: and you cannot endure to be seen at the Church in a modest habit, or a plain neck-kerchief. Alas your opinion, and your curiosity, is the greatest part of your evils!

Were it not better to undergo all the miseries of the World, in the fidelity we offer to God, than through disordinate love of proper interests, to become a devil? For what fitter title deserves he, who doing all for himself, looks on himself as a Divinity, accounts other men who are under him, as flies and catterpillers, tyrannizeth over inferiours, tormenteth equals, striketh at superiours, breaketh laws both divine and humane, to hasten unto gain or honour, and to anticipate his punishments, makes to himself an hell in his own conscience. If these truths perswade you not sufficiently the way of duty, consider a man of interest in the following example, and see by his success, that there is no greater unhappiness in the world, then to be fortunate contrary to the rules of a good conscience.

The tenth EXAMPLE upon the tenth MAXIM.

Of liberality, and unhappiness of those who seek their own ends by unlawful ways.

ANTIOCHUS the GOD.

Drawn from the Prophet Daniel. 11. S. Hieron. upon Daniel. Polyænus. Appian.

I Resolved to present unto you in this History Antiochus the God, who made a God of himself, a man as much perplexed as unhappy in his aims; to oppose him against Ptolomæus Philadelphus, who was free & generous; to the end these Princes, as contrary in qualities, as different in their successes, may make you the more sensibly see the truth of this excellent Maxim. When a great fortune and a prompt will meet together, they produce excellent effects of liberality. This Ptolomey of whom we speak, had one by nature, the other from love. For he was naturally disposed to magnificence, & the greatness of his condition seconded his purposes. The revenue he received from Ægypt, might then amount to fourteen thousand eight hundred talents, which were the matter of his bounty, but the form rested in his heart. He thought nothing to be his, but what he could give, and was willing gold should be drawn from his treasures, to relieve mens necessities, as water out of the streams of his Nilus. To know how to give well, is a great science. It belongs not to all (said Socrates) to manage the Graces well. There are some who give so ill, and to such as merit so little, that the Graces being Virgins by condition, are made prostitutes through the sottishness of their usage But this Prince was as wise in choice of persons, as liberal to distribute favours. He willingly did good to those who made profession of true piety, & loved learning, wel knowing it was to sow seeds in a land not ungrateful. It is observed in all times that Princes & men of quality who have disobliged the Religious and learned, have had ill success in their affairs, and given their reputation as a prey to posterity. That is it which lost the miserable Antiochus, surnamed the Illustrious: for though his father had shewed him an example to oblige the Hebrews, who then stood most eminent in Religion and divine knowledges, he unhappily engaged himself to torment them, and by this means heaped after his life a thousand disturbances, and darkned his name in an eternal History.

Magnificence of Ptolomey.

Socrat. apud Stobæum. Τὰς χάριτας παρθένους οὔσας, μητέρας ποιοῦνται.

It is very dangerous to disoblige pious and learned men.

Much otherwise Ptolomey favoured the people of God with all sorts of courtesie. For not satisfied to have granted liberty to more then a hundred thousand Jews, who were in his Territories, even to the redeeming slaves at his own charge from Masters who possessed them, he bestowed most costly gifts on the Temple of Jerusalem. From thence distending his benefits to men of learning, he furnish'd that incomparable Library, wherin in the end were numbred seven hundred thousand books, & having given the charge of it to Demetrius Phalerius, he caused to be brought thither, as we find in so many histories, the books of the law, with the seventy two Interpreters, who translated them into Greek, to be a singular ornament of his library. All this passed over with ceremonies, magnificencies & the wonders which so many Authors recount, the King wept for joy, such affection he bare to things divine, in comparison of which whic h he no more esteemed gold, then dirt. By which means he gained the affection of all men, causing himself to be beloved and adored by the whole world.

Manners of Antiochus.

But Antiochus the God being as the Antipodes, opposite in manners to him, esteeming himself as a Divinity, thought upon nothing but to satisfie his ambition, augment his revenues, and seek his own ends, to the prejudice of equity, & all the most holy amities. Which was the cause, that undertaking a wicked design of invading the Kingdom of Egypt, he set a huge Army on foot against Ptolomæus Philadelphus, of whom we speak, without any pretext, but the satisfaction of an enraged condition which possessed him. Ptolomey, who for the love of books abandoned not the sollicitude of war, had put his Kingdom into such order, that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, besides he had two thousand carriages for the war, four hundred Elephants, an hundred and fifty tall ships. So that Antiochus coming with all the strength of Asia to surprize him, found one ready to talk with him: for the Egyptian without any incommodity to himself, tired and supplanted all his endeavours, which were grounded more upon passion, then good discretion. This man loth to return with so much shame, being unable to get a Kingdom, sought to win a wife. He passionately courted Berenice, daughter of Ptolomey, whether he were in love with her, or whether he would make use of this marriage, to give some colour to peace, which could not be concluded without leaving on his face the marks of his temerity. Ptolomey, a Prince very peaceful, readily inclined to the resolution of matching his daughter with him, that he might quit his Territories of him, but it was understood he had been already married to Laodice, by whom he had children, which seemed to make this matter meerly impossible. Notwithstanding this unhappy Prince, who betrayed God and men without reflecting on any thing in his designs but proper interest, sware deeply to give assurance, that he kept not Laodice in the quality of a wife and Queen, but of a Concubine, whom he would dismiss so soon as the love of a lawful wife should possess his heart. They who desire, are ordinarily credulous. It was wished peace might be purchased for the wearisomness of war, and this Princess must be sacrificed as a victim without consideration, that as faith and treachery upon one side were incompatible in the person of Antiochus, so on the other, Laodice a Princess much like her husband, would not suffer another to lodge in her bed.

War against Ptolomey.

It was ended by a marriage.

Notwithstanding, the marriage is concluded, Berenice is conducted to Damietta by her own father, who gave huge treasures with her in marriage, she is put into the hands of this false husband, who carried her to Babylon, the capitol City of his Kingdom. This beautiful Queen, who had all attractive graces on her cheek, and the caduceum of Mercury in her hands, by reason of the peace she made between two puissant Nations, was received with much applause. Besides there went along with her a great number of mules laden with gold, silver, and all the most splendid riches of Egypt. For the father, who was so liberal towards strangers, had made spare of nothing to his daughter. The solemnity of marriage was performed with extraordinary pomp, there was nothing but games, theaters, publick joys; Heaven smiled, and the earth assisted in these hymeneal rites. There was none but Laodice, who being repudiated, looked on these triumphs with an owl-like eye, and a countenance surcharged with the vapours of her envy, which hastened to raise a tempest.

Berenice daughter of Ptolomey enreth into Babylon.

Laodice repudiated.

She failed not to flie out in the beginning, and to speak whatsoever a desperate jealousie could suggest to her, to embroil affairs, & stir up the Kingdom: but finding her self not throughly seconded, she covered her discontent under silence, and the fury of her revenge, under an apparance of sweetnes, supposing craft might afford that which force had bereaved her of.

Beholding her self far distant from Court, and put into a condition wherein she could not disturb any thing, she with a malicious prudence dissembled all that which lay on her heart, feigning to have no other pretence upon the Kings marriage, but that she onely desired to gain from him some solace, to sweeten the change of her fortune.

Forthwith she wrote a letter to King Antiochus, very cunningly excusing her self of all had passed, and shewing:

Her cunning.

That if she at the beginning spake a little too boldly touching the alteration he had made in his Kingdom, it was a folly pardonable, since it onely proceeded from the love she bare him. That the disfavour she suffered by being deprived of a God, seemed at first so harsh unto her, that she could find no means to digest it: But that time had shewed her some part of her duty, and her evil fortune daily taught her the humility, she could never learn in Empire. That she acknowledged it was not for her to controul his affections, but observe them; and rather to entertain admiration for her who hath the honour to enjoy his love, then envy it. That she now hath no care to think on Thrones and Scepters, but that the sovereign happiness, wherein she desires to breath out the remainder of her miserable life, is to approach near his person, more dear then all the world, and to behold with an eie more innocent then she had done, the prosperity of his affairs.

Antiochus was very well satisfied with Queen Berenice, and already had by her a fair son, who was as the seal of marriage: yet touched at the beginning with some compassion to see Laodice so humbled, he gave her leave to come nearer him, which Berenice all made of goodness, and over-credulous, never sought to hinder.

She returned with shews of humility, pretext of amity, and admirable conformity. Antiochus saw her, and readily entertained her with discourse & witty merriments, thinking her unable to re-enkindle his affection: but she stil had a commanding beauty accompanied with a wily wit, and a voluble tongue of power to win love, which the other very easily laid hold of, though he ever managed it to his own ends.

The Chronicle of Alexandria hath a remarkable passage, telling, that Perseus looking on the head of Medusa which he had cut off, took in poyson from it, whereof he became blind. We must not too much trust these beauties and loves, which after a long course of sway seem dead, when they but disappear. Flames sometimes break out of wrinkles and ashes, to inflame hearts they had heretofore possessed.

Antiochus quickly felt the sting of this Gorgon, whose insolence he thought he had vanquished. For having formerly surprized him by slight dalliances, she renewed her battery, and by force of her continual conversation, began to possess him as much as heretofore. Berenice retained nothing in all this great pomp of her fortune, but countenances and shews; whilst the other became Mistris of his heart, and had so bewitched the soul of this God, as to make him become a beast. The wicked woman staied not there, but infinitely desirous to place her son Seleucus in the throne of the Antiochusses, and fearing the mutable condition of this unfortunate lover, prevented his inconstancy, and gave him, (as saith S. Hierom) not the Nectar of Gods, but the poison appointed for offenders, to send him speedily unto the other world. Presently after she caused her son to be proclaimed King by the subtle practise of two powerfull Favourites, who assisted her in this affair, and at the same time laid hold of the little son of Berenice, and gave him unto two murderers, to butcher him.

Behold whither the mischief of a woman, abandoned by God, reason and all humanity, goeth, when incensed love and blind ambition have let loose the rains to disorder. The poor Queen extreamly overtaken by this disloyalty, came forth in publick with her great sorrow, conjuring all the world with tears & sighs, able to rent rocks asunder. To take pity of a poor stranger, their lawful Queen, & who had never sought any thing, but their good: whilest some not content to poison the King her husband, had murdered the little innocent, who was lawful heir to the Crown, would for full accomplishment of cruelty, serve the mother so: Then shewing her bosom, added, She was ready to receive therein the bloudy sword, which had cut off the life of her most precious child, in an age so tender and lamentable, if the people thought it might be for the Kingdoms good; but what could it benefit them to see a deplorable Queen torn in pieces before their eyes, who had no other crime, but her integrity towards them?

The people were so moved with this discourse, that they caused Berenice to save her self in the best fortress of the City, and instantly demanded their young Prince might be brought forth. The murderers (as Polyenus affirmeth) already misdoubting the peoples fury, had prepared a supposititious child, who marvelously well resembled the young Prince, & presently producing him cloathed in his garments they for some time appeased the sedition. The wicked Laodice, seeing her business succeeded not to her mind, feigned much to desire a reconciliation with Berenice, and by practise of the ministers of her fury, found means to get some companies to steal into the Cittadel, whither she was retired, who cut the centinels in pieces, and killing all the Queens officers, came to her chamber to murder her. It was a pittiful spectacle to behold the poor maids, who were about her person; for standing in defence above the strength of their sex, they pulled the weapons out of the souldiers hands, running up and down amidst swords and partisans, like Lyonesses, until many all bloudy fell at the feet of their good Mistris, leaving an eternal monument of their valour and fidelity. The poor Berenice was amongst the dead, unworthily massacred on the bodies of her servants. Three maids survived this assassinate, who bathing the Queens body with their tears, and humbly kissing all her wounds, cloathed her again with Royal garments, and laid her on the bed, invoking Heaven and its powers to their aid. The people flocking with the bruit of this great murder, environed the Castle, and put the murderers to flight, who durst not then boast to have committed this execrable assassinate.

The Queens maids on the other side carried themselves very discreetly among such extream dolours: for as yet forbearing to publish Berenice's death, for fear of giving advantage to Laodice's plots, they shewed themselves at a window, and told the people their Mistris had been wounded by the cunning practises of Laodice, but that (thanks be to God) the wound was not mortal, she onely stood in need of some little rest, and good attendance, to take breath and be cured, to the end she might acknowledge their good services. Polyenus saith, that the business being drawn at length, & the people desirous to see the Queen, the maids put a counterfeit into the bed, dressed up for the purpose, and framed some words, feigning a low & mournful accent of their Mistris. This cunning held the subjects in obedience, and the enemies in fear, whilest a Courtier dispatched to Ptolomey the son of Philadelphus, advertised him of all had passed. He failed not to hasten speedily to Babylon with a potent army, where he surprized the Conspiratours, affrighted with the image of their crime. Callinicus fled, and was afterward slain by a fall from his horse. The wicked Laodice was taken & led to punishment, where the people understanding the death of Berenice, and the dreadful exorbitances of this wretched woman, meant to have torn her in pieces, loading her memory and ashes with maledictions. The Kingdom was for a time reduced under the obedience of the King of Ægypt, who carrying away infinite riches, & establishing Governours in Provinces, returned to his own country. One may see by this history, that men of interest desirous to swallow all by ways unlawful, loose their fortunes, honours, and lives, leaving their souls to the pains of hell, & their memory to the execration of posterity.

XI. MAXIM.

OF CRAFT.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That the life of curious wits is not governed but by fiction, and that the deceiver still finds such as will be deceived.

Dissimulation. CRAFT, one of the prime Maxims of an ill Court, is now adays become the lesson of all Ages, each sex, and condition; and it seems to many, that to prosper well in subtleties, is the flower of wisdom, and utmost period of felicity. All are not fit for arms, learning picks out wits with too much advice, arts are painful, and require in those who profess them some ability, which is not produced but by time and much industry.

But in the mystery of counterfeiting, dissembling and guile, every one perswadeth himself he therein can quickly acquire some skil, & be able to triumph over simple silence; and if he must labour in it, to strike the best strokes by the help of the tongue.

From thence it cometh to pass, that children are framed to this exercise almost from their cradle. Women, yea, they who make account to refine in devotion, keep now adays shops of counterfeiting: the great-ones think it is their trade; the mean, who are as their shadows, take the same course. The world becomes a Theater of fictions, where truth hath much ado to be known, so many false visages are put upon it. To speak truly, one would say the earth had changed its nature, and were now become a Sea, where Dissimulation reigneth every where.

THE HOLY COURT.

That Sincerity is the Queen of virtues, and that the deceiver is taken in the snare he prepareth.

where the ſimple, like poor creeping worms, are abandoned to the malice of the moſt ſubtle. It was a worthy ſpeech of the Prophet, who ſaid to God, Alaſs, Lord! have you then made ſo many mortals, like filly fiſhes, and wretched worms, which have no government? Deceit hath ſowed its ſubtleties every where, it hath every where ſpred nets and ſnares, and never ceaſeth to drive, take, and entrap: and it ſeems would catch the whole World with its hook. It rejoyceth at its own crime, as if it were a virtue, and maketh ſacrifices with the inſtruments of miſchief. It judgeth of happineſs by the multitude of preys, and acknowledgeth no other God, but its own good fortune.

Habac. 1. 14. Facies hominis quaſi piſces maris, & quaſi reptilis.

2. Now as for you, who are perſwaded in this Maxim, that to proſper in converſation with men and affairs of the world, neceſſarily the foxe's skin muſt be put on, ſimplicity being too ſottiſh and diſarmed to bear any ſway in humane life. I pray at leiſure conſider ſome reaſons which I intend to preſent, and rather weigh them in the ballance of judgment then of paſſion. Firſt know, that in the inſtant you reſolve to be crafty, to be a lier, a deceiver, you proclaim war againſt a great Divinity, which will follow you ſtep by ſtep all your life time, which will diſcover you when you ſhall not know it, even to the bottom of your thoughts, which will overthrow all your pernicious intentions, and hold the ſword of God's vengeance over your head, even to the gates of hell.

2. Reaſon againſt counterfeiting. The blemiſh of truth.

This puiſſant adverſary againſt whom you undertake reſiſtance, if you as yet know it not, is truth, the moſt ancient and admirable of all virtues, which hath ever been, and which ſhal never end; nay, could you make your thoughts penetrate into an abyſs of time, and could you flie through ten millions of Ages, there ſhould you find truth. But if you ſay, it was not before Heaven and earth, and that in pronouncing this word, you had ſome reaſon (which cannot be) at the leaſt denying verity, and ſpeaking truth, yet muſt you find truth; ſo neceſſary is its being. It runs through time (ſaith S. Auguſtine) not being under the laws of time, it paſſeth through all, and ſhifteth not place; it is hidden in night, not obſcured by night, it is in the ſhadow, not ſhut up in ſhadows; it is not ſubject to ſenſe, ſince it ſwayeth over underſtandings. It is always near us, nay, let us rather ſay, It is within us, or we live in it; and although it do not occupy place, it poſſeſſeth all place in its Empire. It exteriourly giveth notice, it appeareth inwardly, it turneth all into the better, and is not changed by any into worſe. Of it, unleſs belied, one cannot think ill; and without it, unleſs by flattery of ſelf preſumption, we cannot enough diſcern. What then ſhall we ſay more, ſince God himſelf is Truth, verity of Eſſence, verity of Reaſon, verity of Speech, as Theologie teacheth us. All virtues are truely for him; but he is not called by their names, as he is by the title of truth. (a) It is the apple of his eye, his heart, his ſolace, his delight, his power, his wiſdom, his throne, and dignity. All what God is, is nothing but verity. It penetrateth all virtues, as fire and light do all the parts of the world. There is not any thing ſo victorious or triumphant in all greatneſs; for it never ceaſed ſince the beginning of the world to cruſh heads which rebel againſt light. It hath untwiſted ſo many webs, ſcattered ſo many wiles, overthrown ſo many lies, brought to nothing ſo many ſects, deſtroyed ſo many humane powers, trampled under foot ſo many dragons. And you who pretend to be the cunning and refined ſpirits of the time, renounce it; you take up arms againſt it, and are not afraid of it; you think to avoid it, but it will avoid you, and the firſt of your afflictions ſhall be to looſe ſight of it. O my God, what a bold enterprize is it to draw a ſtrong adverſary upon us, and to provoke thy juſtice, when we may enjoy thy Clemency!

The power of truth.

Auguſt. l. 2. de liber. arb. Non peragitur tempore, non migrat loco, nec noctis intercipitur, nec umbra involvitur, nec ſenſibus corporis ſubjacet: omnibus proximo, omnibus ſempiterno, &c.

(a) Ego ſum via, veritas, & vita. Joan. 14. 10.

Remember you the ſon of Cyrus, who cloſely attempted on Ethiopia with his arms, and prepared to make war againſt it? but the King thereof to ſtay him, was pleaſed to ſend him his bow, and cauſed to be ſaid unto him, Ad hunc venis, that is, you come againſt the Maſter of this bow. He was ſo amazed at the ſight of this armory, that he ſurceaſed from the temerity of his counſels, to provide for the ſafety of his perſon. Now had you ſeen the arms of truth, which from ſo many Ages have quailed ſo many monſters, and gained ſo many victories, you would fear conteſt with ſuch a Princeſs. She wil never forſake you, if you renounce untruth; and if you do it not on earth, you wil be enforced to do it in hell. Hippocrates gave the eyes of a ſtar to truth, but ſhould he have ſeen her face more uncovered, he had ſaid it was a Sun, which illuminateth by its light, animateth the beſt ſpirits by its vivacity, as it diſſipateth the miſts of lies by virtue.

Hippoc. ep. 10.

3. Beſides, not content with this, when you in this manner undertake diſcourſes of ſilk, and promiſes of wind, to reveal a ſecret, to lay ſnares for the ſimplicity of a man, to ſatisfie your paſſion, or ſerve your ends, you commit another crime moſt pernicious to humane ſociety, for you ſeek by theſe ſleights to ruin all belief and fidelity. The ancients made ſo much account of human faith, which is conſtancy and ſtedfaſtneſs of words conſonant to the heart, and performance of promiſes; that the Romans placed it in their Capitol, cloſe by the ſide of their prime Divinity, and one of their Poets durſt ſay, Faith was before Jupiter himſelf, and that without it the world would not be, and that it was a Divinity which had a Temple in the hearts of men, the moſt purified and beſt worthy of God. If with one ſingle glance of an eye, you might ſee the world as a huge Theater, you therein ſhould behold Empires, arms, laws, Cities, Provinces, ſciences, arts, riches, infinite magnificencies, you would be enforced to ſay, the baſis which ſupporteth all this great majeſty of Commonwealths, is fidelity, without which, Cities would rather reſemble Cyclopean Caverns, then temples of peace and juſtice. But if you deſtroy it, not by improvidence or frailty, but by the form of a ſetled liſe, and by example cauſe others to imitate you, is it not to overthrow all that which is beſt eſtabliſhed, and to profane whatſoever is moſt holy?

2. Reaſon. Diſſimulation ruineth humane faith.

I wil not tell you, this anſwer better becomes the mouth of a Tartar, then a Chriſtian; but I dare wel aſſure you, theſe ways of craft and deceit, which ſo much pleaſe you, are moſt prejudicial to your honour, and moſt fatal for your ruin. For firſt of all, ſay you be a man of quality, you are not ſo unnatural, but you have ſome ſenſe of honor. Now reſt aſſured, nothing ſo much vilifieth you as to be reputed a crafty man, who carrieth labyrinths in his heart, & ſnares in his tongue. Dion Chryſoſtomus judiciouſly obſerved, that nature gave ſubtlety as an inheritance to creatures, the moſt feeble and abject, as to Apes, Foxes, Cats, & ſpiders: but the moſt generous, as Eagles and Lyons, know not what ſlights and wiles mean. We muſt likewiſe affirm, all the moſt eminent and divine ſpirits are very naturally inclined to ſincerity: and that it onely belongs to inferiour ſouls, and ſuch as diſtruſt their own ability to amuſe themſelves in search of inventions and tricks, to involve those, who treat with them by the way of sincere freedom

See you not, mirrours render forms when they are leaded? and think you natively to represent the draughts of verity, unless your soul be solid and stable, supported by its proper weight, on constancy & magnanimity? Seneca noted, that women the most destitute of strength are most inclined to fraud and doubleness of heart; (what I speak, nothing concerneth the prudent and generous, who know how to correct infirmities of sex by virtue) but our daily experience teacheth us, that there are of them very crafty, and such as under a pure and delicate skin, with a tongue distilling honey, often hide the heart of a panther, all spotted over with subtlety, as the skin of this beast with diversity of mirrours. Their throat is more slippery then oyl, (said the Wiseman) but in the end you find effects more bitter then worm-wood, and more penetrating then a two edged sword. What sense is there that a Noble man, who would in all things seem more then a man, should take upon him the vices of women, and inclinations onely fit for silly creatures?

Nevissima illius amara quasi absinthium, & acuta quasi gladius ancipes. Prov. 5. 4.

It is a strange thing to see what the light of nature dictated to the souls of infidels, so alienating them from all manner of deceit, that they made scruple to treat with their enemies by way of dissimulation. We learn in Titus Livius, that one called Philippus, giving an account to the Senate, what he had negotiated in the Court of the Macedonian King, declaring particularly the course he took to entertain Persens under pretext of peace, and to feed him with fair words; the old Senatours stood up, and aloud protested much to disavow such proceedings as matters opposite to Roman generosity. Violence (said that great Captain Brasidas) though it seem unjust, is always more excusable in a man of authority then craft; which secretly contriveth some black business under colour of amity. What could there be more odious in nature, then a man, who to deceive the world, might have the art to change faces every hour, and seem sometimes white, sometimes black, sometimes gray, another while grizly, sometimes hairy, another while beardless; in such sort, as to be meerly unknown to those who should treat with him? Now what deceivers cannot do on their faces, they act in their souls through a strange profanation of Gods Image, they take upon them a thousand countenances, and a thousand impostures, to train a poor victim into the snare. They flatter, they promise, they swear, they protest, they call Heaven and earth to witness; you would take all their words for eternal truths: but if you speak to them an hour after, and that it be time to pull off the mask, they with a brazen brow will deny all they said, they will mock at all they promised, and disavow all they have done, with the same lips which before contrived it. What Behemoth, what Leviathan was ever beheld so prodigious in nature?

Sincerity preserved in the light of nature. Tit. Liv. l. 2 Decad. 5.

Thucid.

Hatred and horrour of doubleness

Phot. Biblior. p. 67.

I know Ctesias among the great rarities of the Indies, makes mention of a Martichore, a beast which hath the face of a man, and the body of a Lion, who counterfeiteth the sound of flutes to charme passengers, and then entrappeth and kills them with the tail of a scorpion, all bristled with pricks, and which is more, makes the same serve for bowe, arrows, and quiver. Needs must this be terrible; but to see it before our face, is to have one beast for an enemy, which may by prudence be avoided, which may by force be vanquished, and with weapons mastered: but in a faithless man, you discover under a smiling brow, a thousand plagues, a thousand Centaurs, a thousand Geryons, infinite many Charibdes, and Syrens, who lay snares for you, who undo you, who ruin you, who strangle when they seem to embrace you. Can you then admire, if among the six abominations of the heart of man, deceit be one of the first. Laws have not severity enough, arms terrour, nor scaffolds punishments, to chastise, affright, torment a man with a double tongue and heart, who persecuteth truth, killeth faith, poisoneth friendship, and many times plotteth effects of death even in a banquet, the solace of life.

Linguam mendacem, cor machinans cogitationes pessimas. Prov. 6

5. All this is to no purpose will some Polyphemus say, so that one prosper in the world, either by treason or craft; little heed must be given to the judgements of certain men, who are only able to bark at our fortune, not to hinder our felicity. Here now is the knot of the business, wherein we must consider, that besides that the ways of treachery are laborious and shameful, they always carry along with them the confusion, misery, and ruin of those who embrace them. Who diggeth a pit (saith the Wiseman) shall fall into it, and the stone shall return back on his head who threw it. The reputation of honesty is so necessary in the manage of affairs, that such as lost integrity of manners, sought to retain the bark, to cherish a renown amongst men, swolen up with smoak and imposture. A deceiver fears nothing so much as to be discovered, and to lay open the face of designs which he closely worketh for the ruin of others. Judge now how hard a matter it is, to practise at this present in the world with such proceedings in an Age most vigilant, and where little children are almost grown wise. What a trouble is it to hide your jugling in a Court, where are so many Argus eyes, who perpetually watch upon all actions. If one be surprized before the act, he must expect to be flouted even by foot-boys, & used like one who cannot hit upon it to be wicked although this trade be very easie, and who having sold his conscience to devils, knows not how to evict payment, unless he plead it in hell. But if a man some one time come to the point of what he projected, which he can hardly keep from breaking through the ears of others, (they who are deceived, seldom wanting eloquence either in themselves or their own ashes, were they dead, to decry treachery;) yet must he heareafter for one trick of craft, loose reputation & credit, two pillars of discretion. All the world will avoid you as a rock or a monster, what ever you do, you have but one heart and one tongue, to invent and tell lies: but you shall raise a thousand against you by it: For all those who know you practise this trade, and that you make it your endeavour to deceive, will bend all their sinews and strength, to entrap you in the same snares you laid for other; in such sort, that you shall become a prey aimed at (if it were possible) by all the world.

4. Reason. Craft pernicious.

Qui fodit foveam, incidet in eam & qui volvit lapidem, revolvetur ad eum. Prov. 26. 27

Troubles and miseries of dissimulation

Where have we ever seen a deceiver to prosper in all his enterprizes to the very end? You may as well number the waves of the sea, and leaves of trees, as recount the lamentable and tragical events of all these common cheaters, who never had the power to avoid God's vengeance. The pernicious Machiavel, who taught the art to deceive, produceth the example of an infamous Prince, whose impostures succeeded so ill, that by mistaking, he drank the poison prepared by himself for another in a banquet, & ended his detestable life. Is not this man abandoned by religion, wit and reason, to seek to perswade treachery with so weak examples? If he will work this way, let us oppose both against him, and the like the experience of passed Ages, to set (as it is said) the Sun in full splendour before their eyes.

Dreadful events of deceivers.

THE

The eleventh EXAMPLE upon the eleventh MAXIM.

Of Craft.

VIce many times hath a ſhop near unto Virtue (as ſaid Origen) and deceives Merchants under colour of ſelling good commodities. Craft readily counterfeiteth wiſdom, and ſome there are alſo, who make the wiſe to paſs for ſubtle. But there is ſo much difference between them, as between glaſs and diamond. Craft is a falſe prudence, which maketh uſe of ſubtleties againſt right and juſtice; but true wiſdom, though it be ſubtle, is never craftie: For it pretends nothing at all againſt equity and good conſcience.

The witty conceit of Theodora. Zonaras in Theophilo.

If you deſire to know wary wiſdom, and to diſtinguiſh it from craft, look upon what the Empreſs Theodora did, one of the worthieſt women of her Age. She was married to the Emperour Theophilus, an Heretick, and a capital enemy to the honour of Images, which he forbad to be kept, or eſteemed, upon pain of death. Notwithſtanding this pious Princeſs, who maintained Religion in the Empire what ſhe might, and ſweetned with much wiſdom the wilde humours of her husband, ſpared not to have in private, pictures and holy Images, affording them ſingular veneration. It happened one day, that Dender the Emperour's fool, who played this part at Court, rather through natural blockiſhneſs, then diſſimulation, came (as he was roaming up and down) into the Empreſſe's chamber, and found her reverencing thoſe Images. He failed not in dinner-while to give the Emperour notice of it, at which time he uſed to entertain him with a thouſand merriments, ſaying aloud, He found Manna (ſo he called the Empreſs) with her babies, and that ſhe was ſuddenly ſurprized with it. Theophilus preſently doubted it was Images his wife honoured, and at the riſing from the Table, he ſought her out all foaming with anger, and asked, where thoſe puppits were ſhe adored in the preſence of Dender? Truly we muſt confeſs, devout women have ſometimes a marvellous dexterity to excuſe a buſineſs; for ſhe ſuddenly hit upon a handſom evaſion, which freed her from the importunity of her husband. For in ſtead of ſeeming troubled and overtaken, ſhe ſmiled very ſweetly, having therein an excellent grace: Behold Sir (ſaith ſhe) verily one of the prettieſt knacks happened in your Court of a long time. This fool Dender, who ſtill doth ſomewhat worthy his name, came into my chamber, as I ſtood before my looking-glaſs with my women, and confuſedly ſaw our faces repreſented in the glaſs; he thought they were images, ſo ſubtle witted is he. Is not this an excellent jeſt? Then cauſing the fool to be taken by the arm, they ſet him before the looking glaſs, ſaying: how now Dender, are not theſe thy babies? The Emperour was ſo ſurprized with the witty conceit of a diſcreet Princeſs, that he believed ſhe had reaſon, and all the matter was inſtantly turned into laughter.

I term not this example a piece of craft, but a prudence, as the ſtratagem of a Captain called Chares, who enjoyning his ſouldiers ſome labour upon his fortifications, and ſeeing they undertook it coldly, becauſe they feared to marre their garments, which were handſome enough, he preſently commanded every one ſhould uncloath, and take the apparel of his fellow. That done, and all the ſouldiers being perſwaded their caſſocks would not be ſpared by thoſe who put them on, they wrought in good earneſt, and very quickly performed the task impoſed upon them.

This ought to be ſtiled with the name of wiſdom, rather then any other title. But if we obſerve what paſſeth in the world, we ſhall find there are two ſorts of crafts. Some are politick addreſſes and ſubtleties, which proceed not fully to injuſtice; but which notwithſtanding aim at intereſt, at reputation and glory, by ways not ſincere.

Baro. de aſtutia. Craft of the world.

So there are men who reſemble thoſe houſes, which have goodly gates, and moſt magnificent ſtair-caſes, but never a fair chamber: they have ſome ſweetneſſe of ſpirit, ſome readineſſe and prattle, which is never wanting, but no depth nor capacity, yet will ſeeme able among company: which is the cauſe, that not daring to examine or ſolidly debate a point of doctrine, or a buſineſs, they preſently fly to the concluſion, and find handſom evaſions. Others have admirable tricks to ſeem wiſe, by making uſe of another mans labour, and like droans eating the honey which the Bees gathered. Other, in handling affairs, and ſeeking to get diſpatches, amuze and dazle with variety of diſcourſe, ſuch as they negotiate with, to the end to entrap them. Other; to croſs a buſineſſe, cauſe it to be propoſed in the beginning by a man, who underſtands nothing thereof, of purpoſe to give ſome ill impreſſion of it. Other, break off a diſcourſe they began upon ſome matter, to draw on the more appetite. Others, make a ſhew to have nothing leſſe in their thoughts, then what they moſt deſire, and let their main texts creep in the manner of a gloſs. Other, have tales and hiſtories in ſtore, wherein they can enfold in covert terms, what they will not openly affirm. Other in things important, cauſe the foord to be ſounded by men of leſſe note, and many (as it is ſaid) pull the cheſtnuts out of the fire with the cats foot.

Theſe are ſleight merchandizes taken from the ſhop of worldly policy, which proceed not ſo far as to great injuſtice. But there are black and hideous ſubtleties, which tend to the ſubverſion of humane ſociety, and deſerve to be abhorred by all living men.

Such were thoſe of Tryphon, (of whom it is ſpoken in the Book of Macchabees) which were moſt fatal to the people of God. This wicked man, being the Tutour of young Antiochus, ſhewed himſelfe in the beginning very zealous in all which concerned the good of his ſervice, and having a deſign to ſubdue Syria, he would firſt have ſurprized the Macchabees, who were then very eminent in arms. But when he ſaw Jonathas come towards him with an Army of fourty thouſand men, the fox played his ordinary pranks, he received him with a pleaſing countenance, and overwhelmed him with heaps of courteſies. He told him he deſired to live with him as a faithful brother, and that he accounted it too heavy a charge, to keep ſo great an Army on foot in full peace, which could not but be prejudicial to the repoſe of the people. That he might walk confidently every where how he pleaſed, without any other armour, then the amity of King Antiochus, which was an aſſured buckler for all thoſe who would make trial of his protection. This crafty companion not content with meer complements, carried Jonathas into all the places of his charge, with ſuch honour and reſpect, that he cauſed him to be attended as himſelf, making ſhew, that whereſoever he ſet foot, there roſes and lillies ſprang. Never doth any man take with a ſnare, untill he have ſome bayt ſuitable to the appetite of him who catcheth at it. Jonathas a little loved honour, and his ſenſes were dazled with the luſtre of pomps, and charmed with the ſweetneſſes of converſation in this ſubtle fellow. He believed, he truſted, his whole Army was cashier'd by the perswasion of a man who wished him not wel. He only kept a thousand men with him to be as a guard, and entred with Tryphon into the City of Ptolemais, where he presently saw himself arrested, and his souldiers cut in pieces. The Impostour desirous to extend his plot further, wrot to Simon brother of Jonathas, that he should not be troubled at what was past, and that his brother was onely detained for some money due to the King, which being satisfied, he should have liberty, onely let him send him a hundred talents of silver, with the two sons of Jonathas in hostage, to bring the business to the period he desired. The poor Simon who doubted the plot, had more wisdom to know him, then force to avoid him. For, fearing lest the people might murmur if he accepted not the ways of accomodation proposed, he sent the money and children, whereof the one was despoiled, the other massacred with their father, by the command of the treacherous Tryphon. This factious and cruel man pursued his plot to the usurpation of the Diadem, and dispatch of his pupil. But in the end after a reign of two years, Heaven, elements, and men conspiring against him, he was knocked down like a ravenous beast, and buried in ruins and publick desolations.

Army

I would willingly know, to whom hath treachery ever been fortunate? Was it to Saul, who after he had so many times promised David the safety of his person, yet not ceasing to persecute him, was reduced to such necessity of affairs, that he slew himself with his own hands, leaving finally his spoils to him whom he meant to beguile? Was it to the unhappy Ammon, who using treachery to draw his sister Thamar into his chamber and dishonour her, was afterward murdered at the table by his brother Absalom? Was it to Joab, who moistned with his bloud the Altar whereunto he fled, after he had slain Amasa, in saluting him? Was it to Amasis King of Ægypt who lost both Kingdom and life, for having fostred in another daughter then his own, whom he feigned to give in marriage to Cambyses King of Persia?

Impostours surprized.

So many Impostours there have been, who in all times sought to usurp Scepters and Crowns by admirable inventions: were they not all shamefully ruined in rashness of their enterprizes? Smerdes the Magician who had possessed the Kingdom of Persia by tricks & incomparable sleights, was he not torn in pieces as a victim by Darius, and other princes? The false Alexander, who rebelled under Demetrius Soter, after some success, was he not vanquished under Nicanor, and slain in Arabia? Archelaus, who called himself the son of great Mithridates, overcome by Gabinius? Andriscus a man of no worth who falsely boasting himself to be descended from Perseus King of Macedonia, and durst confront the Romans arms, was he not subdued by Metellus? Ariarathres, who affected the Kingdom of Cappadocia by the same ways, sent to punishment by Cæsar? The false Alexius who durst aspire to the Empire of Constantinople, slain by a Priest with his own sword, under the reign of Isaacus Angelus?

Val. l. 9. c. 16. Nucl. l. 1.

False Alexander discovered.

Josephus relateth, that pursuing the same ways, there was a young Jew who had been bred at Sidon, with the freed-man of a Roman Citizen, who having some resemblance of Alexander the son of Herod, whom the father had cruelly put to death, feigned he was the same Alexander, saying, Those to whom Herod had recommended this so barbarous an execution, conceived such horrour at it, that they resolved to save him, yet to secure their own lives upon the command imposed, they promised to conceal him till after the death of his father; which was done, he remaining unknown in the City of Sidon: But that he was now returned as from the gates of death to demand his right, as being the indubitate and lawful heir of the Kingdom. This Impostour had gained a subtle fellow, a servant of Herod's household, who taught him all the particulars of the Court, the better to colour his counterfeiting. He led the Bear through all the City with good success, and great applause of the people, who embraced this false Alexander, as a man returned back from the other world. For besides that the Jews were credulous enough in any thing which flattered them, they were ever much inclined to the race of poor Mariamne, whose son this man counterfeited to be: under this pretext he was very welcome into all the Cities where there were any Jews, and the poor Nation freely impoverished themselves, to afford some reasonable support to this imaginary King.

When he saw himself strong in credit and coyn, he was so confident as to go to Rome, to question the Crown against Herod's other sons; there wanted not those, whereof some countenancing him by credulity, others through the desire they had of alteration, bare him to the throne. He failed not to present himself before Augustus Cæsar, the God of fortune and distributer of Crowns, shewing he had been condemned to death by his own father through false rumours, but was delivered by the goodness of the God he adored, and the merciful hands of the ministers of execution, who durst not attempt on his person; beseeching him to pity a fortune so wretched, and a poor King, who threw himself at his feet, as before the sanctuary of justice and mercy. Every one seemed already to favour him: But Augustus, a Monarch very penetrating, perceived this man tasted not of a Prince, for taking him by the hand, he found his skin rough, as having heretofore exercised servile labours. Hereupon the Emperour drew him aside, saying: Content thy self to have hitherto abused all the world; but know thou art now before Augustus, to whom thou must no more tell a ly, then unto God. I will pardon thee on condition thou discover the truth of this matter; but if thou lyest in any one point, thou art utterly lost. This man was so amazed with the lustre of such majesty, that prostrating himself at his feet, he began to confess all the imposture. Augustus perceived by the narration, he was none of the most daring in impostures, and said: Friend, I give thee thy life, on condition thou ransom it in my Galleys; thou hast a strong body, and canst well labour, the Scepter would have been too ful of trouble; I will have thee take an Oar in hand, and live hereafter an honest man, without deceiving any.

As for the Doctour, who had been Tutour to this counterfeit Alexander, the Emperour observing him to be of a spirit more crafty, and accustomed to evil practises, caused him speedily to be put to death. One might make a huge Volum of such Impostours, as have been entrapped in their tricks; but satisfie your self with experience of Ages, and if you dare believe me, take in all your affairs a manner of proceeding noble, free, sincere, and true, throughly perswading your self, what the Wise man said, That he who goes forward with simplicity, walketh most confidently.

XII. MAXIM.

Of REVENGE.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That it is good to reign over men like a Lyon, and take revenge, not permitting freſh favours to aboliſh the memory of old grievances.

THis maxim of the prophane Court more properly proceeds from the throat of Tygers and Lyons, then the lips of men: but being harſh in execution, it is ever direful in its effects. The experience of Tiberius's, Caligula's, Nero's, Domitian's, Herod's, and ſo many other, who have purſued this with events ſo tragical, and lives ſo monſtrous, are fit leſſons to convince a heart, which yet retaineth ſome humanity.

How this maxim oppoſeth common ſenſe.

All power imployed onely to hurt is ever pernicious, and having made havock, it reſembleth the ruins of buildings, which overwhelm not any, but ſuch as they oppreſs by falling on them. Man is a creature more tender then any other, and muſt be handled with much reſpect: nor is there any blood ſo baſe, which ought not to be ſpared, as much as juſtice and reaſon may permit.

Notable veities.

The moſt part of men in theſe miſeries and weakneſſes of nature, ſeldom hit upon innocency, but by paſſing through many errours. He who cannot tolerate ſome one, baniſheth all virtue. He muſt neceſſarily excuſe many things within himſelf, who pardons nothing in another. If he think himſelf a God, his nature ought to be mercy, and if a man, the experience of his own faults ſhould render him more favourable to the like in another.

It is a ſtrange folly to think greatly to proſper by rigour. For all done through fear being forced, cannot be of long laſting, unleſs the courſe of humanity fail. The ſavage beaſt is then much to be dreaded, when he ſees the knife on one ſide, and rails on the other. There is no ſtrength ſo feeble, which becomes not fierce upon the defenſive, within the limits of neceſſity. A man who menaceth every one with blows of a cudgel, ſword, or fire, ſhould remember he is not a Briareus with an hundred hands, and hath but one life. Now becoming cruel and inexorable, he makes himſelf an enemy of all mankind, which hath ſo many hands, and ſo many lives. Such an one thinks he is well accompanied in revenge, who ſhall find himſelf all alone in peril.

The ſcope of the diſcourſe.

Then let us here ſay, there is nothing ſo Sovereign for the government of men, as the love of a neighbour, clemency, and pardon, and that the character of an excellent nature is to forgive all other, ſo much as reaſon may permit, & to pardon nothing in himſelf.

Excellency of love.

Love is the firſt law of nature, and laſt accompliſhment of our felicity. Love from all eternity burneth in the boſom of the living God: & if he breath with his Word, as he doth with a reſpiration ſubſtantial, he breaths nought but love. He reſpiteth this love by neceſſity within himſelf, he inſpireth it by grace out of himſelf, and laſtly draws all to himſelf by love. The worthy S. Dionyſius in the book of Divine attributes, diſtinguiſheth three ſorts of love, one is called circular, the other love in a right line, & the third oblique. Circular love properly is that which carrieth the ſoul with full flight into the boſom of God, and there holds it, as in a ſweet circle of raviſhing contemplations, which tranſport it from perfection to perfection, never finding end or beginning in the Divinity. Love in a right line is that which tends directly to creatures, by ways not onely lawful and laudable, loving them for God, of God, and in God, but ways likewiſe eaſie, and yielding to natural inclinations. Oblike love is that, which holdeth of both the other, and which imitating the Angels of Jacobs ladder, climbs to God by creatures, and deſcends to creatures by the love of God. But behold a love of enemies commanded by God, which ſeemeth not comprized in this diviſion, ſo much it ſeeketh out ways alienated and inacceſſible to nature, yet I intend to ſhew, it may be found in the third part of this liſt, and that it is a love, which by the love of God deſcendeth unto the love of man, to love him according to God: A love which I maintain to be poſſible, glorious, and neceſſary in three proofs that ſhall make three heads of this diſcourſe.

Diviſion of love. χύκλικος, εὐθὺς, ἑλικοειδὴς. S. Dionyſ.

Three proofs of this diſcourſe.

First reaſon poſſibility of the love of enemies. Diligite inimicos veſtros.

1. To deny the poſſibility of the love of enemies, is to bely the Goſpel and reaſon, the Goſpel which commandeth it, reaſon which fortifieth the juſtice of the commandment. The words ſpoken by our Savior, Love your enemies, is not a counſel but a commandment: ſo explicateth the Council of Carthage the fourth, chap. 93. the Council of Agde Can. 22. and all holy Fathers, who lent the light of their ſtile to the firſt light in the Goſpel. Now to ſay God commandeth a thing impoſſible, is to make a tyranny of the Divinity, and to make a God like to the cruel Duke of Muſcovia named Baſilides, who commanded from his ſubjects a tribute of ſweat, and of nightingales in the midſt of winter.

Right of nature.

2. Reaſon dictateth to us this commandment is not onely of Divine right, but of nature, ſo far is it from being contrary to nature, that to ſpeak naturally, we judge that ſhould be done to our neighbour, we would have done to our ſelves: and we deſire to be beloved by all the world, yea, by thoſe whom we have offended; we then neceſſarily conclude, we are bound to love thoſe who have done us ſome injury. Beſides, we wel ſee that to ſeek revenge by proper authority is to deſtroy the right of nature, & to make of a civil life, the life of a Cyclop, which were to have no other reaſon then ſtrength, nor limit but the ſword.

Anſwer to an objection.

Some will ſay it were good, could love as eaſily be put on as a ſhirt; but if we have much ado to love things indifferent, how can we affect bad and offenſive? Love ever purſueth good as the ſhadow the body, and God who made both love and nature, will not that it ſettle it ſelf unleſs there be ſome attractive or appearance of good, which inviteth it to love. Now what is lovely in an enemy, in whoſe perſon all is odious, yea, the very name? Behold how carnal Philoſophy with ſtrong paſſions, and weak reaſons, ſtrikes at the eternal Word; as if in the worſt man in the world, there could not ever be found ſomething which may be an object of reaſonable love. We are not commanded to affect him with

THE HOLY COURT.

That mildneſs and pardon is the beſt revenge.

with a love of tenderneſs, but of reaſon. It is not ſaid, you muſt love him as vicious, you muſt endear him as injurious or wicked, for that were to force nature; but we are commanded to love him as a man, to love him as a Chriſtian, to love him as the work of God, and as a creature capable of life eternal: All things in the world (ſaid an Ancient) have two handles, and two faces. Take a good hold-faſt, look on the good countenance, and you ſhall find that eaſie, which you thought impoſſible.

Omne animal diligit ſimile ſibi, ſic & omnis homo proximum ſibi. Eccl. 13. 19

Let us alſo paſs with Divinity to a reaſon more eminent, and ſay, it is not a thing againſt nature to love above nature, by the commandment of him who made nature. it is asked, whether a creature can naturally love God more then it ſelf, ſince all that nature loveth, it loves as a thing united to it ſelf, according to the ſaying of Philoſophers: and all well conſidered, the moſt learned Divines anſwer, that the ſoul of man remaining within the liſts of natural reaſon, ſhould love the Creatour, more then its own life becauſe naturally the wil wel rectified, hath a ſtrong inclination to its end, which is the Sovereign Good, and the underſtanding neceſſarily judgeth the ſubſiſtence of eſſence increate & independent, wch ought rather to be preſerved then that of eſſence create. And if that be done by ways of nature, how may one ſay it is againſt nature to love an enemy, when there is the commandment and honour of God in it?

Amicabilia ad alterum ſumuntur ex amicabilibus ad ſe. Ariſt. Ethic. l. 4. c. 8. D. Tho. 2. 2. q. 26.

Nay, it is ſo much otherwiſe, that I will add a reaſon, which perhaps may ſeem ſtrange, but it is undoubted true. I ſay, it is much more hard to love ones ſelf well, then an enemy. For I beſeech you, why was it that the Son of God ſo much ſpake, laboured, wept and bled, if not to teach how we ſhould aptly love our ſelves? And wherefore were ſo many Saints fifty yea threeſcore years at ſchool in deſarts, but to learn this hard leſſon? And who hath ever thought any thing more difficult to be repreſſed then ſelf-love, which powerful in fury, and impotent within it ſelf, forgetful of God, & ſtill mindful of its own intereſts, ever gluttonous and ſtill hungry, ſwalloweth like a gulph, ſweepeth along like a torrent, beateth down like thunder, and in the end is buried in the ruins it made?

A remarkable conſideration.

Self-love very hard to be repreſſed.

If well to love ones ſelf, this monſter, be neceſſarily to be tamed; who ſees not there is much difficulty therein, & that on the other ſide there is nothing to be done but to love the gift of God in man; which cannot be ill but in your imagination? Why create we ſo many impediments in the love of an enemy, & find none in the love of our ſelves? Were it not natural, why in the law of nature did Cato ſmilingly wipe away tough phlegme, which an enemy ſpit in his face when he pleaded a cauſe? Why was Socrates content having received a blow on the cheek from an inſolent man, to ſet over his head a ſcroul uſed on ancient tables, Lycus faciebat? Why did Auguſtus in an abſolute ſovereign power of revenge, tolerate with ſo much curteſy a certain writer named Timagenes, who perpetually barked againſt him? Traytours that we are to nature, ſo to cover our neglect and weakneſs with the pretext of nature.

Effects of the love of enemies in the Law of nature. Senec. l. 3. de ira c. 38

3. Let us yet add more force to truth, and more ſcope to our pen. Let us enter into the ſecond point of this diſcourſe, which teacheth us the greatneſs and glory of a man, who knows how patiently to ſuffer an injury. The maxims of the world ceaſe not to perſecute us, & ſay: That by tolerating a firſt affront a ſecond is provoked; that mildneſs & manſuetude ſerve as matter of mirth to inſolency; and that a man never ſo much undervalueth himſelf, as by publiſhing his little courage in the revenge of an affront. Behold goodly propoſitions, which ſo oft have drawn blood out of the veins of France in theſe deteſtable duels, nouriſhing afterward covert hatred & ever laſting averſions. O ignorant that we are of Gods greatneſs, and ever unfaithful to his word! We fear by pardoning, to be contemned; when the only reaſon which God uſeth in the Goſpel to perſwade us unto pardon, is the excellency and glory derived from this action: for he ſaith. It is the means to become the children of God, who cauſeth his Sun to ſhine upon the good and the bad, who lets his ſhowrs fal as wel on the offenders, as the innocent.

Second point of proofs drawn from the glory of pardon.

Vt ſitis filii Patris veſtri qui in cœlis eſt, & qui ſolem ſuum facit oriri ſuper bonos & malos, & pluit ſuper juſtos & injuſtos. Mat. 5. Iaiah. 40.

What beauty, what luſtre, what ſplendour to enter into the number of the children of God What elevation to be tranſported with full flight into conformities with the Omnipotent! The Prophet Iſaiah ſaith, God meaſureth the waters with his fiſt, and poizeth the heavens in the palm of his hand; to ſignifie he goeth with a ſhut hand to puniſhments, ſignified by the waters, but proceeds with the whole extent of his goodneſs to reward, repreſented by the heavens. The rain-bow which God hath taken for the ſymbole of his reconciliation with man, environeth the throne of his Majeſty in the Apocalips; and it is a bow without arrows (ſaith S. Ambroſe) to inſtruct us, this divine Majeſty is ſweet and peaceful. So in the Prophet Ezechiel, after the deſcription of this terrible cloud, which ſerves as a chariot for the God of Hoaſts, you read theſe words: (a) And upward a face ſmiling with light; where Theodotion (as ſaith S. Hierom) hath tranſlated: (b) The weſt hath the higheſt place with the Creatour, meaning, the mildneſs of weſtern winds, and coolneſs from ſcorchings, is in the pavillion of glory, where this Sovereign Monarch inhabiteth. O wonder! God, who is a Sovereign Majeſty, Sovereign greatneſs, and Sovereign Juſtice, ſhewed himſelf in al times ſo patient to ſuffer men, who are the worſt of all evils, that he had rather we doubted his Divinity, then make any queſtion of his mildneſs: he had rather that by ſo patiently tolerating ſuch infidels & ſinners, the lips of blaſphemers ſhould receive encouragement to ſay there is no God, then by taking revenge on every ſin in the heat of crime, it ſhould be truely ſaid there is a God, but he is ever armed with lightnings, & inacceſſible to the miſeries of men, as thoſe mountains, which all flaming caſt out their entrails. O Prodigy! God maketh it ſo great a matter to pardon an injury, that he rather permitteth his eſſence to be touched, then his clemency; his title of God to be taken away, then the glory of pardon: Shall we then place greatneſs in revenge.

Ambroſ. 16. de arca & Not 17 Arcus contentus ut careat ſagitta magis terrere vult quam ferire.

(a) Et ſurſum quaſi aſpectus ſplendoris. (b) Aura in ſupernis Dei.

Non eſt Deus.

Tertul. de pat. c. 2.

How many Pyrates are there, to whom God daily openeth ſeas? How many Idolaters, for who he cauſeth ſtars to give light, fountains to ſtream, corn to grow, harveſts to become yellow, and vines to ripen? How many ungrateful children, who take benefits from him as hogs do acorns, by grumbling againſt the tree which gave them, and never caſting an eye to heaven? God not withſtanding ſuffereth them, and confounds their ingratitude by continually conferring favours, in an abſolute power of revenge.

What anſwer we to that? Shall we make it our glory to do like the ſilly mouſe, which bites that which pincheth her; or rather imitate the perfections of God, who never appears ſo great as in pardoning great injuries? What may we hope in revenge, but to enter into the community of a brutiſh life? That is it bears do, tygers, ſerpents, and ſo many other creatures, which imploy their teeth, horns, poyſon, & all the arms they have from nature, to purſue revenge: Yet many times they meaſure it by the neceſity of their defence: but to pardon an ungrateful man and an enemy, is to go out of our elements, and the baſe droſs of earth, to enter into a ſphere of glory and light, ranked in the number of ſovereign beauties, to be an aſſociate with ſo many noble and illuſtrious ſouls, who have in all ages placed their glory on actions of mildneſs and patience.

Let us, I pray you, enter into it with a firm footing and a bright forehead. There ſhall we ſee Moſes at the feet of the Tabernacle to pray, and almoſt binde up the hands of God, to ſtay the courſe of his revenge againſt thoſe, who perſecuted him even to the Tabernacle. There ſhall we ſee an Aaron in the majeſty of his Prieſtly habit, bearing all the world, with the incenſory & ſacrifice in hand, to appeaſe the anger of God againſt his perſecutors, when heaven was all on fire over their heads, and the earth became a gulph under their feet to ſwallow them. There ſhall we ſee a David bear honourable wounds, which the envenomed tongue of Shimei had thrown on his reputation, and to mount to the Throne of Saul by the ſteps of patience witneſſed in ſuffering Saul. There ſhall we ſee all the Martyrs laden with torments, opening as many mouths as they had wounds to beg pardon for thoſe who perſecuted them, and in the midſt of all the Martyrs, Jeſus, the great and faithful witneſs quickning by effuſion of his blood, even thoſe who ſhed his. There finally ſhall we ſee Conſtantine laughing at his ſtatues they ſtoned; a Theodoſius pardoning ſuch as dragged his an; Andronicus, who at the taking of a City embraced in ſight of all the world him, who moſt eagerly had oppoſed him with all manner of outrage.

Goodly company of courteous.

Let us now judge which is moſt glorious, either to enter by pardoning into the moſt noble and generous ſociety, or in ſeeking revenge, to become of the number of certain wranglers, ruffians, men of the damned crew; and laſtly, creatures the moſt bruitiſh in the world, wholly inclined to revenge.

Third point of reaſons, drawn from necity.

4. Let us conclude finally with the third reaſon, and withal ſay, that to pardon injuries is not ſomuch an election of virtue, as a neceſſity of ſalvation, ſince God will not we hope remiſſion of our ſins, but on condition we baniſh the reſentment of injuries. Neceſſity of ſalvation, ſince prayer & ſacrifice, eſſential are parts of our ſalvation, cannot ſubſiſt without the pardon of our neighbor. And purſuing this precept, we have a tradition from the Hebrews which ſaith, He who being intreated to pardon, after warning given before competent witneſſes, if he ſhewed himſelf inexorable, was ſurnamed as with a title of infamy, the Sinner, and held as one excommunicate, as a rotten member, and cut off from the ſociety of the faithful. I likewiſe ſay, neceſſity of ſalvation, ſince according to S. Auguſtin, without this virtue, all devotion is but hypocriſy, all religion blaſphemy & all faith infidelity.

Dimitte nobis ſicut dimittimus. Vade prius, reconciliare fratri tuo, & tunc veniens offer munus tuum.

Auguſt. ſuper Joan. homil. 10. Quid prodeſt quia credis & blaſphemas? Adoras illum in capite, blaſphemas in corpore, &c.

To what purpoſe is it (ſaith the Prelate) to believe and blaſpheme, to adore God in his head, and blaſpheme him in his members? God loveth his body which is his Church: if you diſſever your ſelf from his body, he will not for all that forſake his own members. Hear you not the head which ſpeaketh to you from heaven, ſaying: O Man, it is in vain thou honoureſt me, hating thy neighbour? If any one, whileſt he is giving thee low obeyſance with his head, tread on thy foot, thou wouldſt in midſt of all his complement cry out, Sir, you hurt me.

The horrour and confuſion of revenge.

What is there either more powerful or perſwaſive, then theſe reaſons? Yet notwithſtanding among ſo many lightnings & thunders which incompaſs us on every ſide, there are to be found infinite many black ſouls in the world, which practiſe hatred, ſome in ſecret, ſome in publick, & make vaunts to eternize their revenge in the everlaſtingneſs of their puniſhments. What a horrour is it to ſee a man, who beſought and intreated with all earneſtneſs to pardon a brother, who hath offended him, anſwereth with diſdain, furious & intolerable, he will never agree nor hold correſpondence with him, no more then with a Turk or Moor? Ah Barbarian! ſhut up that mouth, unhappy creature, and never open it, at leaſt never open it before the wounds of Chriſt which bleed againſt thee. Thou wilt embrace no other friendſhip with thy brother, but ſuch as may be found between Turks & Moors. Lyar that thou art, ſeek yet out words more outrageous to expreſs the gall of thy paſſion: For, if thou knoweſt it not, Turks and Moors retain the amities and ſenſe of man, whereof thou art deſpoiled. Turks even in the general deſolatiō of Moors, entertained them into their Countries, and afforded them helps, which thou haſt denied thy fleſh and blood. If that ſeem worthy of thee take a turbant, and become a Turk; but when thou haſt put it on, yet ſhalt thou find laws which will oblige thee to love a man. The Turks have their Behiram, a feaſt, wherin they pardon all injuries; & wilt thou turn Turk to retain an injury? Out of God's Church, out of the ſociety of men, out of nature, bloody monſter as thou art. Where wilt thou any longer find place in the world, when thou once haſt pulled down the Altars of clemency?

That alſo which is ſpoken in choler and haſty precipitation, might ſeem pardonable in repentance, were it not there are ſome, who in cold blood foſter ſuits, and immortal pertinacities, and which is worſt, many times in publick ſhewing a fair face, in ſecret they tranſfix the heart of a poor man, like unto witches, they rip up the bowels of wife and children, to ſatisfy a revenge. Barbarous man! Eeat, rather eat the miſerable heart, then pierce it perpetually with thy infernal Bodkins. I would in the reſt be ſilent, if there were not women, who being infirm in all things, get diabolical ſtrength for revenge. What may we ſay of a creature of this ſex, who being very ſlightly offended by another of the ſame ſex, whileſt ſhe, adviſed by her Confeſſour, diſpoſed her ſelf to all duties of ſatisfaction, the other looked on her with a Gorgons eye, and foaming with anger, ſpitefully reviled her with bloody words; ſo that nothing now remained but to take her by the hair, and drag her on the floor: which violence reproved by other, ſhe repeated the burthen of the Ballad, That ſhe wiſhed her not ill, but would never ſee her again. Inhumane and furious creature, a Magera, not a woman, what mouth will you hereafter bring to the Altars, which you ſeem to honour? Have you any other then that by you polluted with this poiſonous choler? What heart remains in you for God? Is there any part of it not ſteeped in gall? What expect you at the hour of death, and in the inſtant of your ſouls ſeparation, but that God repeat unto you your own words: I wiſh thee no ill, I will not put thee upon the wheel, nor the rack, I have neither raſors nor flames to torment thee; but thou never ſhalt ſee my face? Wilt thou then cheriſh quarrels, maintain ſides, ſpread rumours either true or falſe, ſecretly undermine the fortune of men, and make thy ſelf as inexorable to reconciliation, as thou art inflexible to reaſon? Lord have mercy on us, a cruel Angel will be ſent againſt thee, an ill ſuit commenced, a ruinous buſineſs, a tedious ſickneſs, a loſs of goods, a confuſion of underſtanding, and then ſhalt thou ſee, whether fire being in the four corners of thy houſe, thou ſtill retaineſt the itch of revenge.

But, you generous ſouls, march on by union to the chief of unities, and think the only revenge, is well to be revenged on your ſelf. If as I have ſhewed, pardon be poſſible, glorious, and neceſſary, why ſoment we our curiosities to inflame our fevers? Let us take away these silly humane respects, this slender pride, which often broodeth under silken devotions, and which is the cause, that God is daily beheld and adored upon both the knees, by those who will not see nor speak to any that have committed some slight indiscretion, whilst feigning to honour God the Master with lips, the servat within the heart is strangl'd.

Goodly considerations to pacifie the mind.

Say (O Christian) say to thy self: Am I more powerful in my small family then God in the universe? He daily endureth so many injuries, not threatning mortals with his thunders; what am I, who have ears so tender? Many have forgiven their deaths, and I cannot pardon a cold countenance, a silly word, a slender negligence. Is it a child, is it a young man hath offended? Age excuseth him; is it a woman Sex, a stranger? Liberty; a friend? Familiarity. He hath offended, he hath displeased thee once, and how many other times hath he done thee good offices? But this is not the first time; so much the better shall we bear, what we already have suffered. Custom of injuries is a good Mistriss of patience. He is a friend, he did what he would not; if an enemy, he hath done according to the world, what he ought. If he were wise, he hath not done it without reason; if simple, he deserves compassion. Whoever bit a Dog because he was bitten by a Dog? Or who ever entred into a combat of kicking with a Mule? If he did it in anger, let us give him leisure to come to himself, and he will correct himself without our trouble to give assistance. If it be a superiour or man of eminent quality, let us suffer that which God hath set over us; if a person of base condition, why by striving against him, shall we make him our equal? What pleasure hath a woman whose hands are so delicate, to seek to foul them with crushing flies and caterpillers? Let us reflect on the carriage of humane things, we are all faulty, and live among errours. There is no wise man whom some indiscretions escape not. We shall never live content, if we learn not to excuse in another what our selves are. Are we not ashamed to exercise in a life so short, eternal enmities? Behold death comes to separate us, although we forcibly hold one another by the throat: let us give a little truce to our reason, light to our understanding, and rest to our ashes. JESUS in his last words recommended forgiveness to us, moistned with his tears, and blood: Go we about to tear his Testament, that we afterward may pull his Images in pieces? The blood of Just Abel still babbleth on the earth, and is unrevenged; shall we then seek to revenge it? O my God, we utterly renounce it with all our hearts, and are ready to seal peace with our blood, that by thy blood thou maist sign our mercy.

Of Reconciliation.

CONSTANTIA.

THere is nothing more certain then that he, who seeks revenge, shal find the God of revenge. It followeth those who pursue it, and when they think to exercise it on others, they feel it falling on their own heads. It is only proper to base and infamous spirits to endeavour to glut themselves with bloud, and to delight in the miseries of mortals, but souls the most noble, are ever beautified with the rays of clemency.

Zonar. Theophilus a bloody Emperour.

Theophilus, one of the most bloudy Emperours that ever ware the diadem, an enemy both of heaven and earth, of Saints and men, as he had lived on gall, would end in bloud. He felt his soul on his lips flying from him, and saw death near at hand, which he could not escape. It was time, he should now yield up life to others, when it appeared he could no more take it from them: But this wicked man, holding at that time Theophobus, one of his prime Captains imprisoned in his own Palace, upon certain jealousies conceived he was too able a man and well worthy of Empire, commanded a little before his death, to have his head cut off; and causing it to be brought to his bed side, he took it by the hair, held it a long time in his hands, so much was he pleased with this massacre; then seriously beholding it, he cried out: It is true, I shal no longer be Theophilus, nor art thou any more Theophobus. And many times repeating these words, he yielded up his damned ghost like a ravenous wolf, which passed from bloud to infernal flames, although certain revelations spake of his deliverance. Behold how having taken in his youth evil habits of cruelty and revenge, he persevered in them to his death, being besides most unfortunate and infamous in all his enterprises.

But contrariwise it is observed, all great ones disposed to clemency, have been very glorious & most happy before God & men. I could here reherse very many, yet pursuing our design, I rest contented with relation of a notable pardon given by a Queen to a Prince, on a Friday in memory of our Saviors Passion.

It cannot be said, but so much the greater & more outrageous injuries are, so much the more difficult is their pardon, especially when one hath full power of revenge in his hands. Now the injury whereof we speak, was the death of poor Conradinus, which well considered in all its circumstances, rendereth this clemency whereof I intend to speak, much more admirable. Know then this Prince, son of the Emperour Conradus, went into Italy with a huge army to defend the inheritance of his Ancestours, pretending it to be unjustly usurp'd by the wily practises of Charls of Anjou: He stood at that time in the midst of his armies, sparkling like a star, full of fire & courage, when Pope Clement the fourth seeing him pass along with so much nobility, said: Alas, what goodly victims are led to the Altar! His valour in the tenderness of his age, was as yet more innocent, then wary; and he had to do with a Captain, whom war like experience had made more subtle in this profession. Conradinus.

Charls being ready to give him battle, resolved it was best to weary out this yong vigour, & to afford him the bait of some success in appearance, the more easily to draw him into his snare. He gave the leading of one part of his army to a Captain of his call'd Alardus, commanding him to bear al the royal ensigns, as if he had been Charls of Anjou's person. Conradinus thinking he had nothing to do but to conquer what he saw before his eys, for decision of the difference, advanc'd his troups, which falling like a tempest upon the enemies, quickly dispatched Alardus, who was slain in the battel, as some histories record, carrying from all this ostent of regality, a fatal glory into a tomb. He gave battle to Charles of Anjou.

This yong Mars, supposing the war ended by the death of his adversary, presently proclaim'd victory, at which time Charls of Anjou, who lay hidden in a trench with the activest troups, as yet very fresh, came suddenly upon him. He did all that for his defence, which a brave spirit might in an evil fortune. But his army being cut in pieces, he was enforced to save himself, after the loss of 12000. dead in the place

His calamity caused him to change the habit of a King, to that of a horse-keeper for his greater security, so much he feared to be known by those, who would decide the dint of war by his bloud. He embarked with his cousin Frederick of Austria, to pass unto Pisa, committing himself in this disguised habit to a Pilot, who much importuned him for his hire. He had not then about him either bread or mony, so that he was constrained to pull off a ring, and leave it in pledge to the Pilot to assure the debt. He seeing these young men of a graceful garb, and considering this jewel was not a wealth suitable to their habit, doubted some trick, and gave notice to the Governour, a crafty man, who complying with the times, laid hold of the Princes, and put them into the hands of the Conquerour. His taking.

Charls

His sentence and death.

Charls of Anjou much fearing this young Lion, forgat all generosity to serve his own turn, and did a most base act, detested by all understandings that have any humanity: which is, that having kept Conradinus a whole year in a straight prison, he assembled certain wicked Lawyers to decide the cause of one of the noblest spirits at that time under Heaven, who to second the passion of their Master, rendered the laws criminal, and served themselves with written right, to kill a Prince contrary to the law of nature, judging him worthy of death, in that (said they) he disturbed the peace of the Church, and aspired to Empire. A scaffold was prepared in a publick place, all hanged with red, where Conradinus is brought with other Lords. A Protonotary cloathed after the ancient fashion, mounteth into a chair set there for the purpose, and aloud pronounceth the wicked sentence. After which Conradinus raising himself, and casting an eye full of fervour and flames on the Judge, said: Base and cruel slave as thou art, to open thy mouth to condemn thy Sovereign.

It was a lamentable thing to see this great Prince on a scaffold, in so tender years, wise as an Apollo, beautiful as an Amazon, and valiant as an Achilles, to leave his head under the sword of an Executioner, in the place where he hoped to crown it. He called heaven and earth to bear witness of Charls his cruelty, who unseen beheld this goodly spectacle from an high turret. He complained that his goods being taken from him, they robbed him of his life as a thief, that the blossom of his age was cut off by the hand of a hang-man, taking away his head to bereave him of the Crown, lastly throwing down his glove, demanded an account of this inhumanity. Then seeing his cousin Frederick's head to fall before him, he took it, kissed it, and laid it to his bosom, asking pardon of it, as if he had been the cause of his disaster, in having been the companion of his valour. This great heart wanting tears to deplore it self, wept over a friend, and finishing his sorrows with his life, stretched out his neck to the Minister of justice. Behold how Charls, who had been treated with all humanity in the prisons of Saracens, used a Christian Prince; so true it proves, that ambition seemeth to blot out the character of Christianity, to put in the place of it something worse then the Turbant.

This death lamented through all the world, yea, which maketh Theaters still mourn, sensibly struck the heart of Queen Constantia his Aunt, wife of Peter of Arragon: She bewailed the poor Prince with tears which could never be dried up, as one whom she dearly loved, and then again representing to her self so many virtues and delights, drowned in such generous bloud, and so unworthily shed, her heart dissolved into sorrow. But as she was drenched in tears, so her husband thundred in arms to revenge his death.

Collenutius histor. Neapol. l. 5. c. 4. & 5. The son of Charls of Anjou taken.

He rigged out a fleet of ships, the charge whereof he recommended to Roger de Loria, to assail Charls the second, Prince of Salerno, the only son of Charls of Anjou, who commanded in the absence of his father. The admiral of the Arragonian failed not to encounter him, and fought so furiously with him, that having sunck many of his ships, he took him prisoner, and brought him into Sicily, where Queen Constantia was, expecting the event of this battle. She failed not to cause the heads of many Gentlemen to be cut off in revenge of Conradinus, so to moisten his ashes with the bloud of his enemies. Charls the Kings onely son was set apart with nine principal Lords of the Army, and left to the discretion of Constantia. Her wound was still all bloudy, and the greatest of the Kingdom counselled her speedily to put to death the son of her capital enemy, yea, the people mutined for this execution: which was the cause; the Queen having taken order for his arraignment, and he thereupon condemned to death, she on a Friday morning sent him word, it was now time to dispose himself for his last hour. The Prince, nephew to S. Lewis, and who had some sense of his uncle's piety, very courageously received these tidings, saying,

That besides other courtesies he had received from the Queen in Prison, she did him a singular favour to appoint the day of his death on a Friday, and that it was good reason he should dye culpable on the day, whereon Christ died innocent.

This speech was related to Queen Constantia, who was therewith much moved, and having some space bethought her self, she replyed:

An excellent passage of clemency.

Tell Prince Charls, if he take contentment to suffer death on a Friday, I will likewise find out mine own satisfaction to forgive him on the same day, that Jesus signed the pardon of his Executioners with his proper bloud. God forbid I shed the bloud of a man, on the day my Master poured out his for me. Although time surprize me in the dolour of my wounds, I will not rest upon the bitterness of revenge. I freely pardon him, and it shall not be my fault, that he is not at this instant in full liberty.

This magnanimous heart caused the execution to be staied, yet fearing if she left him to himself, the people might tear him in pieces, she sent him to the King her husband, entreating by all which was most pretious unto him, to save his life, and send him back to his Father. Peter of Arragon, who sought his own accommodation in so good a prize, freed him from danger of death, yet enlarged him suddenly. For his deliverance must come from a hand wholly celestial.

Sylvester Pruere writes, that lying long imprisoned in the City of Barcelon, the day of S. Mary Magdalen approaching, who was his great Patroness, he disposed himself to a singular devotion, fasting, confessing his sins, communicating, begging of her with tears to deliver him from this captivity. Heaven was not deaf to his prayers. Behold on the day of the feast he perceived a Lady full of Majesty, who commanded him to follow her, at which words, he felt as it were a diffusion of extraordinary joy spread over his heart. He followed her step by step, as a man rapt, and seeing all the gates flie open before her without resistance, and finding himself so cheerful, that his body seemed to have put on the nature of a spirit, he well perceived Heaven wrought wonders for him. The Lady looking on him after she had gone some part of the way, asked him where he thought he was; to which he replied, that he imagined himself to be yet in the Territory of Barcelon. Charls you are deceived (said she) you are in the County of Provence, a league from Narbon, and thereupon she vanished. Charls not at all doubting the miracle, nor the protection of S. Mary Magdalen, prostrated himself on the earth, adoring the power of God in his Saints, caused a fair Church to be built to this most blessed woman, and a Cross to be erected in the place where she left him, which was called the Cross of the place: Thus was God pleased to ratifie by so great miracles, the pardon Constantia had given to Prince Charls.

I will shut up this discourse with a passage of so rare a clemency of a Monarch, offended in the honour of a daughter of his, by a mean vassal, as it seems could never have fallen but into the heart of a Charlemaign.

Curio l. 2. rerum Chronologicarum.

It is to this purpose recounted, that one Eginardus, who was Secretary to the Prince, having placed his affections much higher then his condition admitted, made love to one of his daughters, which was in mine opinion natural, who seeing this man of a brave spirit, and a grace suitable, thought not him too low for her, whom merit had so eminently raised above his birth. Shee affected him, and gave him too free access to her person, so far as to suffer him to have recourse unto her, to laugh, and sport in her Chamber on evenings, which ought to have been kept as a sanctuary, wherein relicks are preserved. It happened upon a Winters night, these two amorous hearts, having inwardly so much fire, that they scarcely could think upon the cold, Eginardus (ever hastening his approaches, and being very negligent in his returns) had somewhat too much slackned his departure. The snow mean while raised a Rampart, which troubled them both when he thought to go out. Time pressed him to leave her, and heaven had stopped up the way of his passage. It was not tolerable for him to go forward. Eginardus feared to be known by his feet, and the Lady thought it not any matter at all to see the prints of such steps about her door. They being much perplexed; love, which taketh the diadem of majesty from Queens, so soon as they submit to its tyranny, made her to do an act for a Lover, which had she done for a poor man, it would have been the means to place her among the great Saints of her time. She took this Gentleman upon her shoulders, and carried him all the length of the Court to his chamber, he never setting foot to the ground, that so the next day no impression might be seen of his footing. It is true which a holy Father saith, That if Hell lay on the shoulders of love, love would finde courage enough to bear it. But it hath more facility to undertake, then prudence to hide it self; the eye of God not permitting these follies should either be concealed or unpunished. Charlemaign, who had not so much affection in store for women, that he spent not some nights in study, watched this night, and hearing a noise, opened the window, and perceived this pretty prank, at which he could not tell whether he were best to be angry, or to laugh.

Goodness and indulgence of Charlemaigne.

The next day in a great Assembly of Lords, and in the presence of his daughter and Eginardus, he proposed the matter past, in covert terms, asking what punishment might a servant seem worthy of, who made use of a King's daughter as of a Mule, and caused himself to be carried on her shoulders in the midst of Winter, through night, snow, and all sharpness of the season. Every one gave hereupon his opinion, and there was not any who condemned not this insolent man to death. The Princess and Secretary changed colour, thinking nothing remained for them, but to be flayed alive. But the Emperour looking on his Secretary with a smooth brow, said: Eginardus, hadst thou loved the Princess my daughter, thou oughtest to have come freely to her father, who should dispose of her liberty, and not play these pranks, which have made thee worthy of death, were not my clemency much greater then the respect thou hast borne to my person. I now at this present give thee two lives, the one in preserving thine, the other in delivering her to thee, in whom thy soul more survives, then in the body it animateth. Take thy fair Portress in marriage, and both of you learn to fear God, and to play the good husbands. These lovers thought they were in an instant drawn out of the depth of Hell to ascend to Heaven, and all the Court stood infinitely in admiration of this judgment. It appears by the narration, what was the milde temper of Charlemaign in this point, and that he followed the counsel of S. Ambrose, who advised a Father named Sisinnius to receive his son with a wife he had taken for love. For receiving them both (said he) you will make them better; rejecting them, render them worse. The goodness of these great hearts for all that, justifieth not the errours of youth, which grievously offendeth, when it undertaketh resolutions in this kinde, not consulting with those to whom it oweth life.

XIII. MAXIM.

Of the Epicurean life.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That the flesh must be daintily used, and all possible contentment given to the minde.

EXperience teacheth us, there is in the World a sect of reformed Epicures, who do not openly profess the bruitishness of those infamous spirits, which are drenched in gourmandize and lust, but take Maxims more refined, that have (as they say) no other aim but to make a man truly contented. For which purpose they promise themselves to drive all objects from their mindes, which may bring the least disgust, and to afford the body all pleasures which may preserve it in a flourishing health, accompanied with grace, vigour, and vivacity of senses.

The Philosophy of Epicurus swayeth in the world.

Here may the judicious observe, that such was the doctrine of ancient Epicurus. For although many make a monster of him, all drowned in ordure and prodigious pleasure, yet it is very easie to prove, that he never went about to countenance those bruitish ones, who through exorbitance of lust, ruine all the contentments of the minde and body: But he wholly inclined to finde out all the pleasures of nature, and to banish any impediments which might make impression on the soul or body. For which cause I think Theodoret mistook him, when he made him so gluttonous, as to contend with Jupiter about a sop, and that Nicetas, who represenceth him so licourish after honied Tarts, well understood him not: For Tertullian, S. Hierom, Laertius, and Seneca, who better noted his doctrine, assure us he was a very sober man, and speaketh not in his writings but of pulse and fruits; not for the honour he bear to the virtue of temperance, but for that it seemed he found himself better disposed in this frugality, then in superfluities, the tormenters of health. Yet notwithstanding he is ever greatly reprehensible, in that he so deifieth the contentments of Nature, and this kinde of life free from bodily pain and mindes unquiet; that he makes a Sovereign God of it, honouring and adoring it as a Divinity.

THE HOLY COURT.

That life without crosses, and flesh void of mortification, is the Sepulcher of a living man.

From

From this principle he derived concluſions, which led to a life wholly repleniſhed with eaſeful idleneſs, much prejudicial to civil ſociety. For he would not have a wiſe man intermeddle in ſtate-affairs, nor undertake deſigns for the good of Common-wealths, for fear of troubling the repoſe of his mind, & gave a moſt infamous advice, to taſt the pleaſures of marriage, without taking care for the education of children, becauſe it was painful: whereupon Arrianus in Epictetus reproacheth him, that his father and mother would have ſmothered him in the cradle, had they known ſuch peſtilent words ſhould come from his lips.

Arian l. 4. c. 10.

He now-adays is waited on by many, who take other ways then he did, to arrive at the practiſe of his Maxims. For they uſe their bodies to ſuch effeminacy, that they ſeem ſingle in their kind, and feed their minds what they can with tender thoughts free from any care or affair, which may divert contentment, ſo that they ſuffer themſelves with all endeavour to be diſſolved in an eaſie truantly life, wholly to enjoy themſelves.

1. Reaſon againſt this Maxim of riot.

2. Now you, who incline to this Sect, by ill habits taken in the great ſervice you daily do your bodies, I beſeech you conſider how far it is alienated both from reaſon and Chriſtianity. Firſt, ſee you not that to imagine here on earth a life without pain, is to frame Chymera's in your mind, ſince the world is a ſoil as natural for thorns, as barren of violets. All the ſons of Adam (ſaith the Scripture) have trouble enough to carry their yoke. Where find you this perpetual quiet of mind, this freedom from bodily diſturbances which you figure in your thoughts? It is in my opinion not unlike the little Iſland of ambergrece, whereof Garcias ſpeaketh, which was perceived by certain merchants, who ſayled along on the Ocean. But they much labouring to take it, in ſuch proportion as they advanced towards it, it recoiled back, and when they thought to touch it, it was loſt in the waves. I dare affirm you purſue an Iſland more imaginary then that, running with full ſpeed after the falſe pleaſures of Epicurus. It is a fantaſie that mocketh you, and which amuzeth you on the ſurges of this life, to make you periſh, ſeeing according to Clemens Alexandrinus, ſenſuality is the ſhipwrack of ſpiritual life.

A man muſt not be born of a mother to eſcape worldly moleſtations, ſince the Scripture, which cannot lie teacheth us, travel is as natural for the children of women as flight for birds. How could there be pleaſures of body without pain, ſince pleaſures would never be pleaſures if they had not been preceded by ſome incommodities? It is a witty reaſon of the philoſopher Simplicius, which was well conſidered by S. Bernard, (a) Take away hunger (ſaith he) & there is no pleaſure in viands, take away thirſt, and the moſt chryſtal fountains would be unto you but as mariſhes. Hot things muſt be had to ſeek for coolneſs, and cold to be delighted with heat. If you take away evil and neceſſity, you take away the moſt active ſpur which ſenſuality hath over nature.

Tolle famem, & panem non curabit; Tolle ſitim & limpidiſſimum fontem quæſi paludem reſpicies; umbram non quærit niſi æſtuans; ſalum non curat, niſi ægre.

The world which is ſo old, the earth ſo fertile, experience ſo knowing, and hiſtories ſo curious, could not this day produce one ſole man abſolutely happy and content. The great Genius of nature Pliny, who ſearched into all the corners of the world to meet with a man, ſuch as Epicurus framed in his idea, aſſureth us, that after a very long enquiry, he found but one, a Muſician named (b) Xenophilus, who was ſaid to have arrived to the age of an hundred and five years, free from diſquiet or ſickneſs. This is a Rodomontado of Greece, which went about to make him brave it on paper. But might we have penetrated into his heart, and taken all the parts of his life aſunder, I am perſwaded we might preſently find ſomewhat, for which he ſhould be baniſhed out of the imaginary Palace of felicity. I can as ſoon believe Xenophilus came into the world free from original ſin, as imagine he went out of it exempt from any dolour. It were as eaſie to ſail proſperouſly amidſt the tempeſts of the Ocean, having no other veſſel but a tortoyſe ſhel, as to live in the world without ſuffering. We are condemned to it before we are born, and our tears teach us this decree before we iſſue from our mothers womb.

(b) Plin. l. 7. c. 50.

One ſole man happy.

What remaineth (ſaies S. Bernard) to finiſh the deſcription of man, and to make him a true picture of calamity, ſince he entreth into the world by the gate of ſin, with a body frail, a mind barren, weakneſs of mortal Members, and ſtupidity of heart being given him as a portion of his birth, and a neceſſity of his condition? The miſerable Epicurus, who was the firſt Authour of this lazy life, and who ſought by ſpeculation and practiſe into all he could imagine, bending all his thoughts and actions to this purpoſe, found he ſatisfaction in this ſearch? Hiſtories tell us, this great father of the happy had a ſtone in his bladder, which infinitely pained him: & this being a time, that knew not the operations now in uſe to deliver mortals from theſe vexations, he carried his affliction to the grave, dying with enraged dolour. Upon this you ſhal obſerve, that it ſeems God, nature, elements, and men, conſpire to torment one, who ſeeks with over-much curioſity and too ſeriouſly, the contentments of his body, and the eaſe of his mind.

3. But, that I may here produce a ſecond reaſon, although you were permitted to pleaſe your ſenſuality throughout the whole latitude of your deſires, & the capacity thereof, what ſhould you elſe do, but ſerve a miſerable body & tie your ſelf all your lifetime to the preſervation of a fool and ſick man? If you live according to the fleſh you ſhall dy, ſaid the Apoſtle to the Romans. All great ſpirits, who have a feeling of their extraction, the beauty and nobility of their ſouls, take not the neceſſities of life but with ſome ſhame and ſorrow. They regard the fleſh as the priſon of a ſpirit immortal, and think to flatter it, is to ſtrangle the better part of themſelves, which reſteth in the underſtanding. The Philoſopher Plotinus, who was renown'd as the worlds Oracle, could not endure to have his picture taken, ſaying, he had trouble enough to ſuffer a wretched body, without multiplying the figures thereof by the help of painting, and you imagine it is a virtue of the times to adore it, and afford it ſubmiſſions which paſs to the utmoſt period of ſervitude. How much the more we profit in the liberty of God's children, ſo much the more we proceed in diſengagement from ſenſe, and enter as into the ſanctuary of ſouls, there to conſult on truths, and underſtand reaſons, which vindicate us from the dregs of the world, to give us paſſage into the ſociety of Angels.

It is a ſtrange matter, that the ſubtle Divine Scotus thinks, that to underſtand and know objects by ſenſible repreſentations, paſſing through the gate of ſenſe, and ſtriking our imagination, is a puniſhment from original ſin. He finds it is a harſh ſubjection, to make application to the body, to derive colours, odours, and ſounds from it, which notwithſtanding ſeemeth as innocent as the purchaſe of bees, who ſuck hony out of flowers: and ſhal we think there can be any felicity to plunge our judgment into all the voluptuous pleaſures of fleſh?

heron to the faulcon? He endeavoureth to flie about him, and to wet his wings with his excrements, to make his flight heavy, and render his purpose unprofitable. Alas, how many times feel we the vigour of our reason enervated by the assaults of concupiscence, which contracteth the like advantage from its ordures, for the enthralment of the spirit! And why would we second its violence by our weakness.

Instance upon the weakness and misery in service of the body.

I moreover demand of you, what can you hope from so punctually observing your body? You are not a Geryon with three heads and three throats: There needs but a little to fill you. For though your concupiscence be infinite, yet are your senses finite, and many times pleasure overwhelms them before they afford themselves the leisure of tasting them. If you resolve so curiously to attend the search of pleasures, you should desire the spirit of a horse, to enjoy them with the more vigour and liberty. But what sense is there to have the soul of a man, and seek to be glutted with the mire of the earth: as if one would feed a Phœnix with carrion, on which ravens live? when you have done all you can to make your self happy by diversity of worldly pleasures, beasts will ever have more then you. For their sensitive souls much sooner meet the heighth of nature; and as their pleasures are free from shame, so they drag not sorrow after them. They are not gnawn with cares by desiring things needless, they take what the elements afford them, and what the industry of man manures for them, and know not what it is to find poisonous maladies in the most ardent pleasures sensuality may imagine. But admit you were resolved to become a beast with the disciples of Epicurus, yet ought you not for all that, according to your own limits, surpass the bruitishness of beasts. And I pray tell me, where is the beast which hath never so little generosity, would not think it self most miserable, if it were condemned to eat and drink perpetually, and grow lazy in an idle life? They frame themselves very willingly to the exercises nature appointed them for the service of man, and a man thinks it a great Phylosophy to consecrate all the parts of his body to sensuality, no whit considering, he is made for the contemplation of things Divine, for the love and fruition of the first cause.

Avicenna lib. de prima Philosoph. p. c. 1. apud Javellum. Notable saying of Avicen.

Avicenna, an excellent wit, by the unhappiness of his birth ranked in the sect of Mahomet, coming to consider this false Prophet had placed the beatitude of the other life in the injoying sensual pleasures, was so ashamed of it, that he shrunk from his Prophet, that he might not betray his reason. The law (saith he) which Mahomet gave us, considered beatitude and misery within the limits of the body: but there are promises, and hopes of other blessings much more excellent, and which cannot be conceived but by the force of a most purified understanding. Which is the cause, wise Divines ever set their love on the blessings of spirit, without any account taken of those of sense, in comparison of the felicity we one day pretend to have in the union of our immortal spirit with the first Verity. What can our worldlings answer to this Arabian? Should they not blush with shame, to see a man bred in the school of Epicurus, gone out of it to teach us the Maxim of Christianity?

Felicitas ab conjunctio cum prima Veritate.

3. Reason. tyranny of ryot.

4. Finally, to conclude this discourse with a third reason, although the service of the body were possible, and not shamefull to you, do you not well see it is tyrannical, and that Epicurus himself, wholly bent to pleasure, cut off all he could from nature for this onely cause, which made him think over-much care of the body was extreamly opposite to felicity?

Opinion of Platonists.

The Platonists said, our souls were of an extraction wholly celestial, and sent from Heaven to serve God on earth, in imitation of the service, Angels do to him in Heaven, but that many of those poor souls forgetting their original, instead of going directly to the Temple of virtue, stood amuzed in the house of a Magician, which was the flesh, that enchanted them with his charms, and had cast them into setters, where they were enforced to suffer a painfull bondage, from whence there were but two passages, wisdom, or death. To this Synesius made allusion in his Hymns, complaining, his soul from a servant of God was become a slave of matter, which had bewitched it by wily practises. And verily who can sufficiently expresse the servitude a soul suffers, fast linked to flesh, and which onely endeavours to dandle it, hoping by this means to give true contentment to the mind? First, pleasures are not exposed now-adays to all the world as the water of a river: such an one there is, who hath sold himself for the life of a hog, who will never have his fill of hogs draft, as S. Peter Chrysologus said of the prodigal child. Men covetous of bodily riches would willingly make themselves horns and claws of iron, to speak with the wise Plato, of purpose to take and defend, the one his wealth, the other his loathsome pleasures. Many times iron gates must be broken to purchase a fruition, which draweth along with it a thousand disturbances. Behold how a man who is excessively enamoured of his own health, becomes suppliant and servile to his body. He fears his proper dyet, all kind of airs are dreadfull to him; nor can he take but with distrust, those very comforts which afford him life. He makes of his stomach a soyl of drugs; he perpetually consulteth with his Physicians; he tells his infirmities to all the world, he seeks out extraordinary cures, as he often hath imaginary diseases; he lives in an afflicting equality, and would many times rather transgres Gods ten commandments, then fail in one of Hypocrates's aphorisms. I leave you to think, what death were not much sweeter, then health so religiously preserved.

Inordinate love of health.

See now on the other side a worldly woman, who feeleth her beauty (that short tyrany) already in the wain, & yet would cherish it in the opinion of men, who heretofore adored it; or of such likewise, who may be taken in the same snare. What doth not this silly creature to make her self to be esteemed fair? What time wasteth she not to seem slender, to wash, paint, to divide the white, well to mingle the red, to powder her hair, to make her self eyebrows, to preserve the whiteness of her teeth, to set a vermillion tincture on her lips, little patches like flies on her cheeks, choose stuffs, and think of new fashions. What torture inflicteth she not on her body with those iron stayes and whalebones? How many turns maketh she dayly before a looking-glasse? What perplexities of mind, what apprehensions, least her defects may appear? And what discontent, when after such torments so miserably ended, she sees her self despised by men, before she becomes the food of worms? What Captain of a Galley was ever so cruel to fettered slaves, as vanity and love of the body are to the soul? Pursue the track of all other pleasures, and you shall find them painful and dolorous; and in the end you will be enforced to say, there is no worse bondage then that which is afforded to wretched flesh. The Prophet Esay speaking of punishments due to sinners and worldlings, faith, they are written on box, whereupon we may say with S. Hierom, it is to shew the lasting of it, since characters graven on such kind of wood, cannot so easily easily be taken off. But I here consider a secret, which teacheth me box bears no fruit, only satisfied to produce a flower, which otherwise making a goodly shew, killeth Bees that suck it. The Prophet in this figure presented to us a lively image of pleasure, which surprizeth the eys by a vain illusion, whilst it conveyeth poyson into the heart. Rest then assured, you shall never meet with solid contentment of minde, but by the ways the Saviour of the world shewed us on earth, to transfer us to Heaven. The just are here below, as little Halcyons on the trembling of waters, or Nightingales on thorns. They finde their joys amongst holy tears, and their delights in austerities of life. There is nothing so Sovereign, as early to accustom to depend little on your body, and quickly to forsake a thousand things by election, which you shall be enforced to abandon of necessity. When a manner of virtuous life is chosen, and which hath some austerity in it; custom makes it sweet, grace fortifieth it, perseverance nourisheth it, and glory crowns it. How many worldlings daily putrifie in a miserable condition, who have from their tender age yielded all submission to their flesh, and how many delicate bodies in Monasteries have we seen, which the whole world condemned to the beir from their entring into Religion, to go out of hair-cloath, ashes, and fasts, as a Phœnix from her Tomb? A life without crosses is a dead Sea, which breedeth nought but stench and sterility: but austerity is like the Ægyptian thorn, which had an excellent grace in Crowns. We are called to Christianity, to bear a God crucified on our flesh, and, as it were, impressed with the Character of Divine Love, Let us carefully preserve our selves from prostituting members to sensuality, made to be the Temple of the living God, and the ornament of Paradise. Holy Job was in state so lamentable, that those who beheld him could scarcely tell, whether it were a man reduced into a dunghil, or a dunghil into the shape of a man. Notwithstanding in the midst of these smarting dolours which over-ran all his body, and the afflictions which assailed his minde, he received so unspeakable comforts from God, that himself confesseth to have nothing so strange in his own person, as his proper torments. Behold the reason why he exalted himself on his dunghil, as upon a throne of virtue, he adorned himself with his wounds as with a royal purple, he took the Scepter in hand over all effeminacies of body, and pronounced Oracles unto vs, which to all Ages shew, that there is neither evil nor affliction wherein God maketh not his miracles of our pains, and his glory of our rewards.

The thirteenth EXAMPLE upon the thirteenth MAXIM.

The miserable event of Lust.

AMMON the Son of DAVID.

IT is not one of the least miseries of the greatest of all evils, I mean sin, that the ill example which often accompanieth it, doth likewise survive it. It is, to say truly, a most bitter fruit of this direful tree, or rather a Cien, which it in growing produceth, and which being fed from its sap, stands upright after the fall of it. Nor is it strange, that when once the mercy of God (only able for this great work) hath stifled the monster sin in the soul of parents, yet fails it not (though wholly dead) to infect their families, and poyson their posterity with the stench of its ordure.

David that great Prince, that King according to God's heart, had lost the affections and sweet indulgencies of it, by an adultery and an homicide. He afterward weepeth, he humbly prayeth, he loudly cries, and God, who is willing to be moved, turneth his eys from his crimes, and that he may no more hereafter see them, applies the Sponge to cleanse them: yet behold long after Ammon, one of his children, who casteth an eye on these bad lessons, and though blotted out, fails not to read them, and to learn thence the science of his own ruine. This unhappy Prince scorns to reflect on the milde temper, the penance and zeal of his father, to look on his exorbitancies. He cannot see this Sun but in eclipse, and not seeking to make choice among so many eminent virtues, which had made him happy, he will not follow his steps but in a path, where needs he must meet with ill adventures.

Although the holy Scripture speaketh not of the wicked deportments of this Prince until his incest, yet there is a great probability he began not at the end, nor mounted this tower of confusion by the top: but rather arrived thither by the degrees of a life irregular, effeminate, and freed from the care of the soul, wholly to resign himself to the service of the body and its concupiscence. But insomuch as loathing, which always waits very near upon the most exquisite pleasures, is wont every moment to put the levity of sinners upon new objects, & in that, besides the pride of those who hate thee (O God supremely amiable) perpetually mounteth, until their giddiness precipitate them into the abyss. Behold here our wicked one, our Epicure, before there was an Epicure in the world, who rejecteth mean crimes, distasteth common pleasures, and projecteth an incest with his own sister, not considering how unreasonable it is to sacrifice the honour of the royal house, the tranquility of his father, his soul and salvation to the distemper of his fancy.

Ammon plotteth incest with his sister.

He turneth his eys from heaven, and from the God of heaven, whose wonders his father had so often sung unto him: he is wholly for passion which predominateth over him, nor entertains any other cogitations but to satisfie it. Already this feaver, which takes away his sense, hath inflamed his blood, leaving him nought in his veins, but the fire of Hell, which more and more increaseth. The contagion of this unsound soul spreads over the body. Behold (saith the History) he falls sick for the love of his sister, who hath nothing at all in her, which can displease him but her chastity; because that sets before him the great difficulties of his enterprize. He hath a friend, & this proves his main unhappiness; a worldly wise one, a flattering friend, a companion of his riots; but such amities which deserve not the name, resemble false fires, which seeming all inflamed, are nothing else but smoak very easily dissipated, & whose bright splendour only serves to lead into precipices.

This was Joadab, one of David's Nephews, who having searched into the change both of his countenance and humour, quickly understood the reason of it from his lips, so that too easily complying with his passion, he lastly gave him this counsel: Lye (saith he) on your bed, counterfeit sickness, the King doubtless will visit you, you shall beg of him that your sister Thamar may come to you to prepare your diet, and he without doubt will assent to it.

Joadab counselleth Ammon to incest with his sister Thamar.

Cruel friend, nay rather soothing enemy, what dost thou? Thou well knowest that thus flexibly to serve the passion of this violent spirit, thou subjectest him to the extremity of all unhappines. Thou stranglest this Prince whilst thou flatterest him, and in lieu of good offices, offices, giveſt him a hand to lead him down into ruin. Were it not better to uſe fire and ſteel for the cure of this mad man, then to comply with his malady to render it incurable? Were it not better with a bitter, but charitable correction, to purge his bad humours, then to pour into him a pleaſiug poiſon?

There is nothing more faithfully or more readily executed, then an ill advice; quickly our amoriſt is in his bed, he entreateth Thamar of the King, who came to viſit him; where behold the father, too good for ſo bad a ſon, grants what he demandeth. The poor virgin likewiſe obeyeth the commands of her father, and the ſuggeſtions of her own heart, which had but too much tenderneſs towards ſo execrable a brother. She runs like an innocent victim to the kniſe, which muſt cut her throat, ſhe ſollows the bait not doubting the hook, and goeth fearleſs into a place, where ſhe muſt looſe all. This diſſembling ſick man at firſt refuſeth the broths ſhe had prepared to procure him an appetite, but having given command all ſhould depart out of the chamber, deſires his ſiſter to bring them in: ſhe who nothing doubted the practiſe, readily goes in, offers them to him, but the enraged creature ſeizeth on her, and requires to lie with her.

Ammon diſſembleth ſickneſs.

Thamar's advice.

The poor Princeſs ſurprized in this attempt, ſeeks to temper him with ſweet words. Alas, dear brother (ſaith ſhe) commit not ſuch a violence upon me, remember with your ſelf this abomination is without example in Iſrael. Baniſh ſuch thoughts from you, and take heed you enterprize not an act, which will among the wiſeſt be eſteemed an unſpeakable folly. Whither ſhall I go after ſuch a ſhame, or what will you do, when you have purchaſed ſo ill reputation? By all means ſpeak to the King, he is a good father, he perhaps will freely afford you that, which you by violence would take. The enraged monſter will not ſo much as underſtand her, he forceth her, he finds himſelf to be the ſtronger, and makes uſe of this advantage for the ſatisfaction of a paſſion, nay rather of a fury, which even the moſt part of bruit beaſts abhor.

It is a ſtrange thing, how thoſe who ſeek their contentment in the contempt of God and his ordinances, make an ill reckoning. They meet with wormwood even in honey: their fingers are pricked whilſt they gather roſes, the odour of which ſo ſoon paineth them, and in a word they ſee, that loathing concludeth, what was begun by diſturbances and impatience. This inconſtant ſpirit promiſed himſelf pleaſures without anxiety or period, but behold him foiled in the firſt fruition. This infinite love finds its end in the beginning, or rather its change into averſion and hatred.

Ammon deſpiſeth his diſhonoured ſiſter.

Behold he preſently deſpiſeth his ſiſter, yea, exceſſively; mark the Scripture: The hatred was much greater, then was ever the affection. He commands her to be gone, and ſhe exaggerating the ſecond offence committed by him, his ſo unworthy uſage of her after ſuch an outrage, he willeth one of his ſervants to drive her out, and ſhut the door after her. Who can deſcribe the griefs and agonies of this afflicted creature, defamed by her brother, and thruſt by a groom out of a houſe, whereinto ſhe came not but to do him ſervice? She caſt aſhes on her head, rent her garments, lifts her hands over her head, goes away weeping and lamenting like one diſtract, to ſeek out her brother Abſalom, to give him an account of her dolours, and to ask revenge.

Abſalom cloſe in his revenge.

This Prince (one of the moſt prudent and politick of his time) at the firſt diſſembleth his reſentment; to make it ſeaſonably appear, he endeavoureth to ſweeten the acerbity of his ſoul by fair words, adviſeth her to be ſilent, ſheweth when all is done he is her brother, and that ſhe ſhould not take ſuch an injury to the heart. Needs muſt the ſmoake of pleaſure, turn the courſe of things into flames, and a momentary contentment tranſmit ſorrow and ſadneſſe over to poſterity.

Behold Thamar lives in her brothers houſe, quite diſconſolate, King David is enraged, nor can be appeaſed, and Abſalom hides under the aſhes of his diſſimulation a fire not to be quenched, but with the bloud of this caitiff.

Two years paſſed, and he ſpake neither well nor ill of this act, that he might not by his ſpeech betray the deſire he had to avenge it. In the end, at the time of his ſheep ſhearing in Balhazor, he took occaſion to invite all the Kings children to his houſe. He invited the King likewiſe, but he making excuſe to charge him with ſo great a train, he entreats that at the leaſt his brother Ammon might be his gueſt. He ſhrinks not back, not upon the firſt denial, he enforceth by the eagerneſs of importunity, where behold the miſerable man goes with his brothers, not knowing he muſt be the victim of a Sacrifice, prepared by the Juſtice of heaven, which hath ever undertaken the revenge of violated chaſtity. See in the midſt of a banquet, when Ammon had taken in a little wine, and was full of jollity, Abſalom cries out, kill; and his ſervants following the direction he had given them, fell upon him, ſtruck him, and left him dead in the place. The other brothers affrighted, roſe from the table, got on horſe-back, and came to Sion, where they ſatisfied the King, who thought his whole family had been maſſacred. They at their entrance cried out aloud, they wept with their father, who gave to the deſolation of his houſe what remaind of tears, after thoſe torrents which had heretofore dropped from his eyes, and where his ſins had happily made ſhip-wrack.

Ammon ſlain.

The murderer eſcapeth and forſakes the Kingdom, and David languiſheth with ſorrow for his abſence, being unable to endure that one death alone ſhould bereave him of two of his children. Laſtly he comforted himſelf in it, and admired the judgments of God upon his houſe, who permitted that two of his ſons were partakers in his crimes, and had ſurmounted his adultery and homicide, with an inceſt and a fratricide.

XIV. MAXIM.
Of TRIBULATION.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That one muſt be evil to be happy, ſince the Juſt are moſt afflicted.

IT is a wonderfull thing how the Prophane Court dares propoſe this maxim, refuted by the experience of all Ages, obſervations of all hiſtories, underſtandings of all people, and common voice of nature.

Camerarius in his Problem, wherein he purſueth the the tracts of ordinarily life, without search into other considerations more Divine, makes a question, why those who are addicted to Religion, are always most happy. And on the contrary, from whence it is, that the wicked are most unfortunate: affirming it to be observed throughout all Histories. Now this Author, who plainly sheweth in this Treatise he is none of the most Religious, gently toucheth some reasons, saying among other things, there is some power which pleased to depress the wicked, because ordinarily they are of a spirit fierce and insolent, as if impiety alone were not sufficient for their infelicity. The punishments of the wicked are so frequent in histories both divine and humane, that in so great an Ocean of examples, which may take up more then fifty Ages; scarcely can we produce one sole notable felicity, which felt not some great mishap. That we many times may have cause to make use of S. Augustine's, and S. Eucherius's argument, who say, that although God punish not a crime in this life, he doth it to assure us there is a great Tribunal, and a puissant Justice in the other world. It were a thing superfluous at this time to oppose this Maxim by effects which are so evident, and whereof I think I have produced sufficient observations in preceding Tomes: I had rather here imploy reason, and shew all to be happy to the just, yea, tribulation.

That the Providence of GOD excellently appeareth in the afflictions of the Just.

MEn curious in their censures, and distrustful in their actions, have never ceased in all times to argue with Divine Providence about the afflictions of the Just, but I with the assistance of heaven intend at this present to prove the Eternal Wisdom maketh it self visibly appear by the same things, wherwith many think to overthrow it. Now I make it good by four reasons: the first whereof shall shew, worldly blessings cannot be great but by the experience of evils. Secondly, that tribulation is the nursing-mother of all virtues. Thirdly, that there is no spectacle more glorious among the works of God, then an Innocent afflicted for Justice, and patient in affliction. Fourthly, that it is a proof of beatitude.

We then deliver in the beginning of this discourse, a notable Maxim drawn out of Æneas Gaza, an ancient Author, inserted in the Bibliotheck of the Fathers; Never do we sufficiently know the sweetness of good, without the trial of evil. Joseph mounted upon the triumphant Chariot of Pharaoh by prisons and fetters: David to the throne of Saul by many persecutions. And their great prosperities were much more sweet unto them, because they were for-gone by sharp afflictions. We see the same in Nature, where the Sun is more resplendent after its eclipse, the Sea more calm after a tempest, and the air much brighter after a shower, which made a great Statesman say: Storms and tempests contribute to the clearness of the heavens, and the smoothness of the sea. The condition of mortals hath this proper, that adversities grow out of prosperities, and prosperities from adversities. God bideth from us the seeds both of the one and the other, and many times the causes of blessings and evils are covered under one and the same appearance.

One may here object, that if we must always have evil to tast good, we might infer the Angels were not sufficiently happy, because they arrived at beatitude without passing through tribulations; these being the Flower-de-luces of God's garden, which neither wrought nor took pains to be cloathed with the robe of glory; we might conclude God himself had some defect in his felicity, since he always hath a most accomplished beatitude, with exclusion of all manner of evil. I answer to that, there is very much difference between the condition of things eternal and temporal. Angels entred almost as soon into felicity, as into being, because they were placed in the upper region of the world, where miseries cannot approach, and who having besides a singular knowledge of God's favour, stood not in need to be aided by the counterpoize of adversities. But as for us, we are not only born in a soil, which is as fertile in calamities, as forrests in birds, and rivers in fish: but besides, we are extreme ignorant of God's grace, when we long enjoy prosperity; which is the cause that adversity, though necessarily tied to our condition, maketh us notably open our eys to know the felicities which follow it, and to understand from what source they proceed. As for that which concerneth the Divinity, it cannot, to speak properly, endure any thing contrary by reason of the condition of its essence, which is fully replenished with all sorts of beatitude. God (said Philon) is incommunicable to tribulations, he is always vigorous, ever free from dolour or pain, perpetually in action, without weariness, still plunged in a sea of most pure delights, as being the height, end, and aim of felicity.

Thereupon unable to suffer (as he is God) and yet willing to undergo some special part in the great sacrifice of patience, which began with the world, he took a body, and in that body drank the cup of the passion, shewing evidently to all mortals, that tribulations by their darkness avail to the brightest rays of glory, which S. Augustine spake in very expres terms.

The only Son born of the substance of the Father, and equal to the Father in Divine Essence: the Word, by which all things were created, had nothing to suffer as God, and is cloathed with our flesh to participate in our punishments.

2. The second reason which visibly sheweth the secret of Divine Providence in the tribulation of the Just, is, that God being the Sovereign Sanctity, was necessarily to procure and plant it in the souls of his Elect, by all the most effectual ways which his wisdom hath ordained. Now there is not any shorter way to virtue, then a well managed affliction, and therefore it was necessary to maintain adversity in the world, as the Nurse of great and generous actions of Christianity. It was necessary (saith the Scripture) to try thee by tribulation, because thou wast acceptable to God.

It is a matter almost impossible to preserve a great virtue in perpetual prosperity, one must be more then a man, and to have a double spirit: which is excellently well observed by S. Augustine, upon the words of Elizeus: I intreat your spirit may be doubled in me. Elizeus (saith he) begged the spirit of Elias might be doubled in him, because he was to live in the favour of Court and worldly prosperities, where the way is more slippery, and dangers most frequent. His Master Elias had passed his life in many persecutions, wherefore a singular spirit was sufficient for his direction, adversity being not so difficultly born as prosperity. But insomuch as eminent fortunes are subject to deep drunkenesse, & supine forgetfulnes of God, the Prophet saith by an instinct of the Divinity: Let your spirit be doubled in me.

Prosperity under the shew of felicity deceiveth us, tribulation is ever true: the one flatters us, the other instructeth us: the one tieth up our senses & reason, the other unbinds them: the one is windy, empty, giddy, ignorant; the other sober, reserved, and prudent: the one withdraws us from real good by the allurements of vanity; the other reduceth us by a whole-wholsome way into the duty from whence we wandered. S. Bernard ſaith excellently: Proſperity is in weak and inconſiderate ſouls, as fire to wax, and the ſun's rays to ſnow. David was very wiſe, and Solomon much more, yet both charmed by the great ſucceſs of affairs loſt underſtanding, the one at leaſt in part, the other wholly. We muſt affirm, there is need of a ſtrong ſpirit to ſubſiſt in adverſity, without change of reaſon or conſtancy: but it is much more hard to taſt very pleaſing proſperities, & not be deceived. This is the cauſe why wiſe providence, ever to keep virtue in breath, ceaſeth not to exerciſe it in this honourable liſt of great ſouls; and we behold, that following theſe proceedings, it thence deriveth great advantages and many beauties. The Scripture noteth that Job (a) returning into the luſter of his former ſtate, gave titles to his three daughters, much obſerved: for he called one by the name of Day, the other Caſſia, or as ſome Interpreters ſay Amber, & the third Amalthea's Horn, ſo the Septuagint tranſlate it. We muſt not think ſo holy a man would herein do any ſlight thing, or not to ſome purpoſe. But if we believe Holy Fathers upon it, he meant by theſe three names to ſignifie the three conditions of fortune. The firſt, (which was before his great adverſities) is compared to the day rejoycing us with the natural ſweetneſs of its ſerenity. The ſecond, which was that of his calamity, to amber becauſe it is properly in tribulation, where virtue diffuſeth her good odours; it reſembleth aromatick ſpices, which more ſhew their virtue when they are pounded & brought into powder in a mortar; or incenſe, which never lets it ſo much appear what it is, as when it is caſt on coals: ſo that this motto of the Wiſeman may be attributed to it, (b) A reſplendent fire, and increaſe burning in the fire. In the end iſſuing forth of tedious tribulations, and having been hardned and fortified under ſtorms, it openeth its boſom, and unfoldeth admirable fruits, which fitly make it to be called the Horn of abundance. Whereof we ſay with S. Ambroſe (c) there is a certain beatitude in dolours, which virtue full of ſweetneſs and delight repreſſeth, from whence it acquireth palms, and ineſtimable riches, as well for ſatisfaction of its conſcience, as the condition of glory.

3. For we affirm for a third reaſon, that God hath not a more glorious ſpectacle on earth, then a juſt man afflicted and patient. Is it not that which God himſelf meant in the book of Job, where the Prince of darkneſs, telling he had gone round about the world, he ſaid not to him: Haſt thou ſeen the Monarchies and Empires, which bow under my Scepter, and circumvolve under my laws? Haſt thou ſeen Palaces of Kings and Princes, whoſe turrets penetrate the clouds? Haſt thou ſeen armies all encloſed with ſwords, making the earth tremble under the claſhing of their arms? Haſt thou beheld the theaters, beauties and triumph of greatneſs? Haſt thou conſidered all the wealth which nature reſerveth for me in magazins? He ſayes nothing of all that. What then? (d) Haſt thou looked on my ſervant Job, who hath not his like on earth? And what maketh him more admirable, then that which Caſſianus (e) mentioneth? A man was ſeen abounding in all ſorts of bleſſings, become very poor, having not ſo much as wherewith to cover his nakedneſs, fallen from a moſt perfect health into a prodigious malady, which diſfigured his whole body, and having loſt ſo many goodly farms, reduced to the extremity of being the inhabitant of a wretched dunghil: But he out-braving his miſeries, and ſhewing himſelf to be nothing curious, took a rough ſtone to wipe his wounds, and putting his hand far into the botto of his ulcers, drew thence the corruption and worms, which made him honourable by the lights of his patience. Have we not cauſe to cry out with Tertullian: (f) Oh what a trophey hath God erected in this holy man! Oh, what a ſtandard hath he advanced in the ſight of all his enemies? I dare freely pronounce it, there is not any approacheth more near to God, then a man laden with afflictions, and become invincible in the arms of patience. And I ask of you what made Toby to be called the Good God (g) but this admirable virtue? I ſay although many have been honoured with marks of the Divinity, by reaſon of their favours and benignities towards men, (there being nothing which ſo charmeth people as the profuſion of benefits) yet intereſt was the cauſe great men were flattered with ſuch titles above their deſerts; whereas quite otherwiſe, praiſe rendered to patience is much more ſincere, as being expreſſed by a certain veneration afforded to a virtue abſolutely heroick: which makes me conclude, that men raviſhed with the ſight of this notable patience which ſhined in Toby, when having done wel, evil was retributed, ſurnamed him the Good God, not for any other reaſon but his admirable conſtancy, having this maxim wel engraven in their hearts, that God hath not on earth a more perfect Image of his greatneſs, then a patient man. S. Denis (h) likewiſe plainly calleth patience the imitation of the Divinity, and addeth, Moſes was honoured with the rays of Divine viſion for his ſingular manſuetude.

4. Laſtly, I ſay tribulation confirmeth us in the faith of future things, as being a maniſeſt proof of beatitude. For reaſoning, though never ſo little by the light of nature, we judge if there be any juſtice in men, it is in God as in its ſource, with an incomparable eminency; and therefore we cannot imagine a Divinity without the inheritance of goodneſs and equity, which perpetually accompany it. Now when we ſee innocent men continually afflicted, who go out of this life by bloudy and horrible ways, many times oppreſſed by the tyranny of men, and having none to revenge their aſhes, we neceſſarily conclude, there is in the other life another juſtice, and another tribunal, where cauſes muſt be decided in a laſt Court of judicature. We ſay with S. Paul: (i) The expectation of the creature looketh for the revelation of Gods children: For every creature is ſubject to nothing, not of his own liking, but by the ordinance of him, who hath ſubjected him with hope of riſing again: For creatures ſhal be delivered from the ſervitude of all corruption into the liberty of the children of God. That was it, which comforted all the Martyrs in hideous torments, when their ſouls were torn out of their bodies with incomparable violence. For although mortal members yielded to the ſword of perſecution, yet they beheld, though with an eye drenched in bloud and tears, the bright glory which waited on them, and ſaw as in a mirrour the throns of thoſe prodigious ſufferings diſpoſed all into Crowns. There S. Stephen, ſaw his ſtones changed into as many rubies to ſerve for matter of veneration to piety, and an example of courage for all poſterity. There S. Laurence looked on his flames turned into roſes and delights. There S. Felicitas, the mother of glories and triumphs, beheld ſeven ſons, who received her with palms in their hands into the beautiful pavillions of heaven, where all torments made an end to give beginning to infinite comforts. That is it which animated all the juſt in ſo great a heap of tribulations, and which made them ſpeak theſe words of Tertullian: (k) God is payable enough, in that he is the Arbiter and Feoffee, of your patience. If you commit an injury to him, he is the Avenger

Avenger of it, if a loss of goods, he is the restorer; if a pain or malady, he is the Physician; since it makes God himself the debtor, who by the condition of his independent nature, being not accountable to any, doth notwithstanding particularly bind himself to patience.

Let us conclude with four excellent instructions to be observed in adversity, which are expressed in the book of Job; (1) for it is said: He rent his garments, and having cut off his hair, and prostrated himself on the earth, adored and said: Naked I came out of my mothers womb, and naked I return into earth.

Note, that rising up he rent his garments, to shew he courageously discharged himself of all exteriour blessings, which are riches & possessions, signified by garments. He cut his hair, which was a sign he put the whole body into the hands of God, to dispose of it at his pleasure. For as those Ancients sacrificing a victim first pulled off the hair & threw it into the fire, to testifie the whole body was already ordained to sacrifice; so such as for ceremony gave their hair to temples, protested they were dedicated to the service of the Divinity, to whom the vow was made. In the third instance, he prostrated himself on the earth, acknowledging his beginning by a most holy humility. And for conclusion, he prayed & adored with much reverence. Behold all you should practise in tribulation, well expressed in this mirrour of patience.

First, are you afflicted with loss of goods, either by some unexpected chance, or by some tyranny and injustice? Abate not your courage, but considering the nullity of all earthly blessings, and the greatness of eternal riches, say: My God, although I have endeavoured hitherto to preserve the wealth thou gavest me, as an instrument of many good deeds; yet if thou hast ordained in the sacred counsel of thy providence, that I must be deprived of them for my much greater spiritual avail, I from this time renounce them with all my heart, & am ready to be despoiled, even to the last nakedness, the more perfectly to enter into the imitation of thy poverty. Say with S. Lewis Arch-bishop of Tholouse: Jesus is all my riches, and with him I am content in the want of all other wealth. All plenty, which is not God, is mere penurie to me.

If you be tormented with bodily pain, by maladies, by death of allies, say: My God, to whom belongs this afflicted body? Is it not to thee? Is not this one of thy members? It now endureth some pain, since thou hast so appointed, and it complains and groaneth under the scourge: where are so many precepts of patience? where is the love of suffering? where conformity to the cross? S. Olalla, a Virgin about thirteen or fourteen years of age, as she was martyred, and her body torn with iron hooks, beheld her members all bloudy, and said: O my God, what a brave thing is it to read these characters, where I see thy tropheys and monuments imprinted with iron on my body, and written in my bloud. A creature so tender, so delicate, shall she shew such courage in the midst of torments, such transfixing pains, and cannot I resolve to suffer a little evil with some manner of patience? If it be the death of an ally, behold that body, not in the state it now appears, but in the bright lustre of glory, wherewith you shall behold it in the day of the Resurrection, wipeing away your tears, say what Ruricius did: Let them bewail the dead, who cannot have any hope of Resurrection. Let the dead lament their dead friends, whom they account dead for ever.

In the third place arm your self with profound humility, and looking on the earth from whence your body came, say: My God, it is against my pride thy rod is lifted up in this tribulation. Shall such a creature as I, drawn out of the dust become proud against thy commandments, and so often shake off the yoke of thy Law? I now acknowledge from the bottom of my soul the abjectness of my nothing and protest with all resentments of heart my dependence on thee. The little hearb, called trefoyl, foldeth up the three leaves it beareth, when thunder roareth, thereby willing to tell us, it will not lift a creast, nor raise a bristle against Heaven. Lightning also, which teareth huge trees asunder, never falls upon it. My God, I hear thy hand murmuring over my head in this great affliction, and I involve me within my self, and behold the element whereinto I must be reduced, to do the homage my mortality oweth thee. Exercise not the power of thy thunders against a worm of the earth, against a reed which serves for a sport to the wind. Lastly, take courage what you may, in the accidents that happen, and by the imitation of our Saviour, retire into the bosom of prayer, which is a sovereign means to calm all storms. Jesus prayed in his agony, and the more his sadness encreased, the more he multiplied his prayers. Say in imitation of him: My God, why are my persecutours so encreased? Many rise up against me. Many say to my soul, there is no salvation for it in God. But Lord, thou art my Protectour and my glory, thou art he who wilt make me exalt my head above all mine enemies.

Factus in agonia prolixius orabat. Domine, quid multiplicati sunt qui tribulant me. Multi insurgunt adversum me, multi dicunt animæ meæ, non est salus ipsi in Deo ejus. Tu autem Domine susceptor meus &c.

The fourteenth EXAMPLE upon the fourteenth MAXIM.

Of Constancy in Tribulation.

ELEONORA.

WE are able to endure more then we think. For there are none but slight evils, which cause us readily to deplore, and which raise a great noise, like to those brooks that purl among pibbles; whilest great ones pass through a generous soul, as huge Rivers which drive their waves along with a peacefull majesty.

This manifestly appeareth in the death of Sosa and Eleonora, related by Maffæus in the 16 th. book of his history of the Indies. This Sosa was by Nation a Portingal, a man of quality, pious, rich, liberal, and valiant, married to one of the most virtuous women in the whole Kingdom. They having been already some good time in the Indies, and inflamed with the desire of seeing their dear Country again, embarked at Cochin, with their children very yong, some gentlemen and officers, and with about 600 men. The beginning of their navigation was very prosperous; but being arived at Capo de buena speranza, they ther found the despair of their return. A westerly wind beat them back with all violence; clouds gathered, thunders roared, Heaven it self seemed to break into fire over their heads, and under foot they saw nothing but abysses and images of death. If they would anchor, the Ocean tosseth them, if return to the Indian coast, contrary winds blow to stay their passage. Their sails are torn, Mast crack'd, Rudder broken, their ship shaken with surges, begining to leak, industry of men fruitless, and all let loose to the sway of tempests. To conclude their unhappiness, another Southern wind violently thrust them into the port, where they met with ship wrack. They must avoid this counter-buff, if they would not be buried in the waves. They cast anchor to stay the ship, and leaped into cock-boats, to recover shore with the more safety. Sosa first of all saved himself, his wife and children, carried with him his gold, silver and jewels, so much as so imminent danger would permit. boats after a return or two, were ſcattered, the cable unto which the Anchor of their Ship was faſtned, brake, the ſides leaked, the keel opened, every man ſought to ſave himſelf; many were drowned, other ſtrugled with the Ocean, golden coffers, painted cabinets, and the goodly riches of the Indies ſwom with men half-dead, toſſed by the waves amongſt fardels and packs, and loſing life, loſt not (as yet) the ſight of that which made them live. Some became black with the buffets they received, others bedewed the Sea with their blood, yet all deſired to reach the haven; ſo much, deſire of life poſſeſſeth us. Scarcely got they thither, but they ſaw their Veſſel ſink down to the bottom, leaving them not any hope of return. The dead bodies of their companions, with the doleful baggage utterly ſpoiled with Sea-water, were caſt up at their feet. On what ſide ſoever they reflect, nothing is ſeen but calamity. Here the dead which begged burial, there the living all drenched in water, laden with wounds, overwhelmed with toil, worn with hunger, to arrive in a ſavage Country, where having nothing almoſt to hope, they have all to fear.

All that poor Soſa could do, was to kindle fire, and draw out ſome tainted victuals, wherewith to take reſection; his heart was ſeized with apprehenſion of this diſaſter, in which he ſaw all he eſteemed moſt precious, involved; notwithſtanding clearing his brow he comforted this afflicted company, and ſaid:

It was not time to think upon their loſſes, but to give God thanks he had ſaved their lives. That they were not ſo ignorant of the ſea, as not to know full well, when one makes account to embark thereon, he muſt expect hunger, thirſt, loſſes, ſhip-wracks, and all the miſeries of mankind. And therefore when they happen, they muſt be regarded as things already foreſeen, and profit made of evils for expiation of ſins. As for the reſt, being ſo deſtitute of all things in a ſtrange Country, there was no better riches than mutual correſpondence, which would preſerve the whol body adhering together, as diſcord infallibly ruineth divided members. He added (fetching a deep ſigh) They might behold their poor Lady with their tender infants, in the extremity of peril, and that although both Sex and Age required they ſhould be ſomewhat aſſiſted, he would neither ſpare himſelf nor his, for the common ſafety.

All anſwered with tears in their eys, he might confidently lead them where he pleaſed, and that they had no further hopes of their lives, but in the obedience they reſolved to yield to his commands. Having then remained 13 days in this miſerable Port, barricadoed with huge ſtones & coffers, left as remainders of their ſhip-wrack, to defend them by night from thieves and wilde beaſts, they put themſelves in the way to bend towards the Eaſt, directly to a great river which the Portingals had heretofore named the Holy Ghoſt. Soſa went foremoſt with his wife, who ſhewed a maſculine courage in a tender conſtitution: ſhe had her little children by her ſides, whom turn by turn every one carried. Andrew de Vaſe the Pilot, was in the ſame rank, bearing the ſtandard of the Croſs, attended alſo by about fourſcore Portingals, and an hundred ſervants who bear Arms. Then followed Marriners, poor creatures, and other inferiour people, who were not yet cured.

The good ſervants moved with compaſſion of Eleonora, whom they beheld walking on foot, framed her a kind of Litter, & ſopght all they might to comfort her; but that laſted not long. Needs in the end muſt the poor Lady travel through places, where nothing was to be ſeen but wild beaſts, and Cafres more inhumane then beaſts, over rocks inacceſſible, mountains which raiſed their heads above the clouds, vallys not to be looked down into without horrour, torrents ſwoln with ſhowers, mariſhes cloyed with mud, and which was moſt irkſom, they muſt go at random through ways of which every one was ignorant, nor could any direct them, ſo that they made an hundred leagues of thirty. Their little ſtore of victual failing, they eat firſt pieces of rotten whales, & other garbages of the Sea, then wild fruits, leaves, and laſtly, ſpared not the carkaſes of beaſts, which they found in the deſart. From that they fell into a great ſcarcity of water, and if they would have any ſomething tolerable, they muſt ſeek it among Moors and Tigers, and buy it at eight crowns the pinte. There were many, who overwhelmed with theſe hideous diſaſters, left the ſpoil of their bodies to cruel Æthiopians, to birds and beaſts, bidding a ſad adieu to their companions, with the laſt words they deſired to be delivered to their friends & kindred. But the fears and preſent calamities of every one, made them to forget the dead with their requeſts. The unfortunate Soſa oppreſſed with ſorrow, conſidering ſo many miſhaps redoubled one upon another, and beholding his wife, who to comfort him, ſhewed her ſelf indefatigable both in mind & body, ſhe carrying her children in her turn, and incouraging all the reſt, it moſt ſenſibly wounded his heart to ſee a Lady ſo tenderly bred, endure with ſuch conſtancy the utmoſt of worldly miſeries.

At laſt, after four months travel, they came to the river of the H. G. ere they were aware, where a petty King commanded, who very courteouſly received them, partly moved with the ſight of ſo great a calamity, & partly alſo deſiring by this opportunity to make uſe of the Portingal's favour, wherof he ſtood in need for his affairs. He let them underſtand, as wel as he could, his deſire of their ſtay with him in expectation of the commodity of re-imbarquing. Otherwiſe, ſhould they hazard themſelves to proceed forward on their way in this miſerable equipage, they would be in danger to be robbed by a neigbour-Prince, one of the greateſt thieves in the Country.

The more this Barbarian King ſhewed himſelf courteous, ſo much the more Soſa grew ſuſpicious of his proceedings, and ſiniſterly judged, that ſuch ſweetneſs in man unknown, was but the cover of an evil purpoſe. He thanked him for his favour, and very earneſtly beſought him to accommodate them with Boats to paſs the River, which the other unwillingly did, ſeeing the peril whereinto they haſtned to fall. They went, there remaining not above ſixſcore of five or ſix hundred men, and having been five days on the River, they landed at adventure, rather conſtrained by night, then invited by the commodiouſneſs of place. The next day they deſcried a Squadron of about two hundred Æthiopians, who came towards them, which made them prepare for defence; but troubled at their Arms, they ſhewing themſelves peaceful enough, the other by geſture and ſigns diſcovered their infinite miſeries. Theſe people wholly practiſed in tricks of deceit, and who would make benefit of this occaſion, let them with much ado underſtand, they might paſs along to the King's Palace, where they ſhould be very well entertained, which they attempted; but approaching to the City in arms, the King of theſe Barbarians timerous and wicked, forbade them entrance, and confined them to a little wood, where they remained certain days, paſſing the time in a poor traffick of knives and trifles, which they bartered for bread. But this treacherous Prince, who meant to catch them in the ſnare, ſeeing they had ſome commodities, ſent word to Soſa, he muſt excuſe him that he denied entrance into the City, and that two cauſes had put him from it: The firſt whereof was the dearth of victual among his people, & the other, the fear his ſubjects had of the Portingal's arms, they never, as yet, being accuſtomed thereto. But if they would deliver their their weapons, they should be received into his city, and his people consign'd to the next towns, to be wel entertained. This condition seemed somewhat harsh, but necessity digested all. They agreed with one consent to satisfie the King, Eleonora only excepted, who never would consent to betray their defences in a place where they had so much need of them. Behold them disarmed and seperated, some dispersed into several villages here and there: Sosa with his wife, his children, and about twenty other brought to the regal City. Scarcely was he arrived, but all his company were robbed, beaten with bastonado's, & used that very night like dogs; whilest himself had little better entertainment: For this Prince of savages took all his gold and jewels from him, and drave him away as a Pyrate, leaving him only life and his poor garments. As they went out of this calamity, deploring their misery; behold another troup of Cafres, armed with javelins, who set upon them, and let them know, they must leave their apparel if they meant not to forsake their skins. They were so confounded, they neither had strength nor courage to defend themselves: behold the cause why they yielded what was demanded, as sheep their fleece. There was none but Eleonora, who preferring death before nakedness, stood a long time disputing about a poor smock with these savages: but in the end, violence bereaved her of that, which modesty sought by all means to keep.

The chast and honourable Lady, seeing her self naked in the sight of her domesticks, who cast down their eyes at the indignity of such a spectacle, presently buried her self in sand up to the middle, covering the rest of her body with her dishevel'd hair, and every moment having these words in her mouth, Where is my husband? Then turning towards the Pilot, and some of her Officers there present, she said to them with a setled countenance: My good friends, you have hitherto afforded to my husband your Captain, and to me your Mistress, all the duty may be expected from your fidelity: It is time you leave this body, which hath already paid to the earth the moiety of its tribute. Go think upon saving your lives, and pray for my poor soul; But if any one of you return to our native Country, be may recount to those who shall please to remember the unfortunate Eleonora, to what my sins have reduced me. Having spoken these words, she stood immoveable in a deep silence some space of time, then lifting her eyes to Heaven, added: My God, behold the state wherein I came from my mothers womb, and the condition whereunto I must quickly return on earth, one part of me being already as among the dead. My God, I kiss and adore the rods of thy justice, which so roughly, though justly, have chastised me. Take between thy arms the soul of my most honoured husband, if he be dead. Take the souls of my poor children, which are by my sides. Take mine, now on my lips, and which I yield to thee, as to my Lord and Father. There is no place far distant from thee, nor any succour impossible to thy power.

As she spake this, Sosa her husband came having escap'd out of the hands of these thieves who had robbed him, and finding his wife in this state, he stood by her, not able to utter a word. The Lady likewise spake only with her eys, which she sweetly fix'd upon him, to give comfort in the violence of the insupportable afflictions. But he feeling his heart wholly drenched in bitterness, hastned into a wood of purpose to meet with some prey, at least to feed his little children, which were as yet by their mothers side. Thence he ere long returned, and found one of them already dead, to which with his own hands he gave burial, immediately after he went again into the forest, to hunt as he had accustomed, finding no other comfort. His heart was perpetually in Eleonora's, where he survived more then in his own body, and coming to behold her once again for his last, he perceived she was already deceased, with his other child, who died near her; there being only left two poor maids, who bewailed their Lady, and made the wilderness resound with their sad complaints. He commanded them to retire a little aside, then taking Eleonora by the hand, he kissed it, standing a long time with his lips fixed unto it, and nothing to be heard but some broken sighs. That done, with the help of the maids, he buried her near his two children, without any complaint or utterance of one word. In a short space after, he returned into the thickest of the forrest, where it was thought he was devoured. So joyning his soul at least to hers, who had tied her heart to his in death, with examples of her constancy.

The third Part of MAXIMS. OF THE HOLY COURT.

THE DESIGN.

Having in this Second Part deduced the principal Maxims which concern the direction of this present Life, we enter into the other, there to behold the power of death over mortal things, and the immortality of our souls in the general dissolution of bodies. We consider them in the several ways they take in their passage, and then set them re-united to their bodies, at in the Resurrection. It is under thy eyes, Eternal Wisdome, and by thy favour we enter into these great labyrinths of thy Eternities, therein hoping thy direction, as we intend thy glory.

The THIRD PART, Touching the State of the other World.

XV. MAXIM. Of DEATH

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That it is to no purpose to think upon death so far off, and that it alwayes cometh soon enough without thinking on it.

1. IT is a strange thing that men, being all made out of one and the same mass, are so different in beliefs, in reasons, in customs, and actions, as the Protens in Poetical Fables. Our manners daily teach us a truth, which says: There is not any thing so mutable upon earth, as the heart of man. Diversity of men.

THE HOLY COURT.

That the best employment of life is to be well prepared for death, and that good thoughts of death, are the seeds of immortality.

Yet we see in the world many honourable personages, and good men who travel apace to this triumphant phant City of God, this Heavenly Jerusalem, looking on the blessings of the other life with an eye purified by the rays of faith, and expecting them with a hope, for which all Heaven is in bloom. But there are an infinite number of black souls marked with the stamp of Cain, who consider all is said of the state of the other world, as if it were some imaginary Island, feigned to be in the Ocean to amuze credulous spirits, and fill them partly with pleasing dreams, partly with irksom visions.

Opinion concerning the other life.

If these people could find some apparent proofs, they would eahly perswade themselves there were no death; but their senses convinced of the contrary from experience of all Ages, they believe that which they dare not think on, and commonly dye after so bruitish a fashion, that a man may say, they had converted the lights of an immortall spirit wholly into flesh.

But you, generous souls, whom at this present I intend to guid through the hopes and terrours of the other life, observe this first step you must make, to enter into a new world with constancy, not unworthy a soul sensible of its immortality.

Life and death, the two poles of the world.

2. Life and death are two poles, on the which all creatures rowl: life, is the first act moveable and continual, of the living thing; death, the cessation of the same act. And as there are three notable actions in things animated, the one whereof tendeth to nourishment and increase, the other to sense, the third to understanding; so there are three sorts of lives, the vegetative, the sensitive, and the intellectual: the vegetative in plants, sensitive in beasts, the intellectual which only appertaineth to God, Angels, & men. The intellectual life is divided into two other, which are the life of grace and glory. In Heaven (the place of things eternal) reign those great and divine lives which never die, and which are in a perpetual vigour, being applied to the first source of lives, which is God. But in the more inferiour rank of the world are dying lives, of which we dayly see the begining, progress, and end. Here properly is the dominion of death, and our only mystery is to dye well. Some do it of necessity, others every day anticipate it by virtue. Now it is my desire here to shew you; That death in the state wherin the world is at this present, is a singular invention of Divine Providence, whether we consider the generality of men, whether we look on the vicious, or fix our thoughts on the just.

Divers kinds of life.

Providence of God concerning the sentence of death, in the generality of men.

3. Some complain of death, but you would see much other complaints, if in such a life as we live, there were no death. You would see men worn with years and cares, daily to charge altars with vows and prayers, men insupportable to all the world, irksom to life, inexpugnable to death, men old as the earth, incessantly calling upon the hour of death, and almost eating one another with despair. God hath herein (saith Plato) well provided; for seeing the soul was to be shut up in the body as in a prison, he hath at least made it chains mortal.

Plato in Timæo. Pater misericors illis mortalia vincula fecisset.

What makes you so much desire life? I find (saith the worldling) it is a pleasure to behold the light, the stars, elements, and seasons. There wil be a much more delight to see them one day under your feet, then there is now to behold them over your head? Are there now so many years you have been upon the earth, and have you not yet sufficiently looked upon the elements? There were certain people among the Pagans, who by laws forbade a man of 50 years to make use of the Physitian, saying, It discovered too much love of life; and yet with Christians you may find at the age of fourscore, who will not endure a word of the other world, as if they had not yet one days leisure to look into it. But I must still perform the actions of life. Have you not done them enough? See you not that to live long, is to be long in the entertainment of travel and misery, which extend their power over our heads, according as the web of our life lengtheneth? Do you not consider we are in this life as fish in the sea, perpetually in fear of nets or hooks? Will you not say, we live here in the midst of misery and envy, as between Scylla and Charybdis, and that to decline once perishing, we dayly make ship-wrack? Notwithstanding we are pleased with life, as if man were not so much a mortal creature, as an immortal misery.

Ambr. l. 2. de Abel & Cain. Non advertitis senectutem hanc arumnarum esse veteranam, processionibusque ætatis miseriarum crescere stipendia, Scyllæo quodam usu circumsonari nos quotidianis naufragiis?

Revolution troublesome.

Do you not know life was given by God to Cain, the most wicked man on earth, for a punishment of his crime, and will it rest with you as a title of reward? There is a great cause to desire life. Were there no other miseries (which are but too frequent) this anxiety and turmoil of relapsing actions would tyre us. What is life but cloathing and uncloathing, rising and down-lying, drinking, eating, sleeping, gaming, scoffing, negotiating, buying, selling, masonry, carpentry, quarrelling, cozening, rowling in a labyrinth of actions, which perpetually turn and return, filling and emptying the tub of the Danaïdes, and to be continually tyed to a body, as to the tending of an infant, a fool, or a sick man? That is not it which withdraweth me, (say you) But I must see the world, and live with the living. Had you been all your life time shut up in a prison, and not seen the world but through a little grate, you had seen enough of it. What behold you in the streets but men, houses, horses, mules, coaches, and people, who tumble up and down like fishes in the sea, who have many times no other trade, but to devour one another, and besides, some pedling trifles hanged out in stals? When I have seen all this but for half an hour, I say: O God, how little is the world? Is it for this we deceive, we swear, and make a divorce between God and us!

Baseness in the world.

But admit we were not interessed in this action, must we not rest on the law of God, who maketh life and ordaineth death, by the juridical power of his wisdom, ever to be adored by our wills, though little penetrable to understanding? Will you I pronounce an excellent saying of Tertullian: The world is the belly of Nature, and men are in it as children in the mothers womb: the birth of men are the world's child-bearings, death its lying in, and deliveries. Would you not die, to hinder the world from bringing forth, and unburdening it self by the way the Sovereign Master hath appointed it? We have seen Tyrants of all sorts, some invented exquisite torments and tryals, others forbad eating and drinking, some to weep, some caused children to be taken from the teat, to strangle them and cut their throats, as Pharaoh & Herod. But never was there any amongst them, who forbad women with child to be delivered. The world hath for a long space been big with you, and would not you have it to be delivered at the time God's counsels have ordained? Were it a handsom thing think you to see an infant presently to have teeth and articulate speech, and yet (if it might be) would stay in the mothers womb, using no other reason but that there is warm being.

Uterus natura. An excellent conceit drawn from the words of Tertullian.

Judg now, and take the even ballance; if the world be the belly of nature, if this good mother bare us the time Gods providence appointed, if she now seek her delivery, that we may be born in the land of the living, in a quite other climate, another life, another light, are not we very simple to withstand it, as little infants who cry when they issue out of bloud and ordure, ordure, at the sight of day-light, yet would not return thither from whence they came.

Providence in the death of the vicious. Bur. l. 1. de consol. Cum supplicio carent, inest illis aliquid ultra mala, ipsa impunitas. S. Eucher. in parænesi.

4. Behold the Providence of God in that which concerneth death in the generality of all men. Let us see in this second point the like providence towards the wicked, the vicious, rich, and proud Great-ones, who spit against heaven. We must first establish a most undoubted maxim, that there is nothing so unhappy as impunity of men abandoned to vice, which is the cause the paternal providence of God arresteth them by the means of death, dictating unto them an excellent lesson of their equality with other men.

Mortals circumvolve in life and death, as Heaven on the pole artick and antartick, from east to west; the same day which lengthneth our life in the morning, shortneth it in the evening, and all Ages walk that way, not any one being permitted to return back again. Our fore-fathers passed on, we pass, and our posterity follows us in the like course, you may say, they are waves of the sea, where one wave drives another, and in the end, all come to break against a rock. What a rock is death? There are above five thousand years, that it never ceaseth to crush the heads of so many mortals, and yet we know it not.

I remember to this purpose a notable tradition of the Hebrews, related by Masius upon Josuah, to wit, that Noah in the universal deluge which opened the flood-gates of Heaven, to shake the columns of the world, and bury the earth in waters, in stead of gold, silver, and all sort of treasure, carried the bones of Adam into the Ark, and distributing them among his sons, said: Take children, behold the most precious inheritance your father can leave you: you shal share lands and seas, as God shal appoint; but suffer not your selves to be intangled in these vanities, which are more brittle then glass, more light then smoak, and much swifter then the winds. My children, all glideth away here below, and there is nothing which eternally subsisteth. Time it self which made us, devours and consumeth us. Learn this lesson from these dumb Doctours, the relicks of your grand-father, which will serve you for a refuge in your adversities, a bridle in your prosperities, and a mirrour at all times.

Masius in Josuah. Notable action of Noah.

Moreover, I affirm death serves for a perfect lesson of justice to the wicked, which they were never willing throughly to understand, for it putteth into equality all that, which hazard, passion, and iniquity had so ill divided into so many objects.

Birth maketh men equal, since they receive nought else from their mothers womb, but ignorance, sin, debility, and nakedness; but after they come out of the hands of the Midwife, some are put into purple and gold, others into rags and russets: some enter upon huge patrimonies, where they stand in mony up to the throat, and practise almost nothing else throughout their whole life, but to get by rapine with one hand, and profusely spend with the other. Some live basely and miserably necessitous. A brave spirit, able to govern a large Common-wealth, is set to cart by the condition of his poverty. Another becomes a servant to a coxcomb, who hath not the hundreth part of his capacity.

It is the great Comedy of the world, played in sundry fashions, for most secret reasons known to Divine Providence; would you have it last to eternity? See you not Comedians having played Kings and beggars on the stage, return to their own habit, unless they day and night desire to persist in the same sport? And what disproportion is there, if after every one have played his part in the world, according to the measure of time prescribed him by Providence, he resume his own habit?

I also add, it is a kind of happiness for the wicked to dy quickly, because it is unfit to act that long, which is very ill done. And since they so desperately use life, it is expedient, not being good, it be short, that shortness of time may render the malice of it less hurtful. If examples of their like who soon dy, make them apprehensive of the same way, and how seasonably to appear for death, it is a singular blessing for them. But if persisting in contempt, they be punished, it is God's goodness his justice be understood, and that it commandeth even in hell.

5. But if at this present you reflect on the death of the Just, which you should desire; I say, God's Providence there brightly appeareth in three principal things, which are, cessation from travels and worldly miseries, the sweet tranquility of departure, and fruition of crowns and rewards promised.

First, you must imagine what holy Job said, That this life is to the just as a myne, wherein poor slaves are made to labour, that they may hit upon the veins of gold and silver. And Tertullian had the like conceit, when he said, The first man was clothed with skins by the hand of God, to teach him be entred into the world as a slave into a myne. Now as these hirelings, who cease not to turn up the earth with sweat on their brows, tears in their eys, and sighs in their hearts, no sooner have they met with the hoped vein, but they rejoyce and embrace one another, for the contentment they take to see their travels crowned with some good event: So after such combates, such rough temptations, so many calumnies, so many litigious wranglings, such persecutions, such vexations and toils which chosen souls have undergone in the thraldom of this body, when the day come wherein they by a most happy death, meet the veins of the inexhaustible treasure, whereof they are to take possession, they conceive most inexplicable comfort. Then is the time they hear these words of hony: Go confidently faithful souls, go out of these bodies, go out with alacrity, go out in ful peace and safety: the Eternal Mountains, to wit, the Heavens, and all the goodly company of Angels, and most blessed spirits which inhabit them, will receive you with hymns of triumph: Go confidently on, behold God, who is ready to wipe away your tears with his own fingers. There shal be no more death, no more tears, no more clamours, no more sorrows, behold a state wholly new, what repose, what cessation of arms, what peace!

the sweetness of the death of the just. Job. 3. Qui expectant mortem, quasi effodientes thesaurum. Tert. de pallio. Homo pallium ortus, quasi metalla datur. Isaiah 35. In lætitia egredeminí, & in pace deducemini montes & colles canebunt coram vobis laudem. Apoc. 21. Absterget Deus omnem lachrymam ab oculis eorum, & mors ultra non erit, neque luctus, neque clamor, neque dolor erit ultra: quia prima abierunt, ecce nova facio omnia. Acta Clement. Psal. 35. Quoniam apud te fons vitæ, & in lumine tuo videbimus lumen.

Do you not sometimes represent unto your self these poor Christians (of whom it is spoken in the acts of S. Clement) men of good place banished for the faith, who laboured in the quarreys of Chersonesus, with a most extream want of water, and great inconveniencies, when God, willing to comfort their travels, caused on the top of a mountain a lamb marvelously white to appear, who struck with his foot, & instantly made fountains of lively water to distil? What comfort, what refreshment for the drowsie multitude! But what is it in comparison, whe a brave and faithful Christian, who hath passed this life in noble and glorious actions, great toyls and patience, beholds the lamb of God Omnipotent, which calleth him to the eternal sources of life? What a spectacle to see S. Lewis dy, after he had twice with a huge army passed so many seas, tempests, monsters, arms, and battels for the glory of his Master? What a spectacle to see S. Paul the Hermit dy, after he had laboured an hundred years under the habit of Religion.

The second condition of this death, is great tranquility, for there is nothing at that time in all the world able to afflict, or by acts unresigned to shake a soul soul firmly united to its God. But what say you: Juſt men if they be rich, do they not bear in thoſe laſt agony ſome affections to their riches and poſſeſſions?

Nay, ſo far is it otherwiſe, that they with alacrity go out of all worldly wealth as a little bird from a ſilver Cage, to ſoar in the fields at the firſt breath of the ſpring-tide. I pray tell me, that I may pronounce before you an excellent conceit of S. Clement the Roman, in the third of his Recognitions: If a little Chicken were ſhut up in an Egg, the ſhell whereof were gilded, and ſet out with curious and delicate paintings, and had reaſon, and choice given it, either to remain in this pretious priſon, or enjoy day-light with all other living creatures under Heavens vault; think you it would abide in a golden ſhell, to the prejudice of its liberty? And imagine with your ſelf, what are all the brave fortunes which have ſo much luſtre in the world? they are gilded ſhells, no way comparable to the liberty of God's children. A good rich man dieth as Abraham, who ſays in Origen: My God, if I have been wealthy, it was for the poor; I went out of my houſe, to become a houſe for thoſe who ſtood in need of it, and am perſwaded, that thou haſt made me a Steward of thy goods, to diſtribute them, and not to brood them, as the Hen her Eggs.

Clemens Rom. Recognit.

Dives fuit ſed pauperi; exterrâ patriâ, domus neſcius, ipſe omnium ſuæ domus & patriæ: ſciens non incubatorem, ſed diſpenſatorem divinæ largitatis.

But if the Juſt man dye poor, he is by ſo much the better pleaſed to forſake wretched lodgings of ſtraw and mortar, to go into an eternal Palace. But doth it not trouble him to leave a wife, children, and allies? He leaves all that under the royal mantle of the eternal Providence, and firmly believes, that he who hath care of the flowers of the field, Birds, Bees and Ants, will not forſake reaſonable creatures, ſo they reſt in their duty: But if they muſt ſuffer in this world, he will make of their tribulations, ladders and footſtools of their glory.

What ſhall we ſay of the body? Doth not the ſoul ill to leave it? The body is to the ſoul, as the ſhadow of the earth in the Eclipſe of the Moon. See you not how this bright ſtar, which illuminateth our nights, ſeemeth to be unwillingly captived in the dark, but ſparkleth to get aloft, and free it ſelf from earthly impreſſions. So the faithful ſoul readily untwineth it ſelf from the body, well knowing it hath a much better houſe in the inheritance of God, which is not a manufacture of men, but a monument of the hands of the great Work-man. Repreſent unto your ſelf Job on the dunghil, a great anatomy of bones covered with a bloody ſkin, a body which falleth in pieces, and a ſoul on the lips, ready to iſſue forth as a leſſee from a ruinous dwelling. Think you he is troubled to leave his body? Nay, rather he dieth as a Phœnix on the mountain of the Sun, in the odours of his heroick virtues.

2 Cor. 5. Scimus quoniam ſi terreſtris domus noſtra hujus habitationis diſſolvatur, quod ædificationem ex Deo habemus, domum non manufactam, ſed æternam in cœlis.

Job 29, 18. In nidulo meo moriar, & ſicut Phœnix multiplicabo dies.

But that which maketh this death more ſweet and honourable then any thing, is the hope of beatitude, wherof I will ſpeak in the nineteenth Maxim. Note, that worldlings dye here, ſome like unto Swallows, others as Spiders; the evil rich, paſs away as Swallows, who leave no memory of them, but a neaſt of mortar and ſtraw; for ſuch are all the fair riches of the earth. The ambitious periſh as Spiders, who preſent wretched threds, and ſome little flies in them; ſuch are alſo the ſnares, purſuits, and buſineſſes of the world. But the Juſt forſake us like the ſilk-worm. For this little creature had it underſtanding, would be well pleaſed iſſuing forth of her priſon, to become a Butter-fly, to ſee the goodly Halls of great men, Churches & Altars to ſmile under her works. What a contentment to the conſcience of a juſt man in death, to conſider the Churches adorned, Altars covered, poor fed, ſins reſiſted, virtues crowned, like ſo many pieces of tapiſtry, by the work of his hands! Hath he not cauſe to ſay: I entred into the liſt, I valiantly fought, I have well ended my race, there remains nothing more for me, but to wear the Crown of Juſtice, which God keeps for me as a pledge.

2 Tim. 4. Bonum certamen certavi, curſum conſummavi, in reliquo repoſita eſt mihi corona juſtitiæ

6. I yet come again to thee (worldly man) who ſo much feareſt this laſt hour. Learn from this diſcourſe to fortifie thy ſelf againſt theſe vain apprehenſions of death, which have more diſturbance for thee, then the Sea ſurges. Is it not a goodly thing to ſee thee tremble at thy entrance into ſo beaten a path, wherein ſo many millions have paſſed along before thee, and the moſt timorous of the earth have finiſhed their courſe as well as the reſt, without any contradiction? All that which ſeemeth moſt uneaſie in this paſſage, is much ſweetned by two conſiderations; the firſt whereof is, That God made it ſo common, that there is no living creature exempt; and the other, That to diſpoſe us to a great death, we every night finde in our ſleep a little death.

Exhortation to ſuch nice people as fear death.

Wilt thou then ſtill doubt to ſet thy foot-ſteps firmly in the paths which the world's Saviour, with his holy Mother, imprinted with their tracks? After thou haſt ſlept ſo many years, and ſo long paſſed through the petty miſeries of death, ſhalt thou never come to the great? Sickneſs and miſeries of the world will one day perhaps make thee deſire that, which thou now moſt feareſt. Were it not better to do by election, what muſt be ſuffered by neceſſity? Haſt thou ſo little profited in the world, that thou haſt not yet ſome friend, ſome only dear beloved, who paſſed into the other life? Needs muſt thou have very little affection in ſtore for him, if thou feareſt the day, which ſhould draw thee near to his company.

What is it maketh all theſe apprehenſions ariſe in thy mind? Is it ſo ill with thee to forſake a world ſo treacherous, ſo miſerable, ſo corrupt? If thou haſt been therin perpetually happy, which is very rare, courageouſly ſet a ſeal upon thy felicity, and be not weary of thy good hap, which may eaſily be changed into a great misfortune. Many have lived too long by one year, others by one day, which made them ſee what they feared more then death. But if thou be afflicted & perſecuted in this life, why art thou not aſhamed when God calleth thee, to go out faintly, frõ a place where thou canſt not ſtay without calamity? Deploreſt thou thy gold, ſilver, coſtly attire, houſes and riches? Thou goeſt into a Country where thou no longer ſhalt need any of that. They were remedies given thee for the neceſſities of life, now that thy wounds ſhall be cured, wouldſt thou ſtill wear the plaiſters? Bewaileſt thou loſs of friends? There are ſome who expect thee above, which are better then the worldly, more wiſe, more aſſured, and who will never afford thee ought but comfort.

Thou perhaps laments the habit of body, & pangs of this paſſage. It is not death then which makes thee wax pale, but life thou ſo dearly loveſt. It hath been told thee in the laſt agonies of death, the body feeleth great diſturbances, that it turns here and there, that one rubs the bed-cloaths with his hands, hath convulſions, ſhuts faſt the teeth, choaketh words, hath a trembling lower lip, pale viſage, ſharp noſe, troubled memory, ſpeech fumbling, cold ſweat, the white of the eye ſunck, and the aſpect totally changed.

What need we fear all that which perhaps will never happen to us? How many are there who dye very ſweetly, and almoſt not thinking of it? You would ſay, they are not there, when it happens. Cæſar the Prætour died putting on his ſhoes; Lucius Lepidus ſtriking with his foot againſt a gate, the Rhodian Ambaſſador having made an Oration before the Senate

He will give you a winter according to your wool (as it is ſaid) ſufferings according to the ſtrength of your body, & a crown for your patience.

You fear nothing (ſay you) of all that I mention, but you dread Judgment: Who can better order that then your ſelf? Had you been the moſt deſperate ſinner in the world, if you take a ſtrong reſolution to make hereafter an exact and effectual converſion, the arms of God are open to receive you. He wil provide for your paſſage, doubt it not, as he took care for your birth. He wil accompany you with his Angels, he will hold you under the veil of his face, under the ſhadow of his protection, and if he muſt purge you by juſtice, he will crown you by his mercy.

The fifteenth EXAMPLE upon the fifteenth MAXIM.

The manner of dying well, drawn from the Model of our LADIE.

ONe of the moſt important myſteries in the world, is to die well. It is never done but once, and if one fail to perform it well, he is loſt without recovery. It is the laſt lineament of the table of our life, the laſt blaze of the torch extinguiſhed, the laſt luſtre of the ſetting Sun, the end of the race which gives a period to the courſe, the great ſeal which ſigneth all our actions. One may in death correct all the defects of an ill life, and all the virtues of a good are defaced and polluted by an evil death. The art of dying wel being of ſo great conſequence, it ſeems God permitted the death of his Mother, to teach us what ours ought to be. The death of the Virgin Mary, is the death of a Phenix, which hath three conditions, reſolution, diſengagement, and union.

1. Quality of good death, is the indifferency of time and manner.

I begin with reſolution of conformity to the will of God, which is the firſt quality ſhould be had to die well. That is to hold life in your hands as a loan borrowed from Heaven, ever ready to reſtore it at the leaſt ſummons you ſhall have from the will of God. It is not perfection not to care for life through impatience, nor to have an ear not deaf to death, through faintneſs of courage. This reſignation was moſt excellent, and very admirable in our Lady, for two reaſons. Firſt, the great knowledge ſhe had of beatitude. Secondly, the ineffable love ſhe bare to her Son. For I leave you to think, if our deſires follow the firſt rays of our knowledges, and if we be ſo much the more earneſt after a good, as we are the better informed of its merit, what impatience muſt our Lady needs have of life, ſince ſhe received a ſcience of beatitude, ſtrong, powerful, and reſplendent above all other creatures, God giving her leave to ſee in Calvarie the abyſs of his glories, in the depth of his dolours.

Patience of our Lady to endure life.

It is no wonder we ſo very eaſily affect life, ſeeing we are as the little children of a King, bred in the houſe of a ſhepherd, as the gloſs upon Daniel retorteth touching the education of Nebuchadnezzar. We know not what a ſcepter, Kingdom, or crown is, in this great meanneſs of a life, baſe and terreſtrial. But had we talked onely one quarter of an hour with a bleſſed ſoul, and diſcourſed of the ſtate of the other life, our hearts would wholly diſſolve into deſires. Which makes me ſay, It was an act of a moſt heroical reſolution in the bleſſed Virgin, in thoſe great knowledges ſhe had of Paradiſe, to have continued ſo many years in this life, and if you conſider the moſt ardent love ſhe bare her Son, who was the adamant of all loves, you ſhall find the holy Virgin, who had borne all the glory of Paradiſe in her womb, more merited in this reſignation ſhe made, to ſee her ſelf ſeparated the ſpace of thirty years, both from Paradiſe & her ſon, then all the Martyrs did in reſigning themſelves to deaths ſtrange, bloody, and hideous.

Martyrdom of love.

There is nothing comparable to the martyrdom of love. It is an exhalation in a cloud. It is a fire in a myne, a torrent ſhut up in ditches, a night of ſeparation, laſteth Ages, and all waxeth old for it, but its deſires. Now this holy Mother to be thirty years upon the croſs of love without repining, without complaint or diſturbance, peaceably expecting the ſtroke of her hour, what virtue, and how far are we from it.

Worldly irreſolutions of death. Eccl. Carm. 1. Ebeu cur dura miſeros aveterit ars, Et flentes oculos claudere fata negat?

So now adays throughout the world you ſee nothing but mourners, who are loth to live, or faint-hearted that would never die. Some crie out: Come to me, (O ſluggiſh death) thou haſt forgotten me, what do I here? I am but a living death, & an unprofitable burden to the earth? Ah (death) haſt thou tears of braſs and diamond for me alone? Canſt thou not ſhut up mine eyes, which I daily drown in my tears? Much otherwiſe, when we ſee one die young, freſh, flouriſhing, in honour, wealth, health, proſperity, we crie out upon death as if it were cruel and malicious. To take (ſaith one) this young betrothed, this poor maid, this husband intended, this excellent man, who ſo well played the Rhodomont: to lay hold of one ſo neceſſary for the publick, in the flower of his age! Why took it not away this cripple, this beggar, who hath not wherewith to live? Why took it not away this other, who daily dies, yet cannot die once? O our manners! O dainty conceits! O fit language! were it not ſome little humane reſpect, we would take Gods Providence by the throat.

Whom do we contend withal? The indifferency we daily ſee in the death of men, where as ſoon the young is taken as the old, the happy as the miſerable, the Emperor as the porter, is one of the greateſt ſigns of Gods Providence to be admired. Why then complain we that God maketh us to leave life when he pleaſeth? It is not a puniſhment, but a wholſom doctrine, by which we learn the power of the Divine Wiſdom. Firſt, when we entred into life, our advice was not required whether we would be born in ſuch or ſuch an Age, ſuch a day, ſuch a year, ſuch an hour; ſo when we muſt be gone from hence, there is no reaſon to ask our counſel. Let us onely yield up this laſt loan, and not murmur againſt the father of the family. Let us not ſay, this man ſhould go before, and this after. Who knows them better then God? You complain this miſerable creature lives ſo long, how know you whether he accompliſh the years of his purgatory? How know you whether God ſuffers him to become a ſpectacle unto you of his patience? Why gnaſh you your teeth for anger, that this man rich, that man fortunate, and that other ſo qualified, is taken hence in his flouriſhing youth? How know you the miſadventures and ſhipwracks which attended him, had he ſtill continued in the world? You ſay, he was neceſſary? why, God will ſhew there is not any thing neceſſary in the world but himſelf.

Uno avulſo non deficit alter aureus.

Poor eyes of a bat, which ſee nothing but darkneſs, you would give eyes to Argus, and light to the Sun. If you deſire to take part in the prudence of the juſt, handle the matter ſo, that for the firſt ſign of a good death, you be ever indifferent to live or die, according to our Ladies example. Daily expect death, ſtād perpetually on your guard. Do as the brave bird the Grecians call Onocratalus, which is ſo well practiſed to expect the Hawk to grapple with her, that even when ſhe ſhuts up her eyes, ſhe ſleepeth with her beak exalted, as if ſhe would contend with her adverſary. Know we are continually among rocks and dangers, that there needs but one hour to get all, or looſe all, that the day of Judgement comes with the pace of a thief, and that we muſt be ready to receive it, and reſolute to combat with death, to gain immortality. Hold this concluding ſentence of Tertullian, as an Oracle: Amongſt the rocks and ſhelves of this ſea, called life, Chriſtian faith paſſeth on, breaking the waves, filling the ſails with Gods ſpirit ever aſſured, yet ever diſtruſtful, and perpetually fearleſs, yet ſtill careful of the future. As for the reſt it ſees under its feet an abyſs not to be paſſed by ſwimming, & inexplicable ſhipwrack for thoſe who are drenched, a gulph which ſuffocates all ſuch, as it once ſwalloweth.

Constancy of faith. Tertul. l. dol. c. 2. Hoc inter ſcopulos velificata ſpiritus Dei fidit, navigat tuta ſi cauta, ſecura ſi attonita. Caterum inclinabile excuſſis profundum, inexplicabile impactis naufragium, irreſpirabile devoratis hypocriſibium.

Second quality of good death. Philo l. 3. de vita Moſis in fine.

Thé ſecond quality of a good death, is the ready and conſtant adieu given to the world, as did the Bleſſed Virgin, who was ſo diſengaged from it towards death, that ſhe touched not earth at all, but with the ſoles of her feet.

Notable ſpeech of Philo of Moſes his ſtate Τέλος γὰρ ἦν ἁλῶναι Νόμῳ τὸν.

Philo ſaith, God gave Moſes leave to live very long, perpetually in glorious actions, in contemplations, in lights, ſo that his body was worn, waſted, & almoſt wholly vapouredout into the ſubſtance of his ſpirit. By a much ſtronger reaſon may one ſay the like of the Mother of God. For it is certain her life was nothing elſe but a divorce from the world. But as Phyſitians obſerve, that the breath of ſtorks is purified and made ſweet in the proportion as they increaſe in age, in ſuch ſort, that becoming old, they yield forth moſt odoriferous exhalations: So the life of this holy Mother, which was ever hanging about the heart of her Son, ever in the contemplation of the great myſteries of our ſalvation, perpetually in the furnace of love, wholly transformed it ſelf into her well-beloved, as one wax melted into another, as a drop of water poured into a great veſſel of wine as incenſe waſted into flames. O what ſweetneſs of breath! what odour of virtues in her old age! Her body ſeemed to be exhaled, and to vapour out all in ſoul; the ſoul, which is the knot of life, and which poſſeſſeth in us the moſt inferiour part of ſpirituality, diſſolved wholly into ſpirit, which is in the middle, & the ſpirit melted entirely into the underſtanding, which hath the higheſt rank in the ſoul, and which bears the image of the moſt holy Trinity. Her memory in a ſilent repoſe was freed from all remembrances of the world, her will reſided in languiſhing ſervours, and her underſtanding was wholly engulphed in great abyſſes of lights; there was not one ſmall thred of imagination, which tied her to earth.

Harph. c. 49. libri de myſt. c. Theol.

Cant. 3. 6. Quæ eſt iſta quæ aſcendit per deſertum ſicut virgula fumi, ex aromatibus myrrha & thuris & univerſi pulveris pigmentarii.

O what an adieu to the world! It is very well declared in the Canticles by theſe words: Who is it that aſcendeth through the deſart, like a thin vapour compoſed of odours, myrrhe, incenſe, and all the moſt curious perfumes.

Which ſaith in a word, the holy Virgin was wholly ſpiritualized, wholly vapour, all perfume, all ſpirit, and had (as it were) nothing of body, maſſineſs, or earth.

The three ties of the world, Geneſ. 12. Egredere de terra tua, de cognatione tua, & de domo patris tui.

O how many unreaſonably fail in this ſecond condition! When death comes to ſound his trumpet in our ears, and ſaith to us: Let us go, thou muſt diſlodg from thy lands and inheritances, never to return again, from thy kindred, from the houſe thy father gave thee, to wit, thy body; how harſh that is to ill mortified ſpirit, and which hold of the world by roots as deep as hell, and as big as arms. Go out of thy land. O how hard is this firſt ſtep, to go out of the land, to forſake the land, not at all to pretend to the land, to the gold to the ſilver, to thoſe jewels, that inheritance, to all that glorious glitter of fortune? See the firſt torment of worldly ſpirits. Such there have been, who ſeeing themſelves in the laſt approches of inevitable death, have ſwallowed their gold like pills; other to eternize thēſelves on earth, have cauſed formidable ſepulchers to be built, wherein they put all their wealth, as the Ægyptian King Cheopes, who proſtituted even his own daughter, to raiſe unto himſelf a Pyramid for burial, ſo enormous, that it ſeemed the earth was too weak to bear it, and Heaven too low to be freed from its importunity. Beſides, he cauſed to be engraven upon it, that the manufactures alone of this ſepulcher, had coſt ſix millions of gold in coleworts and turneps. Others cauſed to be buried with them dogs, horſes, ſlaves, apparel, diſhes to ſerve them in the other world.

Deſperate deſire of worldly goods. Joannes Nider.

Yea, it is not long ago, ſince there was found in Rome a coffin of marble eight foot long, and in it a robe embroidered with Gold-ſmiths work, which yielded ſix and thirty pounds of gold, beſides fourty rings, a cluſter of emeralds, a little mouſe made of another precious ſtone, and amongſt all theſe precious magnificencies, two leg-bones of a dead corps, known by the inſcription of the tomb, to be the bones of the Empereſs Mary, daughter of Stilicon, and wife of the Emperour Honorius, who died before conſummation of marriage. About twelve hundred years were paſſed, after ſhe was buried with all theſe goodly toys, which (no doubt) gave much eaſe to her ſoul. My God, how are we tied to earth! Tell me not the like is not done now adays, for it is worſe, ſince they were buried after death with their riches, and you (O mortals) alive as you are, build your ſepulchers thereon. We ſee men, who having already one foot in the grave, if you ſpeak to them of the affairs of their conſciences, all the ſpirit yet remaining, is perhaps for two or three hours beſieged by an infinite number of thoughts of worldly wealth. Death crieth out aloud in their ears, ſaying: Go from thy land, and you pull it to you as with iron hooks.

Anno 1544 Belforeſt. Goodly monument of the Empereſs Mary.

After that cometh kindred, allies, table-friends, friends for game, buffons, amoriſts, and all the delights of former companies. Some weep, others make ſhew of tears, the reſt under a veil of ſorrow make bones-fires in their hearts, they ſeem all to appear about the bed, and to ſing this ſad ſong of S. Auguſtine: Alas, do you leave us, and ſhall we hereafter meet no more together? Farewel pleaſing amities. Adieu feaſts, adieu ſports, adieu loves. This nor that will any longer be permitted from this moment for ever. Behold another very ſlippery and dangerous ſtep, notwithſtanding you muſt leave it: Death haſtneth and ſayes: Go from thy kindred.

Aug. Conf. 6. 11. Dimitis ne nos a momento illo non erimus ſecum ultra in æternum? Et a momento iſto non licebit hoc & illud ultra in æternum?

In the laſt, the body and fleſh is preſented, which ſeems to ſay: Ah my ſoul, whither goeſt thou? My dear hoſteſs, whither goeſt thou? Thou haſt hitherto ſo tenderly pampered me, ſo pompouſly clothed me, ſo wantonly cheriſhed me. I was thy Idol, thy Paradiſe, thy little Goddeſs, and where will you put me? into a grave with ſerpents and worms? what ſhall I do there, & what will become of me: Behold a hard task, principally for ſuch of both ſexes, as have dearly loved their bodies, like the Dutcheſs of Venice, of whom Cardinal Petrus Damianus ſpeaketh, who was plunged into ſenſuality with ſo much profuſion, that ſhe could not endure to lodge but in chambers full of delicious perfumes of the Eaſt, ſhe would would not wash her self, but in the dew of Heaven, which must be preserved for her with much skill. Her garments were so pompous, that nothing remained but to seek for new stuffs in Heaven, for she had exhausted the treasures of earth. Her viands so dainty, that all the mouths of Kings tasted none so exquisite, nor would she touch her meat, but with golden forks and precious stones. God, to punish this cursed superfluity, cast her on a bed, and assailed her with a malady so hideous, so stinking and frightfull, that all her nearest kin were enforced to abandon her, none staying about her, but a poor old woman already throughly accustomed to stench and death, yet could not this proud creature part with her infamous body but with sorrow. She was of those souls that Plato calleth Philosomates, which tie themselves to flesh as much as they can, and after death would gladly still walk round about their flesh, to find a passage into it again.

Modesty of a son of S. Lewis.

The way how to be well provided for death.

Know you what is to be done to die well? Cut off in good time, the three chains which straightly bind foolish and sensual souls. For the first passage that concerneth earthly goods, seasonably dispose of your temporal. Entangle not your hands for so short a time as you are to live in great affairs, perilous, and uncertain, which will perplex you all your life, and throw you down to death. Do not like evil travellers, who stay to reckon and contend with their hostess, when it is already fair day-light, and that the guid wrangles and sweareth at them. Digest your little business, that you may leave no trouble in your family after death. Make a Will clear and perspicuous, which draweth not suits after it. Preserve your self carefully from imitating that wicked man, who caused all his gold and silver to be melted into one mass to set his heirs together by the ears, who killed one another, sprinkling the apple of discord and the object of their avarice, with their blood. Say to your self, I brought nothing into the world, nor will carry any thing away, no not the desire of it. Behold one part of my goods, which must be restored to such and such; these are true debts that must necessarily be discharged. Behold another for pious legacies. Another for alms to persons needy and indigent, another for my servants male and female, & my poor friends who have faithfully served me. They have wasted their bodies & lives, to contribute all they might to my wil; there is no reason I should forget them. Nay, I desire my enemies have some part in my will. As for my children and heirs, the main shal go to them, they wil be rich enough, if they be virtuous enough. Behold how the temporal should be disposed.

And for so much as concerneth kindred, give the benediction of God to your children, and all your family; leave worthy examples of contempt of the world, of humility, of patience, of charity: procure a full reconciliation with your enemies, entertain your friends with sage discourses, which may shew you gladly accept Gods visitations, that you die full of resolutions to prepare them a place, and that you expect from their charity, prayers and satisfactions for your negligence and remisness. If needs some small tribute must be paid to nature in two or three drops of tears, it is tolerable. But take away these whyning countenances, these petty furies, these mercenary weepers, who weep, not knowing why, nor for what they mourn.

As for that which toucheth the state of your body, it would be a goodly thing for you to bewail it, after you have had so many troubles in it. Go out of it like a Tenant from a ruinous house, go from it as from a prison of earth and mortar: Go out of it as on the sea from a rotten leaky ship, to leap on the shore, and care not much what will become of it after death, so it be on holy land. Souls well mortified speak not of flesh, considering the state of sin, but with horrour. Yea, we find in the bequests of one of the sons of S. Lewis, Count of Alencon, these words: I will the Tomb that shall cover my stinking flesh, exceed not the charge of fifty livres, and that which encloseth my evil heart pass not thirty livres. Behold how the son of one of the greatest Kings in the world speaketh of his body, & would you idolatrize yours?

Lastly, for the third condition of a good death, it must have union with God, whereof our Lady giveth us a perfect example. For it being well verified by Theology, that there are three unions supernatural, and as it were wholly ineffable, the first whereof is the sacred knot of the most holy Trinity, which tieth three persons in one same Essence, the second, is the tie of the Word with humane nature, which subsisteth by the hypostasis of the same Word, and the third, the intimate conjunction of a Son-God with a Mother-Virgin; I affirm, the Virgin being a pure creature cannot equal either the union of the Trinity, or the hypostatical union, yet notwithstanding hath the highest place of all created unions; as she who was united to God when she lived in the world, in the most sublime and sacred manner, the spirits of the most exalted Seraphins might imagine, which was most divinely expressed by S. Bernard: She entred into a deep abyss of divine wisdom, so that she was united to light inaccessible, so much as a creature might be permitted, not arriving to the personal union of God.

The third quality of a good death.

Profundissimam divina sapientia penetravit abyssum, & quantum sine personali unione creatura conditio patitur, luci illi inaccessibili videatur immersa. D. Bernard. serm. In signum magnum Mater mea quam appellatis fœlicem, inde fœlix, quia verbum Dei custodit, non quia in illa Verbum caro factum est, &c. Aug. tract. 10. in Joan.

But saying this, I not onely speak of the union she had in quality of the Mother of God, being one same flesh, and one same substance with her Son, but of the union of contemplation, devotion, and submission to the will of God, which alone was the center of her felicity, as witnesseth S. Augustine: My Mother whom you call happy, hath all her happiness, not so much because the Word was made man in her, as for that she kept the word of God, who made her, and who afterward allied himself to humane nature in her womb; as he would say, Our Lady was more happy to have conceived God in her heart, and continually kept spiritual union with him, then to have once brought him forth according to flesh.

We cannot arrive at this sublime union of the Mother of God, but howsoever at least in the last period of thy life, having bid adieu to the world, and drawn the curtain between thee and creatures, endeavour to be united as perfectly as is possible, to thy Creatour. First by good and perfect confession of the principal actions of all thy life, Secondly by a most religious participation of thy viaticum in presence of thy friends, in a manner the most sober, well ordered, and edificative, thou maist. In the third place seasonably receiving extream unction, thy self answering if it be possible, to the prayers of the Church, and causing to be read in the approaches of this last combat some part of the passion. Lastly, by the acts of faith, hope, charity, and contrition.

I approve not the manner of some, who make studied remonstrances to dying men, as if they were in a pulpit, nor of those who blow incessantly in their ears unseasonable words, & make as much noise with the tongue, as heretofore Pagans with their kettles in the eclipse of the Moon. We must let those good souls depart without any disturbance in the shades of death. S. Augustine would die in great silence, desiring not to be troubled with lamentations nor visits, for ten days together, where having hanged some versicles of Pſalms about his bed be fixed his dying eyes upon them with a ſweetneſs moſt peaceful, and ſo gave up the ghoſt. It is good to ſay:

Credo Domine, adjuva incredulitatem meam. Marc. 9. Scio quod Redemptor meus vivit, &c. Job. 9. Si ambulavero in medio umbra mortis non timebo mala, quoniam tu mecum es. Pſal. 22. Quid mihi in cœlo, &c. Pſal. 72.

My God I believe, aſſiſt my incredulity. I know my Redeemer is living, and that I ſhall ſee him in the ſame fleſh which I at this preſent diſarray. Though I muſt walk into the ſhades of death, I will fear nothing, becauſe (Oh my God) thou art with me. What haue I to deſire in heaven, and what would I of thee on earth? My fleſh and my heart are entranced in thee, O thou God of my heart, and my portion for all eternity. Wherefore art thou ſo ſad (Oh my ſoul) and why doſt thou trouble me? Turn now to thy reſt, becauſe God hath afforded the mercie.

Quare triſtis es anima mea, &c. Pſal. 21.

Behold how the Virgin, our Lady died; behold how Saint Lewis died, behold how Saint Paula departed, of whom Saint Hierom (a) ſaid: The holy Lady rendring up her life, put her finger on her mouth, as deſirous to imprint the ſign of the Croſs upon it turning the gaſps of death, and laſt breath of the ſoul, into the praiſes of God, whom ſhe ſo faithfully had ſerved.

XVI. MAXIM

Of the Immortality of the SOUL.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

Little care is to be had of the Soul after death, ſo all be well with it in this life.

1 A Man who doubteth and queſtions the immortality of the Soul, ſheweth in the very beginning that he almoſt hath no ſoul and that retaining nought but the ſubſtance of it to ſuffer, he hath loſt the lights and goodneſs which might crown it. Never enter theſe thoughts into any man without making a tomb of fleſh for his reaſon, whileſt he ſo flattering his body, forgets all the excellencies of his ſoul.

We muſt here follow the counſel of ancient Sages; when a Libertine will impugn a verity known by the only light of nature, it is not needful to anſwer his abſurdities, but to lead him directly into the ſtal, and to ſhut him up with beaſts, ſpeaking unto him the ſentence which the Prophet Daniel pronounced againſt Nebuchadnezzar: Thou ſhalt hereafter be baniſhed from the company of men, and thy abode ſhall be with beaſts and ſavage creatures.

Sentence againſt the wicked. Ejicient te ab hominibus, & cum beſtiis feriſque erit habitatio tua.

All ſpeak, and all diſpute for the Maxim of the Holy Court, and although we ought to have full obligation to faith, which manifeſtly hath ſet this truth before us, thereunto affixing all the order of our life, and the principal felicity we hope for, yet are we not a little enlightned with ſo many excellent conceits which learning furniſheth us withal upon it, and which I will endeavour to abbreviate, comprehending much in few words.

2. I will then ſay for your comfort, that it hath happened that an Heretick loſt both of underſtandng and conſcience having oppoſed the belief of Purgatory (hereſy being a beaten path to infidelity) came to this point of folly, as throughly to perſwade himſelf that death ended all things, and that theſe endeavours of prayers and ceremonies which we afford to the memory of the deceaſed, were given to ſhadows. He did all a wicked man might to tear himſelf from himſelf, and bely that which God made him: but it was impoſsible for him as you ſhall ſee in conſidering the three chambers of juſtice wherein he was condemned. Firſt, he entred into the Court before the tribunal of Nature, & thought he ſaw a huge troup of all the learned men of the earth, and all Nations of the univerſe, who came to fall upon him as a mighty cloud, armed with fire and lightning.

The belief of the immortality of the ſoul invincible. Condemnation of impiety in the tribunal of nature.

My God (ſaid he) what is this? The great Tertullian ſaid, and it is true, that verities which fall into the general underſtandings of all men, as acknowledged, avowed, and confeſſed by all ſorts of nations, ought to be believed as by a decree of Nature. The example thereof is evident. For all men in the world believe, that the whole is greater then a part, that the ſuperiour number exceedeth the inferiour. That the father and mother ſhould be honoured, as the Authours of life: That one muſt not do to another what he would not be done unto himſelf. And becauſe every one underſtands & averreth this by the light of nature, he would be thought a beaſt or a mad man who ſhould contradict it. Now from whence proceedeth it, that the belief of the ſouls immortality, holds the ſame place with theſe general Maxims, although it be otherwiſe much tranſcendent above our ſenſe? If I regard the courſe of time and revolution of Ages, from the beginning of the world, one cannot aſsign any one wherein this faith hath not been publiſhed by words or actions, correſpondent to the life of the other world. And if ſome depraved ſpirits have doubted it, they were gain-ſaid by publick voice, by laws, ceremonies, cuſtoms, proteſtations of Common-wealths, of Empires and Kingdoms where they took beginning. If I look upon all the Nations of the earth ſo far diſtant in climates, ſo divided in commerce, ſo different in diſpoſitions, ſo contrary in opinions, they all agree in this ray of the light of nature, that there is a life of ſeparated ſouls, that there are puniſhments and rewards at the going out of the body.

That we have an immortal Soul, capable of happineſs or unhappineſs eternal.

It is obſerved to have been ſo publick with the ancient, that they carried the marks thereof on their garments, and inſcribed it on their tombs.

gates were engraven on them, to shew that after death all was not shut up from the soul, but that it had passages into eternity.

All the most eminent Philosophers, following the bright splendour of natural light, although distant by the course of Ages, parted into sects, divided into so many different Maxims, agreed in this, as Mercury Trismegistus, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Xenocrates, Seneca, Plutarch, Maximus Tyrienſis, Jamblicus, Themistius, Epictetus and Cicero, as may be seen in so many excellent Treatises, which I might mention at large were they well enough known. But if sometimes doubtful passages occurre in Aristotle and Seneca hereupon, were it not much better to judge them by so many perspicuous and illustrious sentences, which they have upon the life of the other world, then to censure them by some words insensibly escaped in discourse? In which, if some thing repugnant to our doctrine may be discovered, it is to be understood of the sensitive and vegetative soul, not the reasonable and intelligent, which these Authours ever set aside, as being celestial and divine.

Enu. l. 7. c. 10. Nec vult improbus animam immortalem esse, ne ad conspectum Judicis aqui torquendus veniat. Malunt enim extingui penitus, quam ad supplicia reservari.

3. Never (saith Plotinus) was there a man of good understanding amongst so many Writers, who strove not for the immortality of the soul. But if any one among them hath impugned it, even in the darkness of Gentilism, it hath been observed, there ever was some disorder and impurity in his life, which made him controvert his opinion, to divert the apprehension of punishments due to his crimes. That was it, which Minutius Felix said: I well know many pressed with a conscience guilty of crimes, rather desire to be nothing after their death, then to be perswaded of it, for they wish rather wholly to perish, then to be reserved for their punishment.

He should make an annotation, not a discourse, who would here alledg all the authorities of the ancients, which are very ordinary. I satisfie my self with a most excellent passage of wise Quintilian, who in the case of an inchanted sepulcher, comprized all the doctrine of Gentiles upon this Artiele, when he said:

Animam inde venire, unde rerum omnium authorem, parentem, Spiritum ducimus, nec interire, nec solvi, nec ullo mortalitatis affici fato? sed quotiès humani corporis carcerem effugerit, & exonerata membris mortalibus, levi se igne lustravent, petere sedem inter astra.

Our Soul came from the same place from whence proceeded the Eternal Spirit, Authour, and Father of all things, to wit, the true God, and that this soul could neither be corrupted, die, nay, nor feel the least touch of mortality common to corruptible things. But at the passage out of the prison of body, it was purged by fire, and after this purgation it ascended to Heaven, there to live happie. Which is to be understood of good souls: for polluted and impious, are deliuered to eternal torments, by the consent of the wisest Gentiles.

Behold a man, who in few words heaped together the belief of more then fourty Ages which preceded him, touching the immortality of the soul, Paradise, Purgatory, hell, and that within the limits of the light of nature. (a) Plato saith the same:

(a) Plato 1. de Legib. συμβαλλε πατρῶα. Ῥῆτος λευκή.

That our soul wears the liveries of the eternal Father which make it incorruptible.

Algazel in the book of nature:

That our soul being separated from the body, shall subsist with the first intelligence.

Maximus Tyrienſis:

That that which we call death, was the beginning of immortality.

Dionysius the Geographer forgat not in the worlds description, the white Island, whereinto it was held the souls of Heroes were carried.

Lawyers were not ignorant of it, for when there is any speech of legacies to be distributed on the birth-day of the Testatour, they avouch them to be legacies which must be given in perpetuity, every year on the birth-day, by reason, that by death we enter into another nativity, which is that of glory. To the very same, the law of sepulchers hath relation, which saith: We know, and our faith is not in vain, that souls discharged from bodies, have understanding, and that the spirit which is celestial, returneth to its original. Marcel. in l. cum quidam. l. 23. de annuis legatis. Theodosius, & valent. Novella de sepulchris tit. 5. Scimus nec vana fides est, solutas membris animas habere sensum, & in originem suam spiritum redire cœlestem. Tertul. de testim. animæ.

From whence comes this consent so great, so universal, so authentical, in a thing so sublime, so alienated from sense, so eminent, but from the spirit of God? Let us say with Tertullian in the book of the souls testimony: From whence proceeds it, that those who will neither see nor hear Christians, have the language of Christians? I much suspect the consent of words in so great a disagreement of conversation.

4. I am condemned in this first Court of justice, (said the Libertine.) But let us go along to the Tribunal of supernatural light, and see what the divine Wisdom will affirm: Let us follow the counsel of S. Ambrose: He who made heaven, teacheth us the mysteries of heaven, whom shal I believe touching the verities of God, but God himself? And verily, behold the advice God giveth us, to resolve us in doubtful cases, which is, to follow some great and powerfull authority, that may draw our spirits with a strong hand out of so many labyrinths. Without it (saith S. Augustine) there would neither be world, rest, light, wisdom, nor religion. And if a decisive authority must be chosen, where shal we find one more certain then that of a Man-God, whose words were prophesies, life sanctity, actions miracles, who by ways secret and incomprehensible, advanced the Cross on Capitols, and gave a new face to the whole world? Sentence of God upon the immortality of the soul. Ambros. in Symmachus. Cœli mysterium docet nos Deus ipse qui condidit. Cui magis de Deo, quam Deo credam? Vide August. ep. 4. ad Vincent. An veritas comperta sine Deo? cui Deus cognitus sine Christo? 3 Reg. 17. Revertatur anima pueri ejus in viscera ejus.

Now without speaking at this time of the Pentateuc, where the Word with his own mouth drew reasons for the immortality of the soul, against the Sadduces, I might alledge the book of Kings, where the soul of a little infant returneth into its body, at the words of Elias. I could produce the true soul of Samuel, which returneth from Limbo and speaks to King Saul, as the Wiseman rendereth this apparition undoubted, which I will shew. I might mention the book of Tobias, which distinguisheth two places for souls in the other world, one of darknes, & the other of lights. But let us hear Ecclesiastes, since Infidels will make an arrow of it against us, where, after the propositions of the wicked rehearsed in this book to be refuted (which must be well observed) the Wiseman decideth and concludes, That the body returneth into the earth from whence it came, and the spirit to God who gave it. Let us hear Wisdom where it is written: Ecclesiast. 26. 21. Exaltavit vocem ejus de terra in prophetia. Tob. 4. 11. Eccles. 12. 7.

That the soules of the Just are in the hands of God, and shall not be touched with the torment of death. Sap. 3. 1.

Let us hear the Prophet Daniel, who saith: Daniel. 12. 3.

The true Sages shall shine as the brightnes of the firmament, and that such as instruct many to justice, shall be as stars for ever.

Lastly, let us hear our Saviour, who speaketh to us clearly and intelligibly in the blood of all Martyrs:

Fear not those who kill the body, and cannot kill the soul. Mat. 10. 28.

Here will we hold this doctrine of the immortality from his own mouth, more then from any other reason: he caused us to make it an Article of faith, he establisheth upon it all our beatitude, why should we then argue and trie new conclusions, after the decision of Gods Word?

5. I knew well (said the wicked man) this second Court would condemn me, but I am not yet satisfied. After nature and faith, I appeal to reason, I will enter into the bottom of my self, to know some news of my self. What a madnes is it to appeal from the decrees of God, to reason? And yet was this wretch condemned likewise by this tribunal. For Proofs drawn out of reason.

asking his ſoul, whither wilt thou go? What will become of thee after the death of thy body? Wilt thou not accompany it in death as thou didſt during life? I dy (replyeth the ſoul) It is as impoſſible the light of the Sun become night, and fire ice, as the ſoul of man, which is the ſource of life and underſtanding, ſhould be ſubject to death.

S. Thom l. 2 contra Gentes c. 79. For from whence ſhould this death and corruption proceed? If thou haſt never ſo little reaſon, thou welſeeſt what the great S. Thomas, and all the Sages of the world ſaid: A thing cannot dy and be corrupted but by one of three ways, either by action of its contrary; ſo heat, cold, moyſture & drougth corrupt our bodies by mutual counterbuffs and continual combats: or by the want of ſubject which ſerves as a baſis or foundation to it; ſo the eye dyeth, when its organ is corrupted: or by defect of the aſsiſtance of the cauſe which hath influence into it; ſo the light faileth in the air when the Sun retireth. In which of theſe three kinds wouldſt thou corrupt me? Should it be by the action of the contrary. I am not ſubject to bodily impreſsions, but to thoſe only of the mind, which are rather to perfect then corrupt me. I am not compoſed of elements, I am not hot, cold, moiſt, nor dry, I admit no contrariety. But when I (a) comprehend in my underſtanding, white, black, water, fire, life and death, I accord all contraries. Death (ſaith (b) Lucretius) is only made for the things which have a collection of parts, and I am moſt ſimple.

Subſtantia intellectualis patitur tantum intelligibiliter. qui motus potius eſt perfectivus quam corruptivus. S. Thom. l. 2. contra Gentes c. 55. (a) Anima parvo continetur corpore, continetque res maximas Æneſius Platonicus (b) Lucr. l. 1. Mors cœtum diſſipat ollis. Ariſt. l. 2. de anima l. 2. text. 1.

Wilt thou ruin me by defect of the body? I am of a nature different from body. It was ſometime without me, & I ſhall be a long time without it, for I depend not on it, but by accident and chance. I take ſomewhat of it as an hoſteſs in this life, but I govern it as a miſtriſs for eternity. I make uſe of the organs of ſenſes, but I correct ſenſes, and when they tell me the Sun is but a foot broad, I prove to them by lively reaſons it is much greater then the globe of the earth if I borrow fantaſies from imagination, I make truths of them: and in matter of underſtanding, willing and judging, which is my proper profeſsion. I have properly nothing to do with bodies, as the Philoſopher Ariſtotle hath well obſerved, ſaying, I could not be before body, but I might remain after the death of body, and be ſeparated from it, as things eternal from corruptible, becauſe I have an action diſentangled from body, wch is contemplation. All that which is idle periſheth in nature: but I have no death becauſe not idle. I make it my profeſsion to underſtand, to will, and to love, which I now exerciſe in a body, but which doth not abſolutely depend on body. I make uſe of my ſenſes, as of my windows: when they ſhall be no more, and that the panes of my priſon ſhall be broken, I ſhall not for all that looſe ſight but ſhall ſee the more eaſily. Behold you not how even at this preſent, I never am more knowing, then when I ſink into the bottom of my ſelf, and ſeparate my ſelf from commerce of ſenſe. For I am a Miſtriſs (ſaid S. Auguſtine) who ſee better by my own eyes, then by thoſe of my ſervant. Wouldſt thou deſtroy me by the want of an influent cauſe? Needs muſt God fail, if I ſhould be ſo defective on that part, ſince God having created a thing, never reduceth the ſame to nothing. Material creatures are corrupted by changing themſelves into another nature, and return into elements, but I who have no matter, ſubſiſt by neceſsity, abſolutely entire, and wholly incorruptible, without ſuffering theſe changes.

Radix intellectualitatis eſt immaterialitas

Ask likewiſe thy underſtanding, and it will repeat the philoſophical Axiom: The workman is known by the work; by the operation of every thing its nature is diſcovered: from whence enſueth, that if the manner which thy ſoul uſeth in its functions & operations be wholly ſpiritual, we may truely ſay, it is all ſpirit, all indiviſible and wholly incorruptible. Now where is it, that it worketh not with a tenderneſs and admirable ſpirituality? Firſt, in the ſeparations it maketh of univerſal natures, in numbers, relations, proportions, orders, correſpondencies, harmonies, in things eternal and divine. Secondly, in judgements, diſcourſes, diſputations, compariſons, applications, which it maketh on every thing. Thirdly, in the conſiderations and reflections it hath on it ſelf, yea, over all its actions, almoſt in infinitum. If it did not work ſpiritually, how could it harbour in the memory, ſo many ſeas, rivers, mountains, valleys, cities and caſtles? How could it put ſo many places into one place, not holding any place? If it operated not ſpiritually and indiviſibly, how could it be whole in each of its actions? The body, becauſe it is body and quantitative, and diviſible, what it doth with one part, it doth not neceſſarily with another, what it toucheth with the hand, it doth not neceſſarily touch with the foot; but the ſoul is all in its action. If the ſoul underſtand, all the ſoul underſtandeth. If the ſoul will, all the ſoul willeth. If the ſoul ſuffer, all the ſoul ſuffereth. For it is an indiviſible. That was it, which S. Auguſtine judiciouſly ſpake: The ſoul is all in each of its motions.

Avicenna apud Capreol. Modus operandi ſequitur modum eſſendi. The operations of the ſoul are admirable.

Auguſt. l. de ſpiritu & anima c. 19.

Mortal things can do nothing immortal. But our ſoul, to teach us its immortality, doth wounderful works, which fear not the ſythe of time, the wheel of inconſtancy, nor power of death; it out-lives ſtones, mettals, Ægyptian Pyramids, and the worlds ſeven wonders. It is a ſtrange thing to ſee a humane ſpirit, which taketh away the veil from nature, and looketh into the bottom, and penetrateth into the very marrow. It entreth into theſe great labyrinths of eſſences, it defineth, divideth, diſtinguiſheth, ſevereth, it appropriateth, maketh marvelous diſſections, mounteth above the tracks of the Sun and time, ſcoreth out the courſe of the Heavens, the periods of the Stars. It deciphereth eclipſes to an inſtant, and foregoeth by underſtanding thoſe great celeſtial bodies, whoſe motions are more ſwift then wind or thunder Frō thence it expatiateth into the air, there to hear the winds blow, rain pour down, tēpeſts roar, lightnings flaſh, rain-bows and crowns ariſe. It deſcendeth into the deep caverns of the earth, there to meditate on the mettals. It floateth on the ſea, it reckoneth the veins of the abyſs, it keeps a regiſter of ſo many birds and fiſhes, ſo many terreſtrial creatures, ſo many worms and ſerpents, ſo many hearbs and plants. All this great frame of nature paſſeth through its conſideration, from the cedars of Libanus, to the hyſſop. It createth ſciences, inventeth arts, it findeth out an infinite number of devices. It governeth the great bodies of Kingdoms aad Common-wealths with paſſages of incomparable prudence. Arms and laws, cures of maladies, commerce, navigations, induſtries of mechanicks, and finally, a million of rarities are produced from the ſources of the wit of man who cannot yet underſtand his own worth.

Anima in quibuſcunque ſuis motibus tota eſt Manillius l. 4. Aſtron. Jam nuſquam natura latet, perviſimus omnem.

Beſides, what is more ſpiritual, more independent on matter, then the action of the will, then free-will, which beareth the beginning of its motion and elevation within it ſelf, not borrowing it from any? What is more divine, then to ſee a heart more capable then abyſſes, which cannot be ſatiated with all the things in the world? The plant is contented with a little dew; the horſe with a few oats and hay, becauſe animal and vegetative nature is limited to certain ſmal quantities. But the immaterial soul, as it is in some sort infinite, bendeth to infinity.

(a) Omnibus fere ingenita est fama post mortem cupido. Et unde anima affectaret aliquid quod velit post mortem, si nihil de posthoro sciret. Tertul. de testim. animæ.

(a) It speaketh of Heaven as of its mansion, and of God, as of the object of its felicity. It desireth to live ever, it taketh incomparable care for posterity, it interesseth it self in the future, which it would never do, were it not its hereditary possession.

Sleep, which tameth Lions, cannot overcome it. It learns its immortality even in the image of death; there it is where it incessantly worketh, travelleth by sea and land, negotiateth, converseth, sporteth, rejoyceth, suffereth, hunteth after a thousand objects both good and bad, and knoweth (says Eusebius) that having no end in its motion, it hath none in its life.

And to conclude in a word, what is there more admirable for the proof of our immortality, then this synderesis, this conscience, which is in the body, contrary to the body, and a perpetual enemy of sensual nature, which pleadeth, which questioneth, which strikes us with remorse upon the remembrance of sin? What is there less corporal then a soul, which can see its body burned, flesh pulled off with pincers, and members torn piece-meal one after another, to maintain and preserve a belief, which it judgeth to be true, as did the Martyrs. Never should we behold such a combat between the soul and body, were they not two pieces, quite different, the one whereof is sublime, spiritual, immortal, the other low, frail, and mortal?

We likewise daily see how the soul wholly retired within it self (as it happeneth in apprehensive speculations and raptures) is more strong and knowing then ever, being touched by some ray from commerce with Intelligencies, to which it hath so much relation. We find by experience, that upon the declining age when the body shrinketh, it hath much more vigour in counsels and judgments, which giveth us assurance it cannot any way participate of the corruption of the flesh. Who will consider the effects of the soul in three principal things, which are, Intelligence, Sanctity, and Courage, shall find all therein is divine. And if the wicked, smothering these gifts of God, will put themselves willingly into the rank of brute beasts, do they not wel deserve the place of devils?

Eam decrescente corpore augeri maxime videmus. Æ. nesius. Illa sine hoc vivit melius, hoc sine illa nec pejus. Claudius Marcus l. 3. de statu animæ c. 2. Manifest conviction.

6. Finally, we say we have a soul immortal, because God both can and will make it such. He can, for he is Omnipotent, and it is not a harder matter for him to preserve souls he created, then to derive them from nothing: He will, because he engageth his Eternal word to give us this assurance; yea, he will, because it is manifested to us by the light of nature. One cannot believe a God, unless he believe him just: and it is impossible to think him just, without the belief of an immortal soul, as S. Clement reasoneth after his Master, the great S. Peter. For what a stupidity is it to imagine this father of spirits, who accommodated the most silly creatures with all the conveniencies of nature, hath neglected man so far, as to afford him a most lively knowledge, and a most ardent thirst of immortality, which principally appeareth in the most holy and worthy souls, to hold a heart in torment, never affording it any means to be satisfied, since in all nature, he never grants any inclination to any creature whatsoever, but that he provideth for its accomplishment?

Clemens. 3 Recogn.

But which is more, into what mind of a Tartarian can this imagination fall, that a sovereign Cause most intelligent, very good, and Omnipotent, should be pleased to burn virtue here with a slow fire, to tear it among thorns, to tie it on wheels, afterward to equal the soul of the most virtuous man of the earth, with that of murderers, Sardanapaluses and Cyclops: Never should these base thoughts take possession of the heart of man, if he had not vilified his reason with great sins, and drowned his soul in the confusion of body?

Put these prophane spirits a little upon the proof of their opinion, & let them consider the reasons of Plinie, of Lucretius, of Panecus, & Soranus; they are not men who speak, but hogs that grunt. They tell you, the soul is not seen at its passage out of the body as if the corporal eye were made to see a soul spiritual. Doth one see the air, the winds, odours, and the sphere of fire, which our soul incomparably surpasseth in subtlety? They ask, what doth this soul separated, where is its sight, its hearing, pleasure, taste, touching, and what good can it have without the help of sense? Spirits dulled with matter, which never gave themselves leisure to find out the curious operations of the soul in the understanding and love whereupon it lives of its own wealth. They curiously enquire where so many souls may abide, as if hell were not big enough to contain all the Athiests.

Plin. l. 7 c. 55. Ubi cogitatio illis? Quomodo visus, auditus? and quod sine his bonum? Qua deinde fides? Qua malum ista dementia iterari vitam morte?

Lastly they add, it is to tyrannize over a soul, to make it survive after death. Who sees not it is the fear they have of God's judgment, causeth them to speak in this manner? And are not they well worthy of all unhappiness, since they so readily become the enemies of an eternal happiness?

Let us cut off the stream of so many other reasons, and say at this present, This should teach us to treat with the dead, by way of much respect, and most tender charity, as with the living. It should teach us to use our soul as an eternal substance.

The care to be had of the soul.

What would it avail us to gain all the world, and loose that which God deigned to redeem by his death? Let us forsake all these inferiour and frivolous thoughts, which nail us to the earth, and so basely fasten us to the inordinate care for our bodies. Let us manure our soul, let us trim it up as a plot fit to receive impressions of the divinity. Let us prepare it for the great day of God, which must make the separation of a part so divine from these mortal members. Let all that die, which may yield to death. Let the contexture of humours and elements dissolve, as weak works of nature.

But let us regard this victorious spirit, which hath escaped the chains of time, and laws of death. Let us contemn the remainders of an age, already so much tainted by corruption. Let us enter into this universality of times, and into the possession of eternity. This day, which we apprehend as the last of our life, is the first of our felicities. It is the birth of another eternal day, which must draw away the curtain, and discover to us the secrets of nature. It is the day, that must produce us to these great and divine sights, which we behold with the eye of faith in this vale of tears and miseries. It is the day, which must put us between the arms of the father, after the course of a profuse life, turmoyled with such storms and so many disturbances.

Dies illa quem tanquam extremum reformidas, æterni natalis est. Sen. ep. 102.

Let us daily dispose us to this passage, as to the entrance into our happiness. Let us not betray its honor. Let us not wither up its glory. Let us not deface the character which God hath given it. We are at this present in the world, as in the belly of nature: little infants destitute of air and light, which look towards, and contemplate the blessed souls. What a pleasure is it to go out of a dungeon so dark, a prison so streight, from such ordures and miseries, to enter into those spacious Temples of eternal splendours, where our being never shall have end, our knowledge admit ignorance, nor love suffer change.

The

The fixteenth EXAMPLE, upon the fixteenth MAXIM.

Of the return of Souls.

GOd, who boundeth Heaven, and limiteth earth, ordaineth alſo its place to each creature, ſuitable to the nature and qualities thereof. The body after death is committed to the earth from whence it came, and the ſoul goes to the place appointed it, according to its merit or demerit. And as it is not lawful for the dead body to forſake the tomb to converſe with the living: ſo the ſoul is not permitted to go out of the liſts Gods juſtice ordained for it, to enter meddle in worldly affairs. Notwithſtanding as the divine power often cauſeth the reſurrection of the dead for the confirmation of our faith, ſo it appointeth ſometimes the return of ſouls for proof of their immortality.

I would not any wiſe in this point favour all the ſhallow imaginations, which entitle ſottiſh apprehenſions of the mind with the name of viſions, but it is undoubted, there is no Country in the world, nor time throughout Ages, which hath not afforded ſome great example of apparition of ſpirits, by known witneſſes, and the judgements of moſt eminent perſonages. S Auguſtine holds, it is a doctrine grounded on Scripture, experience, and reaſon, which cannot be gain-ſaid, without ſome note of impudence, (although he much deny, that all the dreams we have of the dead, are ever their ſouls which return again.) Such was the belief of the Apoſtles in Saint Luke, it not being corrected by our Saviour, who was the rule of their faith. Such the truth of the apparition of the ſoul of Moſes upon Mount Thabor. I inſiſt not now upon proof, but example, contenting my ſelf to produce one or two out of a great multitude recounted by Authours.

Math. 17.

Apparition of the ſoul of Samuel. 1 Reg. 28.

As for the firſt, I hold the apparition of the ſoul of Samuel is moſt formal in Scripture, for any one who will conſider the whole progreſs of the narration. The Hiſtory telleth us, that King Saul, after the death of Samuel, was upon the point of giving battel to the Philiſtines, and that having firſt addreſſed himſelf to God by ordinary means, to learn the way he ſhould obſerve therein, ſeeing he had no anſwer either by dream, or the lively voice of Prophets, he did what infidels, and men deſperate do, who ſeek to get that from the devil, they cannot obtain of God. He commanded his ſervants to ſeek him out a ſorcereſs, although himſelf had baniſhed them by his Edicts out of his Kingdom. The ſervants ever ready to obſerve their Maſters in ill offices when their own intereſt concurreth, found a famous Magician, whom the Hebrews affirm to have been a woman of good place, but out of a deteſtable curioſity had put her ſelf into this profeſſion. Saul to cover his purpoſe, and not to amaze her, went thither by night in a diſguiſed habit, only accompanied with two gentlemen; where having ſaluted her, he demanded the exerciſe of her profeſſion. But ſhe being crafty, and careful to keep her ſelf from ſurprizes, anſwered: Sir, go you about to undo me and your ſelf alſo? Know you not the Edicts of King Saul? Saul replied, he knew all had paſſed but ſhe might confidently proceed, aſſuring her of his warranty; and whereas ſhe propoſed puniſhments to her ſelf, ſhe ſhould meet with rewards. But ſhe ſtill doubting, and ſticking on diſtruſt, uſual in all miſchiefs, he engaged his word with great oaths, proteſting no ill ſhould befal her for any thing might paſs at that time between them. Thereupon reſolved to give him ſatisfaction, ſhe asked if it were not his deſire to ſpeak to the ſoul of a dead man, as alſo whoſe it was.

It was very ordinary with theſe Negromancers, to raiſe illuſions and fantaſms, inſtead of true ſpirits of the dead. S. Apollonius made Achilles to be ſeen, appearing on his tomb as a giant of twelve cubits high; ſo Santaberemus ſhewed to the Emperour Balilius the ſoul of his ſon Conſtantine; ſo Jamblicus made to appear in certain baths of Syria two figures of little children like Cupids. All this (to ſpeak properly) had nothing real in it; and it is no wonder, if thoſe who thought Samuel had been raiſed by a ſorcereſs, believed it was a ſpecter. But he who well will weigh the phraſe of Scripture, and conſider, that this ſpirit of Samuel ſuddenly appeared before the ſorcereſs had uſed her ordinary ſpells, plainly ſhewing, he came meerly by the commandment of God, and not by the charms of the Magician, will eaſily change opinion.

Philoſtr. in Apoll. Zonaras, Eunapius Sardianus.

Verily the Sorcereſs was much aſtoniſhed, ſeeing the dead came contrary to the manner of other, and cried out aloud as one diſtracted: Sir, you have deceived me, you are Saul, much doubting, it was to him Samuel came. The miſerable King, who endeavoured by all means to aſſure her; fear not ſaith he, I will keep my promiſe, what have you ſeen? She anſwered: DEOS VIDI ASCENDENTES DE TERRA; as who ſhould ſay, according to the Hebrews phraſe, ſhe had ſeen a venerable perſon like an Angel, or a God, raiſed out of the earth. In what ſhape? replies the King: It is a venerable old man, ſaith ſhe, covered with the mantle of a Prophet. Then Saul with much reverence proſtrated on the ground, and made a low obeyſance to Samuel, who ſpake to him, and ſaid: QUARE ME INQUIETASTI, UT SUSCITARER? Why haſt thou diſquieted me, to make me return into the world? Neceſſity hath conſtrained me, anſwereth Saul, I am plunged in a perplexity of affairs, and cannot get any anſwer from heaven. O man abandoned by God, why doeſt thou ask of me that, which I have foretold ſhall happen? Thy army ſhall be defeated by the Philiſtins, and thou with thy children ſhalt be to morrow with me, that is to ſay among the dead as I am now: which ſo fell out. Now the Scripture upon this praiſeth Samuel to have prophetized after death: if it were not the true Samuel but a ſpecter, who ſee not it were to tell a ly, and to applaud the work of the divel?

Eccl. 46.

But to the end you may ſee this belief was held by Nations, as by a decree of nature, Joſephus in the ſeventeenth book of his Judaical antiquities relateth the apparition of the ſpirit of Alexander, ſon of the great Herod and Mariamne, who was ſeen to his wife Glapphyra, when ſhe re-married again to the King of Mauritania, to reproach her ingratitude & forgetfulneſs of her firſt husband, which having amply deduced in the firſt Tome of the holy Court, in the tenth edition upon an Inſtruction directed to widdows, I forbear here to repeat it.

Philoſtratus, in the eight book of the life of Apollonius, maketh likewiſe mention of a young man much troubled in mind concerning the ſtate of ſouls in the other life, and ſaith, Apollonius appeared unto him, aſſuring him the ſoul was immortal, and he need not to be troubled at all, ſince it was rather the work of the Divine providence, then of it.

Ἀδύνατον ἦν τὸν Ἀπολλώνιον ἰδεῖν τὸν νεανίσκον ἀθυμοῦντα περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἅιδου, καὶ μὴ ἐπιστῆσαι αὐτῷ, ἀλλὰ προσελθὼν ἔφη· ὦ νεανίσκε, ἀθάνατος ἡ ψυχὴ, καὶ οὐδὲν δεῖ σε ταράττεσθαι, ἀλλὰ τὸ τοῦ θείου προνοίας ἔργον ἐστὶν, οὐ τὸ σόν.

I willingly pass over many other examples, to tell you that Phlegon a good Authour, who flourished about an hundred years after the Nativity of our Saviour, and was not of our Religion, to favour our opinions (although honourably cited by Origen, Eusebius, and S. Hierom) writeth a strange History, witnessed by the testimony of a whole City, wherein he then governed. He saith, that at Trayls a City in Phrygia, there was a young Maid named Philenion, daughter of Democrates and Charion, who as her story well declareth, was an amorous piece, became Court-like, loved bravery, delighted in too free conversation, and followed the foolish pleasures of the world, true Gardens of Adonis, which in the beginning make shew of silly flowers, and in conclusion afford nought but thorns.

God, who followeth the voluptuous by the track, even into the shades of death; sent her a sickness, which having cropped the flower of her beauty, left her almost nothing but a living carkass, to deliver her over as a prey to death. The miserable Maid suffered the boiling fervours of the feaver through all her body, not losing the flames of love, which she cherished in her heart. She burnt with two fires, not being able either to quench the one or other, and having but a little breath of life left on her lips, she gave to love what already was wholly acquired to death, sighing after a young Gentleman then absent, and not daring fully to manifest her passion.

In the end, death took away the spoils of her life, with her pretences. The father and mother bewailed her with inconsolable tears, furnishing out very honourable Obsequies. And whereas she most ardently affected her dressings and little Cabinet, they buried with her all whatsoever she held most pretious. Six months were now past since her burial, when the Gentleman she loved, named Machates, arriving at Trayls, came to lodge in the house of his friend her father. The spirit of the Maid, which was of the condition of those whom Plato called body-lovers, retaining still the affections with which she went out of her body, appeared one evening to this Machates with words of affection, imbraces, & dalliances, which plainly discovered it was a damned spirit, and an instrument of the Devil, that tormented the one to burthen the other. The young man at the first was much affrighted with these proceedings; notwithstanding becoming tractable by little and little, he soon made this spectre very familiar. It happened during this time, that an old servant sent by her Mistris, to see what their guest did, found Philenion sitting near unto him with the same countenance, and the same garments she wear in her life-time; whereat much amazed, she ran to the father and the mother to tell them their daughter was alive. They sharply reprehended her for a distracted and wicked woman, as going about again to open their wound which still bled. The servant justified her self, and answered, she had not lost her wits, nor spake ought but truth. Hereupon she so enkindled the curiosity of her Mistris, that she secretly conveyed her self by night into the chamber, yet perceived nothing at all able to resolve her.

The next day being vehemently excited with the curiosity of knowing what to believe of this apparition, she threw her self at the feet of Machates, and conjured him to tell her the name of the young Maid who conversed with him. The Gentleman in the beginning was much surprized, and sought evasions to divert her, but in conclusion either through compassion of the mother, whom he saw in the posture of a suppliant, or by vanity of his passion, which easily unloosed his tongue, he confessed he was married to Philenion, that it was a business accomplished by the will of the gods, wherein nothing must be altered: and speaking this, he drew forth a little casket, wherein he shewed her a gold Ring her daughter had given him, with a piece of linnen she wear about her neck, protesting she was his wife: so much was he seduced by the subtle practises of the evil spirit.

The Mother having acknowledged the tokens of the deceased, fell down with astonishment, and coming again to her self, threw a thousand times kissed one while the Ring, another while the linned, moistning them with her tears, and moving the whole family to sorrow, which ran to see this spectacle. Then again embracing Machates, she signified it would be an infinite favour from heaven to have him for a son-in-law, but that she intreated as a courtesie one comfort he could not deny an afflicted mother, which was, once again to see her daughter, whom she accounted dead.

The other promised to give her all satisfaction, and as Philenion came secretly according to custom to converse with him, he closely sent his Lackie to the mother, who advertised her husband of it, and both of them came into Machates his chamber, where they surprized their daughter, at which they were so rapt, that being not able to utter a word, they cast themselves upon her neck, straightly embracing, and with tears bedewed her, which fell from their eys. But the daughter with a sad and dejected countenance fetching a deep sigh out of her breast: Alas (saith she) losing father and mother, your curiosity will cost you dear, for you will lament the second time. Hereupon she fell down dead, leaving a horrible stink in the chamber, which filled the whole house with terrour, groans, and out-cries, in such sort, that the neighbours came in upon the noise, and consequently the whole City ran thither to behold the corps.

The magistrates wondring at an accident so frightful, deputed some Citizens nearest of kin to open the tomb, where the body of Philenion could not be found, but a Cup and a Ring she had received from this Gentleman. The carrion lying in the father's chamber, was by decree of the Senate thrown on the dunghil, the City purged, and as for Machates, he was so over-whelmed with shame and confusion, that he slew himself with his own hands. Behold what an Authour recounteth, only illuminated by the light of nature, who wrote this history after he had been a spectatour of it, of purpose to send a man immediately to the Emperour Hadrian to make a recital thereof unto him, as he saith in a letter he directed to a friend of his. I might have many things to say upon all circumstances, which are not repugnant to that, which Ecclesiastical Authours relate concerning other apparitions of the damned. But I will not exceed the laws of Historians, and it is enough for me here to let you see the belief of the Ancients, and the punishment of God upon souls resigned to sin.

XVII. MAXIM.

Of PURGATORY.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That death is the remedy of all evils, and that the soul separated from the body hath no more to suffer.

Have you well considered in Genesis an Angel of fire, who with a flaming sword keepeth the gate of terrestrial Paradise, placed as an usher at the entrance into the delicious hall, which prepared by God to entertain the first man of the world, alas, it had been the theater of his glory, became the scaffold of his punishments? Procopius observeth, that poor Adam at the time of his banishment was placed just over against this Cherubin, and that this sentinel of the God of hosts no sooner lifted up his cuttel ax, but he made a terrour and icy horrour creep into his bones and in that proportion the sparkles flew from the sword of justice, fears and affrightments invaded the heart of this offender, who being a murderer of his race before he was a progenitour, had brought forth a thousand deaths by the sole bite of an apple. Alas, if the miserable Adam was so astonished at the steel of the Cherubin, which dazled his eies, what ought our representments to be, what our apprehensions, when we think on the flames of Purgatory, enkindled by the breath of the love and wrath of God? So many souls lie their now plunged, having heretofore conversed amongst us in mortal abode, and we must there perhaps long time remain to burn, and wear off so many ordures, as our soul contracted in worldly affections, if we make account to decline the eternity of torments.

Gen. 3.

Purgatory compared to the Cherubins fiery sword.

I am amazed when I reflect on the remisness of Catholicks, as wel in the provision for their own safety, as the comfort of their brethrens souls. And when I have well weighed the course and progress of this great neglect, I find it have two sources. The first is called infidelity, the second stupidity, which I resolve to convince in two passages of this discourse.

It is true, that after this direful heresie, blown by the breath of the infernal serpent, hath for this last Age opposed the verities of our faith, besides the lost souls it daily takes away in the torrent of corruption, it hath distilled into the minds of Catholicks faintness, and infidelities, which now adays turmoil irresolute wits upon many articles, and namely, that which is now our present object. Purgatory, will some Libertine say amidst the fumes of wine and good cheer, is not so hot as folk talk. Who ever came back to tell us news of it? God is merciful, think you he takes delight to burn his children, and to cut off the price of his Sons passion who satisfied for our sins? Young souls hear this, and suck in poison by the ear, which choaks their belief, and killeth the exercise of good works. What shal I say against these infidelities, and floating opinions of feeble Catholicks? It is not my purpose to cast my self upon a subtle controverse, which doth nothing but hale truth hither and thither. I wil loose no time to touch at many passages. I only to the matter express two reasons drawn from two lights, that of nature, and the other of faith,

THE HOLY COURT.

That the soul, which hath not in this world satisfied Gods justice, must pass in the other life through Purgatory.

No dogmata de Purgatorio pro sana ecclesia doctrina nobis obtrudant Pontificii, cavendum est.

which are able to evict confession of truth from a man who hath never so little shame or brain.

Purgatory proved by the light of nature.

1. It is a strange thing to see the great consent of all Ages, which agree in a pretension of purgation of the soul, so strong and powerful, that those lights of nature speak as understandingly, as if they were written with the rays of the Sun. All the Gentiles, who lived out of the law, knew not how to gainsay this doctrine. For they were sensible of the noble extraction of their soul, and knew it was defiled by the body and by sensual works. Behold the cause why they tied themselves to feeble elements to purifie it; one while washing themselves in the streams of fountains, another while passing through flames, and sometimes seeking other ways to cleanse themselves from pollutions of the flesh. But it was a pitiful thing they found prophanation even in sacrifices. They were not content to purge themselves in this life, but extend it to the souls of the dead, constantly believing they stood in need of remedies, to free themselves from bodily stains.

The opinion of the Ancients concerning the purgation of souls.

Theophilus Patriark of Antioch, in the book he directed to one nam'd Antiochus, saith, the Gentiles took out of the Scripture all they wrote of punishments in the other life. And S. Augustine observeth, that having this idea, that all stains of the soul proceeded from the earth, they imploied the other three elements to purge them, as he proveth by texts of the Ancients. Synesius likewise thought there remain'd certain visible spots in the soul, which made it appear they were the crimes wherewith it was contaminated in the body, which notwithstanding agrees not very well with the truth we hold of the spirituality of the same soul. And I find he spake in this text more like a Platonist then a Christian. The Hebrews, the Ægyptians, Grecians and Romans all contended for praiers for the dead and the truth of Purgatory. The Hebrews three times in the year celebrated the feast of the dead, and their Priest mounting up into a chair made expressly & ceremoniously four-square to represent the City of the blessed according to S. John, rehearsed aloud, and audibly the names of the dead, to recommend them to the praiers of such as were present, praiers so familiar amongst them, that they wrote them upon tombs instead of Epitaphs, in these terms: SIT ANIMA EIUS COLLIGATA IN FASCICULO VIVENTIUM, let his soul be bound up in the fasit of the living: As one would say, all the souls of Saints were as an odoriferous posie, whereof every elect constituted a flower. What is this but to make stones speak against impiety?

Notable purgation of Aegyptians.

What shal I say of the Ægyptians, that were so impressed with the opinion that souls must be purg'd in the other life, in so much as they had been drenched in voluptuous pleasures of the flesh, that in the funerals of the dead having opened the body, they took the heart out of the breast, and put it into a little little casket, then on the bank of Nilus, where ordinarily tombs were erected, a herald holding the casket, and shewing it to the eys of heaven, protested before all there present, the deceased now in question had lived piously, and acco ding to the laws of his Ancestours; that if he had offended through bodily pleasures, they wished his soul might be as well cleansed, as they went about to purge the stomach, the instrument of the lusts of the living, thereupon they threw it into Nilus. Behold these poor Pagans, how they were moved with a touch from God, (which cannot lie) who says unto them, the dead must be purged, but as for the rest they know not how?

Shall I speak of the Grecians? And know we not that Plato the prime man of their Nation in his Phædon, spake so perspicuously for Purgatory, that he seemed to have been bred in the Christian Scholes? I will conclude with the Romans. And can we be ignorant how in the beginning of the Church under the Emperour Domitian, when as yet some Apostles lived, Quintilian a most renowned Oratour, making an Oration in the City of Rome, in a certain pleading concerning a Sepulcher which had been inchanted by magick, protested in terms, most expres the truth of Purgatory, saying; The soul being purged by fire, went to take place in heaven: as we shewed also in the 16 Maxim. If you also require authorities of Pagans who have seen what Christians practised: add to all this, that Julius a very ancient Authour, speaking of the death of a Lady named Podon, observed in plain terms, that her husband who was one of the most ancient Christians, made offerings for her, which he called λύσεις ψυχῶν εὐναι, Gifts for ransom of the soul, answerable to what Tertullian writeth, that it was the custom of the ancient Church to pray for the souls of the dead, yea, and to make annual offerings for them.

Tertul. in exhort. ad castitat. Jam repetes apud Deum pro cujus spiritu populos, pro quâ oblationes annuas reddas.

We must no longer say for evasion, it is Plato, it is Quintilian who speaketh, but confess with Aristotle, when we see an universal agreement in a proposition, it is not one man speaks, but the mouth of heaven which uttereth this verity. When S. James telleth us, God must be feared, and proves it by example of the Devils themselves, he saith not, we must fear God, because the Devils do so, but if any despise him, he is therein worse then Devils. Likewise when the holy Fathers produce an example of Pagans, it is not to instruct us by the Pagans, but to shew, that to waver in the belief of things they generally held by the sentence of Nature, is to be worse then a Pagan.

Dæmones credunt, & contremiscunt.

Second proof drawn from the light of faith.

Vide hæc, quia ita facienda sunt, disputare, insolentissima insania est.

3. I say for the second argument, that so often as a truth is proved to Catholicks by the universal consent of the Church, and of all Ages: if any one chance to make doubt of it, it is an evident sign, either that he hath a giddy spirit, or is malicious in Religion. This proposition is grounded upon the Axiom of S. Augustine, who in his Epistle written to Januarius, assureth us, that when we find the tracts of a custom generally observed throughout the whole Church, it is evident that it cometh from the Apostles, or those, to whom God hath given full authority in the Church, and that to go about to be-lye, or question it, is to pass from folly to insolency.

Now so it is, the truth of Purgatory is established by the opinion, practise, sentence, and decisions of all the Church, in such sort, that there is not any verity of our faith more fortified. How is that? Begin with our France. Behold the Council of Chalons upon Saone for prayers for the dead, and the truth of Purgatory. Go into Spain, behold that of Braga: into Germany, behold that of Wormes; into Italy, behold the sixth Council held at Rome under Pope Symmachus: into Greece, behold a number of Synods collected by Martins: into Africk, behold the third of Carthage. Lastly behold the three Oecumenical of Lateran, Florence, and Trent, which say the same. Doth not this suffice to establish a truth in the wit of a man, who hath never so little understanding?

Our adversaries, who still bark against this verity, as dogs at the Moon's brightness, when they have said, Jesus made purgation of sins, and that it was said to the good thief; thou shalt to day be with me in Paradise, or produced some other frivolous objections, have shewed all their ability.

I leave you a little to ponder the goodly consequences; Jesus purged sins, there is then no Purgatory? Should not we have cause to say in the same fashion, Jesus prayed for remission of our sins, then we no longer stand in need of prayer, or penance: and in vain is that S. Luke saith, That Jesus must suffer, and that penance was preached in his name. As the prayers of our Saviour destroy not our prayers, so his satisfaction overthroweth not ours. He prayed that we might pray; he satisfied, to give strength and merit to our satisfaction, which would be dead and unprofitable, were they not quickned by his blood. To what purpose is it to say, the good thief went directly to Paradise, without feeling purgatory? As if we should say, it was necessary for all the world to pass that way. Make your self a great Saint, and you shall have nothing to do with it. Purge all your sins by a love so fervent, that the purifying flames may not find any thing to cleanse. He who hath paied, ows nothing, and who hath satisfied in this world, shall find unrestrained freedom in the other.

Luc. 24. 47.

But think you, in a life which contracteth so many stains, a soul may be raised in an instant above the celestial orbs to the sight of God, before it have passed by those purgations, which the Divine Justice ordaineth to every one according to his demerits? Endeavour is used to deafen your ears with piety, wranglings, and unprofitable disputations, to make you believe Purgatory is an invention of interessed Priests: it seems this doctrine came into the world but within these two days. But read the Scripture and see the Fathers who interpreted it, you shall find proofs to fall upon you like a cloud for confirmation of this verity.

When S. Paul in the first of the Corinthians third Chapter said, that the day of God, to wit, the day of judgment, be it general or particular, shall be manifested by fire, which shal put every one's works upon trial; and that he who upon the foundations of Jesus shal build with wood, straw, or hay, to wit, with vain and sleight works shall be saved as by fire, he clearly declared the doctrine of purgatory, unless you be more illuminated then S. Basil and S. Ambrose, who have judged it so: for the first saith, he threatneth the soul, not with destruction, but purgation. And the other plainly expresseth, he speaks of the pains of fire, which God hath appointed to purifie souls. And it is a poor resistance to object, he said, as by fire, and not by fire, for it is a manner of expression in Scripture, which nothing diminisheth the reality of things, otherwise we should say, when S. John wrot in the first Chapter of his Gospel, That men saw Jesus as the only Son of God, that he were only a figure of it, not a truth. And when S. Paul to the Philippians second Chapter, witnesseth, he was found as a man, we might infer he were not man. See you not how these silly curiosities of words directly invade the truth? When S. Matthew in the 12 Chapter makes mention of one sin which shall never be remitted, either in this world, or in the other. S. Bernard in his threescore and sixth Homily upon the Canticles mainly insisteth upon this passage, and takes it as an infallible proof of our doctrine. When the Evangelist himself toucheth the discourse of the prisoner, which shall be put into a place from whence he shall not come, until he have paid the last penny; S. Cyprian sayes plainly: It is one thing to be a long time purged for sins by the torment of fire, another by the purgation, which is made by the passion of Jesus Christ. When in the same Author it is spoken of divers punishments of choller handled in the fifth Chapter, S. Augustine in the first book of the sermon made on the mountain, interpreteth all that of punishments in the other life. When in the fourth Chapter of Tobie, it is written of bread to be put upon the graves of the dead, S. Chrysostom, Homily thirty two upon S. Matthew referreth this passage to the custom of the ancient Church, which called both the Priests and the poor purposely to pray for the dead. When mention is made in the fourth of Kings, of a solemn fast made for Saul, Bede makes no question but it was for the quiet of his soul: for S. Paul sheweth in the first to the Corinthians fifteenth Chapter, that it was the custom to mortifie and macerate ones self for the dead, and the second of Macchabees saith, it is a holy and a wholesome thing to pray for them. Who knew more, and who saw more in all this then the great S. Augustine, who on the thirty seventh Psalm hath these words: My God, make me such in my life, that I may not need the fire of Purgatory after my death. Hath the Roman Church hired all these so ancient Fathers to write such texts in its behalf? Is it not a shame that a brainless Libertine with the eyes of a bat should mock at all these lights?

Cyprian. l. 4. ep. 2.

Aug. in Psal. 37. Talem me reddas, cui emendatorio ignis non sit opus.

The manner of Purgatory.

4. Doubtless will some say, these reasons are forcible; but I understand not where this Purgatory is, and how souls are there tormented. To that I answer, the Church which walketh reservedly in its ordinances, ever grounded on the word of God, onely obligeth us to hold as an article of faith, a third place for the purgation of souls, which is neither Paradise nor hel. As for circumstances of the place and manner of sensible torments, it hath decreed nothing thereof as an article of our belief. School Divines ordinarily set purgatory in a subterranean place, which is very probable. It may also be, that souls may be purged in the air, in the sphere of fire, and in divers parts of the elementary world, according to the opinion of S. Gregory Nyssen, S. Chrysostom, and S. Gregory the great. It dependeth on the prerogative of Gods power, and the ministry of Angels.

Nyss. de anima & resurrectione. Chrysost. homil. de Beatorum præmiis. Bede l. 3. hist. Angl. 29.

As for punishments, it is most certain the first consisteth in suspension from the sight of God, a matter very dolorous to a soul, which being out of the body, and far absented from its source, is as would the globe of the earth be, were it out of its place, or like unto fire shut up in the bowels of mount Ætna. It naturally desireth to rejoyn it self to God, and the least retardation it feels from such felicity is most sensible unto it. It mourneth to be deprived from an infinite comfort, when the thirst is most ardent, and to see it self bereaved by its own fault; yea, such an one as might easily have been avoided. The second is the pain of sense which is exercised by fire (the great executioner of Gods justice) and sometimes also by other ways, known to his providence, as S. Bonaventure and holy Bede teach us. If you say you cannot comprehend how a material thing worketh on a spiritual? I ask of you again, this soul which is in your body, is it of any other kind then those in purgatory? And yet see you not how it dayly suffereth in the body? See you not how all the dolours of mortal flesh rebound back again by an amorous sympathy, and a counter-buff wholly necessary, to the bottom of our soul? And yet you ask how it can suffer? Is it not true, our soul containeth in it the root of understanding and all sensible knowledge, framed and accomplished by the help of the bodies organs? Is it not true, that being in the body it understandeth and feeleth with dependence on the body. But separated, doth it loose this root of understanding and knowledge? Verily no: For it then understandeth with independence on the body. To speak also according to the opinion of some, it may feel out of the body not onely by a knowledge naked and intellectual, but experimental in some sort, not unlike the understanding exercised in the body. But there is no more corporal organ, which is as the chariot of feeling. What importeth it? God by his power cannot he supply the organ of body, and necessitate the soul immediately to feel the sharpness of fire, as if it were still in the body? And which is more, some Divines think there would be no inconvenience to say, the soul were revested by God with a body of air, as in a sheath, wherewith it should have the same sympathy it had before with the body it informed: and this body being incorruptibly burnt, as that of the damned, should cause a painfull quality to arise to torment it: which I notwithstanding think not so probable. But I rather believe, the fire not being contrary of its nature to the spirit, might for all that be chosen and appointed by the singular disposition of providence to be unto the soul an afflicting sign, in that it representeth to it in its flames the anger of an offended God, as it shall be said in the subsequent Maxim.

Corink. de purgatorio. p. 529.

Alas! O Christians, God grant we may be ignorant of this eternal and temporal fire, & may rather be purged in this life, then expect it in the other.

Against the dulness of those who understand it not.

5. When I come to the 2d. point of this discourse, I cannot wonder enough at our stupidity and lethargy: we believe purgatory and bely our belief by our works. What may we hope in the other life, living so negligently and remisly? God is mercifull: Behold our ordinary saying. But see we not in Scriptures the hand of God armed with fiery tempests over the infamous Cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the bodies which sacrificed themselves in the flames of prodigious luxurie, roasted and broyled under the breath of the anger of the Omnipotent? See we not a whole world buried in the waters of a deluge, waves of the Ocean rushing, as in a City sacked, on the heads of offenders, the sea becoming altogether the executioner and tomb of sinners? See we not those beautifull Angels so beloved of God, and so worthy of favour, which also came most resplendent out of his hands, lost by one thought of pride, scorched and precipitated into dungeons of eternal flames?

Think we to be more to God, then those cities repleniſhed with an infinite number of souls, then a whole world, then legions of Angels? Let us not flatter our selves by a presumptuous confidence of a mercy, not due to negligence so faint and dissolute.

The truth is, no uncleanesse entreth into Paradise: The truth is, the eyes of the supream Judge cannot endure pollution. For if there be any, it must infallibly be taken off with the file of justice. The torment of Purgatory is executed with sharp and transfixing pains, since that imperious element, which raiseth so many terrours in our world, hath there the place of an officer. The continuance thereof is long, by certain revelations that some souls have been there many years: its perseverance and activity dreadful, since the soul is immortal, and incorruptible to its torments. This made the hair ſtand an end on the heads of all Saints. And when the great man Job, all compoſed of innocency and ſanctity, thought on this juſtice of God, he conceived himſelf to be as a little fiſh crouched in the water, that heareth all the ſtorms rouling over its head. S. Auguſtine grown hoary in a thouſand valorous battels for defence of the Church, apprehendeth purgatory; and the elect ſouls, who build all in gold and ſilver, and pretious ſtones, fear the trial of fire, and we with our edifices of ſtubble, ſtraw, and hay, walk with exalted creſts, as if we had all the aſſurances of our ſalvation.

Job. 11. Semper enim quaſi tumentes ſuper me fluctus timui Deum, & pondus ejus ferre non potui.

Where are we, if this torch of juſtice awaken us not? Perhaps we have made a bargain with this fire, and theſe puniſhments, or that we are torment-proof not to feel them. Is there any man who hath learned to abide among burning coals? We are ſo tender, ſo nice, ſo impatient, ſo the lovers of our ſelves, that one ounce weigheth a pound with us. O worldlings! who ſhal weep over you, ſince you know not how to bewail your ſelves? Your bodies are dainty both by nature and education, yea, your ſouls much more: you cannot endure the ſtinging of a Bee; the very ſight of a Surgeons lancet affrights you, and yet you daily entangle your ſelves in a thouſand vanities, a thouſand courtſhips, and a thouſand worldly loves, which defile your ſoul, and muſt at a dear rate be diſcharged in the other world. We know the Chriſtians of the Indies newly converted, when they felt ſome temptations contrary to the law of God, ran to their chimny hearths, and thruſt their hands into the flames, ſaying: Sin ſoul, if thou canſt abide fire; if not go no further. Do the like, touch if not in effect, at leaſt by conſideration, the devouring flames of God's juſtice. And if they ſeem ſtrange unto you, engage not your ſelf in them by your ſenſualities.

Quis poterit habitare de vobis cum igne devorante?

Rigour of the living againſt the ſouls in Purgatory.

6. From the ſlight apprehenſion we have of purgatory proceedeth another ſtupidity very unreaſonable, which is, that we are very little careful of the ſouls of the dead, a matter very worthy of blame for two principal reaſons. The firſt is, that the providence of God which diſpoſeth all with ſo great ſweetneſs, hath as it were tied the ſalvation of theſe good ſouls to the fervour of our prayers, and would have us to be as mediatours and interceſſours of their felicity, which is verily one of the greateſt titles of honour we can receive. It is a note of Divinity to have power to oblige men, ſaith an Ancient, and there is no ſhorter way to eternal glory. Now God gives us the means to oblige, not mortals, but immortal ſouls, and to oblige them in a cauſe ſo great and eminent, that if all the treaſures and lives of the world were diſſolved into one maſs, they could not reach to the leaſt degree of the felicity you may procure to theſe faithful ſouls.

Plin. l. 2. c. 7. Deus eſt mortali beneſacere mortalem, & hac ad æternam gloriam via.

By obliging them to this kind you gain eternal friends, who will entertain no thoughts, but ſuch as may tend to render you the like, and to bear you into the boſom of beatitude, & yet this being moſt eaſie for you (as a matter which conſiſteth in ſome prayers, alms-deeds, and good works) you neglect it: Is not this a prodigious careleſneſs?

Matth. 12. 11. Quis erit ex vobis homo, qui habeat ovem unam, & ſi ceciderit hac ſabbatho in foveam, nonne tenebit & levabit eam?

The ſecond reaſon is, that by ſuch negligence we betray our ſoul, which enclineth, out of a natural propenſion, to the ſweetneſs and mercy we exerciſe even towards beaſts. It is the argument which the Son of God made uſe of: If a horſe, an Ox, a ſheep fall into a ditch, there is neither feſtival nor ſabbath withholds; every one who is able, ſtretcheth out a hand and draws it forth: And behold here not a beaſt, but a ſoul created to the image of God, irradiated with the moſt excellent lineaments of his beauty, which is, to live with Angels eternally, fallen into a ditch, fallen into a boyling furnace, who is afflicted, tormented, imploreth the help of all the world, and whileſt we ſlacken to ſuccour it, hath theſe mournful words of Jeremy:

Hier. Thren. De excelſo miſit ignem in oſſibus meis, & erudivit me, &c. Vigilavit jugum iniquitatum mearum, &c.

Alas! God the juſt avenger of crimes committed againſt his divine Majeſty, hath poured fire into my bones to chaſtiſe me. Behold me in the nets of juſtice, behold me now deſolate, penſive, and diſconſolate both night and day. All afflicteth me in this ſaid abode, but nothing is ſo irkſom, as the burden of mine iniquities and ingratitudes. It is a yoke which ſurchargeth my neck like lead, and puls me down into the torments, from whence I cannot go without your charities. O you, my dear kindred, friends, and allies, who paſs through the Church-yard made the depoſitary of my bones, conſider and ſee with the eyes of faith, whether there be any dolour comparable to mine: ſince God hath cut me off on the day of his indignation, with a ſtrong and inevitable arm. O ingrateful and diſloyal ſon, it is the ſoul of the father which ſpeaketh unto thee in this manner, and ſays unto thee: Son, I have paſſed my life as the ſpider, ſtill ſpinning, ever ſeeking after worldly wealth, perpetually exhauſting my proper ſubſtance to enrich thee, I lived on gall and cares that thou mighteſt ſwim in roſe-water; I travelled over lands and ſeas, to build a ſilver bridge for thy fortune, to ſet thee on the flower-de-luces and employments of a Kingdom, where is thy retribution?

O vos omnes qui tranſitis per viam, attendite, & videte ſi eſt dolor ſicut dolor meus. Quoniam vindemiavit me, ut locutus eſt Dominus in die furoris ſui.

My ſon, I complain not, my eye being ſhut, my body was troubleſom to thee in thy houſe, and thou couldeſt not endure it; it was a dung-hill muſt be yielded up to the earth: but I complain, that thou being wel informed thy father had an immortal ſoul, which thou mighteſt comfort by thy good works, thou trayterouſly employedſt the mony, wherof the poor have too much been fruſtrated, to eſtabliſh thy vanities, and fatten thee in pleaſures. Where is thy liberality? Where are thy alms toward miſerable creatures, who dy in affliction in the ſtreets? Obſerve juſtice, and take example by my diſaſters.

Husband, it is thy wife ſo beloved, that ſpeaks to thee, ſaying: Ah my deareſt friends, where is the faith plighted in the face of the Church? Where are the faithful loves which ſhould have no limit but eternity? Death no ſooner abſented me from thy eys, but forgetfulneſs drew me out of thy heart. I complain not thou liveſt happy and fortunate in thy new affections, for I am in a condition wherein I can neither envy nor malice any; but I complain, that not only after my death, the children, which are pledges of our love, were diſtaſtful to thee, but thou haſt wholly loſt the memory of one who was ſo precious to thee, and whom thou as a Chriſtian oughteſt to love beyond a tomb. Open yet once unto her the bowels of thy charity, and comfort by thy alms and good works, a ſoul which muſt expect that help from thee, or ſome other.

Apparition of Souls in Purgatory.

HIſtories tell us, the apparition of ſouls in Purgatory are ſo frequent, that he who would keep an account, may as ſoon number the ſtars in the ſky, or leaves on the trees. But as it is not fit to be too credulous in all may be ſaid thereupon, ſo a man muſt be very impudent to deny all is ſpoken of it, and to oppoſe as well the authority of ſo many great perſonages, as the memory of all Ages.

He

He who believes nothing above nature, will not believe a God of nature. How many extraordinary things are there, the experience wherof teacheth us the effects, and of which God hideth the reasons from us? The Philosopher Democritus disputing with the Sages of his time concerning the secret power of nature, held commonly in his hand, the stone called cathocita, which insensibly sticketh to such as touch it, and they being unable to give a reason of it, he inferred there were many secrets which are rather to humble our spirits, then to satisfie our curiosity.

Solinus Polyhistor.

Who can tell why the Theamede, which is a kind of Adamant, draweth iron on one side, and repelleth it on the other? Why do the forked branches of the nut-tree, turn towards mines of gold and silver? Why do bees often die in the hives, after the death of the Master of the family, unless they be elsewhere transported? Why doth a dead body cast forth bloud in the presence of the murderer? Why do certain fountains in the current of their waters, and in their colour, carry presages of seasons, as that of Blomnza, which waxeth red when the Country is menaced with war? Why have so many noble families certain signs, which never fail to happen when some one of the family is to die? The commerce of the living with spirits of the dead, is a matter very extraordinary, but not impossible to the Father of spirits, who holdeth total nature between his hands.

Dithmarus. Petrus Albinus.

Peter of Clugny, surnamed the Venerable, and esteemed in his time as the oracle of France, was a man who proceeded in these affairs with much consideration, not countenancing any thing either frivolous or light. Behold the cause, wherefore I willingly make use of his authority. He telleth, that in a village of Spain named the Star, there was a man of quality called Peter of Engelbert, much esteemed in the world for his excellent parts and abundant riches.

Notwithstanding, the spirit of God have made him understand the vanity of all humane things: being now far stepped into years, he went into a Monastery of the Order of Clugny, there the more piously to pass the remnant of his daies, as it is said, the best incense cometh from old trees. He often spake amongst the holy Fryers of a vision which he saw, when he as yet was in the world, and which he acknowledged to be no small motive to work his conversion. This bruit came to the ears of Venerable Peter, who was his General, and who for the affairs of his Order, was then gone into Spain. Behold the cause why he, never admitting any discourses to be entertained, if they were not well verified, took the pains to go into a little Monastery of Nazare, where Engelbert was, and to question him upon it in the presence of the Bishops of Oleron and Osma, conjuring him in the virtue of holy obedience, to tell him punctually the truth touching the vision he had seen, whilest he led a secular life. This man being very grave, and very circumspect in all he said, spake the words which the Authour of the history hath couched in his proper terms:

In the time that Alphonsus the younger, heir of the great Alphonsus, warred in Castile against certain factious disunited from his obedience, he made an Edict, that every family in his Kingdom should be bound to furnish him with a souldier: which was the cause that for obedience to the Kings commands, I sent into his army one of my household-servants, named Sancius. The wars being ended, and the troups discharged, he returned to my house, where having some time sojourned, he was seized by a sickness, which in few days took him away into the other world. We performed the obsequies usually observed towards the dead, and four months were already past, we hearing nought at all of the state of his soul, when behold upon a winters night being in my bed, throughly awake, I perceived a man, who stirring up the ashes of my hearth, opened the burning coals, which made him the more easily to be seen. Although I found my self much terrified with the sight of this ghost, God gave me courage to ask him who he was, and for what purpose he came thither to lay my hearth abroad. But he in a very low voice answered: Master, fear nothing, I am your poor servant Sancius: I go into Castile in the company of many souldiers to expiate my sins in the same place where I committed them.

I stoutly replied, If the commandment of God call you thither, to what purpose come you hither? Sir, saith he, take it not amiss, for it is not without the Divine permission. I am in a state not desperate, and wherein I may be helped by you, if you bear any good will towards me. Hereupon I required what his necessity was, and what succour he expected from me. You know Master, said he, that a little before my death, you sent me into a place where ordinarily men are not sanctified. Liberty, ill example, youth, and temerity, all conspire against the soul of a poor souldier, who hath no government. I committed many outrages during the late war, robbing and pillaging even to the goods of the Church, for which I am at this present grievously tormented. But, good Master, if you loved me alive as one of yours, forget me not after death. I ask no part of your great riches, but onely your prayers, and some alms for my sake, which will much assist to mitigate my pains. My Mistris oweth me about eight franks upon a reckoning between her and me, let her bestow it, not for my body, which hath no need of it, but the comfort of my soul, which expecteth it from your charities.

I know not how I found my self emboldened by these speeches, but I had more desire to entertain it, then fear of the apparition. I demanded whether it could tell me news of one of my country-men, named Peter Dejaca, who died a while since. To which he made answer, I need not trouble my self with it, for he was already in the number of the blessed, since the great alms he gave in the last famine, had purchased heaven for him. From thence I fell upon another question, and was curious to know what had happened to a certain Judge, whom I very well knew, and who lately passed into the other life. To which he replied: Sir, speak not of that miserable man, for hell possesseth him through the corruption of justice which he by damnable practice exercised, having an honour and soul saleable to the prejudice of his conscience. My curiosity carried me higher, to enquire what became of King Alphonsus the great, at which time I heard another voice that came from a window behind me, saying very distinctly: It is not of Sancius you must demand that, because he as yet can say nothing to the state of that Prince, but I may have more experience thereof, then he, I deceasing five years ago, and being present in an accident which gave me some light of it. I was much surprised, unexpectedly hearing this other voice, and turning, saw by the help of the Moons brightness which reflected into my chamber, a man leaning on my window, whom I entreated to tell me where then King Alphonsus was. Whereto he replied, he well knew, that passing out of this life, he had been much tormented, and that the prayers of good religious men much helped him: but he could not at this present preſent ſay in what ſtate he was. Having ſpoken thus much, he turned toward Sancius, ſitting near the fire, and ſaid, Let us go, it is time we depart. At which Sancius making no other anſwer, ſpeedily roſe up, and redoubled his complaints with a lamentable voice, ſaying: Sir, I entreat you once again remember me, and that my Miſtriſs perform the requeſt I made you.

The next day Engelbert underſtood from his wife what the ſpirit told him, and with all obſervation diſpoſed himſelf ſpeedily and charitably, to ſatisfie all was required. What may we infer upon this, but S. Auguſtine's concluſion which he left in a book of care for the dead, fifteenth Chapter?

Holy Scriptures witneſs, that the dead are ſometimes ſeen to living men, as on the contrary, S. Paul amongſt the living was lifted up to heaven. As we ordinarily know not what becomes of the perſons of the dead, ſo we muſt confeſſe, the dead know not all is done in the world at the time it is done, but they afterwards learn it from thoſe, who paſs out of this life into the other, and converſe with them. Yet they underſtand not all ſorts of affairs, but thoſe which may be told them, and ſuch as are permitted to remain in their memories, that reconnt them to ſouls who muſt know them. Angels who are preſent to actions here beneath, may alſo diſcover to the dead what the Sovereign Arbiter, to whom all things are ſubjected, ſhall appoint to come to the knowledge of the one or other.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That we cannot be miſerable when we are no more.

Belief of a Judgment moſt generall.

THat there is an inevitable judgment of God for the damned, fire, darkneſs, eternal priſons, (O Libertine and prophane ſoul) is not a propoſition needs to be proved by many reaſons and arguments. It is the ſubject of all books, the diſcourſe of all tongues, the confeſſion of all people, the great voice of nature, which forgetfulneſs cannot obliterate, impiety extinguiſh, nor an evil conſcience take away. The Hebrews, Grecians, Latins, Chaldeans, Perſians, Arabians, Abyſſines, Affricans, Indians, and not ſpeaking of others, all Nations moſt remote from our region, moſt ſavage in manners, moſt ſtrange in cuſtoms have believed, proclaimed, proteſted, do believe, proclaim, and proteſt this through all Ages; and although different in condition, all notwithſtanding agree in the faith of a living God, who knoweth, ſeeth, judgeth of the good and bad deeds of this life, ordaineth rewards for virtue, and puniſhments for vice.

The order of God.

It is the order of God, who governeth the world with two hands, which are juſtice and mercy. If you take away one of them, you maim him. It is the condition of humane and Divine things, where contraries are ever counter-ballanced by contraries, ſay Philoſophers. If there be a Paradiſe for virtues, there muſt be a hell for crimes. No leſs doth hell contribute to publiſh Gods omnipotency, then Paradiſe. As heaven is furniſhed with ſtars, hell ſhall be with the damned, and the juſtice of the Sovereign will no leſs appear in the condemnation of the culpable, then in the defence of innocents. I knew not what made Doctour Toſtatus ſay, that Plato placed hell in the ſphere of Mars, ſince he very well mentions it in the conceave of abyſſes in his Phœdon. Triſmegiſtus in Pimander omitted not to ſpeak of avenging flames due to impiety. The Stoicks treat among their ſecrets of the general fiering of the world, as witneſſeth Clemens Alexandrinus in his ſtromata. And other Philoſophers according to Tertullian ſpeak of ſecret fire, which muſt ſerve as an inſtrument of Gods vengeance. The moſt ſtupid have ſeen it, the moſt inſolent have frown'd at it, and the moſt forlorn are aſtoniſhed with it.

on paper, what the Author of the cardinal works of Jeſus Chriſt writeth: To burn in flames which waſt not, nor ſhall ever be conſumed, to be ſcorched through the whole body with remedileſs fires, to be broiled alive in his own greaſe, and broiled with ſtains of his impurities not to be taken off. To ſee nothing but pits of fire, and flaming furnaces without eaſe, relaxation, remedy, change, or diminution of ſentence.

Incenſumptibilibus flammis corpus allambentibus ardere in propria adipe frixas libidines bullire, &c.

Notwithſtanding (O Libertine) thou doſt aſk, how this material fire burneth ſpiritual ſouls? It is one of the moſt unfortunate ſciences not to underſtand hell, but by proper experience, to diſpute the activity of a fire as true as the mouth of God, and unfaithfully deny on earth, what muſt everlaſtingly be learned under earth. Algazel the Arabian and Avicen ſaid, a damned ſoul ſuffers no other pain but the object of its eternal perdition. Algazel and Avicen: behold two goodly Authors to oppoſe the wiſdom of the eternal word. I am of opinion, we learn from devils how to believe in God, and derive our Theology from the lips of the wicked, and our belief from infidelity, as if one ſhould proſtitute a Veſtal to a loſt man. Alas wretched ſpirit! how worthy art thou of compaſſion, when not ſatisfied to play the Epicure in thy manners, thou wilt divide thy Libertiniſm with Philoſophy. If this diſcourſe, which ought to be dedicated to holy horrour of Gods judgments, did permit farther queſtion, one might ſhew with the great Biſhop of Paris, that a damned ſoul kept in a priſon of fire, retains all the ſame ſenſes, as if it were with the body in the middeſt of flames, ſince we feel in this life, ſuch vivacity only, from the imagination, that it in us produceth the ſame effects which the preſence of objects doth. And this Doctor witneſſeth he hath ſeen and known men, who needed no other purgation but the ſight of a medecine. But if the ſole idea do thus, what will the real impreſſion of fire work upon a ſoul, which raiſed by the Divine power above its ordinary force, leaves a form and a character, as if a hot iron were ſtamped on the fleſh. We might deduce with S. Thomas, Turrecremata, Cajetan, Iſolam, & Ocham, all the exquiſite dolours of a ſoul, that feeleth it ſelf impriſoned as in a cage of fire, and ſtorneth, ſeeing it ſelf not only deprived prived of sweet liberty, but tormented by an imperious element, destined by God for its punishment by extraordinary ways, by a suppliment of the antipathy of senses, and which shamefully wrack it, as if a person of eminent quality were insolently abused by some slave come from the Moores or Arabia.

See S. Aug. l. 21 City of God. S. Gregory in the 4. of his Dialogues. S. Thomas contra Gentes l. 4. c. 90. Suar. part. 3. and the R. T. Theophilus Raynaud in his natural Theology, where this question is excellently handled.

We should likewise set before you with other Divines the quality of a prodigious deformity, caused by fire raised above its condition, which extreamly afflicteth an immortal spirit, then especially, when it understands the excellent gifts wherewith God had endowed it, the favours and glories it might pretend to in this most blessed eternity. One might say with many other modern Doctours, that the soul being the root of sensitive qualities, is no less tormented by objects dissenting from sense, then as if sense were present, and hath a spiritual sense, by the help of which, it trieth and feeleth the fire with an experimental knowledg, wholly like the action of sense. All these opinions might be argued with many instances and reasons, but it being not according to the scope of this design, I say in one word with S. Gregory the Great: There is made in the soul, from a visible fire, a heat and an invisible pain. It is true, the soul separated from the body hath not a natural antipathy and disagreement from fire, but what this imperious element cannot have, remaining within the limits of nature, it obtaineth by a particular ordinance and disposition of God, who chooseth and expressly deputeth it to serve him, as an instrument and a sign in this action, and to be as an eternal messenger of his anger against a damned soul. Now as the Sovereign Judg of the world gave life to Cain for a punishment, so (according to S. Ambrose,) he engraved by the same means a disastrous mark on his person, which continually set before the eys of this fratricide the image of his crime, and the Divine justice, in such manner, that oftentimes turmoiled during life in the miseries and confusions of his brutish spirit, so soon as he represented to himself this sign, he acknowledg'd the decree of God, who prolonged his life to lengthen his calamities: So this Divine hand, Omnipotent in its effects, imprinteth fire on a damned soul, as the true token of his justice, the character of his anger, the centinel and executioner of his eternal will, who beareth the face of an incensed God with all his decrees in his own flames, who presseth and lieth heavy on this miserable thing, separated from the sight of God, and resigned through an eternal malediction to the life of devils.

Foundation of the eternity of the pains of the damned.

2. Thou must here understand, O Reader, this truth touching the eternity of the pains of the damned, confirmed by expres texts of holy Scripture, and the decision of the universal Church, and by all Ages, is grounded upon the justice of God, ever to be adored by our wils, although impenetrable to the weakness of our understanding: and for confirmation hereof, I think we should not omit the reasons of S. Gregory, S. Bernard and S. Thomas, before we produce that, which to me seems the most formal; for although they are not all necessary in their conclusions, yet they fail not to furnish us with much light, and to give matter of true piety, which is the butt whereat we aim in this discourse. You (O sinner) demand, why is a deadly sin strucken and punished with an eternal pain? I answer you first with S. Gregory the Great, that if an eternal malice be proved in sin, justice by all reasonable ways requireth the chastizement of it to be eternal: for an eternity of crimes must be counterballanced with an eternity of miseries. Now sin in some sort is eternal, and in some manner extends beyond our life, which alone is capable of merit or demerit. For tell me, those stones and kernels of pomegranates, & apple-trees, and all other trees created in the first week of the world, were they temporary or eternal? Temporary you will say, for they fell before the tree. And yet behold they propagate to our time, and live in as many trees as there are of their kind on earth, for these five thousand years, or thereabouts. The like is it with the actions you do at this present: For they seem to pass in a moment, yet are they so many seeds of eternity. Reader, understand well what I say, behold here a secret, wherewith daily to acquire a rich treasure of merits: make me all your virtues as eternal by the sincerity of your intentions, as they in effect are such in their consequence. When you do a good work, be it praier, alms, or other act of charity, do it stoutly, in such manner and disposition, that were you eternal on earth, you would eternally renounce evil, and embrace good. So do all the Just, and so do they eternize all good and laudable actions. But sinners, who pass out of this life in mortal sin, are so framed, that might you enter into their hearts, you there should find such marks of malice, such characters of sin imprinted, as with a hot iron, that they wish to live eternally, to sin everlastingly. Their life is mortal, but the affections they have towards sin are immortal, for which cause Gods justice requires they never be without torment, who would never live without sin.

Vellent sine vivere, ut possint sine fine peccare. Discrete austero judice corda pensat & affectus, non facta.

And say not to me, behold that miserable sinner seized on by the Divine Justice in the heat of his crime, it is not likely he would still persist in his enormous transgression, the boiling of his passion would vapour away, and his spirit be restored to the calm, and reason to its thron. Nay much otherwise. a sinner, who dieth in sin hath the root of affections, which is the heart, so envenomed, that all the sprouts are nought but abomination. And although he were to live an hundred thousand year, should not some servile fear stop the torrent of his corruption, he would spend them in these exorbitances.

Ad magnam justitiam judicandum pertinet, ut nunquam careant supplicio, qui in hac vita nunquam carere voluerunt peccato.

1. Reason of S. Greg. Non transitus opera nostra ut evadantur, sed temporalia quaque velut æternitatis semina jaciuntur.

3. The second reason is drawn from S. Thomas, who saith, the nature of mortal sin is a privation of spiritual life, as death is a privation of corporal. Behold a tree which was heretofore thick spread with boughs and flourishing, is now parched and dry, without force, and life. Let it be in this state, so will it remain still, never returning to its first vigour. Behold a man likewise, who hath killed charity in his heart which is the root of spiritual life, by some most grievous sin, to dy in this state. It is the impossibility of impossibilities, that in the other world not capable of merit or demerit, he may change himself. Death ever reigns there where is trespass, and trespass still reigning there, deserves to be punished without intermission. It is alwaies chastised and never expiated, saith S. Bernard.

2. Reason. S. Thom. 1. 2. q. 87.

Semper peccatis patet, nunquam potest expiari. S. Bernard. de consid. l. 3.

And that you may well understand this, represent unto your self an excellent conceit of one of the greatest wits which ever flourished, Picus Mirandula, in the book he composed of the dignity of man. We are in the world as in the shop of a Sculptour, who laboureth on Statues of Mettal. Behold the burning Furnace, behold the Mettal all boiling, behold many Moulds ready at hand. Say you unto him, Sir, make us some curious piece worthy of you, make us a generous Lion, make an Eagle, make a triumphant King, it is now in your power. But if the Workman through malice or incivility should say, I will make nothing of it, I am about to make of all this melted Mettal vessels of ignominy, and so he doth, had not

An excellent conceit of Picus Mirandula. Tui ipsius quasi arbitrarius honorarius que plastes & fictor, quam malueris tu tibi formam effingas, poterunt in inferiora quæ sunt bruta degenerare, poterunt in superiora quæ sunt divina ex animi tui sententia regenerari. Picus Mirandula de dignitate hom. by you,

you cause to say unto him, what hast thou done; all is marr'd, there is no time given for you to repent it, the mettal is cast. I say the like after this great man: Behold us in this world, as in the house of a Plummer or Graver; our understanding is the Enginier, who laboureth upon the search of a thousand inventions: our will is the Mistris, who keeps the mettal still boiling, and the mettal is our life, and our soul indeterminate. God saith unto us, up friend, be courageous, thou may'st make thy self a little God, perfectly framed to my likeness: Behold, take the mould, cast it confidently. I will make nothing of it, saith the sinner, I am about to make a hog, an owl, a serpent, a hideous monster; and behold in effect all so made at the hour of death. The mettal is cast, repentance is unprofitable, since Hell vomiteth up good desires, and affordeth no felicities: thou hast made a monster, and thou shalt remain a monster whilest thou art in this estate, which is immovable, fire likewise shall be annexed to thee to gnaw thee, which is the worm in the rotten wood.

8. Reason drawn from the right of God, and from the nature of sin.

Add for a third instance, that God who is wholly infinite, hath right in him to oblige us to the keeping of the law, under an infinite penalty, considering the greatness of his perfection and benefits. The continuance of the pain is not measured by the lasting of actions. A man is hanged, who still so remaineth, for a theft done in a moment. If this be done daily for the reparation of the honour and goods of another man who is offended, although he be a captive and a miserable creature, what shall we think of offences committed against the Divinity? Must we not confess, that sin of its own nature, and by the only consideration of its proper malice, deserveth infinite punishment, since it hath mischief in it, respectively infinite? And as it needed the Incarnation, death, and passion of a Word infinite to wash it on earth, so it must have an eternal punishment to expiate it under earth. What can you find strange in this proceeding?

Punire non est malum sed fieri pœna dignum. Peccatum non potest residere ad perpetuum nisi in inferno. Dionys. c. 4. de divin. nom.

I say, it is not Hell that should put these quaking and icy fear into our bones: it is not pain should be strange unto us, but sin; it is not an evil to be punished, but to be worthy of punishment. You complain sin is lodged in Hell, where would you place it? In Heaven? Is it a fit thing, I pray you, to carry dirt into a King's Palace? The heavens according to Job are stronger then iron or brass; and yet you see these celestial bodies able to carry all the glory of God, cannot bear one single sinner, so heavy, so insupportable he is. So soon as the rebellious Angels conceived a sin of pride, heaven cried out murther, and could not indure them: behold them fall from the Palace of glory more thick then flakes of snow, or hail on a Winters day. Where would you lodge this mortal sin? On the earth? See you not in the book of Numbers, how after the rebellion of Core, Dathan, and Abiram, this earth, which is the foundation and basis of the Universe, changed its nature, shook with frightful tremblings, and opened its wide and gaping bosom to swallow these disastrous creatures? Where shall we lodge this sin? On the waters? Behold the waters could not indure one sole disobedience of Jonas? All the air is on fire, all the winds in blusters, all the Sea in rage and fury, whilest it is under the weight of this poor sinner. He must be cast into the belly of a Whale, although unable to digest, she vomited him up. God himself, God Omnipotent, in whose hands all this great world is but a drop of dew, complains he cannot indure sin. Where shall we place it then but in the pit of Hell?

Solidissimi quasi are fusi sunt. Job 37.

The grievousness of sin. Numb. 16.

Laboravi sustinens. Job 1.

But if at least this pain had some end. And see you not, sin hath neither end nor limits in its Eternity? Alas! he who would understand this, who would open his eys to behold what I am about to say, and what I conceal, had rather put himself into the arms of Hell being in innocency, then among imaginary felicities in crime and sin. If you know it not, O Christians, it is an infinite evil, because it striketh at the head of an infinite Divinity, and it is an horrible thing to think on, for that as much as is possible, it annihilateth God & the whole fountain of Essences, felicities, and mercies. Do you not consider a transgression increaseth according as the person interessed is of great and eminent quality? It is one thing to offend a peasant, another thing a Merchant, another thing a Judge, another a King. But he who offends all Kings and all judges of the earth, or should thrust a knife into the throat of a million of men, would he not seem very criminal? Nay, where all the greatness, grace, and majesty of a hundred thousand worlds poured and quintessenced in one body, what would it be in comparison of God, but one grain of sand? And then to invade God, in his will to infringe and annual the Divinity; O abyss of confusion! To say unto God Omnipotent, all good, and all holy, You will give me a law, and I will play the unbridled Colt, I will take it of my self, I will admit no Law-maker: you created me for your self, and I will live for my self, and be the sovereign good of my self: you created a world for my use, and I will people it with monsters, which shall be my sins. You redeemed and reconciled me by the blood of your Son, and I will contemn and trample it under foot. I should not presume to use these words, had not S. Paul prevented me. You will be a Judge to chastise me, and I make as much account of all your thunder-strokes, as of broken rushes. To despise God as a Law-maker, as a Creatour, as a Father, as a Redeemer, as a Judge, as God, as all, and then say, God did you wrong in making a Hell!

Duxerunt in bonis dies suos, & in punctо ad infernа descendunt. Job 21. 13.

Enormity of a sinner.

Irritam qui facimus legem Mosis sine ulla miseratione moritur, quanto magis putatis deteriora mereri supplicia, qui Filium Dei conculcaverit, & sanguinem Testamenti pollutum duxerit. Hb 10.

5. Behold there his justice purged, now see its effect in the quality and condition of pains of the damned. What is Hell? It is called Silence, to shew we cannot speak of it but by silence. All is said of Hell, is less then Hell. The holy history of Ægyptian Anchorites written by Palladius, recounteth an accident very prodigious happened to the great Macharius, which is, that one day this admirable man, commonly called the God of Monks (for his speech was an oracle, & his life a perpetual miracle) this excellent man, I say, travelling through the hideous and savage Deserts of Ægypt, always fixed and bent both with ey & heart upon the contemplation of a future life, met with the head of a dead man by the way, and ere he was aware, set a Palmers staff which he had in his hand upright upon it, & behold at the same instant (as it happened in other occasions) he heard to come from the head of this dead man, a sad and frightful voice, able to have astonished the most courageous. But the holy Saint, being wholly made for these apparitions of spirits, and armed to the proof against all illusions of Satan, stood still and asked, Whose art thou? It answered, I am the head of one damned. He replied, What threw the head-long into this wretched misery? Two things, said the dead; Misbelief, and Vice. Then being demanded concerning the torments he endured. He replied; The soul makes hell, the soul suffers hell, and the soul cannot well comprehend what hell is. What have you on the earth, more odious then horrible darkness? and not to speak of our coals, nor of any of the rest of our greatest calamities, behold our greatest ease. The unhappy spirit cutting off his words, held his peace, and the holy

Quality, and condition of the pains of the damned.

Strange narration of Palladius.

man lifting the head up from the ground, took it in his hand, then deeply ſighing with ſobs of lively and penetrating grief, he ſaid: O what eaſe! O what eaſe! what eternal darkneſs! blind world, proſtituted world, deſperate world, oh wouldeſt thou know, Wouldſt thou know! but thine unhappineſs hath put a ſcarf before thine eys.

I would here conclude this diſcourſe, and ſubſtitute in my place this bleſſed old man, the eye and honour of theſe deſarts, holding this dead mans head between his hands: I would intreat him to ask of it again, what have availed the damned their honours, reputation, riches, riots, pleaſures, delights; thoſe wretched lime-twigs, which entangled the wings of the ſoul, and plunged it into an abyſs of infelicities, I would intreat it to tell us what a monſter mortal ſin is, ſince to puniſh it ſuch dreadful dungeons muſt be built, ſuch racks and tortures. It would tell this with a voice of thunder accompanied with flouds of tears, and you would be appalled, tremble, and weep at it with all the juſt, who never think of hell but with terrour and tears.

Definition of hell. Arcani ignis ſubterranei ad pœnam theſaurus: abyſſus in viſceribus terræ profundus, &c. Tertul. de anima.

O brutiſh and ſenſual men, who live in a continual contempt of Gods anger! Ask the great Tertullian what hell is? And he will anſwer, hell is a treaſury of fire, enkindled by the breath of God for puniſhment of the damned: hell is an ugly and deep ſink, and a ſewer, wherein all the ordures of Ages are thrown. Ask of Hugo of S. Victor (a) what hell is, and he will reply a bottom without bottom, which ſhutteth the gate againſt all hopes, and opens it to all deſpairs. Ask of S. John (b) what hell is, and he will tell you aloud and plainly, hell is the great lake of Gods anger: It is a great pool of fire and brimſtone perpetually inflamed with ſtrong and vigorous breaths of the Omnipotent. And what do the damned there? (c) They burn and ſmoak. On what live they? On the gall of dragons. What air breath they? That of burning coals. What ſtars and lights have they? The fire of their torments. What nights? Of palpable darkneſs. What beds? The couches of aſpicks and and baſilisks. What language ſpeak they? Blaſphemies. What order have they amongſt them? Confuſion. What hope? Deſpair. What patience? Rage. O hell, O hell! Avant, O gnawing worm, avant O living death, avant death which never dies, avant life which daily, not dying, dies.

(c) Life of the damned. Horres vermem mordacem & mortem vivacem: horres videre in manum mortis venturi, & vitam morientis. Guilielm. Paris. de univ. p. 1. c. 15.

I ſpeak not here of the pain of ſenſe, exerciſed by this pittileſs element, which worketh upon ſouls as I have ſhewed you in the beginning of this diſcourſe. I let paſs this world of puniſhments figured by vultures, gibbets, tortures, ſnakes, burning pincers, and all the inſtruments of terrours, I only ſpeak of the pain which tormenteth the damned by privation from the ſight of God. Imagine within your ſelf a ſublime conceit of the great Prelate of France, William of Paris, who in a Treatiſe he made of the univerſe, pertinently ſheweth, that as Paradiſe is the houſe of all felicity, ſo hell muſt be the receptacle of all miſery and calamity. Now the bleſſed, beſides beauty of the glory of their bodies, the contentment to enjoy ſo excellent and triumphant company, have a happineſs totally infinite in the ſight of God, which is the period of their eſſential felicity: So likewiſe in the ſame meaſure the damned ſhal have ſome object ſad and mournful, incomparably dolorous, and according to its nature infinite, which collecteth as into one ſum all their calamities. And what is this object? Some will imagine it is the aſpect of the great lake of fire, and horrid legions of devils. That truly is horrible, but that is not yet the top of their ſupream miſery. What is it then? I do aſſure my ſelf you will at firſt be aſtoniſhed with what I ſhall ſay, and will hold it as a paradox, but it is undoubted. The darkneſs of hell is apprehended as a moſt intollerable evil, and that with juſt cauſe. Notwithſtanding I affirm the greateſt torment of the damned, & heigth of their notable calamities, is light. I ſay light of ſcience and knowledge. To underſtand this, you muſt obſerve a paſſage of the Prophet Ezechiel in the firſt Chapter, where he deſcribeth the majeſty of the God of hoſts, who prepareth to chaſtiſe the wicked: he repreſenteth him unto us like a hideous chryſtal mirrour, that is to ſay, God planteth an idea of himſelf in the ſoul of a damned creature, as of a mirrour of Chryſtal, and a terrible light, in which, and through which, it beholdeth moſt clearly and evidently the good it hath loſt by forſaking God, and the evil incurred by drenching it ſelf into the ſad habitation of the reprobate. It ſeeth how in looſing God, it hath loſt a good, delicious, fruitful, infinite, everlaſting, incomprehenſible; a good, for which it was created, and formed by the hands of God; a good, which is meerly and abſolutely loſt by its infidelity, ingratitude, wickedneſs, perverſe obſtinacy in ſin; a good, which it might have repaired in a moment of the time it heretofore had: and behold it now irrecoverably for ever loſt. Moreover it ſees and feeleth by a diſaſtrous experience, the evil whereunto it is fixed by pertinacity. And that which is alſo more terrible, is, that as God is repleniſhed with a ful and moſt plentiful felicity, becauſe he hath all his contentments aſſembled together, ſo the damned ſoul, by a moſt lively and piercing apprehenſion of the eternity of its pains, beholdeth the evils it muſt endure beyond a hundred millions of years, and hath them all as preſent in thought. From theſe two lights and two knowledges in the damned ſoul, ſpring as it were two ſnakes, faſtned both to the one, and other ſide of its heart, which inceſſantly and unconſumably ſuck all the juice and marrow of its ſubſtance. The holy man Boetius (the eye of the Roman Senate and ornament of the Church) lets us underſtand what the puniſhment of the damned is, when he ſaith, there needeth neither wheels, tortures, nor gibbets to puniſh the wicked. He who might only ſhew them the beauty of virtue in the form of a lightning-flaſh, and ſay unto them, behold wretched creatures, behold what you have loſt by your folly, the ſorrow they would conceive for their loſs would be ſo ſenſible, that no keen razour, devouring flames, gnawing vultures might put them to a more exquiſite torment.

The ſouls of the damned tormented by their lights. Aſpectus Chryſtalli terribilis.

Quid dementium Holidius me actibus impreſſer, &c.

Now I leave you to think, if the wicked in this life for one ſole idea of virtue, which paſſeth in a moment ſhould conceive ſuch a remorſe, what may a damned ſoul that ſees in this hideous chryſtal, not for a moment, but through all moments of eternity, the infinite good it hath loſt, the infinite unhappineſs wherein it for ever ſees it ſelf involved. Then is it, yea perpetually gnawn, torn, and tumbled into a huge torrent of inexplicable dolours, which cauſe it to break into furies and unprofitable frenzies.

Locus pœnæ felicitatis nihil habet quod non addat felicitati: locus pœnæ miſeriæ nihil habet quod non addat calamitati.

O Palace of God, ſaith it, which I have loſt! O ugly dens of dragons, whereinto I am head-long thrown! O brightneſs of Paradiſe, which ſhalt be nothing to me! O hideous darkneſs, which ſhalt eternally be my inheritance! O goodly and triumphant company of elect ſouls, with whom I ſhould eternally have lived, had not my wretchedneſs ſealed up mine eyes! O infernal countenances of enraged devils, which ſhal hereafter be my objects and perpetual companions! O torrent of delights which poureſt thy ſelf upon thoſe bleſſed ſpirits, how have I turned

turned thee into a lake filled with pitch, ſulphur, and ſcorching flames, enkindled with the breath of the Omnipotents anger! O couch of King Solomon, how have I given thee away for a bed of coals! O God, O God, whom I have loſt, and whom I cannot looſe! I have loſt him in the quality of a Sovereign Good, yet have him perpetually preſent as the object and cauſe of my pains. O eternity! It is then true, that ten millions of years hence my evils ſhall but begin. Curſed athieſm and infidelity of the world, thou wouldeſt rather feel theſe torments then believe them. Wert thou not mad? Cruel ambition, thou haſt given me the ſtroke of death. Diſaſtrous riches, you have forged gyves, which now fetter me. Loves, (petty vipers of inhumane hearts) you ceaſed not to breath and enkindle ſparks, which made theſe fires for me. Wicked companies, charming companies, traiterous companies, you were the chains of my ruin. O why was not the womb of my Mother, that ſerved for the firſt bed of my conception, the Sepulcher of my birth! O why the ſtars, which predominated at my coming into the world, in lieu of their benign aſpects, threw they not darts of poyſon againſt me? Why did not the earth ſwallow me in my Cradle? Muſt I live one ſole moment, to live an enemy of God eternally? O God, what an abyſs is thy judgement! Let us draw, let us draw aſide the curtain of ſilence, thy ſpirit can no longer endure me, nor my pen maintain the conceptions of my heart.

6. It ſeems enough is ſaid to ſhew the horrour of mortal ſin, which alone is the cauſe and procurer of hell. Think ſeriouſly on all I have ſaid, and all I have omitted, and if you deſire to eſchew the unhappineſs of a reaſonable creature, which I have expreſſed, obſerve I pray perpetually and inviolably theſe things, which I would, if I might, inſcribe on your hearts in unremoveable characters. The firſt is, that you muſt diligently ſeek to fore-arm your ſelves againſt a certain liberty of heart, which neither feareth ſin, hell, nor evils of the other life; liberty of heart, which ſwayeth now adays throughout the world, of which Sathan makes uſe to blunt the darts of heaven, and all the incitements to the fear of God, as being the true way of athieſm, and an undoubted note of damnation. But contrariwiſe frame unto your ſelf a conſcience termed timorous, a conſcience filially and lovingly fearfull, which layeth hold without ſcruple and diſturbance, even of the leaſt offences and imperfections. Fear is the mother of ſafety, and the means not to fear hell at all, is to fear it always. In the ſecond place you muſt effectually apprehend frequent relapſe into mortal ſins, which is the ſecond note of reprobation. For when a creature ſuddenly returneth into enormous ſins, and playeth as between Paradiſe and hell, it is a ſign he harboureth in this evil heart a plain contempt of God, and an eternal root of ſin, the ſprout whereof is an everlaſting puniſhment. In the third place you muſt ſtill live in the ſtate wherin you would die, and often to call your ſoul to an account of your actions. Ah my ſoul! If you were at this preſent inſtant to diſlodge out of this world, are you in a ſtate to be preſented before the inevitable throne of the Sovereign Judge? Have you not ſome touch of mortal ſin? Is there not ſome reſtitution to make? ſome ſatisfaction not accompliſhed? Reſts there not in your heart ſome blemiſh of evil company, and worldly love, which ſlackeneth your purpoſes? Let us break, let us break theſe chains: there is neither pleaſure, mony, nor honour can hold. You muſt ſeek ſalvation and ſay: O God of mercy; O moſt mild Saviour, I embrace thy Altars, and implore thy clemency, deliver my poor ſoul from the ſnares of Sathan, and eternal death at the great day, when heaven and earth ſhall flie before thy Juſtice. I am neither greater then David, nor more holy then S. Paul, not to think of hell. All my members quake, and bloud waxeth cold in my veins, when I reflect on it. O Jeſus, O love of eternal mountains, deliver not a ſoul over to this infernal beaſt, which will have no lips, but to praiſe and confeſs thee, eyes, but to behold thee, feet, but to run after thy commandments, nor hands, but eternally to ſerve thee.

Nemo ſapius opprimitur, quam qui nihil timet: frequentiſſimus calamitatis ineſſe ſecuritas. Velleius.

The eighteenth EXAMPLE, upon the eighteenth MAXIM.

Of Judgment, and of the pains of Hell.

ALl affairs of the world end in one great affair of the other life, which is that of the judgment God will give upon our ſoul, at its paſſage out of the body. A heart, which hath no apprehenſion thereof, unleſs it hath ſome extraordinary revelation of its glory, is faithleſs or ſtupid to extremity.

The ſimple idea's of this day make the moſt confident to quake: not ſo much as pictures but have given matter of fear, and if ſome ſparks of knowledge touching that, which paſſeth at the tribunal of God, come unto us, it ever produceth good effects in ſouls, which had ſome diſpoſition to piety.

Curopalates. Curopalates relateth, that whileſt Theodora poſſeſſed the Empire of Conſtantinople with her ſon, who was yet in minority, one named Methodius, an excellent Painter, an Italian by Nation, and religious by profeſſion, went to the Court of the Bulgarian King named Bogoris, where he was entertain'd with much favour. This Prince was yet a Pagan, and though trial had been made to convert him to faith, it ſucceeded not, becauſe his mind employed on pleaſures and worldly affairs, gave very little acceſs to reaſon. He was exceſſively pleaſed with hunting, and as ſome delight in pictures to behold what they love, ſo he appointed Methodius to paint an excellent piece of hunting in a Palace, which he newly had built, and not to forget to pencil forth ſome hideous monſters, and frightfull ſhapes.

The Painter, ſeeing he had a fair occaſion to take his opportunity for the converſion of this infidel, inſtead of painting an hunting piece for him, made an exquiſite table of the day of judgment. There upon one part was to be ſeen heaven in mourning, on the other the earth on fire, the Sea in bloud, the throne of God hanging in the clouds, environed with infinite ſtore of legions of Angels, with countleſs numbers of men raiſed again, fearfully expecting the decree of their happineſs, or lateſt miſery. Below were the devils in divers ſhapes of hideous monſters, all ready to execute ſtrange puniſhments upon ſouls abandoned to their fury. The abyſs of Hell was open, and threw forth many flames with vapours, able to cover heaven, and infect the earth. This draught being in hand, the Painter ſtill held the King in expectation, ſaying, he wrought an excellent picture for him, and which perhaps might be the laſt maſter-piece of his hand.

In the end the day aſſigned being come, he drew aſide the curtain, and ſhewed his work. It is ſaid the King at firſt ſtood ſome while penſive, not being able to wonder enough at this ſight. Then turning towards Methodius, what is this? ſaid he. The religious man took occaſion thereupon to tell him of the judgments of God, of puniſhments and rewards in the other life, wherewith he was ſo moved, that in a ſhort time he yielded himſelf to God by a happy converſion.

If draughts and colours have this effect, what do not viſions, and undoubted revelations, which were communicated to many Saints concerning affairs of the other life? Every one knows the wiſdom and authority of S. Boniface the Martyr, who converted Germany, ſent thither by Gregory the ſecond, and who flouriſhed about nine hundred years ago. This great Apoſtle of the Northern parts left goodly writings to poſterity, being moſt learned, and we have to this day ſome Epiſtles of his taken out of good Libraries.

S. Bonifacius. ep. 31. In the one and twentieth of his letters written to Aldeburgus, he makes mention of a man who was raiſed again to life in his time, the miracle much known, and verified before all the world: for to prove he proceeded very far into knowledges of the other life, he advertiſed many men of note of moſt ſecret ſins, never opened to any living man, and exhorted them for God's ſake to true penance. He likewiſe foretold the death of Ceolredus King of Mercia, who reigned with much tyranny and rapine, whereof he received the reward.

This great Prelate S. Boniface, then in Germany, ſought to inform himſelf particularly of this wonder, and afterward couched in the fore-mentioned Epiſtle, the diſcourſe he had with this late raiſed man. How he asked many queſtions concerning events happened to him in this ſo dangerous paſſage: he tels the ſtory and relates it with tears in his eys.

Alas! how much other are our knowledges at the ſeparation of the ſoul from the body, then they are in this preſent life. We here only ſee through two little holes, which are our two eys, the bark of objects, a very little diſtance: but the inſtant of death diſcovers unto us much other truths. Repreſent unto your ſelf, ſaid he, a blind man, who never ſaw any thing, if ſome one come and take away the film, giving him ſight, he would then behold things ſpoken of in a much other manner then he imagined. The like happened to me; for my ſoul leaving my body about midnight, I inſtantly ſaw the whole world with the extenſion of its lands and ſeas that water it, as if it had been abbreviated in a table, although to ſay truth, it was not the univerſe which was abridged, but the ſight of the ſpirit dilated by diſengagement from the body.

The world was all encompaſſed with fire, which ſeemed to me of an exceſſive greatneſs, and ready to ſwallow all the elements, if its impetuous courſe had not been ſtaied by the meaſures of God's hand. At the ſame time I perceived our Saviour in the quality of a Judge, inviroined with an infinite number of Angels, indued with marvellous brightneſs and excellent beauty. On the other ſide Devils in dreadful ſhapes, which I cannot now well deſcribe, ſince my ſoul is returned to my body. At the ſame inſtant, ſouls newly unlooſened from bodies, came from all parts in ſo prodigious numbers, that I could never believe there had been ſo many creatures in the world. Then was a rigorous Examen made of crimes committed in the life paſt: and I ſaw very few ſouls who had holily lived, whileſt they were as yet in this mortal fleſh, to fly unto Heaven with Palms and Crowns. Others were reſerved to be purged, as gold in the Furnace, and to follow the ſteps of thoſe happy Warriours who had gone before them.

As for thoſe who went from this life out of the ſtate of grace, and were in mortal ſin, it was a horrible thing to ſee the tyranny with which the Devils uſed them. For I perceived, in places under the earth, pits which vomited fire and flames, on the brinks whereof I ſaw thoſe ſouls in ſuch manner, as we ſhall ſee ſome fatal birds, who bewailed and lamented their diſaſters with dreadful complaints, able to rent rocks and marbles aſunder. Then they were thrown into precipices of fire, bidding a long adieu to all pleaſures, without hope ever to behold the face of God, nor pleaſing light of the Sun, or to have fruition of any other reflection but the flames of their torments.

I who ſaw theſe ſtrange paſſages, leave you to think with what terrour I expected the laſt ſentence of my Judge. The evil ſpirits began to accuſe me with all violence: you would have ſaid, they had reckoned all the ſteps of my life, ſo rigorouſly they muſtred up all the ſlighteſt actions. But nothing at that time was ſo inſupportable to me as mine own conſcience. For the ſins which I heretofore imagined to be light, were preſented unto me in ſpirit as horrid phantaſms, which ſeemed to reproach me with mine ingratitude towards God, and to ſay: I am the pleaſure thou haſt obeyed, I am the ambition whoſe ſlave thou waſt, I am the avarice which was the aim of all thy actions. Behold ſo many ſins which are thy children. Thou begatſt them: thou ſo much didſt love them, as to prefer them before thy Saviour. It is an admirable thing that I likewiſe ſaw the ſpecter of a man whom I had heretofore wounded, though yet alive. He ſeemed to be preſent at this Judgment, and to require of me an account of his blood.

All theſe horrours had already ingulphed me into an inconſolable ſadneſs, expecting nought at all but the ſtroke of thunder and ſentence of my Judge, at which time my good Angel diſpoſed himſelf to produce ſome good works I had heretofore done.

One cannot ſay nor believe the comfort a ſoul then feels in the remembrance of virtues it exerciſed in the body. Happy a thouſand fold the hands which ſow alms on earth, to reap them in heaven. It ſeemed to me I ſaw ſo many ſtars of a favourable influence, when I beheld this little good I had done with God's grace.

Laſtly, ſentence was pronounced, that for inſtruction of many, I ſhould again return into life.

I muſt confeſs unto you, that among ſo many troubles of mind, ſo many fears and frights which I ſuffered before the deciſion of my affairs (except Devils and Hell) nothing ſo much ſtruck me with horrour as to ſee my body, for which a burial was prepared. Is it poſſible (ſaid I to my ſelf) that to ſerve this carrion I ſo often have forſaken my God! Is it poſſible that to fatten this dunghil, I deſpiſed my ſoul! That I ſo adored my priſon and fetters, as to ballance them with the Croſs and Nails of my Saviour Jeſus! for this cauſe I had ſome repugnance to re-enter into this body, which ſeemed to me a little Hell. But my ſoul coming back into it, I remained the ſpace of ſeven days quite ſtupid, and ſo laſtly ſtrove with my ſelf till blood guſhed from mine eys, as not having tears ſufficient to bemoan my ſins. Behold me ready to declare and witneſs to all mortals by an authentick example the words of the Wiſeman, who ſaith; MEMORARE NOVISSIMA TUA, ET IN ÆTERNUM NON PECCABIS: REMEMBER ALL VVILL PASS AT THE LAST HOUR, AND THOU SHALT NEVER OFFEND. Eccleſ. 7.

I beſeech the Reader who peruſeth theſe lines to put the affairs of his conſcience in order, and if he love any thing in the world, to love it for life eternal.

XIX. MAXIM.

Of Sovereign Happineſs.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

It is a ſimplicity to forſake certain pleaſures for an uncertain beatitude.

Opinion concerning beatitude.

WE live here among the groans of creatures, every one well underſtands he is not in his right ſituation, and all the world turns from one ſide to another, like a ſick man in a bed, and if any one ly ſtill, it is rather through the impotency of motion, then the happineſs of repoſe. Our ſoul well knows, it is the daughter of a good houſe, that there is another place which expecteth it, another life which inviteth it: It ſeeth ſome glimmers of felicity in the maſs of this body, but hath much ado to follow them, ſo many illuſions deceive it upon one ſide, and ſo many obſtacles oppoſe it on the other.

Diſturbances of life. Auguſt. l. 2. de Trinit. c. 12. Amor magis ſentitur eum prodit indigentia.

The great flood and ebb of perpetual diſturbances, ſhew us we are made for ſome great matter, ſince among ſo many objects, there is none which either fully or long contenteth us. We underſtand our happineſs by the continual change of our miſeries, and our ſtrong appetite by diſtaſt of all things. Love, which according to Plato is the ſon of indigence, never is ſo ill as with its own mother, from whom it learns nothing but its poverty, which addeth a ſharp ſpur to direct it to riches.

Naz. de itineribus vitæ. The divers wayes of humane life, according to S. Gregory. That the choice of conditions of life is hazardous.

When I read S. Gregory Nazianzen, in the great work he compiled of ſundry courſes of life, it ſeems to me I behold a man in the entrance of a labyrinth, much diſtracted, who will and will not, who deſires, waxeth drouthy, is intranced, and become pale, yea, in the height of his delights. It ſeems to me nature leadeth him through all the corners of her Kingdom, and ſaies unto him: O man, what wouldeſt thou do to become happy? Behold, I conduct thee through all the parts of my juriſdiction, of purpoſe to afford thee felicity, which thou ſeekeſt. Wilt thou then marry? fie no, ſaith he, for there is too much hazard in the adventure: ſingle life? It is painful: would you have children? they cloy with too much care: barrenneſs? it hath no ſupport: riches? they are treacherous to their Maſter, and many have been in danger to looſe life for having too much wherewith to live: charges and honours? they coſt overmuch, and are indeed dead trees, whereinto Oſtriches fly as well as Eagles: would you have favour? it is a ſquib which cracks in the air, and leaves nothing behind it but burnt paper and ſmoak: but if the Courts of Great-ones afford good fruit, there is ſtore many times of evil birds, which devour it. Thou wouldeſt then live in ſubjection (ſaith nature) ſince thou canſt not command? He replieth, he could not obey. I will make thee poor, ſaith ſhe, to teach thee humility: you were as good, quoth he, to put me on the wheel. Thou ſhalt have beauty; it is the ſnare of luſt: youth, it is the bubbling of time: ſtrength, it ſhal be inferiour to bulls: nobility, it is too full of liberty: eloquence, it is too vain: skil in pleading, it is nought but wrangling. Wouldeſt thou wear a ſword by thy ſide? it is to live either an homicide, or to become a victime of death: retire into ſome wilderneſs? it is to languiſh. Will you have title? it is to become captive: traffick? it hath too much hazard and pains: travel? it hath too much toil: ſail on the ſea? there are too many ſtorms: ſtay on the land? it is repleat with miſeries: learn ſome trade? all is full of craft, and I find none good: manure the earth? I am not able: live idlely? that is to rot alive.

One knoweth not on what ſide to turn him in the world; poor ſtates are overwhelmed under their miſeries, great totter, born down with the weight of their own greatneſs. We find by experience, that we here lead a painful, bitter, and corruptible life, which is fruitful in miſeries, knowing in all whereof it ſhould be ignorant, and many times impotent but to do ill. A life over which elements predominate, which heats burn, cold congeals, humours ſwell, maladies torment, the very air and viands wherewith it lives ceaſe not to corrupt. A life which ſoves tyrannize, hopes flatter, cares devour, anxieties oppreſs, joys make profuſely diſſolute. A life which ignorance blindfolds, fleſh tempteth, the world deceives, ſin poiſoneth, the devil beguiles, inconſtancy turmoileth, time takes away, and death deſpoileth.

Oblectamur humilitate depreſſa, abſtant celſa faſtigia. S. Eucherius. Miſeries of this preſent life.

Now what ſpirit is ſo brutiſh and unnatural, which conſidering upon one ſide how God accommodateth all creatures, even the leaſt flies, to the full latitude of that felicity their nature admitteth, and on the other ſide ſeeing this great abyſs of miſeries, wherein we roſe in this life, doth not judge that God, who in his nature is moſt wiſe and benign, hath not ſo given the King of creatures over as prey to injuries and calamities, as not to have reſerved a life of ſpirits for him, ſince he is ſpirit, to pleaſe him by an intellectual felicity.

2. The Sages of Gentiliſm have looked this verity in the face by the ſole ray of natural light. For if we conſult with Alpharabius the Arabian, he will tell us, that the Sovereign felicity of man conſiſteth in a perfect diſpoſe of the functions of his ſoul, as wel thoſe which concern the underſtanding, as ſuch as depend on the will. If we aſk of the Philoſopher Heraclitus, what wiped his eyes ſo many times drenched in his tears? He will tell you, that it was the contemplation of a good not imaginable, which ſouls expected in the other life. If we deſire to underſtand the apprehenſions of Metrodorus, we ſhal learn the ſoul muſt aſcend until it behold time in its ſource, and the infinity of the firſt Being. If we covet to hear Plato upon it, doth not he diſcourſe in his Phædon, that the ſoul recollected within it ſelf, mounteth to the Divinity, whoſe image it carrieth, and that in the fruition thereof, it ſatisfieth all deſires? Is it not likewiſe the doctrine of Triſmegiſtus in his Pymander? Doth not he teach us, the ſoul after death of the body returns to its nature, as a troubled water which which purifieth when it is ſetled. And doth not Plotinus triumph on this ſubject in publiſhing, that bleſſed ſouls at their paſſage out of bodies to the firſt beauty, which hath power to make all its ſpectators fair and amiable? There it is, (ſaith he) we ſhall live for ever in the palace of verity, which is the mother-nurſe, nouriſhment, and eſſence of our ſoul. There it is, that all is all, and where each part becometh a whole. There it is, where happineſs is indefatigable, and plenitude never gives a loathing to him who poſſeſſeth it. And who knoweth not the raptures of Seneca, when in the hundred and ſecond Epiſtle he ſpeaks of the ſoul, which goeth out of the body, as from a wretched veſſel, to enter into theſe vaſt Temples of Intelligences and lights, deriving its nouriſhment and increaſe from the ſame place, whence it took its beginning? May we not ſay, this truth ſo loudly profeſſed by men, who lived in a belief different from ours, is a publick voice of humane nature, touched by the ray of its felicity?

Senec. ep. 102.

Divines teach us our appetite is finite in its eſſence, infinite in its productions. It is a miracle to ſee a heart ſo little, big with ſo many deſires, and perpetually to go like a wheel inflamed with its ardours, or rather a fire which makes a prey of its own way, and is nouriſhed with proper hunger. It is a cloud (ſaith S. Gregory) ſwoln with vapours, toſſed with winds, ſcattered by heat. It daily makes abortion of a thouſand productions, and when it thinks to have all, embraceth nothing.

Infinity of our appetites.

Nubes ad alta levatur, denſata ventis impellitur in ſuperna, calore diſſolvitur in evaneſcat. &c. Greg. in Job. l. 8. c. 10.

The wiſe man ſpeaking of death, ſaith, it is that which ſhall break the pitcher at the fountain, and the wheel upon the ciſtern. Some explicate this literally of the veins and brain. But I had rather at this preſent ſay, this pitcher is the heart of man, which ceaſeth not to go to the water of the Samaritan, whereof our Saviour ſpake, when he ſaid, He who ſhall drink of this water, ſhall ever be thirſty. It is a water which never quenched thirſt, and which ſometimes ſerves for an incentive to inſatiate deſires. And the pitcher ſo many times fruitleſly filled with this water, the heart ſo often drenched in theſe frail and momentary pleaſures, ſhall ſplit againſt the rock of death, remaining ſtill at the fountain of concupiſcence.

Eccl. 12. 7. A notable ænigma of a wiſe man.

Omnis qui biberit ex aqua hac, ſitiet iterum. Joan. 4.

Nay I will tell you, the heart is a wheel over the ciſtern of life, which ceaſeth not to draw up buckets filled with wind; one while running after one object, another time after another, not finding contentment, and at the laſt day the wheel ſhall be broken over the ciſtern, when man, if not warie, ſhall be ſurprized in the labyrinth of his deſigns, and confuſion of his hopes.

Providence of God in the limits of our appetites.

3. Now conſider the wiſdom of God, who having given us an infinite appetite, would not limit it but by himſelf: he would be our good, and being unable to be the end of himſelf, (becauſe he hath no end) he will be ours, to make us in ſome ſort infinite. He will not we put our felicities in commands and honours, becauſe they often reſemble the Idol Moloch, which was outwardly of gold, inwardly mortar; and becauſe honour is rather in him who honoureth, then in the honoured. He will not we ground our ſelves upon riches; for either they be gems which are the ſcum of elements; or metals which are the harbours of ruſt, and enkindlers of avarice; or garments the food of moths; or houſes, which are mountains compoſed of the bones of the earth; or fruits, beaſts, and ſo many other productions of nature, which cannot make us happy, ſeeing they, beſides their frailty, are of a ſervile nature, being made for the ſervice of men, and not for their glory. He will not we place our happineſs on pleaſures, becauſe all bleſſings of ſenſe go not beyond ſenſe, and for that their condition is either to ſtarve men by their barrenneſs, or ſtrangle them with their ſuperfluities. The beſt part of our ſelves being the ſpirit, he will repleniſh us with himſelf, who is the chief of ſpirits. It is he (ſaid the Prophet Eſay) who is the Crown of true glory, and the poſie of all comforts: the Crown, becauſe his felicity is wholly circular, and fully repleniſhed as the circle without any defect; the poſie, inſomuch as in his ſole eſſence he comprehendeth all the good of creatures, which are as petty flowers of this goodly garden.

God will repleniſh us with himſelf.

Greatneſs of God. Iſa. 28. 5. Corona gloria & ſertum exultationis.

It is neceſſary (ſaith Tertullian) that all greatneſs and beauties be extracted into one alone, which is the firſt greatneſs and prime beauty. He loves as charity, he knows as verity, he ſits as equity, he ruleth as majeſty, he governeth as chief, he defends as ſafety, he operateth as virtue, he revealeth as light, he aſſiſteth as piety, he doth all in all things, and ſuch as he is, he giveth himſelf unto us. I demand of you, whether he deſerveth not to be eternally diſpleaſed, who cannot content himſelf with God?

In unum neceſſe eſt ſummitas magnitudinis æquatur. Tertul. l. 1. adverſus Marcion. c. 3. Bernard. l. 5. de conſider. c. 5.

Nay, that which here maketh his communication the more perfect and admirable, is, that Divines obſerve there be two felicities in heaven: The one of object, the other formal. That of object, is the good by which we become happy, and formal, is the poſſeſſion of the ſame good. Felicity of object is that, which looketh towards God without any reflection upon us; formal felicity is that, which reſpecteth our proper good. We might ſee God as a diſtant mirrour, which were not ours, and which had not the power to make us lovely. We might love him with a love of good will, by the ſole conſideration of his perfections. We might rejoyce at his good, without relation to our own benefit: But the goodneſs of God would not only make us happy with the felicity of our object, but by formal beatitude. He will not we behold him with a lazie and barren eye, but with a viſion, which rendreth us like to himſelf.

S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 3.

He will not we love him only with a love of good will, but with a love of ardent deſire, as our good and repoſe. He will not we rejoyce onely becauſe he is God, but for that he is our God, our ſcope, and contentment.

4. The point of this beatitude conſiſteth in a perfect union of our ſoul with God, who is the fountain of ſpirits, the object of all regular loves, and the circle of felicity. So long as we are in the world (ſaith the Apoſtle) we are as pilgrims in a forraign Nation, ſeparated from the ſweetneſs of our deareſt Country, and lovely viſion of the ſovereign cauſe. We are (ſaith Syneſius) as little veins of water wandered from their fountains, which deſire nothing but to be re-united to their ſource: ſhould you afford them veſſels of amber or chryſtal to contain them, they are never ſo well as in their origin. We have a ſtrong inclination that diſpoſeth us to know, love, and admire this ſovereign Being, which makes the world bring forth his great idea's with more eaſe, then the Sun could produce a ray.

The eſſential point of beatitude is union with God.

Ἐκδημεῖν. Syneſius hymn. πατρὸς μὲ δίδυ ὅθεν ἐξέχυθην.

Now here we muſt obſerve, there are many ſorts of union: The one of dependence, which cauſeth the creature to depend on the Creatour, as light on his ſtar, and heat on the fire, which produced it: The other of preſence and moſt inward penetration, by which God penetrateth all creatures by his admirable infuſions, by reaſon of his immenſity and ſubtlety: The third of grace, by which we are ſanctified, and in a ſort made participant of Divine nature:

Diverſity of unions.

ture: The fourth of glory, properly that, which accompliſheth what grace had begun, and ſetteth a ſeal upon the plenitude of all our felicities. This being ſo divided, it is evident, that the union whereof we here ſpeak, is the glorified and ineffable union, which diſpoſeth the reaſonable creature to the higheſt point of the commerce it may have with the Divinity.

It is very hard to explicate how that is in our ſoul, becauſe of the weakneſs of our ſpirits, which are now ſo tied to fleſh. Some Divines refuted by Chancellour Gerſon, and among others, Doctour Almaricus, and Henricus, took this in a very high ſtrain, when they imagined that God comming to fall as a lightning-flaſh upon the ſoul of a bleſſed one, filled it with his preſence, force, and love, and ſo poſſeſſed it, that he wholly converted it into himſelf, in ſuch manner, that from created Being, it paſſed to increated Being, returning to Idea's of God, and into the eſtate it had before the World's creation.

Anima perdit eſſe ſuum, & accipit eſſe divinum.

This opinion hath been rejected, and condemned as a Chymæra; for God will not beautifie us by ruining and deſtroying us, but he will our felicity be ſo wholly of him, that it be notwithſtanding wholly to us; and there is no appearance our ſoul, which is immortal and incorruptible, ſhould be annihilated by the approach of God, from whom it muſt derive its being and conſervation.

5. We muſt then conceive this much otherwiſe, and believe the union of glory, that makes our beatitude, conſiſteth in the viſion, love, and joy of God, which is the fruition, termed by S. Thomas the ineffable kiſſes. Imagine you ſee a needle, which in preſence of a Diamond runs not to the Adamant, as being tied and fettered by the force of this obſtacle, but if you take away the Diamond which captived it, it goes ſtoutly and impetuouſly to its Adamant, which ſetteth it in the place of its repoſe by ordinary charms. I find ſomething like in the ſtate wherein we are: our poor ſpirit naturally tendeth to God, as to the firſt cauſe, and can take no contentment but in union with him; yet is it here arreſted by the poize of body, by the bait of concupiſcence, and tye of ſenſe: but ſo ſoon as theſe obſtacles are taken away, and that it feeleth the vigorous infuſions of this light of glory, which giveth it wings to raiſe it ſelf to the Sovereign good above all the ways of nature, it ſoareth as a feathered Arrow unto the Butt of its deſires: it ſinks and plungeth it ſelf into the boſom of God, and there abideth contented with three acts, which eſſentially compoſe its beatitude. The firſt is viſion, the root of this ſo Sovereign happineſs, which cauſeth us to ſee with the eys of a moſt purified underſtanding, through the rays of the light of glory, the great God face to face, with all the immenſity of his eſſence, the length of his eternity, the height of his majeſty, the extent of all his excellencies, and with the fecundity of his eternal emanations, the productions of total nature, and ſecrets of higheſt myſteries. We ſhall ſee him (ſaith S. John) as he is, and thereupon S. Auguſtine addeth, we ſhall neceſſarily derive a reſemblance of God, becauſe knowledge here principally rendreth him who knoweth, like to the thing known.

Union of glory, what it is.

The three acts of beatitude.

Joan. 1 3. Auguſt. l. 9 de Trin. c. 10. Omnis ſecundum ſpiritum notitia ſimilis eſt rei quam novit.

Of this viſion neceſſarily is formed a great fire of love divinized, when God like to a burning mirrour oppoſed to a glorified ſoul, repleniſheth it with his ardours, ever by us to be adored. And from this love proceedeth that exceſſive joy, which is called the joy of God. Viſion cauſeth in us an expreſſion of God, love an inclination delicately violent to the preſence of this Sovereign good: joy a profound repoſe, which ſeems to ſpread over our hearts a great river of peace, benedictions, and felicities. Then this beatified ſoul not being able to be what God is by nature, in ſome ſort becometh ſuch by favour. So that S. Gregory durſt boldly ſay, our ſoul makes it ſelf a little God, which eternally triumphs in the boſom of the great God. It is properly then, when man by an amorous conſumption wholly diſſolves into his beginning, and not loſing what he is, becometh one ſame ſpirit with him, not by nature, but by apprehenſion and affection. He not only will what God willeth, but he cannot will any thing but what God will. He takes part in all his intereſt, all his greatneſs, and all his joys, being ſo divinely incorporated into the family and boſom of this Father of eſſences. He rejoyceth at the beatitude of all the elect, as of his own; he is rapt with admiration, ſometimes at the beauty of the place, ſometimes at the delicious correſpondence of that great company, ſometimes at the unchangable continuance of his moſt bleſſed eternity, ſometimes at the garments of glory his body muſt put on, and he every where beholdeth ſources of comfort to ſpring, which can never dry.

Θεὸς ἐν Θεῷ χεῖται. Naz. hymn.

6. From this favour, beſides ſo many other wonders, I ſee three excellent effects ſucceed. The firſt is, impeccability. The ſecond, verity of our knowledges, which ſhall admit no errour. The third, tranquility of our love, which ſhall not know what wound, or interruption is. And firſt conſider what a good it is to be impeccable, ſince we not only ſhall be without ſin, but out of all danger of ſinning. All that which here afflicteth the moſt purified ſouls, is not to be expoſed to ſo many miſeries & perſecutions, for they know good men are here on earth like Flower-deluces, begotten by their own tears, and that in the ſame manner they are produced to beatitude by their proper afflictions: but it is to ſee themſelves in a ſtate of power to loſe the grace of God, and to be able to be ſeparated from the firſt of lives, by an action of death. That is it which made Job, being on the dunghil like to the dunghil it ſelf, as on the throne of patience, to deplore his condition, and ſay; Why haſt thou made me, ſeeing I am contrary to thy Divine Majeſty? That is it which renders me inſupportable to my ſelf.

Three great effects of beatitude.

The great happineſs to be impeccable.

Plin. 21. 5. Lilium lachryma ſua ſeritur.

Quare me poſuiſti contrarium tibi, & ſum mihimet-ipſi gravis?

Now there ſhall be in beatitude an impotency of ſin, becauſe in full ſight of Sovereign good it will be impoſſible to propend to the leaſt evil, or leaſt diſorder, without which there can be no ſin.

Moreover, as our knowledges are here wretched and ſtarven, there is not a man ſo knowing in the world, who for one drop of knowledge hath not a tun of ignorance, and who in the little he knoweth, hath not ever many errours, which ſtick to ſcience as the worm to the tree, or the moth to the cloath. Now there above, the ray of increated light, which ſhal appear in ful luſtre, wil diſſipate all the weakneſs of underſtanding, all inconſiderations, all faults, and ſhal fil us with a moſt reſplendent verity. So that our ſoul ſhal be like that Egyptian Pyramid, which perpendicularly reflected on by the Sun, caſt no ſhadow.

Excellency of beatifick ſcience.

In lumine tuo videbimus lumen.

Laſtly, we ſee our love is ill guided in this wayfaring life, it ſticks upon ſo many frivolous objects, which are fooliſh fires, that often lead it into precipices. It is taken by the eys with bleſſings which have nothing more certain in them then their loſs, bleſſings which we ever ſhal leave by death, if they forſake not us by misfortune. Being ſurprized it tumbleth therein, and perpetually bendeth to all which feedeth its dolours and drives away content. All it leaſt can do, is that thing it moſt deſires, all it ſeeks, is many times the good it eſchewed: It looſeth labour to run after a flitting phantaſm, and if it ſtay, it is not but through deſpair not to overtake all which kils it. But if it come to poſſeſs what it loves, it is inſtantly turmoiled with its happineſs, and not having need to labour any more in deſires, it grows mouldy in proper fruition. It is willing to be reſiſted, to enkindle its flame, and reſiſtance thruſts it into rage, as poſſeſſion into diſtaſt. That is it which maketh me ſay, the earth being made for us, we are not made for the earth, and that we ſhould ſeek the place where love ſuffers neither offence nor interruption. I ſay offence, for it hath an object which contents all the world, and offendeth none. I ſay interruption, for if we ceaſe to love in Paradiſe, it muſt proceed from God, or from our ſelves: If it be by the commandment of God, we ceaſe to love, we ſhall ceaſe in loving, and in ceaſing we ſhall inceſſantly love, ſince we ſhall ceaſe through love. The ceſſation cannot come from us, for we ſhall love without obſtacle, and of neceſſity that Sovereign good, which for its infinities will not be beloved but in infinitum.

O what pleaſure, to have but one pleaſure, and what joy to derive all joys from their ſource! Why ſay we not with S. Auguſtine: O fountain of life, O vein of living waters, when ſhall I come to thy delights, and eternal ſweetneſs! I here on earth ſigh after thy beauties (O holy Hieruſalem) in a land ſcorched with ſervours of ſenſuality. O when will it be, that I ſhall come before the face of my God! Think you I ſhall ſee that fortunate day, that day of comfort and triumphs, that day which God hath made, and which takes its eaſtern riſe from his eys? O bright day, which hath no evening, nor knows what the ſetting Sun is! When do you think I ſhall hear that word, enter into the joys of thy Maſter, enter into a joy inacceſſible to ſorrow, wherein is al good, with an eternal baniſhment of all evil? There it is, where youth waxed not old, where life hath no limits, where beauty decays not, where love knoweth not what it is to be cold, nor health to impair.

O dear City! with weeping eyes we behold thee afar off, we thy poor exiles, but yet thy children, redeemed with his bloud, who makes thee happy by his aſpects. Stretch out thy arms unto us, O mild Saviour, caſt an eye on us from the haven in theſe ſtorms of life, and give us leave to walk in ſo undoubted paths, that we may come to the place where thou liveſt and reigneſt for ever.

The nineteenth EXAMPLE upon the nineteenth MAXIM.

Of the pleaſures of Beatitude.

THE joys of Paradiſe are without example, and as they are here above our experience, ſo they paſs beyond our Imagination. Yet well may we conceive, raiſed bodies ſhall have ſome manner of contentment, in the perfect uſe of their ſenſes and beauty of objects, which ſhall ſatiate them with everlaſting delights.

When after a long winter, which covered us in darkneſs, and buried us in ſnow, we behold a new world ariſe under the benign favour of the ſpring, and conſequently the golden days of ſummer, we feel our heart dilate, ſeaſonably taking in ſome antepaſt of the repoſe of the bleſſed. What ſweetneſs is it to enjoy delights in a body ſound, and a ſpirit well purified? What contentment to behold thoſe goodly Palaces, where is ſeen an admirable conſort of art and nature, ſo many Hals ſo well furniſhed within, ſuch rich hangings, ſuch moſt exquiſite pictures, ſuch marbles, ſuch gildings; and without mountains which make a natural Theater, tapiſtred without art to ſurpaſs all Workmanſhip, forreſts, which ſeem born with the world, hedges, and knots curiouſly cut, alleys and mazes, where both eys and feet are loſt, rivers which creep along with ſilver purlings about gardens enameled with moſt fragrant flowers, cavernes repleniſhed with a ſacred horrour, grots and fountains which gently gliding contend with the warble of birds: and ſo many other ſpectacles, which at firſt ſight aſtoniſh ſpirits and never ſatiate. All this is but a little atome, I do not ſay of the eſſential pleaſure of the bleſſed which is ineffable, but of the ſole content of the ſenſes of a glorious body, which may in ſome ſort be expreſſed.

S. John to accommodate himſelf to the weakneſs of our underſtanding, hath made a deſcription of it in the Apocalyps, where he depainteth this goodly City of the bleſſed with ſingular curioſity. It is a pretty thing to conſider how Lucian, an excellent wit, though a bad man, intruding into our myſteries hath ſet out in his idea's to the imitation of it the life of the fortunate Iſland, wherein he ſayes all he can to repreſent unto us unſpeakable delights: but it is ſo far from what we would but cannot ſay, as Heaven from earth. Apoc. 21. & 22.

"When you approach (ſaith he) to this place you diſcover the walls, extended in length, all built with emeralds, the luſtre whereof is extremely reſplendent and pleaſing. The gates are of a precious and odoriferous wood, which caſteth forth at the entrance moſt delicious ſavours. When you paſs in, you behold a pavement of all Ivory, and houſes all of gold, ſet out with coſtly workmanſhips. The Temples there are made of huge Berils, precious ſtones, of the colour of the ſea, and altars of Amethiſt. The whole City is environed with a goodly river, which ſtreameth all in balm, 300. cubits broad, and as deep as is neceſſary to bathe in. There are on either ſide ſtoves which are great houſes of glaſs, wherin are exquiſite baths: They never burn any other wood in them but cynnamon, and in ſtead of water, a certain dew is preſerved, ſovereign for bodily health. Lucian. I. 2. vera hiſt.

It is a pleaſant thing to ſee the inhabitants of this fortunate City, for you would ſay, their bodies are no bodies, but naked ſouls, ſeen by the help of ſome thin veil. Yet they ſtand upright, and ſit, walk, ſee hearken, talk and anſwer, but have nothing groſs or terreſtrial in them, as we. Their garments are of purple colour, and of a ſilk as tranſparent as ſpiders webs. No man complaineth there either of poverty, maladies, paſſions of the mind, or miſeries of the world: no man waxeth old, and all ſuch as have the favour to enter into it, remain there incorruptible. They never have either winter or night, but a temperate ſeaſon, & day which ſeems to go on with a perpetual morning. There is no asking, whether ther be orchards, gardens, flowers or fruits: for never were the like pleaſures ſeen. Their vines bare twelve times a year, and ſome fruit-trees to thirteen. Their corn is very fair, and hath on the top of the ear, little loaves of bread, ready made, very taſtfull.

I told in the City three hundred threeſcore and five fountains with chryſtalline water, as many with hony, five hundred with ſweet water, ſeven rivers of milk, and eight of moſt exquiſite wine. They make many feaſts out of the City, in a beautiful meadow, properly called Elyſium, wholy repleniſh'd with the choiceſt beauties of nature, and all round about it is crowned crowned with a great wood which plentifully affordeth shadow. They sit upon couches all composed of flowers, which never wither, and when they are at table, the winds take care to bring them all the most precious viands, except wine, whereof they have no need; for there are trees of Chrystal which bear fruits made as glasses, and such cups as we use, and so often as they gather them, they find them filled with a pleasant liquour.

Mean while Nightingales, Linnets, Gold-finches and Buntings flie over their heads, and having wantonly thrown flowers on the table, which they had gathered in the next meadows, make them admirable musick. The clouds also swoln with vapours, drawn from those fragrant fountains, afford a little dew for them to bathe in and recreate themselves. Lastly, that which is very commendable among them, is, they have two fountains, one of joy, the other of laughter, which being once tasted, they become impenetrable to all sorrow.

Behold all a curious wit may do, to describe a life truly contented. We know there is nothing of all this in Paradise, but we are not likewise ignorant there is more then all this, and that whosoever might have the favour onely one hour to be with the sun and stars, should there find so brave sights, that all these dalliances of wit so gaily set out by this man, would seem to him no better then the slight verdure of cottage land-skips, hanged out of the windows, in comparison of the tuilleries.

The blessed shall have the pleasure of eyes in the aspect of the humanity of our Saviour, of the most holy Virgin, of so many bodies more lustrous then the sun, of so many beauties which shall never cease to be beauties. The recreation of ears in the mottets and canticles of triumph, which shall be sung to the praise of the ever to be adored Trinity. The contentment of smel in the good odour which shal proceed from glorified flesh. The exercise of tast, not in wine or viands, but in a subtle humour wherewith the palate shall be perpetually moistned, by reason of the noble temperature of body. The satisfaction of touch in conversation with celestial bodies. All this may in some sort be conceived by the figure we have here presented. But the joy of God, and the essential beatitude, whereof I speak in the discourse, cannot fal under our sense. Yet we may imagine the sense of joy a man hath, who unexpectedly goeth out of a tedious and painful imprisonment, or he who prevails in a great and desperate suit, or who enjoys a love infinitely affected, and sees himself tied by chast marriage to a wife a thousand times desired; or who is raised to some great office and eminent dignity, which may advance him to some high esteem, and bring him store of wealth; or who suddenly, and after many years, meeteth a dear friend whom he thought long since dead: The soul sometimes is so seized with joy, that the body is no longer able to bear it, and remains overwhelmed, as it were, under roses.

We know what happened to the good old man Diagoras, so famous in histories, which tell us, that in an assembly of Olympike games (the Theater of all Greece) he having seen three of his sons publickly crowned by the Magistrate, took at first great comfort therein, which multiplied in his heart, as light by the break of day. But so soon as these three young men came near to embrace him, and had all joyntly put their Crowns on his head, the good man sheading tears for joy, said: Gell. l. 3.

Children, I am not to flie to heaven, yet have concluded all my joys on earth, seeing you to day all three together crowned in the bosom of glory, and the full accomplishment of my wishes. It is time to die, since life can adde nothing to my happiness.

And saying these or the like words, he was so intranced with the consideration of good fortune, that he died in the place.

An honourable Lady of the Island of Naxos, named Polycrite, was touched with the like passion which took away her life, not bereaving her of glory. For the history saith, her City being besieged by the Erythreens, & menaced with all the calamities might be expected from a siege, she was intreated by the prime men thereof, to undertake an Embassage for the pacifying of troubles, which she willingly did, and being one of the most beautifull women of her time, and a very good Oratress, she had so much power upon the Prince Diognetes, the general in this siege, that she disposed his heart to what she pleased. In such sort, that going forth in the fear and confusion of all the people, she returned with peace and assurance of quiet, which made them all to come out to receive her at the City gates, with loud acclamations, some throwing flowers, other Crowns, and all rendring thanks to her as their Sovereign Preservereſs. She apprehended so much joy therewith, that in the very instant, she expired in her honours, at the City gate, and in stead of being carried to the throne, was brought to her tomb with the infinite sorrow of all her countrey. I leave you to think; if humane comforts have such force, what will the great joy of God be for these unheard-of spectacles, these continual triumphs and inexhaustible sources. Must we not say, we should there every moment leave our souls in the height of pleasure, were not the happiness of it conjoyned to immortality? Plutarch. de clar. mulieribus.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That we must not deny our bodies the benefit of time, since they must perish.

THE HOLY COURT.

That we must use our bodies as the Temples of God, since they must rise again.

The resurrection proved more then any other mystery.

WE may truly say, there is not any mystery in all our faith, which God hath pleased to teach and prove unto us more effectually, then the resurrection. For, it being sufficiently averred, that our salvation consisteth in the knowledge of three principal Articles, which are, that of the Trinity, of the incarnation with its extension made to the Sacrament of the Altar, and of the Resurrection, although they be all of like necessity, yet it seems God disposing himself more to our ends then his own, hath more abundantly explained himself in this last mystery, which most concerneth our peculiar profit. It is very true, that for the doctrine of the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Sacrament of the Altar, he was contented to give us some figures of them in old Testament, not fully shewing the effects: but for the Resurrection, he was pleased to establish it even before his coming into the world, really and actually, by raising many dead by the merits of Elias and Elizeus, as we learn in the history of Kings. It is well enough known, that having afforded to the Ancients very obscure knowledges of the Trinity and Incarnation; for the Resurrection alone he made the law of nature, the Mosaical, the order of the world, the form of Commonwealths, and the Evangelical law to speak so intelligibly, that he could speak nothing more perspicuously.

Scio quod Redemptor meus vivit, & in novissimo die de terra resurrecturus sum, &c. Job. 19.

In the law of nature I understand the chief Secretary of the world, Job, who crieth out on the dunghil I know my Redeemer liveth, and that at the last day of the world I must rise again from the earth, and shall see God in mine own flesh; that I shall see my self in person, and that my eyes shall behold him, and no other; this hope I keep as a pledg in my bosom. A man who lived about three thousand years ago before al books all Doctours, & all schools, to speak in so clear terms so presing, so peremptory, is it not a prodigy?

Ecce ego aperiam tumulos vestros, & educam vos de sepulchris vestris. Ezech 37. Macch. 2. Matth. 22. D. Tho. art. 1. ad 2. supplem. q. 75.

In the Mosaical law, besides formal passages in the prophet Ezechiel: I will open your tombs, and will take you from your sepulchers; besides the generous confession of the Macchabees, we have in the Pentateuch a passage alledged for proof of the resurrection by the Son of God himself, which for this purpose ought to be held, as an argument necessary and invincible. It is so many times said, The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: Now he is not the God of the dead, but of the living, and therefore needs must these Patriarchs be living, not only in the immortality of their souls, for the soul makes not a man entire, but to future Resurrection..

Tertul. l. de Resur. c. 12 and 13. Greg. Mag. 14. mor. c. 10. Cyril. Catech. 18. Macar. hom. 5. de Resur. Nil. Ora. 2. de Pasca. Theod serm de Provid.

In the order of the world, we have the new birth of stars, days, seasons, planets, of birds, who make a perpetual image of the resurrection in the world, on which the holy Fathers enlarge with much eloquence. In the form of Common-wealths and policy of the universe, we observe the great care all Nations, the most barbarous, have had of the burial of bodies, not to have been but through an instinct and estimation of the resurrection. Which the chief men in Gentilism have publickly and notably professed. And although they had very weak knowledge of other mysteries of our faith, and spake of it with much obscurity. in the point of Resurrection, they unfolded themselves most distinctly and expresly.

Mercurius Trismegistus; in the first chapter of Pimander assureth us of the Resurrection of bodies, as a thing infallible. The great Athenagoras sheweth, it was the doctrine of Pythagoras and Plato, the two first lights of Philosophy. And verily we have also the writings of Plato, which witness, the wicked shall be judged, and condemned to hell in body and soul; a passage alledged by S. Justine in the tenth of his Common-wealth, and which is more, this singular man to win us to this belief, hath couched a very notable axiom in his Phædon, where he saith, that all, which is living in the world, comes from something dead. Democritus, who was (as Hippocrates affirmeth) one of the wisest men in the world, wished the bodie of the dead should be honourably used in respect of resurrection, which Pliny could not dissemble. Phocyllides said the same in verses, written, as with the rays of the Sun. Nay, if we would consult with the tombs of the dead, we shall find, there hath not been any but some wicked and irregular spirits, who have renounced the blesings of the other life, as by publick profession, causing it to be engraven on their tombs. So did Sardanapalus the most infamous of men, whose epitaph Aristotle having read, said, It was more fit for a hog, then a King.

Vixi & ultra vitam nihil credidi.

So did that wretched woman of Bresse, whose monument is yet to be seen in antiquities, causing to be set over her ashes: That after the death of her husband she had been neither Widdow nor wife: and that her house served only for a snare to loves, Otherwise that during life she never believed any thing but life. So did one Julia, who caused also to be inscribed over her bones: That she had lived 27 years without committing any sin, but by resigning her self to death.

Nihil unquam peccavit, nisi quod mortua est. Brisson. formul.

But on the contrary, you observe some of the Gentiles, who professed the happiness of the soul in the other life, and the resurrection even on their tombs. We at this day read in Rome the Epitaph of Lucius and Flavius, two friends, who witnessed, They would have but one grave on earth, since their souls make but one in Heaven. And that of Aulus Egnatius who maketh mention, That all his lifetime he learned nothing, but to live and dy, from whence he now deriveth the joys of beatitude. And that of Felicianus, who having led a solitary life, saith, He did so to rise again with the more facility, being freed from trouble at the day of Judgement. Where the Interpreters under this word Trouble, understand his wife. What voice of nature is this? What touch of God? What impresion of verity?

In cœlo spiritus mihi adest. Ut in die censorio sine impedimento facilius resurgam. Brisson.

In the Evangelical law, besides the passages of S. Matthew 22. of S. John 5. of S. Paul 1. to the Corinthians 15. the Saviour of the world remained fourty days upon earth after his Resurrection, that he might be seen, reviewed, touched, handled, and manifested to more then five hundred people assembled together, as writeth S. Paul in the fore-alledged place, of purpose most deeply to ingraft the mystery of Resurrection in the hearts of the faithful.

2. And as for that which concerneth reason, this belief was acknowledged to be so plausible and conform to humane understanding, that never hath there been any who doubted it, were it not some hereticks, furious, infamous and devillish, as the Gnosticks, Carpocratians, Priscillianists, Bardesanites, Albigenses, & such like enemies of God and nature, or Epicures and Libertines who finding themselves guilty of many crimes have rather desired not to be perswaded of the end of souls and bodies, to bury their punishments with their life. For which cause they framed gross and sensual reasons touching this truth, unworthily blaspheming that which their carnal spirit could not comprehend.

Reason of possibility.

What impossibility should there be in resurrection to an omnipotent hand? We must necessarily say it comes either from matter or form, the final or efficient cause. It cannot come from matter since our bodies being consumed by death the first matter still remaineth, and after a thing is once created, never is it meerly reduced into nothing. Shall it be said that God who made thee of nothing cannot make thee again of the remanders of matter, and that he hath less power over dust then over nothing?

πᾶν τὸ ζῶν ἐκ τοῦ τεθνεῶτος, Plato in Phædon. Plin. l. 7. c. 55.

The Philosopher Heraclitus saith, birth is a river, which never dries up, because nature is in the world as a workman in his shop, who with soft clay makes and unmakes what he list. Think we the God of nature cannot have the like power over our flesh, that nature hath over the worlds?

Proceeds the impediment from form? It cannot, since the soul, which is the form of body, remaineth incorruptible, and hath a very strong inclinati-

tion

Levin. l. 2. de mirac. c. 52. tion to its re-union. Proceeds it from the end? No, since Resurrection is so the end of man, that without it he cannot obtain beatitude for which he is created, perfect felicity being not onely the good of the soul, but of the whole man.

Wonders of nature. Will then impediment arise from the efficient cause? And is it not an indignity to deny to the Sovereign power of God the reitauration of a body he made, being we daily see so many wonders in nature whereof we can yield no reason?

Why doth a liquor extracted from hearbs by a certain distillation never corrupt? Why is water seven times purged, not subject to corruption? Why doth amber draw a straw along, which other mettals repel? Why do the lees of wine powred to the root of vines make them fruitful? How with so base ingredients are so goodly and admirable glasses made? Why do men by the help of a fornace and a limbeck, daily make of dead and putrified things so wonderous essences? What prostitution of understanding, to think that the great Architect, having made our bodies to pass through this great fornace of the world, and through all the searces his divine providence ordaineth, cannot render them more beautiful and resplendent then ever? What should hinder him? Length of time? There is no prescription for him? Multitude of men? That no more troubles him then millions of waves do the Ocean, since all Nations before him are but one drop of dew.

The condition of glorious bodies.

CONsider, I pray, the state of glorified bodies, and observe, that there commonly are four things irksome to a mortal body; sorrow, weight, weakness, and deformity. These four scourges of our mortality shall cease in the Resurrection, being banished by gifts quite contrary to their defects. We may truly say, among the miseries of body, there is not almost any comparable to pains and maladies, which are in number so divers, in their continuance so tedious, in their impressions so sharp, that it is not without reason an Ancient said, health was the chief of Divinities, and an incomparable blessing. For what is a soul, inforced perpetually to inhabit a sickly body, but a Queen in a tottering & ruinous house, but a bird of Paradise in an evil cage, and an Intelligence tied to attend on a sick man? As the body very sound serves the soul for a house of pleasure, so that which is continually crazy, is a perpetual prison.

Now observe, that against the encounters of all sorts of pains and maladies, God communicateth to glorified bodies the chief gift, which is impassibility, wherewith they shall be exempt, not onely from death, but from hunger, thirst, infirmities, and all the diseases of this frail and momentary life. O God, what a favour is the banishment from so many stones, gravels, gouts, nephreticks, collicks, sciaticks, from so many pains of teeth, head, heart, so many plagues, and sundry symptoms of maladies, which afflict a humane body.

This good, if maturely weighed, will be thought very great, by such as have some experience of the incommodities of this life. Add also thereunto a singular Theological reason, that this gift shall not be in us by a simple privation, as the non-essence which the Epicureans imagined, but by a flourishing quality communicated by God to our bodies, and which shal have the force to exclude all whatsoever is contrary and painful, onely admitting the sweet impressions of light, colours, melodies, odours, and other things pleasing to sence. Note I say, quality, for I am not ignorant, Divines dispute concerning the true cause of the impassibility of a glorified body, and that some place it in a virtue and external protection which God will give them to stay the effect of hurtfull causes. In such wise, that according to the opinion of those Doctours, glorious bodies shall be impassible as were the three Children in the fornace of Babylon, not that their bodies were impenetrable to fire, but because God hindred the action of flames on their bodies. But I had rather say with S. Thomas, it is done by a quality internal and adherent to the bodies of the blessed. Because this manner, besides that it is sweet, easie, and suitable to the magnificence of God, is more noble, more natural, and nearer approaching to the condition of celestial bodies.

Durand. d. 15. 44 q. 4. num. 13.

1. part. q. 97. art. 1. and 5. q. 82. art. 1.

Against the second incommodity of mortal body, which is terrestrial weight, we shall have subtility, a gift much to be desired, and which also opposeth the beastlines and stupidity, that insensibly cause aversion in reasonable and intellectual nature. We cannot be ignorant, that many Divines place this subtility of glorious bodies in a vertue they shall have, to penetrate the most massy objects, not bruising or breaking them, like a spirit; and that it were an errour either to say it were impossible to the divine power, or was not done by our Saviour when he came out of his mothers womb, or when he entred into the chamber. Notwithstanding, I think this penetration of bodies should be judged as extraordinary to a blessed body, without having any necessary dependence of its condition. But I had rather believe with S. Thomas, Doctor Durandus, and the Roman Catechism, that this gift of subtility, whereof question is here made, consitteth in a great vigour of sence, proceeding from a perfect disposition of organs, and a tenderness of spirits, and besides in an entire subjection and admirable pliantness of the body to the soul, and of appetites to reason; a matter which I esteem more then the penetration of Semiramis's wals.

Durand. in 4. d. 44. q. 5. D. Thom. in 4. l. 4. q. 2 art. 2. and 3. q. 83. a. 2.

The third blemish of our bodies, which is weakness and infirmity, shall be excluded by the grace, force, and agility, which will bring to pass that the blessed may go from one place to another, not by a simple ability and equality of the motion of steps and going forward, but an impetuousness, as would be that of an eagle, who should fall upon her prey, or of an arrow shot by a strong hand, according to S. Augustines opinion. Doctor Scotus thinks this agility will proceed from the force of the soul, with substraction of weight, which shall at that time be taken away from the body in this state of immortality. Others think, this weight shall onely be suspended and interdicted in its effect, not for ever, but for the space the blessed shall desire, who besides this admirable lightness, shall have great and sprightly forces.

Aug. l. 22. de Civit. c. ultim. Ubi volet spiritus, ibi protinus erit & citius. Isaiah 40. Qui sperant in Domino mutabunt fortitudinem.

Lastly, the fourth accident of this mortal and corruptible state, is deformity, which hath sometimes been so troublesom to many souls little courageous, & greatly faithless, that there have been such found in Pagan antiquity, who voluntarily deprived themselves of life, to be delivered from the shame and grief they conceived to be born in a body notably deformed.

Of beauty. Beauty, although it be often decried, since it began to serve for a bait, and to be an instrument to sin, yet it must be confessed, when it contracteth good alliance with the spirit and virtue, namely, that of chastity, it hath qualities so lovely, & excellencies so noble, that without arms or guards it exerciseth power even over the hearts of Monarchs. Zeno said, grace of body was a Voice of flower, and a flower of voice; voice of flower, because it draweth amity to it, as the flower of a garden, not crying out nor tormenting it it self, a flower of voice, because it is one of the most flowery eloquences among the attractives of nature. Earthly sovereignties often employ the whole extent of their power, to make themselves beloved, yet never attain it, but this as the rays of the sun, not breaking either gate or window, gets entrance for it self in humane heart, and not alledging any other reason, nor affording patience of resolution, transporteth a soul, which lives more in that it loveth, then in that it animateth. And yet what is temporal beauty but a transitory charm, an illusion of senses, a voluntary imposture, a slave of pleasure, a flower which hath but a moment of life, a dyal on which we never look, but whilest the sun shines on it? What is humane beauty but a dunghil covered with snow, a glass painted with false colours, a prey pursued by many dogs, a dangerous Hostess in a frail house, a sugered fruit in a feast which some dare not touch for respect, and others gormandize through sensuality? Go, trust so fading a good: Go, betake you to so unhappy a snare: Go, ty your contentments to so slippery a knot. What else will happen unto you but to court a fantasie, which loosening your hold, will leave you nothing but the sorrow of your illusions?

If beauties must be loved, let us love them in the state wherein they shall never cease to be beauties: let us love them in the glory of their resurrection, where they shall be placed as Qs. in their thrones.

Durand. in 4. de 44. q. 3. The beauty of glorified bodies (saith Durandus the Divine) consisteth in three things. First, in a pure and resplendent colour, conjoyned to a most perfect and distinct proportion of all members, without the least blemish or defect, able to give the least aversion. Secondly, in a singular smoothness, as would be that of a mirrour, receiving the Sun beams directly. Thirdly, in an interiour light, which, as other Doctours with a general consent do add, will diffuse it self over the body with an incomparable lustre, if it happen not that the blessed to manifest themselves to feeble and mortal eyes stay the course of the rays of glory, as did our Saviour in the conference he had with the two pilgrims of Emaus.

Daniel 12. Qui docti fuerint, fulgebunt tanquam splendor firmamenti &c. Mat. 13. Fulgebunt justi sicut sol in regno Patris eorum.

O Beauties which never tarnish! O lights which know not what it is to be eclipsed! O house of God! O Temple of peace! When will the great day come, which shall devest us from all we have mortal, to put us into the bosom of immortality? But we must confess, that among all the considerations may be ad upon this subject, we have not any more pleasant or effectual, then the triumphant Resurrection of our Saviour, which is the root and hope of ours. If we desire to sweeten the acerbities of life, and to replenish our hearts with the antepast of our immortality, let us make a perpetual Pasch in our souls, and reflect on our Jesus, our Phenix, who goeth out of his sepulcher on the day of his triumphs.

That the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, is the foundation of ours, and we must behold his sweetness and glories as the sources of our eternity

Nature delighteth in contrarieties. Discordant accords of the world. NAture, which is an expression of Divine understanding, is never so great and admirable, as in contrarieties, & it seems she takes delight to derive the goodliest harmonies of the world from certain disagreeing accords. We admire contrary motions in the heavens, which compose an eternal peace: In the air, a bird which takes life from death, & the beauty of her plumage from a tomb of ashes: On earth, bees bred in the throat of a dead Lion, that find life in a savour able to kill them: In the sea, a fish named the holy fish, which as histories say, taking its original in the Kingdom of tempests, fails not to create a calm by its presence: And among fountains, we cannot sufficiently wonder at the water of Dodone, into wch a torch falling, is put out, and coming forth is lighted. Jesus, authour of nature, beareth all these miracles in his own person, to make a miracle in our hearts, and to draw them out of the dust and darkness from which he freed our bodies. He is the great heaven, which by motions of his life holily contrary, unanimously divers, and harmoniously disagreeing, hath made the accords of the Church militant and triumphant. He is the Bird of the East, whereof Isaiah speaketh, which glorifieth his tomb, and quickneth his death, to slay ours. He is the Bee of the celestial Father, which from all Eternity having his hive in the heart of his Father, soareth into the region of death, to sit upon dying flowers which took away his life, and put him into the throat of a lioness, of a death which devouring all, is devoured it self, as saith the Apostle: and from this gulf which yielded nothing, issueth a life to be the seed of all lives. It is the Divine fish of the Sybills, sacred by so many titles, to consecrate all intelligent nature, which after the rage of so turbulent a passion, makes a great calm in the world, which he establisheth by his fall, quickeneth by his death, washeth by his bloud, and glorifieth by his torments. He is the torch which entred dead into the river of Cocytus, whereof holy Job speaketh, and came out lighted and all environed with flames of a triumphant glory.

Æl. l. 8. de animal. S. Isido. de fonte Epyri and Solinus. Miracles of the person of Jesus. Isa. 46 11. 1 Cor. 15. Job 21. 33.

Let us then say that God, who by his providence and by a singular predestination, governeth the state of intellectual creatures in all perfect height and accomplishment of beatitude, hath so tied glory to merit, and merit to glory, that he would not glorify the Angels, without giving them some moment of a wayfaring life, & some exercise of meritorious actions, to obtain the crown and consummation of felicity. And consequently to the same purpose, it is very true the most holy humanity of the worlds Saviour from the first instant of his beginning, was inseparably united to the Divinity, but not to be the lights and actual splendours which were incessantly to spring from this ineffable union of the Word to the flesh. The Father ordained, and the son for our love received and freely accepted a suspension of the light of glory, for the space of three & thirty years. And although he had the foundation and root in himself, the exercise of it was staid, and proposed to him in the end of his race, as the recompence of his painful life, and unspeakable dolours of his death.

Jesus entreth into his glory by his merit. Suspension of actual glory in the body of our Saviour.

He naturally desired the glory of his body, as our soul sticking in flesh and bloud, vehemently covets a full liberty of its intellectual functions; and behold here in this mystery, his desire is accomplished, and this humanity darkened by the space of a long night of life, hidden and buried in the obscurity of an ignominious death, cometh from it as the Sun out of a cloud, and makes a transfusion of himself into the bosom of ineffable lights, which issue from the Sanctuary of the most holy Trinity. In such sort, that it is a second birth of the most sacred humanity, which being born to the communication of divine subsistence, is here born to glory.

Three proprieties of splendour in the resurrection of our Saviour. 5. Now observe, if you please, that as the lightning flash, which appeared in the face of the Angel, messenger of the resurrection, hath three properties; the first is, that it is a subtle part of inflamed elements, the second, that it is endowed with a splendour and sparkling, which dazleth humane eyes, the third, that it goes from one pole to another with an extream extream vivacity, and a shril sound; So three things are observable in the glory, which our Saviour entertained in his Resurrection: first, that this body taken from the clay of Adam and matter of elements, became in an instant wholly invested in sweet and honourable flames of divinity; secondly, that he appeared with an admirable beauty, which made, that S. Augustine gave him this title: The flower of pleasures, and the most purified pleasure of all delights, the root of holy loves; the third, consisteth in the lustre of this great name, which went from the East to the West, from the South to the North, filling the world with his wonders.

A Remarkable Psalm.

Psalmus David quando ei terra restituta est. Alii, quando fundata est terra. Dominus regnavit, decorem indutus est, &c.

The triumphant glory of the Resurrection.

It seems, this was divinely propheſied in the 29. Psalm, which beareth a title very remarkable. It is a Psalm sung by David to the Messias, on the day when his land was restored to him, to wit, his body was rejoyned to his soul in the possession of glory, and therefore he saith according to the paraphrase: It is verily on this day our Saviour beginneth an eternal Empire, and a supream Monarchy in his militant and triumphant Church: It is on this day he cloathed himself with a body, endowed with a flourishing beauty, with beauty he took, an invincible force which hath penetrated even into hell, as divinely saith (a) Eusebius Emissenus. The eternal nights of hell have been visited by the rays of God, plants and clamours ceased, direfull chains fell off, executioners were amazed, and the whole habitation condemned to eternal pains, shook under the feet of this admirable Conquerour. The Prophet pursueth (b) The seat of glory, (O Saviour) was prepared for thee from all eternity, and thereinto thou makest a victorious triumphant entry, after so great an inundation of sufferings. All the waves of persecutions have roared over thy head, and have buried thee in the acerbities of death. How much the more this sea of passions immeasurably swelled, so much the more thou appearedst resplendent in the supream eminency of thy glory and triumphs.

6. (c) Transfer your consideration from thence to the effect of our Saviours glorification, which consisteth in repose and stability, represented by the Angel, which appeared at the resurrection, sitting on a solid stone. This verily is the great day, which we may call the mystical Sabbath, and the eternal repose of Jesus. It is said in the mystery of the creation, (d) that God rested on the seventh day, and casting his eye on all these great works, which he drew out of nothing, he thereupon took satisfaction in his spirit, and impressed them all as with the seal of his approbation. To speak according to our understanding, it was an incomparable comfort to the heart of the Sovereign Creatour, to behold in six days so goodly a world, where before that time reigned an huge imaginary vacuum, accompanied with a sad horrour of darkness: and to consider how a Nothing in the hands of a great work-man was a mighty thing, having been as the ground of the greatness, and beauty of the universe.

(d) Complevitque Deus die septimo opus suum quod fecerat, & requievit die septimo ab universo opere quod patrarat, & benedixit diei septimo, & sanctificavit illum. Genes. 2. 1.

The relation of the resurrection to the creation.

What contentment to see a heaven distended as a Pavillion over all creatures, which already circumvolved with so much impetuousness, and besides to see it enameled with so great a number of stars in the peaceable silence of the night, and in the day to see it enlightned with a sun, which is the visible Image of God invisible, the eye of the world, the light of nature, the treasury of heat, light, & influences, that animate, illustrate, and quicken all the parts of this great work. To see a Moon to serve for a sun by night, so constant in her inconstancy, so regular in her increasing & waynings, so measured in all her course, so effectual and fruitful in the impressions she maketh on nature. To see days and nights return into our hemisphere at a time prefixed, to agree as brothers & sisters, to afford time one to another, & to yield it, one in winter, another in summer, with so much integrity, that all therein goes in compass. To see the order of seasons, a delicious spring-tide strewed all over with flourishing beauties, a summer with harvests, an Autumn with its fruits, and a winter, which is as the depository of nature, dies to live again with the first rays of renovation. To see the Sea so spacious in its extents, so fertile in its productions, so concluded in its limits; to see the flood and ebb of the Ocean, the tomb of curiosity, the impetuous stream of rivers, the eternal veins of fountains, the height of mountains, the depth of valleys, the winding of hillocks, the wideness of fields: To see so prodigious a quantity of trees, herbs, flowers, so curious in beauty, so wholsom in their utility, & so divers in their multiplicity: To see so many speckled birds flying in the air, which they fill with their natural musick, so many fishes to swim in the chrystal of waters, so strange a variety of beasts, armed some with horns, some with teeth, some with spurs, other with saws, many with paws: And lastly man, who contracteth in himselfe all the draughts and works of the divine hand, and epitomizeth the whole world in his perfections, and beareth the most animated character of the living God. Is it not true that God, casting his eye on this, had a certain delight therein, as the Master of a family, when he sees a house, which he had long time designed to be raised in one night entirely perfect, throughly furnished, and in all kinds accommodated with whatsoever concerns necessity and beauty?

The joys of the heart of Jesus in the first instant of the resurrection.

Here raise your thoughts above all that is mortal and momentary: Imagine with your self the ineffable joy of the heart of Jesus, and the profound repose of his spirit, when at the first instant of his resurrection he represented unto himself not creatures, elements, plants, and a corruptible world, but a world of wisdom, understanding, love, beauty, force, and felicity. A Church which was to take birth from his blood, life from his death, and spirit from the most subtle spirits of his heart. He then saw this Church as a great Temple divided into two parts, whereof one made the Quire, another the body; In the Quire he beheld an infinite number of Angels, who chanted a song of triumph in honour of his victories. He saw in his idea the number of the elect, who should accompany the magnificent legions of Intelligences. He saw about him those sacred first-fruits of immortals, whom he very lately had taken out of Limbo, and himself he beheld in the front of so many clean and purified souls, rejoycing to busie the earth in the memory of his triumphs, and to make heaven happy by his sweet aspects.

The goodly world he beheld in his Idea's at the day of his resurrection.

He beheld himself as in a picture in that manner wherein S. John presenteth him in his Apocalyps, all laden with crowns, clad in a white garment imbroidred with precious drops of his blood, which gave him a lustre a thousand times more honourable, then that of diamonds and rubies; and after him an infinite number of celestial Courtiers who waited on the triumph of his resurrection. He heard acclamations which gave him the title of True and Faithful, voices of trumpets, of water, and thunder, which ceased not to resound Alleluiah. O what a source of joy did then over-flow the breast of God, that treasury of chast delights.

Ecce equus albus, & qui sedebat super eum vocabatur fidelis & verax. In capite ejus diademata multa, vestitus erat veste aspersa sanguine, &c. Apoc. 19.

From the Quire he cast his eyes on the body of his great Temple, and saw in magnificent idea's all the state of the Church militant, which is compared to the body of it, to wit to a ship, because it is still in the waves of this tempestuous sea. He beheld it with an eye of love & compassion, seeing by his example it increased by its losses, rose in its ruines, and was glorified by persecutions: and considered this little handful of Christians, which multiplying, Age after Age, peopled Asia, Europe, & Africa, and spred through the world known and unknown, taking for habitation the same limits the Sun hath in his course: he perceived Nations drenched in the darkness of ignorance, which having no more of man then shape, were transformed at the first light of the Gospel into a life wholy celestial: prophane Temples thrown down on their Gods, Idols broken in a thousand pieces, dens of theeves, full of horrour, bloud & darkness, purified by his doctrine, & the very instruments of his dolours honoured and advanced on the top of Capitols. He beheld Churches erected on al sides to his honour, Monarks and Queens who laid their Crowns and diadems at his feet, with praises, sacrifices, and eternal feasts.

in

On the other side he represented to himself so many Doctours, knowing as Oracles, & pure as Angels, who were to be the trumpets of his glory: so many innocent Virgins who should with an immortal character inscribe on their bodies the resemblance of his own most sacred purity: so many confessours who hasten to engrave on the most hideous rocks of the desart, the omnipotency of his name; the imitation of his fasts, watchings, abstinencies; the image of his deifying conversation. And lastly more then eleven millions of Martyrs who defyed all torments, affronted executioners, braved death, and scored out with their bloud the holy pathes of their glory.

Cruciate, damnate, atterite, patientia nostra probatis iniquitas vestra, crudelitas illecebra est secta; plures efficimur quoties metimur a vobis: sanguis Martyrum semen est Christianorum. Tertul. Apol. 50. Kingdom of Jesus.

7. I leave you to ponder that which never can enough be thought on, the repose and comfort of the soul of Jesus, when he beheld in his idea's the great Kingdom which was to be brought forth in his bloud & established in his resurrection. And moreover that his Kingdom should be an eternal Empire, never admitting end, death, nor darkness. Humane wisdom being desirous to be established in Empires by vice, policy, & tyranny, found every-where scepters of glass, crowns of vapours, and thrones of ice, which are broken, scattered, and dissolved into nothing under the progress of time and eye of the divine providence: But the Empire of Jesus, which taketh its beginning on earth & beareth its conquests into heaven, hath recommended his scepter to the bosom of eternity.

O what a torrent of pleasures flowed over the fair soul of our Saviour in these considerations. Painters naturally love their own workmanships, learned men their writings, Law-makers their politick Institutions, military men their victories and trophyes. All men in the world have a sensible joy to see their designs brought to perfection. Solomon even melted with comfort in consideration of the accomplishment of the Temple of Hierusalem. Justinian could not behold but with much transportation of joy the Church of S. Sophy he had built. Constantine had most pleasing dreams concerning the City of Constantinople, which was as his creature. And what is all this but Chymera's in comparison of the great work of the Church, performed by the resurrection of the worlds Saviour. Have not we cause to say, It is to thee, O Jesus, it is to thee, the joys of the holy Spirit do appertain: Joys pure, celestial, divine, distilled from the heart of God, who is the heart of eternal amities. Enter into repose after so great a tumult of wars and battels. It is time (saith the Spirit of God) thou rest thy Ark under the pavillion of the eternal Majesty, after so many travels and effusion both of sweat and bloud.

Luc. 10. 21. In ipsa hora exultavit Jesus spiritu sancto. Ingredere in requiem tuam & arca sanctificationis tua. Amodo jam dicit spiritus ut requiescant à laboribus suis. Apoc. 14. 13.

8. Let us more and more settle our selves in this noble belief, which charmeth al anxieties of this life, sweetneth all rigours, purifieth all intentions, animateth all virtues, and crowneth all merits. Courage (O Christians!) an immortality, a resurrection, an eternal life, a life of God, is gained for thee by the pains, sweats, and bloud of Jesus; and he now inviteth thee into the society and communion of this glory. What resolution wilt thou take (O man of mud and mortar? why dost thou still bow down to the earth, the back whereof thou hast bristled with so many thorns by thy sins? It is not now said unto thee: Thou art dust, and shalt return into dust; but thou art put in mind of immortality. The tombes of Alexanders and Cesars, all sprinckled over with lies and gildings, bear a HERE LYETH, but the glorious sepulcher of our Saviour, HE IS NOT HERE.

The comfort and fruit we should derive from the Resurrection to the imitation of our Saviour.

Tulvis es, & in pulverem reverteris.

Surrexit, non est hic.

9. O Christian, thou becomest the child of a good house, if thou canst understand thy nobility. How magnificent, how happy art thou to enter into a glory, which is common unto thee with God? Thy country is no longer on earth; forsake, forsake the love of these sleight cottages, these poor ant-hils, which enthral so many spirits devested of those divine seeds which bud under generous breasts. Behold the great globe all replenished with stars and lights, which incloseth within its extent all lands and seas; the great house of God where are so many brave Intelligences, part of which are busie in the praises of the Omnipotent, others circumvolve stars, remaining infatigably disposed to their imployments. This is the Palace which God hath conquered for thee. A goodly and flourishing company laden with Crowns stretch out arms to thee, thou still hast thine eye upon the petty trifles of this terrestrial abode thereon to settle thy affections. Enter, enter (O faithful soul) into the foulds and circuits of eternity, all years are for thee, all Ages are open to thee, all the greatness of heaven (if thou wilt be loyal to thy Master) is in thine own hand.

Si consurrexistis cum Christo, quæ sursum sunt sapite, non quæ super terram.

O when will that goodly day come, which shall restore thee thy body to render it to God, thy body no longer a mass of frail, ponderous and perishable earth, but an immortal, agile, and incorruptible body, priviledged with favours and gilded with bright splendours of the body of Jesus. Raise thy self, faithful soul, in the sufferings and travels of this life, yeild not to temptations and persecutions, which will snatch out of thy hand so advantageous a crown. All the pomp of this world, all this life, yea all which here pleaseth and distracteth hearts, is but a poor preludium of the great act of inexplicable contentment which passeth in eternity.

O man, thou hast heretofore been a little infant in thy mothers womb amongst bloud and ordure, involved in thin skins, swadled in clouts and swathbands which nature gave thee, thou wast held in thē to prepare thee for this world, for this life, where thou now breatheft air with all liberty; know this world is a second womb in comparison of heaven. Thou art yet in prison, in obscurity, in fetters, till the coming of the great day, wherein God shall give thee a new body, a glorious body, a spiritual body.

With these hopes the mother of the young Machabees saw the members of her children hewed and cut in pieces under the bloudy sword of persecution. With this hope holy Anchorets filled the desarts with with their tears, walked on scorching sands, trampled dragons under foot, stifled the concupiscences of flesh in snows and thorns; with this hope Martyrs sacrificed themselves in as many torments as they had members. They preached on crosses, sang in flames, triumphed on wheels, and to merit this glory, thou wilt not resolve to forsake that company, which hath robbed thee of thy heart, and dishonoured the character of thy profession. Thou wilt not resolve to suffer a little injury, a slight persecution. Thou wilt not accomplish thy vows, discharge thy obligations, put thy self into some course of a regular piety. And what may we think of thee (O soul, so many times ungrateful and disloyal) if Heaven open in rewards cannot yet dilate thy heart to his love, who readily offers them?

The twentieth EXAMPLE upon the twentieth MAXIM

Divers observations upon the length of life, and desire of the state of Resurrection.

IT is not my purpose to enlarge hereupon narration of many Resurrections, whereof we have sundry notable examples both in the old and new Testament, and in the lives of Saints, in which kind, there is not an Age which doth not furnish us with store. I only rest upon some observations, which evidently shew the passionate desires humane nature hath to the most blessed state proposed us in the Resurrection.

August. l. 22 de Civitate Dei. c. 11. Omne corpus fugiendum ex Platonicis. 2. Cor. 5. 4. Qui sumus in hoc tabernaculo, ingemiscimus gravati, eo quod nolumus exspoliari, sed supervestiri, ut absorbeatur quod mortale est, a vita.

The Platonists said, The presence of felicity was the absence of body, and that we must fly from it as from a prison, to enter into the liberty of beatitude. But the Apostle hath much better said, That we groan in this tabernacle, and are in great pain, not that we desire to be despoiled, but to be better cloathed, that all which is mortal in us, may be as swallowed up by life. Verily we have a tender love of our bodies, and even those who do most torment them, do it for no other purpose but to place them one day in ease We live not without thinking on this Resurrection and immortality, the fruition whereof we shall never find but in Heaven. God hath given us this desire, to teach us we are created for it; but he doth not afford us the performance of it here, to tell us we must seek for it else where. We desire to live long and commodiously; shortness of life taketh away the one, and continual sicknesses bereaves us of the other. So many men have sought for their Resurrection here on earth, and have found nought but their destruction. Our body in the declining of age, is not like Vestal fires, to be everlastingly repaired. All in it is lost, all is dissolved; but if any thing therein be reestablished, it is not to the proportion of its primitive vigour. Spirits, without which we cannot live, cease not to alter our life, and the very air, we breath, drieth, and devoureth us.

2 Pet. 3. 8. Unus dies apud Dominum sicut mille anni, & mille anni, sicut dies unus.

There have been men in the world, who have in this life made boast of great age, as if they had already some scantling of the condition of Resurrection, but they have been very rare, & to speak truly, they have continued long in a happiness, whereof we find an end. It is a remarkable thing, that the eldest of all the Patriarchs in Genesis, who was Methusalem, arrived not to the time wch S. Peter calleth a day of God. A thousand years (saith the great Apostle) are before God but one day: And not any one of the first men of the world, with his so many years, mounted to the thousand year of his age. Yea, it is a thing very well to be observed, that in the account the Scripture maketh of the years of Patriarchs, the age of women is not considered. And Baronius findeth the Bible never reckoned the days and years of women, but of Sara, Judith, and Anne the daughter of Phanuel, to teach us our lives are short, since those of Eve, the mother of the living, and of so many other mothers from whom men issued, entred not into the line of account in Gods Chronicle. We know not how long the first woman of the world lived, but we understand she returned into dust, and that we must tread the like path.

Greece, the mother of fables, sought to use posterity as they do children: it hath pleased it self to scare us with strange tales of huge bodies and long lives, but we have more difficulty to believe them, then it facility to invent them. Phlegon a rare Authour sayes; he read in Apollonius the Gramarian, that the Athenians desirous to fortifie the long Island, which was near to their City, laying the foundation of their fortresses, found a sepulcher one hundred cubits long with this Epitaph, which said: Macrosiris is here interred in the long Island, after he had lived five thousand years compleat. These are impostures and Rhodomontades, which seek to brave Ages, and cannot affront worms, nor be defended from corruption. Phlegon. de rebus mirab. c. 17

All about us is sufficient to give us lesson of the shortness of our life. The corn, on which we live, dies every year to the root. The Vine feels as many deaths as winters, and although it renew every year, it cannot attain to the reasonable age of some drunkards: Fifty or threescore years make up its age as also of Apple-trees, Pear-trees, Plumb-trees, Chery-trees, and other such like, wherof eating the fruits, we should think the wood which bears them, liveth no longer then we. Tame creatures, which are perpetually among us, live but a while. The age of a horse ends at twenty years. It is a great chance if a dog arrive to that number. The ox will be well contented with sixteen, sheep with ten, cats are between ten and six, pigeons, and so many flying fowl live not long for we daily eat them soon enough; as if all this should say unto us: What do we so long in the world, since all things that must serve our use last so little. Gold & silver continue long, but last very little in our hands, & though one keep them as well as he can, they keep not ever one Master. If there be creatures which live much longer, they fly from us, as Harts, Crows, and Swans: you might say, they are ashamed to participate in our frailty.

Great-ones of the earth have in all times done what they could, with a purpose to prolong their days, so naturally are we desirous of the state of Resurrection; but they have many times bridged them, seeking to lengthen them. Garcias telleth us, that a King of Zeilam having learned the adamant had the virtue to preserve life, would neither eat nor drink, but in a dish wch he caused to be made of adamant, through a strange giddiness of spirit; but he failed not to find death in these imaginary vessels of immortality We make a great matter of it to see men very old; they are beheld with admiration: But if some desire to come to their age, there is not any would have the miseries and troubles of it. This Phlegon, of whom we now speak, who had been one of the most curious Authours of his Age, made a book of long liv'd men wherein he confesseth he hath exactly looked into the Registers of the Roman Empire, there to find old men and women of an hundred years, and scarcely could he meet with a sufficient number of them to fill up a whole leaf of paper. But if he would take the number of such as died before fifty, which the Ancients called the exterminating death, he had filled many huge volumes. Pompey took pleasure at the dedication of his Theater, to see a Comedianess act, named Galeria Capiola, who reckoned ninety nine years since her first entrance into a Theater. It was a goodly play of life in a woman, who danced on the brink of her grave: But how many such like have there been? people go into the tomb as drops of water into the sea, not thinking on it. Nay, do but observe al which is Sovereign, and you will find among all the Emperours, w^ch were through so many ages, there is not one to be found, who attained to the age of an hundred years; and four alone arrived to four-score, or much thereabouts. Gordian the elder came to this point, but scarcely had he tasted of Empire, but was overwhelmed with a violent death. Valerian at the age of seventy six years was taken by Sapor King of Persia, and lived seven years in a shameful captivity, his enemy making use of his back as a foot-stool, when he would mount on horse-back. He was at first much greater in the estimation of men then he deserved, and every one would have thought him worthy of Empire, had he not been Emperour. Anastasius, a man of little worth and less courage, who had more superstition then religion, arrived to the age of four-score and eight years, when he was blasted with lightning from heaven. Justinian reckoned four score & three, which made him wax white in a vehement desire of glory, although being somewhat contemptible in his person, he was fortunate in Captains. They speak of a King called Arganthon, who heretofore reigned in Spain the space of four-score years, and lived an hundred and fourty: But this is rather in fables then authentical histories. Of so many Popes as have been since S. Peter, not any one hath possessed the See twenty five years, & scarcely find you four or five four-score years of age. John the two & twentieth, an unquiet and treasure-heaping spirit, was about ninety years, when death took off his triple Crown. So many had Gregory the twelfth, who was created before the schism, but his papacy was as short, as his life was long. Paul the third attained to one above four-score, and was otherwise a man as peaceable of spirit as prudent in counsel. Paul the fourth, severe, imperious, and eloquent, came to four-score and three. Gregory the 13 lived as many; a Prelate wise, courteous, prudent, liberal, who lived too little a while for the Churches good, for which he could not end but too soon. If we speak of the blessed S. John, S. Luke, S. Polycarp, S. Denys, S. Paul the Hermit, S. Anthony, S. Romuald, and so many other religious men, they lived long: And it seems there are many things in religion, w^ch further long life, as contemplation of things divine, joys not sensual, noble hopes, wholesome fears, sweet sadness, repose, sobriety, and regularity in the order of all actions. But all this is little in comparison of the divine state wherein bodies shall not only never end but live eternally, impasible as Angels, subtle as rays of light, quick as thought, and bright as stars.

Ancients

Tert. in historia vitæ & mortis.

Conclusion of the MAXIMS, by an advice against Libertinism, where all men are exhorted to zeal of true Religion, and the love of things eternal.

Of the obscurity and persecution of TRUTH.

INcredulity is an immortal disease, which hath reigned from the beginning of the world, and which will never end but with the worlds dissolution. Dreams and lies are many times believed, because they insinuate themselves into the heart by charms; but truth, which will never bely her self, hath much ado to make her self understood, and if she be once known, she is beloved when she smiles, and feared when she frowneth.

Four things much unknown.

There are four things have ever been much unknown in the world, time, wind, terrestrial Paradise, and truth. Time is a marvellous creature, which perpetually passeth over our heads, which numbreth all our steps, which measureth all our actions, which inseparably runs along with our life, & we have much business to know it as well in its nature as progressiō It is a very strange thing that there are such as promise themselves to reckon up the years of the world as of an old man of three-score, and yet we know by the experience of so many ages, it is a great labyrinth wherein we still begin, never to end Hadrianus Junius.

It was for this cause the Ancients placed the figures of Trytons on high Towers with tails crookedly winding, to represent unto us the intrication of the foulds and compasses of time. And for this also in the Prophet Esai, the Seraphins covered the face and feet of God with their wings, to teach us (saith S. Hierom) that we are very ignorant in things done before the world, and in those which shal happen to the end of it.

Isa. 6. Hieron. in Isa. Non est vestrum nosse tempora & momenta quæ Pater posuit in sua potestate. Actor. 1.

If we on the other side consider the wind, we cannot but sufficiently understand the commodities and discommodities of it, which have made the wise to doubt, whether it were expedient there should be winds in nature, because if their influences be good in some things, their furies are extreamly dreadful in other. We see how upon one part the wind drench huge vessels laden with men and riches, on other, they tear up trees, they ruin and overthrow houses: We likewise find, they favourably carry the clouds to impart showers to all the world, they purg the air, they cause a good temperature in the elements, they are the occasion of commerce and navigations, to make the riches of the world common. We cannot be ignorant of their effects. But as for their causes some cōmix atoms, other attribute the production of it to the Sun which rarifieth the air, other to vapours & exhalations: Other say they are the sneezng of this vast creature called the world: others, think the element of the air is moved of it self. And indeed we can say nothing more certainly of it, then what the Prophet did, That God produceth the Winds out of his treasures.

Senec. nat. q. l. 5.

Qui producit ventos de thesauris suis. Psal. 134. 7.

As for terrestrial Paradise, it is a question among Divines never to be ended, & which ministreth perpetual business to all Interpreters upon Genesis. Elias Thesbites durst boldly say, that not only the garden of pleasure was still in being, but that doubtlesly many went thither, and the passage into it lay open to them, but that charmed with the beauties and contentments of this place they never returned. Which may be refuted with as much ease as it was invented. Origen and Philo following their allegories made a mystical Paradise and true idea's of Plato, wherein they were imitated by Psellus, who saith that Chaldean Paradise, so calleth he it, was nothing else but a Quire of celestial virtues, which environed the heavenly Father, and beauties of fire issuing from fountains of the first workman.

Some place it in Indy, others in Mesopotamia, where there would be much ado wel to accord these four

Rivers

Rivers, but that recourſe is had to the violence of the deluge. We muſt confeſs that there are many things unknown, wherein God will exerciſe our faith, but not ſatisfie our curioſity. But nothing through all Ages hath been ſo hidden and unknown, as truth. The Philoſopher Heraclitus ſaid, That its Altar was in a cloudy cavern, all covered with ſhades and darkneſs, wherinto ſeldom any came. And verily we ſee, that ſince ſciences were invented, for the ſpace of ſo many Ages, we have beheld nothing but wranglings and wars among Philoſophers, who ſeeking to make diſſection of the great body of this Univerſe, have all mutually contended for the defence of truth, as they ſay: but many defending it, have ſo ill handled it, that they almoſt have diſ-membred it, and for a ſolid body, have in the end retained nought in their hands but a fantaſm. It only appertaineth to God to produce it, and to make it known to mortals, which he out of his infinite goodneſs hath at ſundry times done. But men blinded, like unto Giants, have ever perſecuted poor truth out of a certain ſpirit of incredulity and contradiction, the plague and poyſon of wiſdom. After the Eternal Wiſdom took lips of fleſh, to reveal the ſecrets of Heaven unto us, four Squadrons have furiouſly aſſaulted it. The one of Jews, the other of Gentiles, the third of Mahumetans, the fourth of Hereticks. And now adays after Hereticks, we muſt add a fifth thereto, which is that of Libertines.

Non credent mihi, neque audient vocem meam.

The Definition of Libertiniſm, the Deſcription, Diviſion, and divers effects of Libertines.

2. LIbertiniſm is nothing elſe but a falſe liberty of belief and manners, which will have no other dependence, but on peculiar fancy and paſſion. It is verily a ſtrange monſter, whereof it ſeems Job made deſcription under the figure of Behemoth, as much to ſay, as a creature compoſed of all ſorts of beaſts, of which it beareth the name. Libertiniſm likewiſe is a ſin framed out of all manner of ſins, whoſe effects it hath, to poſſeſs the miſeries. Behemoth (ſaith he) eateth hay as an Oxe: and the Libertine from the table of Angels, is brought back to the ſtall of beaſts, having no other care but to ſtuff his guts with corruptible meats, having deſpiſed the immortal Manna. The one hath his ſtrength in his reins the parts dedicated to luſt, and the other is only vigorous for impurity. The one hath bones of braſs, and the other a heart of copper. The one makes ſhew of ſome griſtles framed of iron, the other of ſome falſe moral virtues, really nothing but iniquity. Mountains bear graſs to feed the one, and the tables of great men plenty to entertain the other. The one ſleepeth in moiſt places under the ſhadow of Reeds, and the other in Victual-houſes and idleneſs. The one threatneth to ſwallow Jordan, the river of the holy Land; and Libertiniſm will annihilate the moſt ſincere part of Chriſtianity.

Iob 40.

We may ſay of all theſe impious, what S. Cyprian did of Devils: Theſe are impure and wandering ſpirits, which plunged in ſenſuality, and having loſt the happineſs of Heaven, through the contagion of earth, forlorn and corrupt, ceaſe not to ruine and corrupt.

Spiritus inſinceri & vagi non deſinunt perditi perdere, & depravati erroribus pravitatis infundere. Cyprian. l. de Idol. vanit.

Now obſerve they are not equal in malice or quality: but when I ſomewhat nearer conſider their ſtate, I find they are divided into ſix orders. The firſt comprehendeth many ſpirits, who are not of the worſt, being ſomewhat reaſonably grounded upon the principal points of Religion; but as much as they fail in all concerneth ſubmiſſion of ſpirit, ſo much are they enamoured of their own wit, and become laviſh of tongue.

Diviſion.

This often proceedeth either from birth, education, too free converſation, ſome paſſion, or from opinion of proper ability, which is the cauſe they cut and mangle many things very confidently, concerning the honour of the Church, and œconomy of Religion. One while they ſtrike at the Pope's authority, another while they deſperately throw themſelves upon the multiplication of Religious Orders, ſometimes they cenſure all Eccleſiaſtical perſons, ſparing none: mean while they ſee not the ſubverſion of Religion, always began by the contempt of Prieſts. Sometimes they ſcoff at Confeſſions and frequent Communions, another time argue againſt the doctrine of Purgatory, then they ſlight indulgences, contemn Saints, Images, and Reliques, ſometimes declaim againſt other Ceremonies and Cuſtoms of the Church. They ordinarily ſay, Jeſus Chriſt ſufficeth them, and that beſides the bleſſed Sacrament, there is no need to take pains in other devotions.

Nay, that which more provokes and ſtrengthneth them in their beliefs, is, what they obſerve in others, who not inſiſting in the more perfect ways of the univerſal Church, create devotions to themſelves, which much incline to ſuperſtition; for neglecting the great and eſſential Maxims of our faith, they adhere to ſilly inventions of their own ſpirit: and you would almoſt ſay, the Father, the Holy Ghoſt, and the Word of God it ſelf, were nothing with them in compariſon of particular devotions of ſome Saints, or ſome ſlight obſervances, which they practiſe according to their own fancy. But if one happen to reprove them upon it, they are uncivilly offended therewith, and think ſuch as ſpeak with reaſon, are not within the compaſs of the upright judgment of faith. I affirm theſe kind of proceedings are not according to the order of the Church, the which honoureth all Saints, yea, and the bleſſed Virgin, in a degree infinitely beneath the Divine Majeſty, nor doth it honour them, but to honour God in them and by them.

But if ſome abuſe myſteries, muſt we therefore overthrow Altars? If ſome popular ſpirits ill inſtructed grow ſuperſtitious, muſt one therefore become a Libertine? Muſt innocency be forſaken the more to hate the guilty? It is a pittiful thing to ſee good ſpirits, who make profeſſion of Catholick Religion, and have in ſome things good apprehenſions of piety, to take ſuch liberty of words to themſelves, that we know not what to make of them. Ought they not to conſider, that a popular errour is one thing, and a poſition of the Church, another? If ſome particulars introduce exorbitant devotions, let them reject, blame, and condemn them. We neither undertake to defend nor juſtifie them. But when we ſpeak of the invocation of Saints, of their Reliques, Canonizations, Indulgences, of the authority of our Holy Father, of the Inſtitution of Religious Orders, and ſo many ſuch like, which are authorized by general Councils, and by the belief of all antiquity, doth not a good judgment ſee, that to go about to oppoſe theſe Maxims, is to do that which S. Auguſtine ſpeaketh, To ſuffer one's ſelf to run into a folly, which haſteneth to the height of inſolency? He, who admitteth a leak in a Ship drowns it, who divideth Religion hath none at all, who reſolves to believe this, and reject that, believes nothing. All that which cometh from one ſame authority, ought to be believed with like equality. Our faith is not grounded upon natural judgment, upon wit, and diſcourſe, but on the ſubmiſſion we ow to God and the Church, which is the Interpretess of his counsels. He who abideth therein, abides in true wisdom, who goeth out of it, shal find nothing but an Ocean of disturbances, and the shipwrack of his faith.

The second order of Libertines is of Neuters, wavering and distrustful, who are almost upon the indifferency of Religions, and hold their faith as a hawk without leashes: It quickly flies away and leaveth them, to repleniſh more-setled brains and more capable souls. In this number you have many squeazy stomachs, who affect to be Masters in matter of Religion, and are extreme greedy of all sorts of innovations. And if there be some bold spirit, who with sensual reason censureth the mysteries of our Religion, that man is according to their taſt a brave fellow, and his books deserve to be bound up in gold and purple. The Bible is not wise enough for them, their spirit of rebellion findeth faults and contradictions therein. They are in search of hidden mysteries, as were the Argonauts, who went out to win the golden fleece: And could they lay hold on Mahomets Alcoran, they will not spare to read it, the more to confound themselves in the labyrinth of their errours. After they have run all over, sounded all, quoted all, they find themselves empty, and have nothing so assured as incertainty, nothing so undoubted as the loss of their faith, which they have almost wholly transformed into a cursed Neutrality, the head-long descent of a horrible precipice.

The third order comprehendeth idle loyterers, & people of the throat and kitchin, who bear in their ensign for devise, that which is said to have been inscribed on Sardanapalus his tomb: Drink, eat, fill thy self in the ordures of flesh, and think thou hast nothing but that which thou affordest to thy sensuality. They all say with Epicurus, As for my self, I cannot understand any felicity, unless it be in palates, in lips, in ears, in the belly, and all that which is common to us with beasts. These kind of men have not so much to do as other, they are not sollicitous concerning the secrets of nature, curious books, mystical Cabals, the Gospel, not Turkish Alcoran: they have found their God in themselves, and indeed will acknowledge no other but the belly. Their continual employment is to furnish out tables for it, which are its Altars, and to offer unto it dishes and sauces in sacrifice.

Ἐν τῇ γαστρὶ, ἀφροδισίοις, τὰ ἄλλα ὑπνῶν.

The fourth region containeth the malign, covert, and narrow observers, who yet still retain some fear of the smoke of the faggot: behold the cause, why they dare not declare themselves in open manner: They enter into the fold as wolves cloathed in a sheeps skin, and tell the sheep they are much affected to their conservation, but that the dogs must be taken away, which do nothing but deafen their ears with barking both day and night. These are such as sow propositions with a double meaning, and have ever a back-shop to hide themselves in; such as say, Catholick religion is good, if it were purged from so many superstitions, such as deceive young men under colour of doctrine, and when they have hit upon a curious spirit, whom they esteem retentive of a secret recommended, they draw the curtain aside, and reveal the mysteries of iniquity to him. They are such as make disguises and differences, which no man imagined, and make truth combat against Atheism with so feeble arms, that it were much better defended, to be left to its own nakedness, such as have a storehouse of evil books, more impure then the stable of Augaus, out of which they derive all their profanations, cloying the ears of the simple with a thousand objections, ever made in the name of a third person, who never dreamt of them: Lastly, such as silently build the Babylon of execrable confusions.

The fifth rank comprehendeth all those, who have sold their souls to ambition, and particular interest, and have nothing of religion, but seeming and ceremonies. They are such as would make no scruple to set a foot upon the throat of their best friends, to raise their own fortune higher: Such as live fattened up with the Altar, being many times enemies of the Altar: Such as lift their children aloft with an arm of silver, through all the ways of injustice, above the heads of men, and make the Church a prey to their ambition: Such as are present at Divine Service with postures of a puppet-player: Such as go to Gods word as to a Comedy, to see and to be seen, more for Adonis then Jesus; and who in conclusion turn all piety into scoffs, retaining nothing of it, but a fantasm to serve their own ends. The sixth manner is of such as are utterly impudent in words, and Libertines in actions, of whom the great S. Jude made a lively description: Certain men are crept in among us reprobate and impious spirits, who apply all talents of grace and nature to lust, and to deny him that made them, to wit, our Lord Jesus Christ, Master and sole Monarch of the whole world. Then he addeth, they are such as defile their flesh, and revolt against lawful powers, such as blaspheme the Divine Majesty. They are gluttonous, cruel, and arrogant, who only think to satiate themselves by others hunger, clouds without water, tossed with turbulent winds; autumn-trees, barren trees, trees twice dead, trees rooted out of the territory of the Church. They are waves of an enraged sea, which foam nothing but confusions; wandering Comets, to which God reserveth a tempest of darkness.

Ut introierunt quidam homines, &c. Et hi carnem quidem maculant, dominationem autem spernunt, majestatem autem blasphemant. Hi sunt in epulis suis maculæ, &c.

The Causes of Libertinism well observed by the Apostle. S. Jude.

3. NOte that this great Apostle doth here touch four sources of infidelity, which are in this very considerable. The chief and original of this corruption, is a brutish lust, which with much infamy overfloweth as well in pleasures of the throat as sensuality, which he was willing to express by these words, when he said: The impious not only act impurities, but are the impurities themselves. For the Libertines are true Borborites, (so were certain hereticks called) as one would say, bemired, because they naturally delighted in uncleanness; they are dissolute people, who have no other God but their belly, good cheer, and unbridled lust; from whence it cometh, that understandings clouded with bodily pleasures, thicken, and become wholly unable for things divine. The people heretofore beloved, is puffed up with fat, hath kicked against, and forsaken its Creator, said Moses.

Jud. Epist. Job. 20.

Hi sunt in epulis suis macula.

Incrassatus est dilectus & recalcitravit, dereliquit Deum factorem suum. Deut. 31.

Tertullian very wel termeth gourmandize the palsie of the understanding: for as a body is deprived of sense and motion by the corporal palsie, which obstructeth the nerves, so the spirit oppressed by sensuality, is wholly darkned, without any feeling of Religion, or any motion to works which concern salvation. To live in fat, is to shut up the gate of wisdom. There is a palsie of corporal pleasures, which wasteth the spirit, and a ptisick which preserves it.

Opimitas sapientiam impedit, exilitas expedit, paralysis autem cum prodigio prius servat. Tertul. de anima. c. 20

Nay Oecumenius discovereth somewhat more mysterious unto us, when interpreting the word macula according to the Greek σπιλάδες, he saith, They are certain rocks hidden under the waves, which surprize Saylours, and cause hideous shipwracks. This very well agreeth to Libertines, and one may call them, according to another translation; rough rocks, hollow stones, & stones, and shelves, which are the causes of so many falls. They are in feasts as gulphs in the Ocean, and overtake ere aware, spirits already possessed with the vapours of wine and meats, at which time they are most open to sottish mirth. Ah how many young men deceived by these impostures, after they have made ship-wrack of reason in a tavern, have thereunto added the ship-wrack of their faith! He was led as an Oxe to the slaughter, or as a skipping Lamb, not foreseeing his captivity, before the mortal arrow had transfixed his entrails, saith the wise man.

Confragosa in mari sunt cavernosus rupes, & scopulos.

Bos ductus ad victimam, ignarus lasciviens & ignorans quòd ad vincula stultus trahatur, donec transfigat sagitta guttur ejus Prov. 7. 23.

The second cause of infidelity, is a certain barrenesse of wit, of judgment, discretion, of Christian virtues, and namely of humility, of good works, and worthy employments, and consequently a swelling of presumption, of imaginary ability, of vanity, of idleness, which is much supported by wicked nature, effeminate education, too free conversation, access of evil company, which render a man absolutely barren. A matter excellently well signified by these words: They are clouds without water, such kind of trees as we see in Judea, unfurnished of fruits in Autumn, and despoiled of leaves; twice dead that is to say, quite rotten. Faith will be manured by the exercises of piety, by presence at Divine Service, by keeping of fasts, by alms, and frequentation of Sacraments: Now these wicked ones, employed in sensual pleasures and evil company, forsake all the Characters of their Christianity, which maketh them by little and litle fall into a great forgetfulness of God, into disdainfull pride, insupportable neglects, and into the maledictions uttered by our Saviours lips against the unfruitfull tree. Of these is understood the decree of Heaven: Earth, earth, earth, hearken to the Word of God. Our Lord hath said, Write down this man as a man barren, who shall never prosper during his life.

Nubes sine aqua.

Jer. 22. 29. Terra, terra, terra, audi sermonem Domini. Hæc dicit Dominus: Scribe virum istum sterilem, virum qui in diebus suis non proseperabitur. Finitus fers maris despumantes confusiones suas. Tunc videbitur ignominia tua, & adulteria tua, & hinnitus, & alienatio fornicationis tuæ supra colles. Ambr. l. de Abra.

The third source is a tumult of enraged passions, which are waves of the sea, that vomit up their confusions; for these kind of spirits are in perpetual disturbances, nor hath the sea so many waves, as they anxieties, pride puffeth them, ambition precipiteth them, hatred gnaweth them, delights conquer them, choller burneth them, fury transporteth them, hardnesse of heart makes them untractable, and impudence insupportable. And being unable to restrain their passions within themselves, they throw them abroad as the the froth of waves, and scum of confusions. That is it which S. Ambrose said, interpreting a passage of Jeremie: Then is it thy ignominy, thy adultery, thy neighing, and strangeness of thy fornication shall be seen to all the world on the mountains.

Lastly, the fourth root which rendreth their evil very desperate, is a perpetual inconstancy, excellently compared in the passage of the Apostle to flying fires, formed in the air from exhalations of the earth. This sort of men perhaps may have qualities, which may give them some lustre according to the world, and make them appear as stars in the firmament of worldly honour, causing some to reflect on them with admiration of their wit, their eloquence, and behaviour. But they are (to speak properly) stars of earth and smoke, like unto that S. John calleth the star of worm-wood, which being not of the stars, enchased by the hand of God in celestial globes, but flying flames enkindled by some grosse exhalations, proceeding perhaps from a dunghill, fall back again on earth from whence they came. If they sometimes take certain semblances of virtue and penance, they have no solidity in their good purposes: If they be touched and raised by some good inspiration, they are not constant, but having sowed certain rays of hope, fall back again into their myre, and falling throw plague and poison among company.

Crinemque volantia sydera ducunt.

Adde also to this discourse of the Apostle, two essential causes of our evils. One whereof is, that the disorder and impurity of manners being very ordinary among young men, who are children of the rich best qualified; parents, instead of repressing of exorbitancy, by the cutting off of excess and superfluity, which is the nurse of impiety, take no other care, but to put them into abundance over head and ears, and thrust them into dignities, in the weakness of ability, and greatest strength of passions. From thence proceedeth they behold one another like little Gods, and having shaken off the yoke of obedience to men, free themselves what they may, from the commands of the supreme Master, having no other guide but temerity, nor other law but the liberty of doing all. Blasphemies, which in the mouths of mean ones, would be esteemed monsters, passe from their lips for braveries, and such as come to adore their fortune, are constrained for worldly respect, to offer incense to their vices. Herein it is, parents make themselves guilty of high treason to the Divine Majesty, having so ill employed their travels and watchings, as day and night to have amassed riches, which serve for sinews to impiety, and scandal to the publick.

The other cause, which much fomenteth blasphemies & irreverencies against Religion, is, that as ears are supple to hear them, so laws are greatly unprovided to punish them. Every man is pleased to revenge his particular injuries, and to reserve unto God the revenge of his own. Prophane speeches, which heretofore made the faithfull tear their garments, such horrour they had to hear them, being now at this time uttered with some witty jests, flatter spirits, and being unable to gain the approbation of truth, they take it from the courtesies of men. It is to be feared, God permitteth this for vengeance of some sin, and wholly withdraws faith from these forlorn spirits, to place it among souls more purified.

Of the ignorance and Nullity of Libertinism.

4. I Find not any thing more intolerable, then to see impiety flatter it self with the pretext of ability, learning, and goodness of wit, since it is ever accompanied by two evil conditions, ignorance and brutishness. What light of understanding can there be in a Libertine, who makes profession to spit against the source of light? God (saith the Scripture) is the Lord of sciences, and on him depends the good order of all our thoughts. How much the more commerce one hath with the essence Divine, so much the more splendour he enjoyeth, as the Ancient Philosophers do assure us. We resemble those statutes, which spake in that proportion as the beams of the Sun reflected into their mouthes. We cannot so much as open our lips to speak worthily of God, unlesse God, who made them, unloose them for his greater glory.

Ignorance and brutishness of Libertines.

Reg. 1. 2. Unumquodque tantum habet de lucis, quantum retinet esse divini. In memor. rer. difficil.

I much esteem the sentence of S. Diadocus, who saith, There is nothing more miserable or more ignorant, then a spirit which will speak of God out of God, that is to say, who being out of the limits of faith and innocency, dares undertake to touch so high a point, as that of divinity. Now we know by experience, the wicked are alienated both in thoughts and manners from this sovereign sanctity, and therefore we may undoubtedly resolve, they are most uncapable of sciences, and especially those which are divine, being sworn enemies of the God of sciences.

Diadoc. de perfect. spirit. c. 7. Nihil egentius ea mente quæ de Deo extra Deum philosophatur.

A notable saying of Avicen. Immaterialitas radix spiritualitatis. Avicen. apud Capreol.

Moreover if that be true which Avicen the Philosopher said, that immateriality is the root of spirituality, and that by how much the more a thing is discharged of matter, so much the more it is capable of intelligence, what reasonable discourse of man can one derive from a spirit wch is perpetually clouded with vapours of lust? Heraclitus in the secrets of his doctrine, required a dry soul to render it capable of the most purified meditations of Philosophy: and can we thing a spirit which hath made a prison of its body by pampering the flesh with all possible tenderness, will declare us the mysteries of hidden sciences? Is it not to go about to gather grapes from thorns, figs from bushes, and golden grains out of straw? And say, there were some appearance of sobriety and modesty: know we not, pride is a formal obstacle to the purity of great and noble sciences, because it instantly blind-foldeth men with the presumption of their ability? Are we ignorant many would have become greatly knowing, had they not thought they were absolutely perfect? Now who is more haughty or more arrogant, then a Libertine, who, if peradventure he have some smattering of letters, is so puffed up with the opinion of his capacity, that he seems to himself to have slept in Sybilla's Cave, to pronounce Oracles, and judge all other men consist of superstitions, and ideots.

Great wits modest.

Great wits who have ravished the world with admiration, resemble those rivers, which glide along with a peaceful majesty, not troubling any body with their waves. But these petty shufflers murmure like unto brooks, and vex the whole world with their tattle. If it happen they arrive to some perfection in humane sciences (which is very seldom) they cannot command their spirit, which admits no other path then precipices. So that in the same things, wherein they take themselves to be wiser then other, they commit errours, and make most shameful lapses.

Arrogancy of Libertinism.

It is truly the disgrace and tomb of humane judgment, to see the barbarous censure, which reigneth among those who pretend acuteness; for they think so many worthy men, who have penetrated into the abyss of the most sublime sciences are ignorant of the Latine tongue: nay, if S. Augustine and S. Thomas might return into the world, they would be entertained in these quaint Academies as Grooms. But if there be some one can make an ode, a sonnet, a letter can play the gentile witty-one in company, and utter blasphemies with philosophy and affectation, he is the god of Learning, and the Monarch of Eloquence. But let a capable man sound these curious fellows, good God! what empty chambers in these great brain-pans? What darkness, and what confusions! It is soon found they understand not one sole principle of true science, and that all their learning is like a house, that hath gilded gates & chambers pestered with Spiders. Think then what a shame it is when men of quality, who affect the reputation of being judicious, prostitute their wits to these gods of straw and dung, and for the tuneable cadence of a rime, lose all harmonies of faith and conscience.

Their ignorance.

All Hereticks who make boast to assail the Church for so many Ages, have likewise made a shew to bring with them into this combat, some recommendable qualities. Some came with points of Logick, other with knowledge of things natural, other with eloquence; some vaunted profoundness in Scriptures, the rest to be versed in the reading of Councils and holy Fathers. They who have had no excellent thing in them, have brought an austere countenance, and semblance of mortal virtues. But such kind of men have nothing but ignorance with brutishness, but scoffing sycophancy, but language, and the wind of infamous words. How can it then become them to talk of the Bible, and to argue upon holy Scripture, and the mysteries of our Religion? Shut up your ears against these Questions, if you be unable to stop their mouths.

Is it handsom, think you, to see a wretched and infamous fellow to make himself the censurer of Divinity and corrector of Scripture? God should have done this and that, in such and such a fashion, (say they:) as if any one knew what is in God, but the spirit of God himself, who is never so great, as when he appeareth little to humane understanding.

Tertul. adverf. Marc. c. 2. Censores divinitatis dicentes: sic non debuit Deus, & sic magis debuit, &c.

There is but one word (saith Tertullian) to determine all disputations with such kind of men: do but ask them whether they be Christians, whether they renounce their Baptism and Christianity. If so, let them wear the Turbant, or go into the Country of god-makers and Gentiles. But if they make profession of one same Christ, and one same Religion with us, why do they belye their profession, by the impudence of their unbridled speeches.

Tertul. de præscript. contra hæres. l. 1.

S. Zeno serm. de fide. Non est fides ubi quæritur fides. Tertul. Nobis curiositate opus non est post Christum, nec inquisitione post Evangelium.

Faith (saith S. Zeno) is not Faith when it is sought. We stand not in need of curiosity after Jesus Christ, nor to search for the Gospel, said S. Cyprian's great Master. Should an Angel from Heaven speak unto us, we are to change nothing in our belief. We have betaken us to the side of truth, we have a law which the Word declared unto us, which ten millions of Martyrs have signed with their blood, which the best part of mankind professeth, the wisest heads of the world have illustrated by the light of their writings. To whom would we abandon it? To a caytive spirit, which hath nothing great in it but sin, nothing specious but illusion, nothing undoubted but the loss of salvation.

Effects of Libertinism, and punishment of the Impious.

5. THe neglect of God, is the root of all wickedness, nor can there be any thing entire in a soul despoiled of the fear of God. Impiety causeth most pernicious effects in States. First, for that it maketh havock of all good manners, leaving not one spark of virtue. Secondly, in that it draweth on the inevitable vengeance of God upon Kingdoms and Common-wealths, which suffer this monster to strengthen it self to their prejudice.

The Table of Philo. of the manners of Libertines.

Philo in the Book he made, that no salary of an unchast woman should be received in the Sanctuary, very wisely concluded, when he shewed, that he who is a Libertine and voluptuous, having no other aim in the world, but the contentments of nature, is unavoidably engaged to all manner of vice: He becomes (saith he) bold, deceitful, irregular, unsociable, troublesom, cholerick, opinionative, disobedient, malicious, unjust, ungrateful, ignorant, treacherous, giddy, inconstant, scornful, dishonest, cruel, infamous, arrogant, insatiable, wise in his own judgment, lives for himself, and is unwilling to please any but himself; one while profuse, presently covetous, a calumniatour, an impostour, insensible, rebellious, guileful, pernicious, froward, unmannerly, uncivil, a great talker, lond, vaunter, insolent, disdainful, proud, quarrelsom, bitter, seditious, refractory, effeminate, and above all, a great lover of himself.

Nay, he goes further upon the like Epithets very judiciously, and sheweth us the seeds of all evils spring from this cursed liberty.

Now I leave you to judge, if according to the saying of Machiavel himself, the means quickly to ruin an Estate, be to fill it with evil manners: who sees not

not that Libertiniſm, drawing along with it all this great train of vices, of corruptions, tendeth directly unto the utter deſolation of Empires? But beſide, there have been obſerved in all Ages hideous puniſhments from God, cauſed by impiety over Cities, Provinces, Kingdoms, and Common-wealths, which have bred theſe diſorders.

And that you may be the better ſatisfied upon this point, I have at this time only two conſiderations to preſent unto you, drawn from two models. In the firſt you ſhal ſee God's juſtice exerciſed before the Incarnation, upon the ſins of infidelity and irreverence towards ſacred things. In the ſecond, you ſhal behold the rough chaſtiſements of thoſe, who after the Incarnation, liſted themſelves up againſt the worlds Saviour. When God was pleaſed to correct the infamous Balaam, who was a Patriarch of atheiſts and wicked ones, he commanded not an Angel to ſpeak unto him, becauſe he was a Doctour, much unſuitable to a carnal ſpirit, but he raiſed a ſhe-aſs to inſtruct him, in ſo much as he was become worſe then a beaſt. It is likewiſe loſs of time to deal with Libertines by proofs derived from Schools, or from the invention of ſciences. Men as brutiſh as themſelves muſt be made to ſpeak to them, who will put them in mind of the way they have held, and the ſalary they have received of their impieties. Firſt, I eſtabliſh this Maxim for ſuch, either who are not yet hardned, or are too yielding and conſenting to evil company, that there are not any ſins which God hath ſo ſuddenly, and more exemplary puniſhed, then ſuch as were committed againſt Religion. The Prophet Ezechiel, a captive in Babylon under King Nebuchadnezzar, diſcovered amongſt tempeſts and flames, that marvellous chariot, which hath ſerved for matter of queſtion to all curious digladiation for the learned, and admiration for all Ages. I ſay, the great S. Juſtine Martyr, touched the ſenſe very near, when he ſaid, that in four figures, whereof the one was of an ox, the other of a man, the third of an Eagle, the fourth of a Lion, God ſignified the divers chaſtiſements he would exerciſe upon King Nebuchadnezzar, in that from a reaſonable man he ſhould become brutiſh, eating graſs as an ox, and that his hair ſhould grow as the ſhag of a Lion, and his body be hoary like the feathers of an Eagle, worn with old age. I add alſo to his conceit, that God by theſe repreſentations of four living creatures, ſeemed to ſay to him: O Nebuchadnezzar, whileſt thou didſt ſin only againſt men, I came with the ſlow pace of an ox, to puniſh thy offences, I ſuffered thee with much ſweetneſs, as a man: but when thou greweſt proud, impious, atheiſtical, and tottering in the knowledg of the Divinity, I fell upon thy crowned head as the Eagle upon her prey, reducing thee to a brutiſh life; and if thou goeſt forward, I will pull thee in pieces, as if thou hadſt paſſed through the teeth of a Lion.

S. Juſtin. in Epiſt. ad Orthodox. q. 44. An obſervation upon the chariot of Ezechiel.

This makes me ſay, that God tolerateth ſins for ſome time, which are of their own nature very enormous; but as for impieties, either he ſpeedily chaſtiſeth them in the heat of crime, or reſerveth them to unſpeakable avengements. See you not in the Hiſtory of Kings, how he tolerated David defiled with murder and adultery, nine whole months without taking notice of his fault: But ſo ſoon as Ozias took the incenſory to do an act of ſacriledg and impiety, behold him inſtantly ſtrucken with leproſie in the moſt eminent part of his body. Why ſo? Becauſe other ſins are many times committed through infirmity, incitement, or frailty; but this which ſtrikes at Gods juriſdiction, proceeds from an adviſed and deliberate malice. Behold the cauſe wherefore God maketh arrows of all wood, and vengeance of all creatures, to puniſh it according to its demerit. Add alſo hereunto a very remarkable proof, which is, that the Sovereign Judg, though oftentimes ſending his Prophets to ſtay the crimes of adultery, of oppreſſion, of injuſtice, and other like, ſuffered them to paſs on in an ordinary way; yet when he diſpatched meſſengers to confound idolatry and impiety, which was raiſed in Bethel by Jeroboam, he made them fly like Eagles and impetuous ſtorms. This is verified in Jeroboam King of Iſrael, who began to offer incenſe to Idols, when a Prophet came out of Jeruſalem, and arrived (as the Interpreters obſerve) in Bethel before the incenſing was finiſhed, which happened in a very ſhort time. If one ask how this man of God, in leſs then the ſpace of a ſacrifice, performed about ſix leagues, (for it was as far diſtant from Bethel to Jeruſalem) it is anſwered, God bare him on the wings of winds, becauſe he went of purpoſe to deſtroy atheiſm and impiety, which was hatched among the Iſraelites. And verily being come before this ſacrilegious Altar, he cried out aloud to Jeroboam's face: O Altar, Altar, liſten, for much better is it to ſpeak to theſe ſtones, then to an Atheiſt: God hath ſaid, and it ſhal happen; an infant ſhal be born of the houſe of David, called Joſias, who ſhal ſacrifice the Prieſts, which now incenſe to Idols, on their own Altars, and there ſhal he turn their bones into duſt. Which was afterward performed.

Obſervation upon the chaſtiſement of impiety.

3. Reg. 13.

Altare, Altare, hæc dicit Dominus, &c.

I now demand, if the celeſtial Father proceeded with ſuch rigour againſt thoſe, who altered ſome ceremony of the antient Law, that he was not contented to fall ſpeedily upon them, more ſwift then eagles and tempeſts, but cauſed bones of the dead to be taken out of ſepulchers, whereunto the right of nature had confined them, to burn and conſume them on the Altar, which they had prophaned: what will become of theſe, who ſince the venerable myſtery of the Incarnation of the Son of God, run into horrible ſins of infidelity, and trample under foot the blood of the Teſtament? Perhaps you yet conceive not ſufficiently the greatneſs of this crime, but I will make it appear unto you by a powerful reaſon. S. Denys the Areopagite ſaith, that Being is the moſt intimate, moſt neceſſary, moſt univerſal, & moſt perfect of all things, becauſe it containeth in eminency all perfections, which are not but participation of Being. And if this eſſence be ſtrongly rooted in all creatures, ſo that there is none but God who can annihilate it, what ſhal we ſay of the eſſence of the Sovereign Creatour, which originally containeth all eſſences, God to ſpeak properly, being nothing but his own eſſence? There is no doubt, but it is an excellency wholly incomprehenſible. Now we muſt neceſſarily infer, that by how much the more a thing is excellent, ſo much the more the crimes which aſſail it, are puniſhable. Behold the cauſe why one cannot almoſt find pains ſuitable to Atheiſm and impiety, which reſiſt the eſſence of God.

Dionyſ. c. 1. de divin. nominib.

The horrible puniſhments of the wicked for the ſin of Impiety.

I Moreover affirm, if in a time when the Divinity was not yet fully publiſhed, it notwithſtanding inflicted fearful puniſhments, both on the living and dead, who had before-time offended, what will become of it after the publication of the Goſpel, and the coming of the Word Incarnate, who maketh ſpeak unto us, for the confirmation of his law and word, the blood of ſo many millions of Martyrs, who died for defence of the truth, who hath opened to us on earth ſo many mouths of Apoſtles, Evangeliſts, b Par. 26. 19.

gelists, Doctours, singular in wisdom and sanctity, as there are stars in heaven; who likewise gave speech to stones and marbles of those ancient Churches, to instruct us in our Religion? The stone shall cry out in the midst of walls, saith the Prophet Habacuc.

Habac. 2. 11. Lapis de pariete clamabit.

Nay, I demand, which is the more tolerable, either to despise Joseph in the fetters of bondage, or to offer him an affront on Pharaoh's royal chariot? Every man of judgment will tell me there is no comparison, and that he who yeildeth not honour to Joseph being a captive, seemed not worthy punishment: but to deny him honour, when Pharaoh having placed him in a chariot of glory, caused to be proclaimed by a Herald of arms, Abrec, Abrec, Let all the world bow the knee before Joseph, was a crime of treason. We then infer, if the Jews for having neglected Jesus Christ in bonds, in opprobries, in torments, and the pains of the Cross, were chastised with hideous punishments to all posterity, what may we expect for such as revile heaven, and dishonour Jesus Christ in the chariot of his triumph, after they had seen and manifestly known, as by ways more then humane, that he put all the glory, power, wisdom and sanctity of the whole universe under his feet, and having now also after sixteen hundred years and more, through all the parts of the habitable world, both Altars and Sacrifices, where he hath received services and homages of so many Myters, Scepters, and Crowns, from wise and holy men, that it would easier to number the sands of the Sea, then to keep an account of them? But if you still doubt the punishment of the Jews for the sin of impiety, do but read Histories both divine and humane, to be therein sufficiently informed.

The Jews were heretofore the chosen people, and are become the reprobate. God for them drove back the waves of the red Sea, and suffered them to walk dry-foot between two waters, as between two chrystal vaults, and afterward, why did he drown them so many times in rivers of their bloud, with so horrible slaughters, that in the whole siege of Jerusalem under Titus and Vespasian, were reckoned according to Josephus his calculation, eleven hundred thousand dead? God opened to them the sides of rocks to quench their thirst, and afterward, why dried he up the dugs of women, who saw their little ones die between their arms, they unable to give them one drop of milk? God for them made Manna and clouds of Quails to showr, and why afterward did he so afflict them with such cruel and enraged a famine, that the hands of mercifull mothers slew and roasted on coals their own proper children, and eat them to satisfie their hunger? God carried them through desarts as upon eagles wings, and wherefore afterward did he abandon them to eagles and vultures, which so many times made carrion of the bodies of his children? God had given them a land so fat and fruitful, that it streamed altogether milk and honey, and wherefore afterward had it entrails of iron, denying food to the living, yea, burial to the dead? God gave them strength as a devouring fire, before which all Nations were but as straw, and why afterwards became it the shuttle-cock of the arms of Infidels? God gave them liberty for an inheritance, and why afterward obtained they not so much as an honourable servitude? Why at the siege of Jerusalem among so many thousand prisoners, did they so much disdain to make use of a Jew, that there being never a Cross to crucifie them, they were reserved for beasts to devour them, rather then derive any service from them? God gave them knowledge, and wherefore afterwards became they blockish, idle, and stupid in all learning? God ordained for them the assistance and protection of Angels, and why afterward forsook they their Temple, crying out aloud: Let us depart, let us depart from hence? God destined to them Royalty and Empire over neighbouring Nations, and why afterward had they not one inch of land at their own dispose, and especially of land, where formerly Jerusalem was built, unless they purchased it with mony, onely to enjoy it one hour or two in the year, and weep over it, and bedew it with the water of their eyes, after they had so often moistened it with their bloud? God established Priest-hood to them, and afterwards what became of Jerusalem the holy? What became of Solomon's Temple, the miracle of the world? Where is the Propitiatory? the Table of Proposition-bread? the Rational, which was before the peoples oracle? Where is the majesty of High-priests, the comelineſs of Prelates, the perpetuity of Sacrifices? From whence comes it, that it is above fifteen hundred years ago, since this miserable Nation goes wandering through the Regions of the earth, as abandoned into an eternal exile without Priests, without Temple, without Sacrifice, without Prince, King, or government? O eternal God, how hast thou thrown down thy foot-stool! O God of justice, how hast thou made desolate thy royal Priesthood! O God of vengeance, how hast thou suffered thy Sanctuary to be prophaned! Who hath ever heard speech of such a punishment? Have there been adulteries, rapines, concussions, gluttonies, yea, and idolatries, which God hath not revenged in this manner? A captivity of threescore and ten years expiated all these sins, but this after fifteen hundred years, to what sin may we attribute it, but to the neglect of the essence of the Word Incarnate? After the time that the Son of God shut his eys steeped in tears and bloud over the miserable Jerusalem, he never hath opened them to afford them mercy. A Lord so sweet, so mild, so clement, as that he raised thieves almost from bloud and robbery in an instant to thrones of glory, for having acknowledged and confessed his name, so roughly to chastise the neglect of his authority, for the space of so many Ages; what meaneth this, but to prove the opposing of the divine Essence of God, is a crime of all, the most hideous and unspeakable?

Vide Josephum, & Hegesippum & Threnos.

Run over the Histories of antiquity as long as you please, revolve in your memory all the experiences, which your Age may afford, and if you see the impious come to a good end, say, There is no cause of fear. Cain, their Patriarch, banished from the sight of God, lived long like a melancholy spirit among forrests, with a perpetual affrightment, until Lamech took away his life: The Cainists were all drenched in the waters of the deluge: Pharaoh drowned in the red sea: Nebuchadnezzar turned into a beast: Holofernes slain in his bed by the hand of a woman: Senacherib lost one hundred fourscore and five thousand men for a blasphemy: Antiochus strucken with a horrible maladie: Birds did eat the tongue of Nicanor, and his hand was hanged up over against the Temple: Heliodorus was visibly chastised by Angels: Herodes Agrippa borne from the Theater to the bed of death: The President Saturnius strucken blind: Hermianus eaten by worms in his Pretourship: Ero the fourth, all covered over with botches and carbuncles: Bamba crowned with a diadem of pitch after his eyes were pulled out: Julian the Apostate strucken with a dart from heaven: Michael the Emperour, who had in his train a heap of young scoffers, that in scorn counterfeited the Ceremonies of the Church, was torn in pieces as a victim, by his own servants: Olympius strucken with thunder in a bath. And if we observe times more near: Regero dragged to a lay-stall: Vanin burnt at Tholouse: Alsan Calefat divided between fire and water, and slain by his own hand.

Tragical events of the wicked.

Great eye of God, which art ever open upon the sins of the earth, who can steal himself from thy lightning-flashes? Great hand of God, who thundrest and lightnest perpetually over rebellious heads, who is able to resist thy justice?

Advice to Youth, and such as too easily give way to impiety.

O Unfortunate youth, who having received the first tincture of good instruction, after thou wert with so much care and honour by those to whom thou owedst thy birth, betrayest the tears of thy Parents, the travels of thy teachers, and the whole hopes of the publick! How canst thou embarque thy self amongst these treacherous and ignominious associates? How canst thou walk among so many shelves and precipices, not so much as once opening thy eys, to behold the abyss thou hast under thy feet? So many heads crushed in pieces under the Divine vengeance, are as broken Masts and shivers of a shipwrack, advanced on the promontory of rocks, to give notice of the deplorable events they have found, whose example thou still pursuest, yet thou lookest on them with arms across, and dalliest in danger like a wanton victim, which leaps and skips between the Axe and the knife.

God is my witness, I write these lines with a spirit of compasion for so many who dissolutely abuse the gifts of Heaven, and if any one happen upon the reading of this, I beseech him by the love of his salvation, not to despise a pen, which tendereth so sincere affection for the good of his soul.

A man who hath never so little reason, should he not argue within himself, and say, Verily the harmonious consent of so many Ages, which have upheld and reverenced a Religion innocent, pure, and holy, it is not a matter of sport. The horrible punishments of such as sought to dis-engage themselves from the homage due to the Divinity of Jesus Christ, are no fables, since we still behold the foot-steps of their ruines. The lights and reflections of the Divinity, which beset me on every side, are speaking tongues, the consent of so many Ages and holy personages yet alive on the earth, are no small testimony. These kind of men, who seek to sow dangerous Maxims in our minds, are creatures of little authority, evil manners, and of a conversation either insolent, or covert. They are neither Apostles nor Prophets: It is not credible, truth should so long be hidden, to be discovered to them amidst their abomination. They have neither sanctity, miracles, nor reason: they are not rich but in libertinous words and blasphemies. All they can promise me, is nothing else but a slight contentment of nature in this life, yet cannot they give it me: For amidst these unlawful pleasures, I feel my conscience much disturbed and perplexed with remorse: If I feared God, I should find this fear would banish all other affrightments from my heart. Now have I that, both of men and laws, yea, even of beast. It seemeth at every accident which happeneth to me, each creature becomes a sword and an arrow of God to punish my evil thoughts and inordinate actions: if that be not true, which these men promise (as they make no clear proof of what they say) behold me then convinced of the most horrible crime which hath ever been, behold me the object of all the execrations that have fain on their heads, who bent themselves against God: Behold me fettered in eternal and inexplicable pains, which I shall escape neither alive, nor dead. Every understanding man always inclineth to the surest way: I see, that following the opinion my Ancestours had in matter of Religion, there can happen no other evil unto me, but to be an honest man, to replenish my heart with good desires, my thoughts with pleasing hopes, my hands with works of justice, and to wait my self like a Torch of Aromatick wood in a life, satisfied with it self, and laudable to posterity: whereas going along with these, I walk on thorns and ice in the depth of night, not knowing who pursues me behind. Avaunt novelties, avaunt cursed impieties, farwel infamous atheisms, adieu execrable liberty; you shall never be ought with me. O youth, if thou didst well tast these words, what repose, what contentment, what glory shouldst thou acquire? O unhappy youth, which adherest to these impious and licentious companies, what wilt thou say, when time shall have taken from thee the scarff which now veileth thine eys, and that thou shalt see the chastisement of God, which shall follow thee in all thy undertakings, misery by thy sides, torments and pains before thee, and peoples execration over thy head? But you meek ones, and you men to halves, who endure with soft and flexible ears, unworthy blasphemies against God, under the shadow of wit and pleasant entertainment, if you have yet any vein of Christianity in all your body, ought it not to bownd and leap against these criminals, who in the heat of wind and banquets, flout in your presences at the truth of a Religion, which your Ancestours left you with so much swear, such virtues, and so many good examples? If you, who be men of quality and authority, persecute even to the gates of Hell, such as once have offended you; when you do negligently suffer them to dishonour him, who hath imprinted the ray of majesty with his finger on your faces, do you not render your selves guilty of all the crimes committed through your coldness and neglects? God hath preserved since so many Ages, doth, and will preserve this Kingdom by the piety of our great King, by the zeal of his Clergy, by the prudence of his Council and good Officers, and by the devotion of people, which are as sincere in France, as in any place of the world, enlightned with the rays of faith. But it is for impiety that Crowns are broken, that Scepters fly in pieces, and Empires have in all times passed from Nation to Nation. It is I (saith the great God) who make Counsellours fools, and Judges stupid; I who change the golden girdle of Kings into a cord; I who throw confusion on the brow of Priests; I who supplant the greatest, when they seek to overthrow true piety.

Against toleration.

Adducet Consiliarios in stultum finem.

The Edict of Darius a Pagan King, which he made in favour of the Hebrews Temple, hath astonishing words, when he saith: What man soever shall be so hardy, as to change and alter my Commandment for the building of the Temple of God, let a Gibbet be erected for him of the same wood, of which his house is built, let it be raised in the street, let him be affixed thereunto, and his house confiscated. This teacheth you, it is a great unhappiness to build your house at the expence of God's houses: Rafters and Beams of such Edifices, have many times served for instruments of punishment to such as raised them. The favours of great men, fortunes of ice, inexhaustible riches, reputation, friends, companions, factours, lackeys, buffons, all have forsaken them as butter-flies, which escape the hand of a child:

Omnis homo qui hanc mutaverit jussionem, tollatur lignum de domo ipsius & erigatur, & configatur in eo, & domus ejus publicetur. Esdras.

child: they are faln through the sin of impiety, which hath made an eclipse of their fortune and life in the brightest lustre of their greatnes.

That the Remedy of our evil consisteth in the zeal of our Faith.

6. THe Remedy of evils which turmoyl us, is wholly in our own hands, and the cure of our wounds dependeth on our own wils. Good examples and strong laws may do all, on spirits which have not yet totally renounced their own good, nor is there any one so desperate, who is not taken either by the hands of virtue, wholly made of adamant, or feareth not to fall into the chains of justice. Let Ecclesiasticks, whom God hath entrusted with his bloud, his word, and his Sacraments, begin first of all to dart rays of sanctity in the firmament of honour, where God hath placed them: Let secular men in dignities and eminent fortunes, affect zeal in Religion: Let such as are stept far into age, bear the torch before youth: Let women endeavour to establish piety, which is the ornament of their sex: Let children be well bred, and trained within the laws of modesty: Let the doctrine of Jesus Christ be sealed with the seal of good manners: there is no Libertine, but will be daunted at the sight of a life led according to the laws of Christianity: For it is a mirrour, which killeth basilisks by reverberation of their proper poison. But if blasphemers continue still so impudent, as to vomit forth unclean and injurious words against the Religion we profess, have not laws, which are in the power of the Sovereign Princes on earth and of their Ministers of State, iron hands able to stay their most daring impudencies?

To the great-ones of all Christendom.

I call you hither, O holy Prelates, O Monarchs, Princes and Potentates, who are in the world as the great Intelligences, who make the Heavens move, and who by diversity of your aspects, cause calms and storms in this inferiour region wherein we live: I pray tell me, where do you think, hath glory which you naturally love, placed its throne and state, if not in the bosom of true piety? By what degrees are those immortal spirits of your Ancestours mounted up to the joys and delights of God, having repleniſhed the earth with the veneration of their memory, if it were not by making the honour of the Sovereign Master march in the front of all their designs, and thinking nought their own, but what was acquired for God?

Apoc. 18. Remember, you are not altogether like the Angel of the Apocalyps, which beareth the Sun, and Rainbow, and all the garnishments of glory on feet of brass: you enjoy dignities and supereminencies that draw the great ones into admiration, astonish inferiours, attract people, evict honour and wonder from all the world: But consider (if so you please) that all this is onely supported on feet of clay and mortar. Time changeth you, cares consume you, maladies assail you, death takes and despoileth you. They who adored you in thrones, may one day trample on you in sepulchers.

Alas! if it happen you carry all your own interests with violence of passion to the height of your pretensions, and that you hold Religion and the glory of Jesus in a perpetual contempt, what will your soul one day answer, when it leaves the body, unto the thundering voice of a living God, saying

Isaiah 45. to you, as he did to Cyrus, in Isaiah, Assimilavite, & non cognovisti me: I called thee by thy name, I created thee like unto my self, I made thee a little God on earth, and thou hast forgotten me. I so many times marched before thy standards, many times have I humbled the most glorious of the earth for thee. I brake brazen gates, pulled down iron bars to afford thee hidden treasures, and the wealth of Ages, which nature for thee preserved in her bosom. The Sun seemed not to shine in the world, but to enlighten thy greatnes, the seas surged for thee, and for thee the earth was wholly bent to honour and obedience.

Admirer of thy self, and ignorant of Gods works, thou hast so ill husbanded my goods, that thou hast changed them all into evils; I gave thee rays and thou hast made arrows of them to shoot against me. Did I seat thee on thrones, that there thy passions might sway? Did I imprint on thy forehead the character of my greatnes, that thou mightest authorize crimes? Thou hadst a feeble pretext of Religion, and hast neglected the effects: Thy interests reigned, and my honour suffered in thy house. At what aimed thy ambition so strong of wing, and so weak of brain, which onely thought how to envy what was above, the more to oppress any thing below it? What did that burning avarice, that profuse riot, that spirit of bloud and flesh, employed in the advancement of thine own house, to the contempt of mine? For an inch of land, a wretched matter of profit, the fantasie of an affront, jealousie onely subsisting in a body of smoake, all the elements must be troubled, men and swords drawn forth for revenge, and bloud of so many mortals shed: but for my Name, which is blasphemed, it is sufficient to wag the finger, to shew onely a cold countenance, a slight touch of that great authority, whilst I was neglected, having done no other fault, but to have paid ingratitudes with benefits.

O you great-ones, who sit at the stern of Churches and temporal Estates, how far will you become accountable to Gods justice, if you place not his honour in the first rank of all your intentions? Alas! Ought not you to entertain an ardent zeal towards the Religion which our Ancestours consigned unto us, with so many examples of piety, that Heaven hath not more stars, then we lights before our eyes? Can we well endure that the verities and maxims of God, which the Prophets foretold us, the Apostles pronounced, the Confessours professed, the Martyrs defended in the piece-meal mangling of their bodies, amidst combs and iron hooks, burning cauldrons, wheels armed with keen razours, should now adays be the sport of certain giddy spirits and the aim of prophane lips, who void of wit or shame, dare invade holy things? Is it not for this, O France, the beloved of God, and orient pearl of the world, thou hast seen in thy bosom so many hostilities, such contagions, famines, monsters, and devastations, that had not the arm of God supported thee, thou wouldst have been long since drenched in irrecoverable confusions? O you, who bear the sword of justice, and have authority in your hands, will you not one day say: All they who have the zeal of the law, and the piety of our Ancestours, follow us courageously, for behold we are ready to revenge the quarrels of God, and to account his glory on earth, in the same degree the Angels hold it in Heaven. This was the conceit of the valiant Macchabee, the Prince of Gods people, who having seen an Apostate of his Nation offer incense to an Idol, slew him with his own hand on the very same Altar, saying aloud: He who hath the zeal of the law, let him follow me. Wo to me, since I am born to behold the desolation of my people! Holy things are in the hands of strangers: &c.

Omnis qui zelum habet legis, statuens testamentum sibi, exeat post me.

Va mihi quia natus sum videre contritionem populi mei! Sancta in manus extraneorum facta sunt. &c.

Nunc ergo filii, æmulatores eſtote legis, & date animas veſtras pro teſtamento Patrum. Moriamur in virtute propter fratres noſtros, & non inferamus crimen gloriæ noſtræ.

ſtrangers: The Temple hath been handled as the moſt wicked man on earth; our myſteries, our beauties, our glories are deſolated. To what purpoſe do I ſtill lead a miſerable life? Fathers of Families, will you not ſay to your children what he did to his: Children, be ye emulatours of the law, and yield your ſouls up for the teſtimony of your Anceſtours. Children, will you not anſwer what the holy Machabees did, by the lips of their elder brother: Let us dye in virtue for our brethren, and not defile our glory by any crime, which may be objected againſt us.

Let War be proclaimed againſt Libertines and blaſphemers, who will ſtill perſevere with deliberate malice in their impiety. Let theſe infernal mouths be ſtopped and condemned to an eternal ſilence. Let the Standard of the Croſs be adored by all Nations, and the enemies of Jeſus diſſolved, as wax melted on the flames of burning coals, as ſmoak ſcattered in the air. Let a chaſt and ſincere worſhip of God flouriſh every where, and ſacrifices of praiſe mount to Heaven, to obtain benedictions on earth.

But you, SIR, who moſt near approach to the King's perſon, having given ſo many teſtimonies of your prudence, your courage and fidelity, ſeem to ſpeak unto him with the ſame tongue, which holdeth ears enchained by the charms of your eloquence, and ſay, what France pronounceth:

An Apoſtrophe of France to the King.

7. GReat King, for whom our Altars daily ſmoke in Sacrifices, and for whom our lips ceaſe not to ſend forth thankſgivings of proſperity to Heaven. The monſters are not all as yet vanquiſhed. Behold the laſt head of Hydra, which God hath reſerved to this triumphant ſword, which the Croſs guideth, Valour animateth, Juſtice moderateth, and the Stars crown. Needs muſt impiety be cruſhed under thoſe feet, which have already trampled on ſo many Dragons, and be fettered with an hundred iron chains, under the Altars we daily charge with our vows.

When Libra, the conſtellation of your birth, ariſeth, the Ram falleth. It is not time (O Monarch of Flower-de-luces) that appearing on the throne of juſtice, with Ballance in hand, all ſparkling with the rays of glory, which environ you after ſo many battels concluded by your victories, you humble the horns of this Ram of inſolent impiety, which dars ſo confidently oppoſe, both by words and actions, the Religion which Crown you, the ſpirit which poſſeſſeth you, and the power which directeth you.

Alas, Alas, SIR, To what purpoſe were it to have walked on the ſmoaking ruins of ſo many rebellious Cities? What would it avail to have thrown down in one Rochel, ſo many ſurly Rocks with the help of ſo great, ſo faithful, and happy Counſel, and opening one gate there at your entrance, to have ſhut up a thouſand againſt factions and civil wars? What contentment could your Majeſtie have by wiping away the ſweats on the Alps, you had gotten on the Ocean, and to have gathered Palms perpetually verdant for you, as well in the frozen Ice of winter, as the ſcorching heats of Summer, if you muſt again behold at your return, that Religion you ſo often defended, trodden under the feet of impiety, wounded by ſlanderous tongues, outraged by blaſphemie, and contaminated by inſolent ſpirits, who know not God, but to diſhonour him? It now at this time preſenteth it ſelf to you with ſighs in the heart, and tears in the eys: It ſheweth unto you the robe, which Clodovæus, Charlemaigne, and S. Lewis, your Predeceſſours, gave you with ſo much ſplendour, now torn in pieces with ſuch violence; it imploreth your aſſiſtance, it expecteth your power, it breaths an air much the more ſweet in the confidence conceived of your zeal and courage.

I call to witneſs that great Angel, which hath led you by the hand to ſo many conqueſts and triumphs, making you dreadful to your Enemies, helpful to your Allies, awful to your Subjects, and amiable to all the World; it is not here where he will limit your actions, and fix the columns of your memory. We ſtill hope quickly to ſee the day which ſhall dry up the tears of the poor, ſhall eaſe their burthens, ſhall ſweeten their pains, ſhall power oyl on their ſoakes: And from whom ſhould we expect all this, but from a Prince ſo pious, ſo benign? We promiſe our ſelves to ſee a Clergie, which ſhall ſpeedily put it ſelf into ſo good a way under your favour, entirely purified from the dregs of ſimony, ignorance, and the liberty of evil actions. Who can give us this happineſs, but a King, who hath under his heart a Temple for true piety? We ſigh for that great day, that day, which ſhall for ever waſh away the ſtains of blood, impreſſed on the foreheads of French Nobility, which ſhall diſſipate diſorders, ſhall ſtop the current of ſo many diſſolutions; and what can aſſure us of it, but the certainty of your Edicts? We moſt earneſtly deſire to behold an abſolute regularity in juſtice, and in all Officers, that a golden Age may ſhine again, which hath ſo often been vaniſhed through the corruption of ſouls ſet at ſale. And who ſhall do it but a King, that from his moſt innocent years ſo much hath cheriſhed the title of Juſt, that he for it contemned the name of a Conqueror, which his valour preſented him, and of Moſt Sacred, which the veneration of his vertues afforded him. Impiety vanquiſhed, beareth thee keys of all theſe hopes, nor ſhall we have any thing more to fear or deſire, when that ſhall be throughly ſuppreſſed through out all the parts of the Kingdom.

Dear delight of Heaven, is it not for this God drew you the laſt year from the gates of a Sepulcher, and reſtored you to life, to render us all to our ſelves? Alas! Great God, what a ſtroke of thunder was the news of this maladie! What a terrour to all Cities! What aſtoniſhment in all Orders! What a wound in the heart of the whole Kingdom! Your poor France remember the 27. day of September, made ſacred by your royal birth: It conſidered this nativity had don to your ſtate, what the infuſion of the ſoul into a body; and ſaw you almoſt taken hence at the ſame time that your Majeſtie entred. It beheld all that greatneſs, and thoſe comforts ready to be ſhut up within your Tomb; The queens drenched in their deep ſorrow, could not ſpeak but by their tears and ſobs: Your good Officers diſſolved in lamentations at the foot of your bed, which was becom as the Altars of grief. All humane hopes were cut off by the violence of the maladie. Nothing was expected but the fatal blow, which all the world deplored, and which no man could divert.

But who knoweth not, SIR, God permitted it to let us ſee your virtues by their bright reflection. The luſtre of beautiful paintings muſt be ſuffered a little to mortify, before we can judg of them. We could not ſufficiently know your Majeſtie in the bright ſplendours of fortune, and ſuch good ſucceſs of arms: Needs muſt we have a character from God of men afflicted, and a mark of the Croſs of Jeſus to conſummate ſo excellent qualities. And what heart was not then ſeized with admiration, when we ſaw a young King, ſo great, ſo flouriſhing, ſo awful, to look death in the face with a confident eie, to expect it with a ſtable foot, to receive it willingly with a ſpirit infinitely peaceful: afterward to be fortified by Sacraments of the Church, with moſt exemplar devotion, and having given the laſt adieus to his Subjects, to go out of the world and all glorious honours, as joyful as from a priſon? But God withdrew this ſtroke, when life held but by a ſlender threed, and heard the many prayers, made throughout all France: He reſtored you to life at the ſame time he had given it you: He ſettled the pillars of this State, which then tottered over our heads: He raiſed our joys again, which were faded, and gave us that we would not looſe to gain the whole world. It is, SIR, to tell you, you muſt perform all God required at your ſacred hands, and ſo to profit in ſanctity, that the earth may one day give you in reward of piety, the Altars you have raiſed to Heaven, by the valour of your arms.

To the King of all Ages Immortal and Inviſible, to GOD alone be given honour and glory, for ever and ever.

THE AUTHOURS DESIGN.

OF the practice of Virtues I have already spoken in my Book of the HOLY-COURT. This is a small Pattern thereof in every dayes action. It should employ your heart, rather then your eyes or hand. It is short to read, but if you practice it, you will in one day find years and ages of felicity.

Indeed we have at this present many spiritual Books, which eccho one another. This Age is as fruitful in words, as barren in works; Inclining to speak much, to do nothing; evapourating the best part of wit, by pen or tongue.

Nevertheless, in matters of Devotion, it is apparent, that a man cannot say too much; that, which he can never do enough; and that in so great a penury of worthy acts, we should not be sparing of good words.

I present you with this short Treatise: carry it in your hand, as the clock, which a great Prince wore in a Ring: it striketh every hour of the day, and agreeth with Reason, as true Dials with the Sun. If you read it with attention, you will find it great in its littleness, rich in its poverty, and large in its brevity. Great Books make men sometimes more learned, seldome more innocent. This reduceth wisdom to practice, and prosperity to devotion. By often reading it, and doing what it directeth, you shall know what it is; for it hath no other character of its worth, then that of your virtues.

THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The First PART.

The first SECTION.

The Importance of well ordering every Action of the day.

A Wise Hermit (as Pelagius a Greek Authour relates) being demanded, if the way to perfection were very long, said: That the Virtues accompany one another, and if a man would himself, he might in one day attain to a proportionable measure of Divinity. Indeed our Virtues are all conjoyned in our Actions, our Actions in the Hours, the Hours in the Day, the Days in the Moneth, the Moneths in the Year, and the Years in the Ages. Every day is a little map of our life; and the way to be soon perfect, is to use much consideration and perfection in the performance of every days action. See here a draught thereof, the lineaments of which I have taken in part from one endued with much wisdom, religion and integrity, whom I would willingly name, did I not fear to offend his humility, which can suffer all things but his own praises.

The second SECTION.

At Waking.

THE Sun hath long since, for your benefit, chased away the shades of night, to delight you with the sight of the wonderful works of God, and your curtains are yet undrawn, to entertain you with a shadow of death. Arise out of bed, and consider, that this great star, which makes you begin the course of this day, must this day run about ten or twelve millions of leagues; and you, how many steps will you proceed towards virtue? This unwearied Harbinger is gone to take you up a lodging in the grave; Each minute is so much deducted from your life. Will you not follow the counsel of the Son of God, and work while it is day? A long night will shortly cover you with its wings, in which you will not have the power to work.

Suppose every day a day in Harvest, suppose it a Market day; suppose it a day, wherein you are to work in a golden Mine; suppose it a ring, which you are to engrave and enamel with your actions, to be at night presented on Gods Altar.

Set before you the excellent consideration of S. Bernard, That your actions in passing, pass not away; for every good work is a grain of seed for eternal life. Say with the famous Painter Xeuxes, Æternitati pingo, I paint for eternity.

Follow the counsel of Thomas Aquinas, Do every action in the name of Jesus Christ, desiring to have the approbation and good affections of all the Church, Militant and Triumphant. Do it as if the glory of God, the welfare of all the world, and your whole salvation depended on it, and as if that were to set the seal to all your works.

Contrive over night the good works you are to do the next day; on what points you are to meditate, what sin you are to vanquish, what virtue you are to practice, what business you are to do: that with a well-digested foresight, you may give birth to every thing in its own time. This is Ariadnes clew, which guides our actions in the great labyrinth of Time, without which all would go to confusion.

Be curious sometimes to know of what colour the dawning of the day is, prevent the light (as the Wiseman adviseth) to praise God. Take heed of imitating ting that Epicurean ſwine, who boaſted, that he had grown old, without ſeeing the Sun either riſe or ſet. It is a good cuſtom to riſe betimes, but hardly perſwaded to Ladies, and thoſe Antipodes to Nature, who change the night into day, and the day into night. The famous Apollonius being very early at Veſpaſian's gate, & finding him ſtirring, from thence conjectured, that he was worthy to govern an Empire, and ſaid to his companion, Ἀνὴρ ἄξιος, This man ſurely will be Emperour, he is ſo early.

That unto which you are to diſpoſe the day, may be divided into four parts. Devotion, Practice of Virtues, Buſineſs, and Recreation. Devotion ſhould bear the light, and open the door to all our actions.

As ſoon as you awake, make an account you are to give the firſt fruits of your reaſon, your ſenſe, and faculties, to the Divine Majeſty. Let the Memory immediately call to mind, that the works of God muſt be done. Let the Underſtanding caſt an ejaculation upon its Creatour, like a flaſh of lightning. Let the Will inflame it ſelf with love of him. Let the Heart let flie the burning ſhafts of deſires and celeſtial affections. Let the Mouth & Tongue labour to pronounce ſome vocal prayer to the moſt bleſſed Trinity. Let the Hands lift themſelves up to Heaven. Let the Arms and Feet ſhake off the numbneſs of ſleep, as S. Peter did his chains at the voice of the Angel. This were a beginning as it were of ſacrificing our ſelves to God. They uſed to pluck the hair off the beaſt, and caſt it into the fire, before they ſacrificed it; ſo ſhould we take theſe little actions from our upriſing, as the beginning of our ſacrifice.

The third SECTION.

Five good actions to begin the day.

THat Action ſhould be as a preparative to another more long and ſerious devotion, which you ſhould perform in your Cloſet, as you come out of bed. If your attire be ſo curious, that it would require much time to dreſs you, it is a miſerable ſlavery: Stay not till that be done, to give God your tribute; but cloath your ſelf indifferently, ſo much as is neceſſary for decency and health: Then on bended knees do five things, Adoration, Thankſgiving, Oblation, Contrition, and Petition.

I will here ſhew you the way to frame theſe actions which you may read at times: and I will add examples and forms, taken partly out of Scripture, ſuch as are fit to be repeated daily.

The fourth SECTION.

Of Adoration.

The firſt Act of Devotion.

YOu are to obſerve, that Praiſe is one thing, Honour another, Reverence another, Adoration another. Praiſe conſiſts properly in words, Honour in outward ſigns, Reverence in inward reſpect, but Adoration (conſidered at large) comprehends all theſe acts with much eminence. For, Adoration is an act of Religion, whereby we do homage to the ſovereignty of God with a lowly ſubmiſſion, which is not communicable to any creature.

This act is formed and compoſed of four things, which are, as it were, its four Elements. The firſt is a ſtrong apprehenſion of the greatneſs and excellency of God. The ſecond, a conſideration of our own meanneſs, in compariſon of that great Majeſty. The third, a fervent act of the will, which at the thought hereof melts it ſelf into reſpect. And the fourth, an outward expreſſion both of the mouth and geſtures of the body, teſtifying the reſentment of our heart.

To diſcharge her ſelf in this act of Adoration, the ſoul firſt conceives God, great, dreadfull, majeſtick; ſhe conceives him as a ſea, infinite in eſſence, goodneſs, beatitude, comprehending within himſelf all Being, all Good, all Truth, and not onely comprehending, but anticipating it to all eternity with an incomparable eminence.

She beholds the whole univerſe in the immenſity of God, like a ſponge in the midſt of the Ocean, an atome in the air, and a little diamond ſet in the higheſt Heaven. She acknowledgeth God to be the Foundation of all things poſſible, the Super-eſſential being of all things that are and that are not, without whom nothing can ſubſiſt, neither actually nor potentially, and that he hath no hold which the underſtanding may take, to have knowledge of him. She repreſents God to her ſelf, as the beginning and end of all things, the Creatour, the Founder, the Baſis, the Support, the Place, the Continuation, the Bound, the Order, the Tie, the Concord, the Conſummation of all creatures; who hath within himſelf all the good of Angels, of men, and univerſal Nature; who hath all glory, all dignities, all riches, all treaſures, all pleaſures, all comforts, all delights, all joys, all Beatitudes, as Leſſius very well explains in his Treatiſe of Infinitie.

This ſoul unſatisfied, walks leiſurely into theſe fourteen depths of greatneſs, which are in God, that is, Infinity, Immenſity, Immutability, Eternity, Omnipotence, Wiſdome, Perfection, Holineſs, Bounty, Dominion, Providence, Mercy, Juſtice, and the End to which all things tend.

Here ſhe is raviſhed in God, as a little piſmire in the Sun; and like Ariſtotle, who (as it is ſaid) being not able to comprehend the ebbe and flow of an arm of the Sea, threw himſelf into it: ſo ſhe drowneth her in ſuch a multitude of wonders, not willing any longer to meaſure her love by the ell of her knowledge.

She is tranſported in this great labyrinth of miracles, otherwiſe then the Queen of Sheba at ſight of the Palace of Solomon: and cannot at the laſt but break forth into an outward act, and ſay: my God, and my All, the God of my heart, my portion and my inheritance to all Eternity!

The fifth SECTION.

Example of Adoration.

IN purſuit hereof you ſhal worſhip God, proſtrate on the earth, ſounding like a ſmall ſtring of that great Harp, the world: offering to the Creatour the whole Univerſe, as a picture to hang up at his Altar, and reſigning your ſelf totally to his will: The Hymn of the 3 children in the fiery furnace, ſuiteth very well with this Act; who call all creatures (as by a catalogue) to praiſe God: or elſe take that form, which the Angels and Saints use in adoring this Sovereign Majesty.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come; Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created. Thou hast made Heaven and earth, with all the ornaments thereof. Thou hast compassed the Sea with bounds by thy Almighty word. Thou hast shut up the Deep, and sealed it by thy terrible and glorious Name. Thou makest the pillars of Heaven to tremble under thy feet. Thou strikest terrour into all creatures, by the insupportable brightness of thy Majestie. Thou art in the Temple of thy holy glory; Thou beholdest the depths, and sittest upon the Cherubims; I adore thee my God from the centre of my nothing, with all the creatures of the Universe; making an entire resignation of all that I am, into thy hands, and desiring now and to all eternity, to depend on thy blessed will.

The sixth SECTION.

Of Thanksgiving.

The second Act of Devotion.

THis is an Act very necessary, considering the benefits that we receive continually from the hand of God: We should not be like the clouds which obscure the Sun that raised them; but let us rather imitate the Looking-glass, which returns the image so soon as the face is presented to it.

We must not let slip any benefit proceeding from this sovereign hand, without representing to our selves the lively image of it in our acknowledgment. And if the ancient Hebrews (as Josephus relateth) set marks & tokens, sometimes on their arms, sometimes at their gates, to publish to all the world the benefits that God hath conferred upon their families, is it not most fitting, that we endeavour to acknowledge in some manner the liberality of the Divine Majesty.

This Act consisteth in three things. First, In the Memory, which represents to the Understanding, the benefit received: and this Understanding considers the hand that gives them, and to whom, and how, and wherefore, and by what ways, and in what measure. Thereupon an affectionate acknowledgment is framed in the will, which not able to continue idle, spreads it self into outward acts, to witness the fervour of its affection.

To practise this well, it is requisite to make a Catalogue of the benefits of God, which are contained in three kinds of Goodness and Mercy.

The first is, that whereby he drew this great Universe, out of the Chaos and darkness of nothing to the light of being and life, for our sakes creating a world of such greatness, beauty, profit, measure, order, vicissitude, continuance; and preserving it, as it were, by the continual breathing of his spirit, affording to every thing its rank, form, propriety, appetite, inclination, scituation, limits, and accomplishment. But above all, making man as a little miracle of Nature, with the adornments of so many pieces, so well set, to bear in his aspect the beams of his own Majesty.

The second bounty is, that whereby he hath decreed to raise in man all that is natural, to a supernatural estate.

The third, that whereby he hath raised the nature of man, being fallen into sin, into misery, into the shadow of death, to innocence, bliss, light, and eternal life.

This is the incomprehensible mystery of the Incarnation of the Word, which comprehends six other benefits, that is, the benefit of the doctrine and wisdom of Heaven conferred on us, the benefit of our Saviours good examples, the benefit of Redemption, the benefit of Adoption into the number of God's children, the benefit of the treasure of the merits of Jesus Christ, the benefit of the blessed Eucharist.

Besides those benefits, which are in the generality of Christianity, we are to represent in all humility often to our selves, the particular favours received from God, in our birth, nourishment, education, instruction; in gifts of soul and body; in means, and conveniences; in friends, allies, kindred; in vocation, estate, and profession of life; in continued protection; in deliverance out of so many dangers, in vicissitude of adversities and prosperity, in guidance through the degrees of age, wherein every one in his own particular, may acknowledge infinite passages of the Divine Providence.

All this pouring it self upon the soul, with consideration of the circumstances of each benefit, at last draws from the Will this act of acknowledgment, which maketh it to say with the Prophet David: Who am I, O Lord God, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? 2 Sam. 7. 18.

The seventh SECTION.

A pattern of Thanksgiving.

HEreupon you shal give thanks for all benefits in general, and particularly for those you have received at present, which at that time you are to set before you, that may season this action with some new relish. The Church furnisheth us with an excellent form of Thanksgiving to God in the Hymn Te Deum: or else say with the blessed spirits;

O God, power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and blessing, be unto thee for ever and ever.

O God, glory be to thee on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men: I bless thee, I worship thee, I give thanks to thee for thy great glory and thy benefits, O Lord God, heavenly King, God the father Almighty; and thou also O Lord Jesus Christ my Saviour, onely Son of the Heavenly Father; perfect God and perfect man; Thou that takest away the sins of the world, and sittest at the right hand of God the Father; And thou, O Holy Ghost, consubstantial with the Father and the Son, most blessed Trinity, receive my prayers in giving thanks.

The eighth SECTION.

Of Offering, or Oblation.

The third Act of Devotion.

REligion and Sacrifice had their beginning in the world's infancy, and ever since have been linked together by an indissoluble tye. God, who giveth all, will have us give to him, meaning we should take out of his store, that which our Nothing cannot afford. Observe here a thing remarkable, That, as in the law of Moses there were three kinds of Sacrifice; that is, Immolations, Libations, and Victims. Immolations, which were made of the fruits of the earth: Libations, of liquors, as Oyl and Wine; Victims, of living creatures. So likewise God requires that we give him our actions for fruits, our affections for liquors, and our selves for victims. This is done by the act of Oblation, or Offering, which is a way of Sacrifice, by which we offer our selves and all that belongeth to us, at the Altar of the Divine Majesty.

To perform this act well we must have first, a pure apprehension of the power and dominion, which God hath over us. Secondly, an intimate knowledge of our own dependence upon him; considering, that we not only have received being, and all things annexed to being, from his goodness; but that we are also sustained perpetually by his hand, as a stone in the air: and that if he should let go never so little, we should be dissolved into that Nothing, out of which we are extracted. From thence will arise an act of Justice in the will, ready to give to God that which is his: and as the Holocaust (where the Host was quite consumed in honour to the Divine Majesty) was heretofore the noblest of all sacrifices; so will we imitate this excellent act of Religion, by consecrating not only our actions and affections, but all that we are, unto God, wishing to be dissolved and annihilated for his sake, if it migh: be for the glory of his Divine Majesty. But if this annihilation cannot be real, we must at the least form it to our mind, in an extraordinary manner, acquiring to our selves (as much as is possible) twelve disengagements, wherein the perfection of the Holocaust consisteth.

The first, is a devesting our selves of all affection to temporal things, so that we no longer love any thing but for God, of God, and to God. The second, a disentangling from our own interest in all our actions. The third, an absolute mortifying of sensuality. The fourth, a separation from friendships sensual, natural, and acquired, that they have no longer hold on our heart, to the prejudice of virtue. The fifth, a banishing of worldly imaginations, in such a manner, that the meer representation of them, may beget aversion & horrour in us. The sixth, a discharge from worldly cares not necessary to salvatiō. The seventh, a deliverance from bitterness of heart & discontents which ordinarily arise from excessive love to creatures. The eighth, a valiant flight from all kind of vanity of spirit. The ninth, a contempt of sensible consolations, when God would have us to be weaned from them. The tenth, a renouncing of scruples of mind, and of our own fantasies, to follow the counsel and will of those that are superiour unto us. The eleventh, an insensibility of the troubles that happen in adversity. The twelfth, an entire mortification of judgment and will, that we follow all the inspirations of God as true dyals the Sun.

He who hath proceeded therein thus far, maketh a true annihilation of himself, & an excellent oblation of all that he is: But if you cannot give the whole tree with such perfection, yet give at least the fruits; desiring in conclusion, to offer up all your faculties, senses, functions, words, works, and all that you are; remembring that saying of S. Chrysostom, That it is the most wicked avarice, to defraud God of the oblation of our selves. Offer to the Father your memory to fill it as a choice vessel with profitable things; to the Son your understanding to enlighten it with eternal truth; to the Holy Ghost your will to enkindle it with his holy flame; Say particularly to the Incarnate Word with the devout virgin Gertrude.

The ninth SECTION:

The manner of offering our selves to God

O My sweet Saviour, illuminate my intentions with thy light, and support my weakness by thy mercy: I recommend the small services which I shall do this day, to the unspeakable sweetness of thy heart; and set it from hence forward before thine eys, to direct, correct, and perfect it. I offer it and all that I am to thee, with my whole affection, both for my self and all the faithful; and I offer it unto thee, in the union of that most perfect intention which thou hadst, when thou prayedst upon earth to thy Father in Heaven.

The tenth SECTION.

Of Contrition.

The fourth Act of Devotion.

THis is an Act exceeding necessary in so dangerous an estate and so great frailty as we continually live in. Theodoret in his Questions upon the Scripture, saith, That there are three kinds of life, intimated by the three sorts of creatures mentioned in Abraham's sacrifice, Gen. 15. 9. There is a Natural life, represented by the four-footed beasts; a Mourning life, figured in the Turtle; a pure and innocent life, signified by the young Pigeon. Natural lives are very frequent in the world; Dove-like, very rare, but there is no Dove so pure, but always needs the mourning of the Turtle.

This is the reason why we should not pray almost at no time, without stirring up some acts of Contrition. Every one knows, contrition is a detestation of sin beyond all things most detestable, taking beginning from the love of God, and hope of his mercy, and ought always to be accompanied with a firm resolution of amendment. Its first foundation is the belief of a living God, of a God clear-sighted, of a God dreadful in all his judgments, from whence a servile fear of the pains due to sin is begot, even in the most stupid hearts. Thunder causeth Doves to fawn, and raiseth tempests and earthquakes in the soul. Then Hope ariseth above the horizon, scattering amorous beams, through the assured confidence we have to obtain pardon for our sins, by undergoing the yoke of Repentance. Then beginneth the love of God in the soul, to free and discharge it self of the dew of heaven. Oh blessed a thousand fold are they, that wash themselves with that snow water which holy Job mentioneth, Joh. 9. 30. and cleanse themselves in the wholsom pool of repentance!

Stir up acts of contrition often for all sins in general, and especially for those defects and imperfections, whereunto you are most subject, with a firm purpose to oppose them strongly, and by Gods help to root them out. Say to that end, as followeth;

The eleventh SECTION.

A form of Contrition

FAther, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son, having paid so great bounty with contempt, and so many benefits with ingratitude. I grieve not at the pains I suffer for my rebellion, but I grieve for having offended a God, who ought to be loved and honoured above all things. Where can I finde punishment enough to be avenged on my self, and tears enough to wash away my offences? Father, from hence forward the face of sin shall be more hideous to me then hell: Make me as one of thy hired servants. My God, thou art our Father, and we are nothing, but earth and dust in comparison of Thee! Thou art our Maker, and we are all but clay in thy hands. My God, be not incensed against so weak, so wicked an object. My God, have not the sins of my life past in remembrance.

The twelfth SECTION.

Of Petition or Request.

The fifth Act of Devotion.

A Certain great Emperour coming into Egypt, to shew the zeal he had to the publick good, said to the Egyptians, Draw from me as from your river Nilus; but what can be drawn from a man, but hopes, which swell like bubbles of water till they burst. It is from God that we must draw, for he is a fountain which perpetually distilleth, who quenching the thirst of all the world, hath himself but one, which is (saith Gregory Nazianzen) that all men should thirst his bounty.

We must necessarily beg of God, seeing our necessities constrain us and his bounty invites us, we must beg of him, according as he himself hath taught us in the Lords Prayer, which is the sum of all Divinity; we must ask in his Sons name, and with confidence to obtain. We must pray for the Church, for the Pastours, for our King, for publick necessities, for our selves, for our neighbours: we must pray for spiritual and temporal blessings according to occasion, as far as is lawfull. For which purpose it is good to have a collection of prayers for all occasions, like a little Fort, furnished with all pieces of battery, to force even heaven it self, with a religious fortitude and a pious violence.

Desire of God every morning at least, That you may not offend him; That you may not want Grace, Light and Courage, to resist those sins wherunto you are most inclined; That you may practise those virtues that are most necessary for you: That you may be guided and goverhed this day by Gods providence, in all that concerns your soul, body, and outward things: That you may obtain new graces and assistance for the necessities of your neighbours, which you may then set before him. Say for your self and for all those that concern you, this form of prayer used by Thomas Aquinas.

The thirteenth SECTION.

A Form of Petition.

O God, give unto me, and to all those whom I commend in my prayers, an understanding to know thee, an affectionate Devotion to seek thee; a wisdom to finde thee; a Conversation to please thee; a Perseverance boldly to wait on thee; a Faith happily to embrace thee. My God, so order it, that I may be wounded with thy sufferings in repentance, that in this life, I may use thy blessings in grace, and enjoy in the other, thy eternal joys in the bosom of Glory. So be it.

The fourteenth SECTION.

Of the time proper for spiritual reading.

BElieve me, you shall do well at this time of the morning, when your mind is freest from earthly thoughts, to use some spiritual reading; sometimes of the precepts, sometimes of the lives of the Apostles and Saints, calling to mind that saying of Isidore in his Book of Sentences: He that will live in the exercise of God's presence, must pray and read frequently. When you pray, you speak to God; and when you read, God speaks to you; good sermons and good books are the sinews of virtue.

Observe you not how colours (as Philosophy teacheth) have a certain light, which in the night time is obscured and buried (as it were) in matter: But as soon as the Sun riseth, & displayeth his beams on so many beauties that languished in darkness, he awakes them, and makes them appear in their true lustre? So may we (truly) say, that we have all, some seeds of knowledge which would be quite choaked (as it were) with the vapours arising from our passions, did not the wisdom of God (which speaketh in the holy Scripture, and in good spiritual books) stir them up, and give them light and vigour to inflame the course of our actions to virtue. Always before you take a book in hand, invoke the Father of light to direct your reading. Read little if you have but little leisure, but with attention; and make a pause at some sentence, which all that day may come into your memory. You will find, that good books teach nothing but truth, command nothing but virtue, and promise nothing but happinesse.

The fifteenth SECTION.

The sixteenth SECTION.

What is to be done at the Celebration of the Sacrament.

AT the Celebration of the Sacrament, you shall endeauour to stir up in your self a great reverence of this incomparable Majesty, who cometh to fill the Sacrifice with his presence, and say:

O God, dispose me to offer unto Thee the merits of the life and passion of thy well-beloved Son. At this present I offer up to thee, in the union thereof, my understanding, my will, my memory, my thoughts, my words, my works, my sufferings, and consolations, my good, my life, all that I have, and all that I can ever pretend unto.

Afterwards, at the Preface when the Priest inuiteth all to lift up their hearts to God, or when the Angelical Hymn, called by the Ancients Trisagion, is pronounced, may be said as followeth, being taken out of the Liturgies of S. James and S. Chrysostom.

TO thee the Creatour of all things visible and invisible: To thee the Treasurer of eternal blessings: To thee the Fountain of life and immortality. To thee the absolute Lord of the whole world, be given, as is due, all praise, honour and worship. Let the Sun, Moon, and Quires of Stars; the Air, Earth, Sea, and all that is in the Celestial Elementary world, bless thee. Let thy Jerusalem, thy Church, from the first-born thereof already enrolled in Heaven, glorifie thee. Let the elect souls of Apostles, Martyrs, and Prophets; Let Angels, Arch-Angels, Tirones, Dominations, Principalities, Powers and Virtues. Let the dreadful Cherubims and Seraphins perpetually sing the the Hymn of thy triumphs. Holy,

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, Heaven and Earth are full of thy glory; Save us, O thou that dwellest in Heaven, the palace of thy Majesty.

O Lord Jesus, thou art the everlasting Son of the Father. When thou tookest upon thee to deliver man, thou clothedst thy self with flesh in the Virgins womb. When thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, thou didst open unto us the Kingdom of Heaven. Thou sittest at the right hand of God, in the glory of the Father, and shalt judge both the quick and the dead. O Lord, help thy servants, whom thou hast redeemed with thy precious blood.

As soon as you have received the Sacrament, say this prayer of S. Bernard in his Meditations upon the Passion.

O Heavenly Father; look down from thy Sanctuary; from the Throne of thy glory, upon the blessed sacrifice, which our High Priest Jesus, thy most innocent and sacred Son, doth offer unto thee for the sins of his Brethren. Pardon the multitude of our offences, and have compassion upon our miseries. Hearken to the voice of the blood of that immaculate Lamb, which crieth out to thee, and he himself standeth before thee at the right hand of thy Majestie, crowned with honour and glory. Behold, O Lord, the face of thy Messias, who hath been obedient to thee, even unto death; and put not his blessed wounds out of thy sight, nor the satisfaction he made for our sins, out of thy remembrance. O let every tongue praise and bless thee in commemoration of thy infinite goodness, who didst deliver thy onely Son over to death upon Earth, to make him our most prevalent Advocate in Heaven.

For Petition. Immediately after you have recited the Lords Prayer, say these words of the aforesaid Liturgie.

O God, be mindful of all Pastours and faithful people, dwelling in all parts of the habitable world, in the union of the Catholick Faith, and preserve them in thy holy peace.

O God, bless our most gracious King, and his whole Kingdom; hear the prayers which we offer up at thy Altar.

O God, remember all those that travel by sea or land, and are exposed to so many dreadful dangers. Remember the many poor prisoners, and Exiles who groan under the miseries of the world.

O God, remember the sick, and all such as are in any discomfort of mind: Remember the many poor souls oppress with bitterness, who implore thy succour. Remember also the conversion of so many Hereticks, Infidels, and sinners, whom thou hast created after thine own image.

O God, remember our Friends and Benefactours: Accept this sacrifice for us sinners, and let us all feel the effects of thy Mercy; drive away scandal, war, and heresie; and grant us thy peace and love.

And at the end of the Communion;

O God, power down thy graces upon us; direct our steps in thy ways, strengthen us in thy fear, confirm us in thy love, and give us at last the inheritance of thy children.

It is very expedient also to have our devotions ordered for every day of the week.

The seventeenth SECTION.

Devotion ordered for the days of the Week.

WE may derive an excellent practise of Devotion for every day of the Week, from the Hymn of S. Ambrose, used by the Church. For therein we learn to give God thanks for every work of the Creation, and to make the greater world correspond with the lesser.

Sunday, which is the day wherin the light was created, we should render thanks to God, for having produced this temporal light, which is the smile of Heaven and joy of the world, spreading it like cloth of gold, over the face of the air and earth, & lighting it as a torch, by which we might behold his works. Then penetrating further, we will give him thanks for having afforded us his Son, called by the Fathers, the Day-bringer, to communicate unto us the great light of faith, which is (as saith S. Bernard) a Copy of Eternity; we will humbly beseech him, that this light may never be eclipsed in our understandings, but may repleniſh us every day more & more, with the knowledge of his blessed will. And for this purpose we must hear the word of God, & be present at Divine Service, with all fervour and purity. Take great heed that you stain not this day (which God hath set apart for himself) with any disorder, nor give the first fruits of the week to Dagon which you should offer up at the feet of the Ark of the Covenant.

Munday, which is the day wherein the Firmament was created, to separate the celestial waters from the inferiour and terrestrial; we will represent unto our selves, that God hath given us Reason, as a Firmament to separate divine cogitations from animal; and we will pray unto him, to mortifie anger and concupiscence in us, and to grant us absolute sway over all passions, which resist the eternal Law.

Tuesday, the day wherein the waters (which before covered the whole element of Earth) were ranked in their place, and the earth appeared, to become the dwelling, nurse, and grave of man; we will figure unto our selves the great work of the justification of the world, done by the Incarnate Word, who took away a great heap of obstacles (as well of ignorance as of sin) that covered the face of the whole world, and made a Church, which like a holy Land, appears laden with fruit and beauties, to raise us up in faith, & to bury us in the hope of the Resurrection. We will beseech him, to take away all hinderances to our soul; (so many ignorances, sins, imperfections, fears, sorrows, cares, which detain it as in an abyss,) and to repleniſh us with the fruits of justice.

Wednesday, wherein the Sun, Moon, and Stars were created; we will propose unto our selves for object, the Beauty and Excellency of the Church of God, adorned with the presence of the Saviour of the world as with a Sun, and with so many Saints, as with Stars of the Firmament; and we will humbly beseech God to embelliſh our soul with light and virtue, suitable to its condition. Especially, to give us the six qualities of the Sun, Greatness, Beauty, Measure, Fervour, Readiness, and Fruitfulness. Greatness, in the elevation of our mind above all created things, and in a capacity of heart, which can never be filled with any thing, but God: Beauty, in gifts of grace; Measure, to limit our passions; Fervour, in the exercise of charity; Readiness, in the obedience we ow to his Law: Fruitfulness, in bringing forth good works.

Thursday, the day wherein God (as S. Ambrose saith) drew the birds and fishes out of the waters, the birds to flie in the air, and the fishes to dwell in this lower Element. We will imagine the great separation which shall be made at the day of Gods judgment; when so vast a number of men, extracted from one and the same mass, some shal be raised on high to people Heaven, and enjoy the sight of God; others shal be made a prey to hel and everlasting torments. And in this great abyss and horrour of thought, we will beseech God to hold us in the number of his elect, and to be pleased to mark out our predestination, in our good and commendable actions.

Friday, wherein the other creatures were brought forth, and man created, who was then appointed to them for a King and Governour; we will set before us the greatness, excellency, and beauty of this Man, in the Talents which God hath given him, as well of grace, as of nature. How much it cost to make him, the hands of the Creatour being imployed in his production: Hands (saith S. Basil) which were to him as a womb, but how much more it cost to make him anew, drawing forth so much labour, sweat, & bloud from the Son of God, who annihilated himself for him, cherishing and fostering him (saith Thomas Aquinas in his Treatise of Beatitude) in such sort, that one not well instructed by faith, would say, Man were the god of God himself: Hereupon we will beg, that we may not frustrate the merit of the life of God, given to eternize ours, and we will practise some kind of mortification, to bear God in our flesh (as saith S. Paul) and to conform our selves to the sufferings of the King of the afflicted.

Saturday, which is the day wherein God rested from the Creation of the world; we will meditate upon the rest, the blessed enjoy in Heaven. There is no more poverty, no more sickness, no grief, no care, no calumny, no persecution, no heat, no cold, no night, no alteration, no confusion, no noise. The body resteth five or six foot under ground, freed from the relapsing imployments of a frail and dying life. It is in the grave, as in an impregnable Fortress, where it no longer fears debts, Serjeants, prisoners, nor fetters. And the soul, when it is glorified, leadeth the life of God himself: a vital life, an amiable life, an inexhaustible life, for which we must sigh and labour, and beg it often of God, with the tears of our eys, and the groans of our heart; as saith S. Augustine.

It is requisite, the same day, to make a review of the whole week, to examine the state of your soul, your passions, affections, intentions, aims, proceedings, and progressions.

And especially at the months end, to consider diligently what God would have of us, what we of him, and what course we take to please both him and our selves: what desire we have of perfection, what obstacles, what defects, what resistance, what means; and to manage all our endeavours under the protection of our great Captain Jesus Christ.

The eighteenth SECTION.

Devotion for the hours of the day.

THE Church likewise assigneth us a practice of devotion for every hour of the day, if we will apply it right. For as if she meant of a Christian Champion, to make a true Bird of the Sun, which saluteth that bright Star almost every hour, seeming to applaud by its songs, and the clapping of its wings. So she requireth, that in imitation thereof, we lose not God out of sight all the day long, but keep perpetual Centinel, to worship and pray to him.

At the break of day.

(Not to say any thing of our nightly exercise) The Church inviteth us, in the Hymn of S. Ambrose, to ask five things: the protection of God for all that day, peace, government of the sence, guard of the heart, and mortification of the flesh.

At the third

Hour, from the rising of the Sun; the hour wherein the Holy Ghost descended in the likeness of fiery tongues upon the Apostles; we pray to the Holy Ghost so to replenish our understandings, our wills, our senses, our hearts, our tongues, our mouths, with vigour and flame, that we may by our good example enkindle our neighbours.

At the sixth,

Which is noon; we look up to our son of Justice, to entreat of him four things; that is, alienation from the heat of concupiscence, mortification of anger, health of body, and peace of mind.

At the ninth.

Which is about three a clock, when the Sun is now declining towards the West, we cast our eie upon our great Star, and desire him (as he is the immovable Center, about which the world is turned; and holdeth the beginning and continuance of light, in his hand:) first, to grant us a happy evening: secondly, a constancy in virtue: thirdly, a good end.

At Evening.

When darkness draweth near, we beseech the Divine Majesty to gather unto him our hearts, oppressed with sin, and distracted by so great diversity of actions; to cleanse them, and to direct them in the way of Eternity: that when we shall be deprived of this temporal light, we may make a sweet retreat into the bosom of God, who is the Fountain of Intellectual light: and that having finished our life, as we have ended this present day, we may receive the prize of Beatitude.

At going to bed.

Now that darkness covereth the face of the earth, we will shelter our selves (like little birds) under God's wing, beseeching him to keep us (according to his accustomed goodness) in his protection; to drive away evil dreams, and the illusions of night from our sleep; hindering the crafty surprizals of our adversary, who goeth up and down like a roaring Lion, besetting the sheep-fold.

These devotions are grave, authentick, and sufficient, throughly to instruct a soul that will practise them.

The nineteenth SECTION.

Of Confession, a very necessary act of Devotion; and advice thereupon.

I Place Confession and Communion, amongst the weekly devotions; because for such as desire to lead a pure life, there is no excess, if at the weeks end, they acquit themselves of this duty. And although I have lately spoken enough, according to my scope, of the practise of these exercises, in Treatises upon this subject: and that to write more concerning them after so many books, were but to bring a drop of water to the river: yet am I obliged by the necessity of my design, to tell you in few words, that to make your Confession good, it ought to have the properties of a Looking-glass. Solidity, lively representation, and clearness.

Solidity; 1. In going to it with much consideration of your own misery, sins, and imperfections.

2. Much reverence towards the Majesty of God.

3. A reasonable examination of your conscience.

4. A dislike of your offences, more for God's sake, then out of any other consideration.

Lively representation: 1. In avoiding confessions made by rote, which have always one and the same tune: or such as are over dry, and not sufficiently explained: or such as are too historical, and full of superfluity.

2. In representing perspicuously the state of your soul, and succinctly discovering how you have behaved your self.

First, in those acts of devotion, which concern more particularly the Divine Service: accusing your self of impure intentions, negligences, irreverences, voluntary distractions, contempt of holy things, coldness in Faith, and evil thoughts.

Secondly, towards your self, in the direction both of your interiour and exteriour, namely, in sins of vanity, pride, sensuality, intemperance, curiosity, impurity, idleness, pusillanimity, anger, envy, jealousie, quarrels, aversion, impatience, murmuring, lies, detraction, injuries, swearing, breach of promise, impertinent, and idle discourse, flattery, scoffing, and mockery.

Thirdly, towards your neighbours, as well superiours and equals, as inferiours; unfolding the defects that may have happened in the duties, which Charity or Justice oblige you to render to every one according to his degree.

Here examine every word, and you shall find matter for accusation.

Clear-

Clearneſs of Confeſſion, conſiſteth in explaining your ſelves in ſimple, honeſt, and ſignificant terms.

S Bernard in his book of the Interiour houſe (which is the Conſcience) hath compoſed a brief form of Confeſſion, making the penitent ſay thus:

Father, I accuſe my ſelf, That I have been diſquieted with anger, exaſperated with envy, puffed up with pride, and have thereupon fallen into an inconſtancy of mind, ſcoffings, ſlanders, and exceſſes of ſpeech.

I accuſe my ſelf, That I have been more ready to judge my ſuperiours, then to obey them: That being reprehended for my faults, I have murmured, and ſhewed my ſelf refractory in matters of duty

I accuſe my ſelf, That I have preferred my ſelf before my betters; vaunting and boaſting, with much vanity and preſumption, of all that belonged to me, and deſpiſing others with mockery and deriſion.

I accuſe my ſelf, That I have neglected the duty of my own charge, and ambitiouſly aimed at others.

I have neither had reſpect to obedience, nor modeſty in my words, nor government in my carriage; but much ſelf-opinion in my intentions, hardneſs in my heart, and vain-glory in my words.

I accuſe my ſelf, That I have been a Hypocrite, ſtiff in hatred and averſion from my neighbour, biting in ſpeech; impatient of ſubjection, ambitious of honour, covetous of wealth, ſlothful in works of charity and Devotion, in converſation unſociable, and many times uncivil.

I accuſe my ſelf, That I have been ready to ſpeak of the actions of others, raſh in cenſuring, contentious in arguing, diſdainful in hearing, preſumptuous in informing others, diſſolute in laughter, exceſſive in pleaſures of taſt, and in gaming, coſtly in apparel, burthenſom to my friends, troubleſom to the peaceful, ungrateful to thoſe who have done me any good, harſh and imperious to ſuch as were under my charge.

I have boaſted to have done that which I did not, to have ſeen what I ſaw not, to have ſaid what I ſaid not, and on the contrary, have diſſembled and denied to have ſeen what I have ſeen, to have ſaid what I did ſay, and to have don what I did do.

I accuſe my ſelf of carnal thoughts, impure remembrances, diſhoneſt motions, which I have not ſoon enough reſiſted.

They who live more diſſolutely, ſhall find (as Hamartolus, a Greek Authour ſaith) that they have great accounts to caſt up, at the audit of concupiſcence: wherefore they may examine themſelves concerning kiſſes, touchings, ſoftneſs, pollutions, fornications, adulteries, abuſe of marriage, and other ſins called monſtrous: adding alſo impieties, ſorceries, divinations, falſe oaths, perjuries, blaſphemies, calumnies, contentions, diſobediences, injuſtices, oppreſſions, falſhoods, theſts, uſuries, ſacriledges, and the like.

You muſt not think that there can be made a Form of Confeſſion like a Boot fit for all legs: conſciences are as faces, every one hath its diverſity. What S. Bernard hath ſaid in general, may ſerve for a direction; yet muſt it be particularized with the circumſtances, expreſſing the intention, quality, manner, and continuance of the vice.

The twentieth SECTION.

An excellent Prayer of S. Auguſtine for this exerciſe, taken out of a Manuſcript of Cardinal Seripandus.

O God, behold the ſtains and wounds of my ſin, which I never can, nor will hide from the eys of thy Majeſtie: I feel the ſmart of them already, in remorſe of my conſcience, and other ſufferings ordained by thy providence for my correction; but all that I ſuffer, cannot equal my demerit. I onely wonder, that feeling the pain of ſin ſo often, I ſtill retain the malice and obſtinacy of it. My weakneſs boweth under the burthen; yet my iniquity remaineth immoveable. My life groaneth in languiſhments; yet is not reformed in its works. If thou deferre the puniſhment, I deferre my amendment; and if thou chaſtiſe me, I can no longer endure. Whileſt thou correcteſt, I confeſs my offence, but after thy viſitation I remember my ſorrows no more. As long as thou haſt the rod in hand to ſcourge me, I promiſe all; But if thou withdraw it, I performe nothing. If thou touch me, I crie out for mercy: and if thou pardon, I again provoke thee to ſtrike: O Lord God, I confeſs my miſeries, and implore thy clemency, without which there is no ſalvation for me. O God, give me what I ask of thee, though without any merit of mine, ſince without any merit of mine thou haſt taken me out of nothing, to ask it of thee.

The one and twentieth SECTION.

Of Communion, the chiefeſt of all acts of Devotion; with a brief Advice concerning the practice of it.

AS for Receiving, remember the ſix leaves of the Lilly, which it ought to have; I mean, deſire and purity, before you preſent your ſelf at it: Humility and Charity in preſenting your ſelf; thankſgiving and newneſs of ſpirit, after you have preſented your ſelf. And if you deſire to know the qualities, whereby you may diſcern a luke-warm Communion from a fervent. I ſay, that a good Communion ought to be lightſom, ſavoury, nouriſhing, and effectual. Lightſom, in illuminating you ever more and more with the light and truth of faith, which begets in you an eſteem of divine things, and a contempt of the worldly, fading, and temporal. Savoury, in making you to reliſh in will and ſenſe, what you know by the light of underſtanding. Yet if you have not this laſt, in a tender and ſenſible devotion, be not diſcomforted at it: for ſenſible devotion will often happen to thoſe that have leaſt charity; as Richardus obſerves upon the Canticles: Affectuoſa dilectio interdum officit minus diligentem. It is ſufficient that you have good habits of virtue in the upper Region of your ſoul. Nouriſhing, in keeping your ſelf in a good ſpiritual eſtate, in good reſentments of heavenly things, in good affections towards the ſervice of God, free from drineſs, leanneſs, and voluntary barrenneſs. Effectual, in applying your ſelf immediatly to the exerciſe of ſolid virtues, humility, patience, charity, and the works of mercy: for that is the moſt undoubted mark of a good Communion.

It is good to preſent your ſelf with ſincere intentions, pondered and fitted to occurrences, communicating (as Bonaventure obſerves) ſometimes for remiſſion of ſins, ſometimes for remedy of infirmities, ſometimes for deliverance out of ſome affliction, ſometimes to obtain a benefit, ſometimes for thankſgiving; ſometimes alſo for the help of our neighbour. And laſtly, to offer up a perfect praiſe to the moſt bleſſed Trinity, to commemorate the paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, and to grow daily in love toward him. To this end, before you communicate, you may ſay this prayer of Thomas Aquinas.

O Moſt ſweet JESUS, My Lord and Maſter, O that the force of thy love, ſubtler then fire, and ſweeter then honey, would engulf my ſoul in an Abyſs, drawing it from all inordinate affections to things beneath Heaven; that I might die with love of thee, ſince out of love thou didſt vouchſafe to die on the Croſs for me!

And after Communion, make theſe Petitions of S. Auguſtine.

O God, let me know thee; and let me alſo know my ſelf; Let the end of my deſires be ever where thou art: O God, let me bear no hatred, but to my ſelf; nor love, but to thee: and be thou the beginning, progreſs, and the end of all my actions. O God, let me humble my ſelf even to the deep, and exalt thee above the heavens; having my minde employed onely in thy praiſe. O God, let me die in my ſelf, and live in thy heart; and let me receive all that comes from thy providence, as gifts from Heaven. O God, let me perſecute my ſelf as an enemie, and follow thee as an onely friend. O God, let me have no aſſurance, but the fear of thy holy Name; nor confidence, but the diffidence of my ſelf. O God, when will the day come, when thou ſhalt take away the evil of the Temple, that I may behold thee face to face, to enjoy thee eternally?

THE SECOND PART OF THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The first SECTION.

Twelve fundamental Considerations of Virtue.

YOu must firmly believe, that the chiefest Devotion consisteth in practice of virtues, without which, there is neither solid piety, nor hope of salvation.

Paradise holds none but blessed souls, and hell the wretched; but the world, wherein we live, hath many kinds of merchants; some traffick with Babylon, others with Sion; some, through their ill trading and disorderly carriage, go on insensibly to the last misery, which is a banishment from the life of God, into an eternity of punishment: Others, go on in a streight line, to the first and sovereign happiness, which is the vision, fruition, and possession of God, in an eternity of inexplicable joys. If you desire to take this latter course, I would advise you, to set often before you these twelve Considerations, (which I have inserted in my Book of the Holy Court) for in my opinion they are twelve great motives to all actions of virtue.

The first, is the nature and dignity of man, that is to say, the first and continual study of man ought to be man himself; to behold what he was, what he is, and what he shal be. What he was, nothing; what he is, a reasonable creature; what he shal be, a guest either of Paradise, or of hell; of eternal happiness, or of everlasting misery. What he is by Nature; a Masterpiece, in which there are a thousand several motions; a Body framed with admirable Architecture; a Soul endowed with understanding, Reason, Wit, Judgment, Will, Memory, Imagination, and Opinion: a Soul, which in an instant flieth from one Pole to the other; descends to the centre, and mounts up to the top of the world; which in one instant is in a thousand several places; which fathoms the Universe, without touching it; which goes, glisters, sparkles, which ransacks all the treasures and magazines of Nature; which finds out all sorts of inventions, which frameth Arts, which governeth States, which ordereth worlds. This soul in the mean time seeth her passions about her, like an infinite company of dogs, barking at her happiness, and offering on every side to seize upon her with their teeth.

Love fools her, Ambition racks her, Covetousness rusts her, Lust inflames her, Hope tickles her, Pleasure melts her, Despair depresses her, Anger burns her, Hatred sowers her, Envy gnaws her, Jealousies prick her, Revenge exasperates her, Cruelty hardens her, Fears freeze her, and Sorrow consumes her.

This poor soul (shut up in the body, like a bird of Paradise in a cage) is quite amazed to see her self assailed by all this mutinous multitude: and although she holds in her hand the scepter of government, yet she often suffers her self to be deceived, ravished, and dragged into a miserable slavery.

Consider also what man is by sin, vanity, weakness, inconstancy, misery, and curse. What he is made by Grace; a child of light, an earthly Angel, son by adoption to the heavenly Father, brother and coheir with Jesus Christ, a vessel of election, the temple of the Holy Ghost. What he may be by Glory; an inhabitant of Heaven, beholding then those stars under his feet, which are now over his head; feasted with the sight of God, his beginning, his end, his true, only, and original happiness.

The second, the benefits received from God, considered in general as those of Creation, Conservation, Redemption, Vocation; & in particular, the gifts of the body, of the soul, of nature, of capacity, ability, industry, discretion, nobility, offices, authority, means, credit, reputation, good success in business, & the like; which are given us from Heaven as instruments to work out our salvation. And sometimes one of the greatest benefits, is that, which few account a benefit, to have none of all those helps which lead a presumptuous, weak, and worldly soul to ruin; but on the contrary, their better wants in the esteem of the world, beget in him an esteem of heavenly things; Man (seeing what he was, what he is, & what he must be, whence he cometh, whither he goeth, and that union with God, his beginning, is his scope, mark, and aim;) if he follow the dictates of his reason, presently resolveth, that no sinew nor vein he hath, but shal tend to this end, to subdue his passions, and to serve creatures no farther then he knows them available to attain to the Creatour. Serva commissum, expecta promissum, cave prohibitum. Every creature saith these three things to man: O man, preserve that which is committed to thee, expect that which is promised thee, and eschew that which is forbidden thee.

The third consideration, is the Passion of the Son of God; an Abyss of grief, reproaches, annihilations, love, mercy, wisdom, humility, patience, charity; the book of books, the science of sciences, the secret of secrets; the shop where all good resolutions are forg'd, where all virtues are refin'd, where all knots of holy obligations are tied; the school of all Martyrs, Confessours, and Saints. Our weakness and faintness proceeds only from want of contemplating this infinite tablet. Who would once open his mouth to complain of doing too much, of suffering too much, of being thrown too low, too much despised, too much disquieted, if he considered the life of God delivered over and resigned for his sake to so painful labour, so horrible confusions, so insupportable torments? Nolo vivere sine vulnere, cùm te video vulneratum: Oh my God! as long as I see thy wounds, I will never live without wound; saith Bonaventure.

The fourth: the examples of all the Saints who have followed the King in the high way of the Cross. When we look upon the progress of Christianity, and and the ſucceſſion of ſo many Ages, wherſoever our conſideration ſetteth foot, it finds nothing but bloud of Martyrs, combats of Virgins, Prayers, Tears, Faſtings, Sack-cloth, Hair-cloth, Afflictions, Perſecutions of ſo many Saints, who have taken Heaven, as it were by violence: Some there have been, who having filled graves with their limbs (torn off with engines and ſwords of perſecution) yet remained alive to endure and ſuffer in their bodies, which had more wounds then parts: Demorabantur in luce detenti, quorum membris pleni erant tumuli, ſaith Zeno. Is it not a ſhame to have the ſame name, the ſame Baptiſm, the ſame Profeſſion, and to deſire ever to tread on Roſes? to be embarqued in this great ſhip of Chriſtianity, with ſo many brave ſpirits, and to go under hatches, to ſleep, like the out-caſts and ſcorns of humane Nature?

The fifth: the peace of a good conſcience, the inſeparable companion of honeſt men, which ſugereth all their tears, which ſweetneth all their ſharpneſs, which melteth all their bitterneſs; a continual feaſt, a portable theater, a delicious torrent of unſpeakable content, which beginneth in this world, and is often felt in this life, even in chains, priſons, perſecutions; what then will it be, when conſummated in the other life? When the curtain of the great Tabernacle ſhall be withdrawn; when we ſhall ſee God face to face; in a body impaſſible as an Angel, ſubtle as a beam of light, ſwift as the wings of thunder, bright as the Sun; and when we ſhall dwell among ſo goodly and flouriſhing a company, in a palace of ineſtimable glory; where we ſhall enjoy no life but the life of God, the knowledge of God, the love of God, as long as God ſhall be God. Neſcio quid erit, quod iſta vita non erit, ubi lucet quod non capiat locus, ubi ſonat quod non rapit tempus, ubi olet quod non ſpargit flatus, ubi ſapit quod non minuit edacitas, ubi heret quod non divellit æternitas, ſaid S. Auguſtine. What will that life be, or rather, what will not that life be? Since all good, either is not at all, or is in ſuch a life: Light, which place cannot comprehend: Voices and muſick, which time cannot raviſh away: Odours, which are never diſſipated: a Feaſt, which is never conſumed: a Bleſſing, which Eternity beſtoweth, but Eternity ſhall never ſee at an end.

The ſixth, is on the other ſide to conſider the ſtate of this preſent life: A true dream which hath onely the diſturbances, but never the reſt of ſleep; a childiſh ſport, a toil of burthenſom and ever-relapſing actions; where for one roſe we meet with a thouſand thorns; for an ounce of hony a tun of gall, for apparent good, real evil: The happieſt here may number their years, but not their cares; the paths here to the higheſt honours, are all of ice, and often bordered only by precipices. Its felicities are floating Iſlands, which always retire, when we but offer to touch them; they are the feaſt of Heliogabalus, where are many invitations, many ceremonies, many complements, many ſervices, and at the end of all this, we find a table and banquet of wax, which melts at the fire, whence we return more hungry then we came. It is the inchanted egg of Oromazes, in which that Impoſtour boaſted, that he had encloſed all the happineſs of the world: but broken, there was found nothing but wind. Omnia hæc conſpectui noſtro inſidioſis coloribus lenocinantur: vis illa oculorum attributa lumini, non applicetur errori, ſaith Eucherius. All theſe proſperities flatter our ſenſes with an impoſture of falſe colours: why do we ſuffer thoſe eyes to be taken in the ſnares of errours, which are given us by Heaven to behold the light, and not to miniſter unto lying? Beſides, another thing which ſhould put us into an infinite diſlike of this preſent life, is, that we live in a time as full of diſeaſes as old age of indiſpoſitions; we live in a world extremely corrupt, of which may be ſaid, it is a monſter, whoſe underſtanding is a pit of darkneſs; his reaſon, a ſhop of malice; his will, a hell, where thouſands of paſſions outrageouſly infeſt him; his eyes are two Conduit-pipes of fire, out of which flie ſparkles of concupiſcence; his tongue, an inſtrument of curſing; his face, a painted hypocriſie; his body, a ſponge full of filth; his hands, harpies talons, and to conclude, he owns no faith, but infidelity; no Lord, but his paſſion; no God, but his belly; what content can there be in living with ſuch a monſter?

The ſeventh: If there are any pleaſures in this life, they do nothing but overflow the heart ſlightly with a little ſuperficial delectation. Sadneſs dives into the bottom of my ſoul, and when it is there, you would think it hath leaden feet, never to go thence; but pleaſure doth only tickle us in the outſide of the skin, and then all thoſe ſweet waters run downwith haſte, to diſcharge themſelves into the ſea of bitterneſs. For this reaſon, Saint Auguſtine ſaid, when any proſperity preſented it ſelf before his eys, he durſt not touch it; he beheld pleaſure as a wandering bird, that would deceive him, and flie away as ſoon as he ſhould offer to lay hold of it.

The eighth: Pleaſures are begot in the ſenſe, and like abortives die in their birth: their deſires are full of diſquiet; their acceſs, of violent, forced and turbulent commotions: their ſatiety is ſeaſoned with ſhame and repentance; they paſs away as ſoon as they have wearied out the body, and leave it like a bunch of grapes, whoſe juice hath been preſſed out, as ſaith S. Bernard. They ſtretch themſelves out at full length, to much purpoſe, when they muſt end with this life; and it is a great chance, if even during life, they prove not executioner to him that entertains them. I ſee no greater pleaſure in this world, then the contempt of pleaſure: Nulla major voluptas, quàm voluptatis faſtidium, ſaith Tertullian.

The ninth: He that conſumeth his time in pleaſures, when they ſlide away (like waters occaſioned by a ſtorm) findeth himſelf deſtitute and aſhamed, like a Pilgrim deſpoiled by a Thief; ſo many golden harveſts, which time preſented to him, are paſſed away, and the ruſt of a heavy age furniſhed him with nothing but ſorrow for having done ill, and impotence to do well; what then remains, but to ſay with that miſerable King, who gave away his Scepter for a glaſs of water, Alas! Muſt I for ſo ſhort a pleaſure, looſe ſo great a Kingdom?

The tenth: Sin always carrieth ſorrow behind it, but not always true repentance: It is an extraordinary favour from God, to have time to bewail the offences of our life paſt, and to take that time by the foretop. Many are ſent into the other world without once thinking of their departure and ſome think of it at their death with many tears, but not one good act of repentance: they weep for the ſins which forſake them, and not for God whom they have loſt. True contrition is a hard work, how can he obtain it who hath ever falſified it? Facilius inveni, qui innocentiam ſervarent, quàm qui congruè pœnitentiam agerent, ſaith S. Ambroſe.

The eleventh: Death all this while is coming on a great pace, he waits for you at all hours, in all places, and yet you cannot wait for him ſo much as one minute, ſo diſpleaſing is this thought unto you; his ſentence is more clear and perſpicuous, then if it were written with the Suns beams, and yet cannot we read it; his trumpet ſoundeth perpetually, more audibly then thunder, and yet we hear it not.

No wonder, that David, Pſal. 49. 4. calleth it (according to the Hebrew) a Riddle, every one beholds the Tablet, but few know the meaning: yet it is a granted truth, that we muſt bid a long farewel to all ſuch things of life, as can extend no further then life it ſelf; a granted truth, that we muſt inherit ſerpents and worms in a houſe of darkneſs: How excellent a leſſon might be learned from hence! to know it once well, we muſt ſtudy it every day: Every where we ſee Watches and Clocks, ſome of gold, ſome of ſilver, others beſet with pretious ſtones: they give us notice of all hours, except that which muſt be our laſt? and ſince they cannot ſtrike that hour, we muſt make it ſound in our conſcience. The very inſtant that you are reading this, a thouſand and perhaps a thouſand ſouls, loos'd from their bodies, are preſented before God's Tribunal: what would you do, if you were now to bear them company? Omnia iſta contemnito quibus ſolutus corpore non indigebis, ſaid Diodore: In a word, deſpiſe timely, whileſt you are in the body, thoſe things whereof you ſhall have no need, when you are out of the body.

The twelfth: your ſoul ſhall go forth, and of all her followers in life, ſhall only be attended by good and evil. If ſhe be ſurprized in ſin, Hell ſhall be her ſhare; Hell, the great Lake of God's wrath: Hell, the common-ſhore of all the filth of the world: Hell, the ſtore-houſe of eternal fire: Hell, a bottomleſs depth, where there is no evil but muſt be expected, nor good that can be hoped.

Theſe twelve conſiderations are very fit to be meditated upon monthly, at leiſure.

The ſecond SECTION.

Seven paths of Eternity, which lead the ſoul to great Virtues.

THeſe twelve Conſiderations well weighed, make us take a ſerious reſolution to proceed directly to good, whereof, if you deſire further demonſtration, Bonaventure points us out ſeven fair paths, and ſeven great gates, which lead us in a ſtrait line to this bleſſed Eternity: and I wiſh we had as much courage to follow them, as he grace to unfold them.

Firſt, ſeeing the beginning of your virtue and felicity conſiſteth in the knowledge of God, and in the ſtate of the next life, (of which we cannot, without ſome crime, be ignorant, and which we can never know, but with profit.) You muſt underſtand, that the firſt gate of Eternity, is, To have good and ſincere intentions in the performance of eternal things. To take a ſtrong reſolution to work out your ſalvation, at what rate ſoever. To account all temporal things as wandering birds, which look upon us from a bough of ſome tree, make us a little chirping muſick, and then fly away. To think, that to bear a vicious mind in a fair ornament of fortune, is to keep a leaden blade in an ivory ſheath. To baniſh evil, hypocritical, impure, and mercenary intentions, throughout all the courſe of your life, and exerciſe of your charge. To go towards God. To do for God. To aim at the honour and glory of God above all things.

You are no little way on your journey, when you have gone this path. Thence you come to the ſecond, which is, the Meditation of eternal things; wherein the Kingly Prophet exerciſed himſelf, like a ſtout Champion, when he ſaid: I have conſidered the days of old, the years of ancient times, Pſal. 77. 5. This good intention which you take to advance to Eternity, will imprint daily in your thoughts an eternal God, an eternal Paradiſe, an everlaſting Hel, an everlaſting life: and as Jacob's flocks, by looking upon the ſtreaked rods, brought forth ring-ſtreaked and ſpotted Cattel, ſo all you do, in contemplating this Eternity, will be coloured with eternity. And if any temporal pleaſure, or opportunity to commit a ſin, were offered, you would ſay as Demoſthenes the Oratour, did of the beautiful Lais, when he was asked an exceſsiue ſum of mony to behold her, I will not buy repentance ſo dear: I am not ſo ill a Merchant, as to ſell the Eternal for the temporal.

Having paſſed through this gate, you will come to the third, which is the gate of Light, called Contemplation of eternal things. Here is it that we ſee the divine things, not only by form of argument and diſcourſe, as if we caſt up ſome account, but with the light of our illuminated underſtanding, as if we ſhould behold with a glance of the eye, an excellent piece of ſome eminent Maſter, almoſt with an extaſie of admiration. So Tiburtius ſaw a Paradiſe, when he walked upon burning coals. So all the Saints beheld Beatitude, when amidſt ſo many afflictions they remained immovable, drowning the pain of their bodies, in the over-flowing content of the minds.

From this ſtep we neceſſarily light upon the fourth gate, which is, moſt fervent love of Eternal things; for as (ſaith S. Thomas Aquinas very well) the ſight of temporal beauty begetteth temporal love, oftentimes filling the ſoul with fire and flame; ſo the contemplation of eternity, begetteth eternal love, Which is an ardent affection towards God, and all that appertaineth to his glory: as was that of S. Mary Magdalen, who ſaith in Origen; That Heaven and the Angels are a burthen to her, and that ſhe could live no longer, exceept ſhe beheld him who made both Heaven and the Angels. She had croſſed Seas armed with monſters and tempeſts, without any ſails, but thoſe of her deſires, to reach her Beloved: ſhe had paſt through flames, and grappled a thouſand times with Lances and Swords, to caſt her ſelf at his feet. The perfect love of God is a wonderful Alchimy, when we have attained it, it changeth iron to gold, ignominies to Crowns, and all ſufferings to delights.

At the fifth gate, which is called the Revelation of Eternal things, God ſpeaketh in the ear of the heart, and repleniſheth the ſoul with extraordinary light and knowledge, darting even here upon it (as ſaith Gerſon) ſome lightning flaſhes of Paradiſe, as when a torch caſteth ſome beams through the chinks of a door or window.

And as the knowledge of the underſtanding is nothing without the fervour of the wil, from this gate we go on to the ſixth, called the Taſt of Experience, by which we begin to reliſh the joys of Paradiſe in this life, and contentments which cannot be expreſſed. A hundred thouſand tongues may diſcourſe to you the ſweetneſs of hony, but you can never have ſuch knowledge of it, as by taſt. So a world full of books may tell you wonders of the Science of God, but you can never underſtand it exactly, but by the taſt of Experience. True ſcience (as Thomas Aquinas ſaith upon the Canticles) conſiſteth more in reliſh, then in knowledge: In ſapore, non in ſapere. I had rather have the feeling which a ſimple ſoul hath with God, then all the definition of Philoſophers.

Laſtly, the ſeventh gate of Eternity, is called The deifying, or divinized operation, which S. Dionyſius termeth θεοῦσθαι, is, when a ſoul worketh all its actions by eternal principles, in imitation of the Incarnate Word, and a perfect union with God. Clemens Alexandrinus andrinus called him that hath arrived at this degree, Θεὸν ἐν ἀνθρωπείῳ σώματι, a little Deity converſing in mortal fleſh: and addeth, That as all good Oratours endeavour to be like Demoſthenes, ſo our whole employment in this life muſt be to beget in our ſelves a reſemblance to God; it is that wherein lies all our perfection.

The third SECTION.

Perfection, and wherein it conſiſteth.

NOw leſt this Doctrine (which is ſomething too ſublime) ſhould dazle your ſight, and not inflame your courage, I will lay before you a more familiar Divinity, which is, that there are two kinds of perfection; the one, of Glory; the other, of Pilgrimage. That of Glory is reſerved for the next life, that of Pilgrimage is our chiefeſt affair in this: It is divided ordinarily into perfection of ſtate, and perfection of operation; Perfection of ſtate is as that of Eccleſiaſtical degrees and Magiſtrates, who are obliged by the duty of their profeſſion, not only to the common virtues, but alſo to others more eminent. Perfection of operation is that, which conſiſteth in good habits. Never trouble your ſelf with the perfection of ſtate, but live contented with that condition wherein Gods Providence hath placed you, aſſuring your ſelf, that the beſt Philoſophy is to diſcharge your office well. It imports not upon what ſtuff you work, ſo you work well; for it is the manner, and not the matter which ſhall bear the prize. Great dignities are oftentimes great vizards, behind which lies no brain; and ſmall fortunes may with little noiſe do ſuch things, as are of no ſmall value with God.

Apply your ſelf earneſtly to the perfection of operation, which conſiſteth in guiding the Heart, Tongue, and hands in perfect charity. Addict your ſelf to the practiſe of good and ſolid virtues, which produce all wonders on earth, and receive all Crowns in Heaven.

The fourth SECTION.

Virtues, and their degrees.

IF you deſire to know their names, qualities, and degrees, I will tell you a wiſe ſaying of Plato: There are four kinds of Virtues, the firſt Purgative, the ſecond Illuminative, the third Civil, the fourth Exemplary. The Purgative ſerve to cleanſe our hearts of vices and imperfections, to which our depraved nature is ſubject. The Illuminative ſettle the ſoul in a calm, reſulting from the victory we have gained over paſſions. The Civil incline a man to the duty he oweth his neighbour, every one according to his degree, and to a good converſation amongſt men. The Exemplary are thoſe which make the furtheſt progreſs into perfection, and may be looked upon as models, whereof the beholders are to take copy.

So order it, that your virtues may arrive at ſuch a height, as that they may not only purg your heart, enlighten your ſoul, and diſpoſe you to good converſation, but may be as a light alſo to others to manifeſt you in them, by imitation of your good example.

I add here in few words, the definitions and acts of virtue, by which you may direct your practiſe.

Prudence.

Prudence (according to Ariſtotle) is a virtue, which ordereth and prepareth all things that concern the ordering of our life.

Richardus de Sancto Victore aſſigneth to it five parts, that is, Judgment, Deliberation, Diſpoſition, Diſcretion, and Moderation. Judgment diſcerneth the good from the bad; Deliberation teacheth how to do all things adviſedly; Diſpoſition ſheweth what order we muſt obſerve; Diſcretion inſtructeth how to give way ſometimes to occaſions, and yield to humain infirmities; not adhering obſtinately to our own opinions; Moderation holdeth the ſcales and meaſure of every affair.

The effects hereof (according to Albertus Magnus) are theſe; To proceed to the knowledg of God, by the knowledg of your ſelf; to ſee in every thing what is beſt, & to embrace that; to weigh the beginnings, proceedings, and events of affairs; to take care your thoughts go not out of God; your affections be not too much emploied upon creatures; your intentions be without mixture; your judgment diverted from evil, and applied to good; your words poliſhed, your actions meaſured, all the motions of your body well ordered: To avoid the four Rocks that moleſt all good affairs, which are Paſſion, Precipitation, Vanity, and Self-opinion; To keep ſecrets carefully, to know, to chooſe, to execute.

Devotion.

Devotion, is a readineſs of mind to thoſe things which concern the ſervice of God: the parts of it are, Adoration, Thanksgiving, Oblation, Repentance, prayer, Mortification, Union with God by contemplation, Frequentation of the Sacrament, Conformity of will to the Divine Providence, and the zeal of ſouls.

Humility.

Humility, (according to S. Bernard) is a virtue which maketh a man diſeſteem himſelf, out of a deep knowledg of himſelf; the chief points thereof are, to know our ſelves well, to prize our ſelves little, to flie humane applauſe, to preſerve our ſenſes free from itch of honour, to deſpiſe bravely all worldly things, to affect a retired life, to acknowledg and confeſs freely our faults, to hearken willingly to advice, to yield to others, to ſubmit your will and judgment to obedience, to ſhun ſplendour and pomp in ſuch things as concern our ſelves, to converſe freely with the poor.

Poverty.

Poverty, is the moderation of covetouſneſs, reſpecting temporal things, the parts whereof are, To cut off ſuperfluities, to have no inordinate care of worldly things, to bear the want of neceſſities patiently, to enter into an abſolute nakedneſs of ſpirit.

Obedience.

Obedience, according to Bonaventure, is a reaſonable ſacrifice of our own will; and according to Climachus, a life without curioſity, a voluntary death, a ſecure danger. The points thereof are, to perform what you are commanded readily, ſtoutly, humbly, indefatigably, though it be contrary to your own inclination; to make an entire reſignation of your own judgment, opinion and will; to be ſent imperiouſly upon hard and troubleſom emploiments, and to undergo them chearfully, without delay, excuſe, or reply; to be indifferent in all things; to covet nothing, nor refuſe any thing; to do nothing of your ſelf, nor to preſume; to have a greater inclination to ſuch things as are mean and laborious, then to ſuch as are more ſplendid, and leſs burdenſom.

Chaſtity.

Chaſtity, is an abſtinence from impure pleaſures: Its parts are, purity of mind and body, vigilant guard of the ſenſes, ſhunning of occaſions, honeſty of ſpeech, mortification of Curioſity, exact decency, care of our ſelf.

Modeſty.

Modesty.

Modesty, is a composure of your self, consisting in government of the whole body, gesture, attire, play, recreation, but especially of the tongue, which is to be restrained from detraction, contention, boasting, disclosing of secrets, idleness, imprudence, importunity, irreverence, affected silence.

Abstinence.

Abstinence, is a virtue which moderates the concupiscence that relateth to delectation of sense: The parts thereof are, To have no rule but necessity in all which concerneth the pleasures of the body, to fear the very least stains of all those things, which reason counteth dishonest, and to preserve your self in a holy bashfulness; to observe the Fasts commanded, and to add some out of private devotion; to put far from you all curiosity of diet, apparel, and sensual pleasures.

Fortitude.

Fortitude, is a virtue which confirms us against the pusillanimity that may hinder good actions. It hath two arms, one to undertake, the other to suffer: Aristotle assigneth it four parts, that is, confidence, patience, love of labour, and valour.

Patience.

Patience, is an honest suffering of evils incident to nature: The points thereof are, To bear the loss of goods, sickness, sorrows, injuries, and other accidents with courage; neither to complain, nor to groan, but discreetly to conceal your grief; to be afflicted in innocency for justice sake, and sometimes even by those that are good, to covet and imbrace persecutions, out of a generous desire to be conformable to the patience of the Saviour of the world.

Justice.

Justice, is a virtue which giveth to every one that which is his due; and all the acts of it are included in this sentence, You must measure others by the same measure, wherwith you desire to be measured your self.

Magnanimity.

Magnanimity, according to Thomas Aquinas, is a virtue which aimeth at great things, by the direct means of reason: The acts thereof are, To frame your self to an honest confidence, by purity of heart and manners, to expose your self reasonably to difficult and dreadfull exploits for Gods honour; neither to be bewitched with prosperity, nor dejected at adversity; not to yeild to opposition; not to make a stay at mean virtues; to despise complacence and threats for love of virtue; to have regard only to God, and for his sake to disesteem all frail and perishable things: to keep your self from presumption, which often ruins high spirits, under colour of Magnanimity.

Gratitude.

Gratitude, is the acknowledgment and recompence (as far as lies in our power) of benefits received. The acts thereof are, To preserve the benefit in our memory, to profess and publish it, to return the like without any hope of requital.

Amity.

Amity, is a mutual good will, grounded upon virtue and community of goods: The acts thereof are, to choose friends by reason for virtues sake, communicating of secrets, bearing with imperfections, consent of wills, a life serviceable and officious, protections in adversities, observance of honesty in every thing, care of spiritual profit, accompanied with necessary advice, in all love and respect.

Simplicity.

Simplicity, is nothing but union of the outward man with the inward: The acts thereof are, to be free from all false colour, never to lie, never to dissemble, or counterfeit, never to presume, to shun equivocation and double speech, to interpret all things to the best, to perform business sincerely, to forgo multiplicity of employments and enterprizes.

Perseverance.

Perseverance, is a constancy in good works to the end, through an affection to pursue goodness and virtue. The acts thereof are, firmness in good, quietness in services, offices, and ordinary imployments, constancy in good undertakings, slight from innovations, to walk with God, to fix your thoughts and desires upon him; neither to give way to bitterness, nor to sweetness, that may divert us from our good purposes.

Charity toward God and our neighbour.

Charity, the true Queen of virtues, consisteth in love of God and our Neighbour; the love of God appeareth much, in the zeal we have of his Glory; the acts thereof are, to embrace mean and painfull things, so they conduce to our Neighbours benefit; To offer the cares of your mind, and the prayers of your heart unto God for him; to make no exceptions against any in exercise of your charge; to make your virtues a pattern for others; to give what you have, and what you are, for the good of souls, and the glory of God; to bear incommodities and disturbances, which happen in the execution of your duty, with patience: Not to be discouraged in successlesse labours; to pray fervently for the salvation of souls; to assist them to your power both in spiritual and temporal things, to root out vice, and to plant virtue and good manners in all who have dependence on you.

Charity in Conversation.

Charity in the ordinary course of life, consisteth in taking the opinions, words and actions of our equals in good part; to speak ill of no man, to despise none, to honour every one according to his degree, to be affable to all, to be helpfull, to compassionate the afflicted, to share in the good success of the prosperous, to bear the hearts of others in your own breast; to glory in good deeds rather then specious complements, to addict your self diligently to works of mercy.

Degrees of Virtues.

Bonaventure deciphers unto us certain degrees of Virtue, very considerable for practise; his words are these:

It is a high degree in the virtue of Religion, continually to extirpate some imperfection, a higher then that, to encrease always in Faith; and highest of all, to be insatiable for matter of good works, and to think you have never done any thing.

In the virtue of Truth, it is a high degree to be true in all your words; a higher, to defend Truth stoutly; and highest, to defend it to the prejudice of those things which are dearest to you in the world.

In the virtue of Prudence, it is a high degree to know God by his creatures; a higher, to know him by the Scriptures; but highest of all, to behold him with the eye of Faith.

It is a high degree to know your self well; a higher, to govern your self well, and be able to make good choice in all enterprizes; and the highest, to order readily the salvation of your soul.

In the virtue of Humility, it is a high degree to acknowledge your faults freely; a higher, to bow with the weight, like a tree laden with fruit: the highest, to seek out courageously humiliations and abasements, thereby to conform your self to our Saviours life.

It

It is a high degree (according to the old Axiom) to deſpiſe the world: a higher, to deſpiſe no man: yet a higher, to deſpiſe our ſelves: but higheſt of all, to deſpiſe deſpiſal. In theſe four words you have the full extent of Humility.

In Poverty, it is a high degree to forſake temporal goods: a higher, to forſake ſenſual amities: and higheſt to be divorced from your ſelf.

In Chaſtity, reſtraint of the tongue, is a high degree: guard of all the ſenſes, a higher: undefiledneſs of body, a higher then that: purity of heart, yet a higher: and baniſhment of pride and anger, which have ſome affinity with uncleanneſs, the higheſt.

In Obedience, it is a high degree to obey the Law of God: a higher, to ſubject your ſelf to the commands of a man, for the honour you bear your Sovereign Lord: yet a higher, to ſubmit your ſelf, with an entire reſignation of your opinion, judgment, affection, will; but higheſt of all, to obey in difficult matters, gladly, courageouſly, and conſtantly even to death.

In Patience, it is a high degree to ſuffer willingly, in your goods, in your friends, in your good name, in your perſon: a higher, to bear, being innocent, the exaſperations of an enemy, or an ungrateful man: a higher yet, to ſuffer much and repine at nothing: but higheſt of all, to go to meet croſſes and afflictions, and to embrace them as liveries of Jeſus Chriſt.

In Mercy, it is a high degree, to give away temporal things: a higher, to forgive injuries: the higheſt, to oblige them who perſecute us.

It is a high degree to pity all bodily afflictions: a higher, to be zealous for ſouls: and higheſt, to compaſſionate the torments of our Saviour, in remembring his Paſſion.

In the virtue of Fortitude, it is a high degree, to overcome the world: a higher, to ſubdue the fleſh: the higheſt, to vanquiſh your ſelf.

In Temperance, it is a high degree to moderate your eating, drinking, ſleeping, watching, gaming, recreation, your tongue, words, and all geſtures of your body: a higher to regulate your affections; and higheſt, to purifie throughly your thoughts and imaginations.

In Juſtice, it is a high degree to give unto your Neighbour that which belongeth to him: a higher, to exact an account of your ſelf: and higheſt, to offer up to God all ſatisfaction, which is his due.

In the virtue of Faith, it is a high degree to be wel inſtructed in all that you are to believe: a higher, to make profeſſion of it in your good works: and higheſt, to ratifie (when there is neceſſity) with the loſs of goods and life.

In the virtue of Hope, it is a high degree to have good apprehenſions of Gods power: a higher, to repoſe all your affairs upon his holy providence: a higher then that, to pray to him and ſerve him inceſſantly, with fervour and purity: but higheſt of all, to truſt in him, in our moſt deſperate affairs.

Laſtly, for the virtue of Charity, which is the accompliſhment of all the other; you muſt know, there are three kinds of it: The firſt, the beginning Charity. The ſecond, the proficient. The third, the perfect.

Beginning Charity, hath five degrees. 1. Diſlike of offences paſt. 2. Good reſolution of amendment. 3. Reliſh of Gods Word. 4. Readineſs to good works. 5. Compaſſion of the ill, and joy at the proſperity of others.

Proficient Charity, hath five degrees more. 1. An extraordinary purity of Conſcience, which is cleanſed by very frequent examination. 2. Weakneſs of concupiſcence. 3. Vigorous exerciſe of the faculties of the inward man. For, as good operations of the exteriour ſenſes are ſigns of bodily health; ſo holy occupations of the underſtanding, memory, and wil, are ſigns of a ſpiritual life. 4. Ready obſervance of Gods law. 5. Reliſhing knowledge of Heavenly Truth, and Maxims.

Perfect Charity reckoneth alſo five other degrees. 1. To love your enemies. 2. To receive contentedly, and to ſuffer all adverſities courageouſly. 3. Not to have any worldly ends, but to meaſure all things by the fear of God. 4. To be diſ-entangled from all love to creatures. 5. To reſign your own life, to ſave your neighbours.

The fifth SECTION.

Of four Orders of thoſe who aſpire to Perfection.

NOw conſider what virtues, and in what degree you would practiſe, for there are four ſorts of thoſe who aſpire to perfection.

The firſt are very innocent, but little valiant in exerciſe of virtues. The ſecond have beſides innocency, courage enough to employ themſelves in worldly actions, but they are very ſparing towards God, and do meaſure their perfections by a certain Ell, which they will upon no terms exceed; like the oxe of Suſis, that drew his uſual number of buckets of water out of the Well very willingly, but could by no means be brought to go beyond his ordinary proportion. The third order is of the Fervent, who are innocent, courageous, and virtuous, without reſtriction, but they will not take charge of others, ſuppoſing they are troubled enough with their own bodies; wherein they may be often deceived. The fourth rank comprehends thoſe, who having with much care profited themſelves, do charitably refreſh the neceſſities of their neighbour, when they are called to his aid; thinking, that to be good onely to ones ſelf, is to be in ſome ſort evil.

Obſerve what God requires of you, and emulate the moſt abundant graces. But if the multiplicity of theſe degrees of virtue perplex your mind, I will ſhew you a ſhorter and eaſier way to perfection.

The ſixth SECTION.

A ſhort way to perfection, uſed by the Ancients.

THE Ancients were accuſtomed to reduce all virtue to certain heads, and ſome addicted themſelves with ſo much fervour and perfection, to the exerciſe of one ſingle virtue, as poſſeſſing that in a ſupreme degree, by one link onely they drew inſenſibly the whole chain of great actions. One dedicated all his lifes ſtudy to government of the tongue, another to abſtinence, another to meekneſs, another to obedience. So that at the death of a holy man named Orus (as Pelagius relates) it was found, he had never lied, never ſworn, never ſlandered, never (but upon neceſſity) ſpoken. So Phaſius (in Caſſian) ſaid upon his death-bed, that the Sun had never ſeen him take his refection; for he faſted every day until ſun ſet. So John the Abbot profeſſeth, that the Sun had never ſeen him angry, that he had never done his own will, nor ever had taught others any thing, which he had not firſt practiſed himſelf. To arrive at this, requires much fortitude of ſpirit. If you deſire things more imitable, be aſſured you ſhall lead a good life, if you endeavour continually to practiſe theſe three words, To abſtain, To ſuffer, To go forward in well doing, as S. Luke ſaith, in the Acts of the Apoſtles of the Son of God. To abſtain. 1. By refraining from all unlawful things, and ſomtimes even from lawful pleaſures, through virtue. 2. By mortifying concupiſcence, anger, deſire of eſteem and wealth. 3. By wel ordering your ſenſes, your will, your judgment, and obtaining always ſome victory over your ſelf, by the maſtery of your paſſions. To ſuffer, 1. By enduring the burthens of life with patience, eſteeming your ſelf happy to partake of our Saviours ſufferings, which are the nobleſt marks of your Chriſtianity. 2. By endeavouring to uſe a ſingular meekneſs in bearing with the oppreſſions and imperfections of others. 3. By undergoing (with advice) ſome bodily auſterities. 4. By keeping your foot firm in the good you have already begun. For (as old Mareus the Hermit ſaid) The wolf and ſheep never couple together; nor did change and diſlike ever make up a good virtue. To go forward in well-doing. By becoming ſerviceable and obliging to all the world, every one according to his degree: but above all, having a catalogue of the works of mercy, as well ſpiritual as temporal, continually before your eye; as a leſſon, wherein you muſt be ſeriouſly examined, either for life or death eternal. And for this purpoſe ſome Saints had theſe words (in ſtead of all books) in their Libraries.

Viſito, Poto, Cibo, Redimo, Tego, Colligo, Condo, Conſule, Caſtiga, Solare, Remitte, Fer, Ora.

To { Viſit, Quench thirſt, Feed, Redeem, Cloath, Lodge, Bury. } To { Teach, Counſel, Correct, Comfort, Pardon, Suffer, Pray, }

Man's beſt knowledge is how to oblige man; the time will come when death ſhall ſtrip us to the very bones, and leave us nothing but that, which we have given for God.

The ſeventh SECTION.

The way to become perfect.

TO this end you muſt keep a perpetual watch over your actions, and be like a Seraphim, beſet all over with eys, and lights, as Beſſarion ſaid: you ſhall perceive your progreſſion in virtue, when you begin, purged from greater ſins, to be fearful of the leaſt: when you feel your ſelf looſed from ardent deſires of intereſt and honour; when your tongue is reſtrained from ſlander and vanity, when your heart is more purified in its affections, and that you draw near to indifferency.

The means to make your ſelf thus perfect, is, firſt to be inflamed with a fervent deſire of perfection. Secondly, not to neglect the extirpation, even of the ſlighteſt imperfections. Thirdly, to have a good directour, who may be to you as the Angel Raphael was to young Tobias; and withal, to confer very often with ſpiritual men, and to be warned by their good example. Fourthly, to make, as it were, a noſegay of flowers out of the lives of Saints, to take from it, odour and imitation. Fifthly, to become conſtant in good purpoſes, and to offer them up to God, as by the hands of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

The eighth SECTION.

How we muſt govern our ſelves againſt Temptations, Tribulations, and Obſtacles occurring in the way of virtue.

FInally, ſeeing in the practice of virtue, we muſt ever be ready armed to over-throw the power of our adverſary, and to further our own affairs of ſalvation, call to mind theſe twelve Maxims, which I propoſe againſt ſuch obſtacles as may happen.

The way to reſiſt temptation, is, not to frame your ſelf to a ſpiritual inſenſibility, unmoved with any thing; that is hard to attain, ſo ſenſible is ſelf-love, and to have it, were to be ſtone, not man: it is not to expel one temptation by another, and to do one evil, to be delivered from another; for to take that courſe were to waſh your ſelf in ink. It is not, to hide your ſelf upon all occaſions, and never to do good, for fear of fighting with evil, but to reſiſt ſtoutly, as I ſhall ſhew you. The great Scholar Joannes Picus Mirandula, hath collected twelve remarkable Maximi, the practice whereof is exceeding profitable, when we addreſs our ſelves to ſpiritual combat againſt weakneſs.

The firſt Maxim; That you muſt be tempted on what ſide ſoever it happen: In hoc poſiti ſumus. It is our profeſſion, our trade and continual exerciſe. The Eagle complaineth not of her wings, neither the Nightingale of her voice, nor the Peacock of his train, becauſe theſe are natural to them; and it is as natural to a man to be tempted, as to a bird to fly, to ſing, to prune her feathers. If you deſert the courſe of ſpiritual life through fear of being tempted, and turn about to worldly delights, aſſure your ſelf you will be much more engaged; and which is worſe, without comfort, honour, or recompence: you forſake a croſs of paper, which if you knew well how to carry, would be no heavier burthen, then feathers to a bird: you forſake it, I ſay, to take up another which is hard, toilſom, and bloody, and will make you of one confraternity with the bad thief. Sidonius Apollinaris relateth, how a certain man named Maximus, arriving by unlawful and indirect means at the top of honour, was the very firſt day much wearied, and fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid thus; Fœlicem, te Damocle, qui non longius uno prandio regni neceſſitatem toleraſti. O Damocles, how happy do I eſteem thee for having been a King but the ſpace of a dinner! I have been one a whole day, and can bear it no longer.

The ſecond; Remember, that in the affairs of the world, we fight longeſt, we work hardeſt, and reap leaſt; the end of one labour is the beginning of another. In pains taking, the only hope is ever to take pains; and temporal labour doth many times pull after it eternal puniſhment.

The third; Is it not direct folly to believe there is a Paradiſe, an eternal life, and a Jeſus Chriſt, who, of the Croſs, made a Ladder to get up to his throne of glory, and yet to deſire to live here with folded arms? To ſee the maſter open the way to heaven through ſo many thorns, and the ſervant unwilling to tread on any thing but flowers? to ſee a freſh and tender limb, to a head worn away with ſufferings, like a brazen Coloſſus with feet of flax?

The fourth; Were there no other fruit in tribulation but conformity with Jeſus Chriſt, who is the Sovereign Wiſdom, yet were it a high recompence. A famous Captain ſaid to a Souldier dying with him; Hadſt thou been obſcure all thy life, yet art thou not a little honoured to day, in dying with thy Maſter: And who would not glory, to have the Son of God for his Leader, his Companion, his Spectatour, his Theater, his reward in all afflictions and tribulations? Who would not account it a great honour, to be crucified daily with him? to ſtretch his hands and arms upon the Croſs, by reſtraining them from violence, rapine, and ruine, whereunto we are carried away by the ſpirit ſpirit of lying? to fetter his feet, by hindering them from running after the unbridled deſires of his heart? to embitter his tongue, by overcoming the pleaſures of the taſte? to annihilate himſelf, by deſpiſing honour after his example, who when he might have walked upon the wings of the Cherubims, would rather creep amongſt us like a little worm of the earth? what a glory were it, to ſay with S. Paul, I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jeſus, Gal. 6. 16.

The fifth. Not to put any truſt in human means, when you undertake to ſubdue a temptation; It is not a thing depending wholly upon us; God muſt go before, and we contribute our will; for if he watch not over us, to much purpoſe is it for us to keep centinel. None is ſo weak as he that thinks himſelf ſtrong. Multa in homine bona fiunt, quæ non facit homo. Nulla verò facit homo bona quæ non Deus præſtet, ut faciat homo, ſaith the Councel of Orange. Many good things are done in man, which man doth not; But man doth not any good which God doth not. He that thinks to reſiſt temptations without his aid, is like one that would go to the wars, and ſtumbles at his own threſhold. And therefore an effectual means in this combat, is, to inſiſt much on prayer, eſpecially at the firſt aſſault of a temptation.

The ſixth. When you have overcome a temptation, take heed of unbending and ſoftning your courage, as if you had no more enemies to encounter. As diſtruſt is the mother of ſafety, ſo ſecurity is the gate of danger. If the enemy goeth up and down continually like a roaring Lion, be you on the other ſide a watchful Lion in the centinels of the Lord of hoſts; and take for your word, ſuper ſpeculam Domini ego ſto; I ſtand upon the watch-tower of the Lord.

The ſeventh. Reſt not ſatisfied onely with not being beaten your ſelf, but beat your enemy: when Satan layes a ſnare to entrap you, make it an inſtrument of virtue; if he preſent a good work, which gliſters in the ſight of the world, thereby to tempt you to pride, do the work, and let alone the vanity; referring all to the greater honour of God.

The eighth. When you are in combat, fight chearfully, as if you were already aſſured of the victory. Turn away the eye of your conſideration from what you ſuffer, and keep it continually fixt upon the reward. One great misfortune, which cauſeth many to fall when they are tempted, is, that their mind is ſet and bent ſo wholly upon the pain, that no room in it is left to contemplate the reward which waits for them. When the fourty Martyrs were in the frozen lake, 39. looked upon their future Crowns, but one of them thought of nothing but his pain; all were victorious, except this wretch, who ſullying the glory of patience, came out of the pool, to die preſently after, in infidelity; Do you not think, the glorious mirrour, wherein he beheld all his ſufferings Crowned, was that which comforted our Saviour on the Croſs in that Abyſs of reproach and torment. This is the courſe you muſt take; to inſiſt little on the preſent, & to have a lively imagination of the future, bearing theſe words of S. Paul always in mind, Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding & eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4. 17. Fight then valiantly, as if this were the laſt temptation which ſhould aſſail you; and perſwade your ſelf, that herein conſiſteth the evidence of your predeſtination. When you have overcome it, behave your ſelf like one always ready to re-enter the liſt, & to make one victory the ſtep to another.

The ninth. Though you are never ſo valiant, do not provoke danger; tempt not temptation, by thruſting your ſelf into occaſions, through preſumption of heart: he that loveth danger, ſhall in ſtead of finding glory, mark out his grave in it.

The tenth. A Sovereign means to overcome temptation, is to diſcover the Mine betimes; to open your heart freely to your ſpiritual counſellour, to diſcloſe your thoughts, to know them well, to conſider their nature, and to ſeek what power they have upon your ſoul. It happens commonly, as Epictetus ſaith; It is not the things themſelves, that trouble us, but our own fancies. How many temptations might be vanquiſhed by ſlighting them, if we took but a little leiſure to laugh at them? We make elephants of flies; and of little pigmies, which pinch us by ſtealth, frame giants. We are like young children, who frighted with a vizard, hide their heads in their nurſes boſom, crying: but take off the vizard, and give it them in their hand, they will make ſport with it. How many things ſeem terrible and impoſſible, which we find ridiculous, and eaſie to be overcome, if we touch them never ſo little with our finger? In temptations of puſillanimity, it is good to conceive theſe counterfeit giants, as pigmies; but in thoſe of concupiſcence, we muſt not deſpiſe any thing, but rather lay hold of ſmall threads, as if they might grow to huge cables. In the one and the other, there is nothing like daſhing theſe children of Babylon againſt the ſtones; to withſtand beginnings, and not to ſuffer our enemies to fortifie themſelves to our diſadvantage. The eleventh. A ſtumbling block to many is, that they repreſent the ſweetneſs of ſin to the like in their imagination, and never conſider the pleaſure which follows victory over ſin. A man is no ſooner plunged in the puddle, but his aſhamed ſoul is immerſed in penſiveneſs, melancholly, and deſpair by a loathſom pleaſure, which paſſeth away like the dream of a dream, furniſhed with a huge heap of ſcorn, ſorrow, and confuſion. Whereas on the contrary, the ſoul which hath held out, remains contented, ſprightly, elevated, and fed with divine comforts, coming from Gods paradiſe. On this thought (which S. Cyprian highly commendeth) few reflect, which is the reaſon why the number of the reprobates is ſo great: And do you not yet think it very fitting, that one who hath fallen a thouſand times under temptation, ſhould once in his life taſte the ſweetneſs which is in victory over temptation, to rejoyce at it for ever? Many have been put by from ſteep and evident precipices, by pondering theſe words; Well then, to covenant with ſin, what will be the event? To purchaſe repentance ſo dear? To give up the credit of ſo many years, a prey to one unhappy minute of pleaſure? Where is the Faith thou haſt promiſed to God? Let us at leaſt ſeek out ſome place where he is not: and where is he not? So many ſtars, ſo many intelligences, wherewith the world is repleniſhed, are ſo many eyes of God which beholdthee: He himſelf ſeeth into thee, even to the bottom of thy conſcience, if thou wilt ſin, get leave of him; but how wilt thou beg it of him? & how obtain? Patience a while: This temptation is a cloud w^th will paſs away. Thou art going to cõmit a ſin, whoſe pardon is very uncertain; but it is certain that when thou haſt done it, God himſelf cannot in all eternity make it not to have been done.

The twelfth. Think not you are the leſs in Gods favour becauſe he ſuffers you to be tempted, though with diſhoneſt thoughts, which are extreamly odious to chaſt ſouls; why ſo? If S. Paul, that Cherubim, ſcorched with celeſtial heat, who ſet his foot upon the ſtars, (according to the opinion of S. Ambroſe, Theophylact, and Oecumenius) felt the ſtings of concupiſcence in a body that had been taken up to the third heaven; do you think, that becauſe you have ſome good diſpoſitions to do well, you muſt be freed from the wars of nature, which preſerve your mind, being too indulgent to its ſelf always in humility?

To conclude, follow the counſel of Caſſian, conſider daily the paſſions which are bred in your heart as a fiſherman beholds the fiſhes ſwimming in the water, on purpoſe to catch them: Look on that wch is moſt predominant within you, from what root it ſpringeth, when it began, what progreſs it hath made, what rule it uſurpeth ordinarily over your ſoul, what effects it produceth, whether it be more ſpiritual or temporal, what things uſe to foment it, what remedies have you taken to divert it; provide counſel and means to root it out; proceed to this with courage and fervour, as to the acquiſition of an incomparable good.

The ninth SECTION.

Remedies againſt paſſions, and temptations proceeding from every vice.

FIrſt, to conſider, That paſion is a motion of the ſenſual appetite, ariſing from the imagination of good or ill, with ſome commotion of the body

2. That there are eleven paſions; ſix in the concupiſcible appetite, which are Love, Hatred, Deſire, Loathing, Joy, Sadneſs: five in the iraſcible, that is, Hope, Deſpair, Confidence, Fear, and Anger.

3. That there are two ways to overcome all paſſions; the firſt is a precaution of mind againſt the occaſions, and vain appearances of all worldly things. The ſecond, a ſerious diverſion to better things, as prayer, ſtudy, labour, and buſineſs; But above all, you muſt pray to God for the light and ſtrength of his holy grace, which infinitely tranſcends all humane remedies.

Againſt Gluttony.

1. REpreſent unto your ſelf the miſerable ſtate of a ſoul polluted and plunged in the fleſh. 2. The hardneſs of heart. 3. The dulneſs of underſtanding. 4. The infirmities of body. 5. The loſs of good. 6. The diſparagement of Reputation. 7. The horrour of the members of Jeſus Chriſt, to make members of an unclean creature. 8. The indignity to worſhip and ſerve the belly, as a brutiſh and vile God. 9. The great inundation of ſins flowing from this ſpring. 10. The puniſhments of God upon the voluptuous.

Againſt Sloth.

1. The ceaſeleſs travel of all creatures in the world, natural and civil. 2. The eaſineſs of good works, after grace given by Jeſus Chriſt. 3. The anxiety of a wavering and uncertain mind. 4. The ſhame and contempt. 5. The confuſion at the day of judgement. 6. The irreparable loſs of time.

Againſt Covetouſneſs.

1. The diſquiet of a greedy mind. 2. The inſatiability of deſire. 3. The many wars and battels which we muſt run through, to ſatisfie one ſingle deſire. 4. The diſhonour of denial, inſupportable to a generous ſoul. 5. The dependance and ſervitude we muſt undergo, to comply with thoſe from whom we expect the accompliſhment of our wiſhes. 6. The eaſineſs of offending God, through exceſſive greedineſs of temporal things. 7. The tranſitory and fleeting pleaſure of thoſe things which we moſt ardently deſire. 8. That God many times allows us the fulfilling of our deſires, as a puniſhment for our faults.

Againſt Carnal love.

1. To conſider the barrenneſs of worldly loves, which are true gardens of Adonis, where we can gather nothing but trivial flowers, ſurrounded with many bryars. 2. To ſet a value on things, and not to be deceived with ſhows. 3. To guard your ſenſes, to ſhun accidents and occaſions of ſinning; and above all, to have a particular recourſe to God upon the firſt impreſſion of thoughts. 4. To pul your ſelf away by main force from preſented objects, and to direct your ſelf by ſerious deſigns, and good employments. 5. To ſet often before you the imperfection, the ingratitude, the levity, the inconſtancy, the perfidiouſneſs of thoſe creatures we moſt ſervilely affect.

Againſt Sadneſs.

THere is a holy ſadneſs: as when we are moved at our Saviours paſſion, or for our own ſins: which is the gift of God, not a puniſhment.

There is one furious, which hath no ears, and is rather cured by miracle then precept.

There is another natural, ariſing from our diſpoſition: and another vicious, which is nouriſhed by ill habits, and neglect of our own ſalvation.

1. Againſt this laſt we muſt conſider, That our deſires and love, cauſe for the moſt part our ſadneſs: and that the true way to diminiſh the cares that conſume us, is, to ſweeten the ſharp and ardent Affection we bear to worldly things.

2. The little eſteem we have of God, is the cauſe that we are often troubled at frivolous things, whether they threaten or happen. He that would truly love this great God, wch deſerveth to poſſeſs all love of heaven & earth, ſhould not entertain fear or ſadneſs for any thing, but for the loſs of God; & no man can looſe him, but he that purpoſely forſakes him.

3. There is nothing beyond remedy, but the tears of the damned: A man who may perſiſt in the way to paradiſe, ſhould not place himſelf in the condition of a little hell: and he, who can hope for that great All, ought not to be ſad for any thing.

Againſt Envy.

1. THe way not to envy any thing, is to account nothing in this life great. 2. To covet onely the inheritance of the land of the living, which is never leſſened by the multitude or ſhares of the poſſeſſours. 3. To conſider ſeriouſly the motives which induce us to love our neighbour, as participation of the ſame nature.

The Third Part of the CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The firſt SECTION.

BUSINESS, Of what importance.

THe third employment of the day is buſineſs; whether Publick or Private; the government of your Family, or diſcharge of ſome Office. Good Devotion is a good Employment, and nothing is more to be avoided then idleneſſe, which is the very ſource of ſin. He that labours (ſaid the old Hermit) is tempted but by one devil; he that is idle is aſſaulted by by all. No man is too Noble to have an occupation; If iron had reason, it would choose rather to be used in labour, then to grow rusty in a corner.

The second SECTION.

Two Heads, to which all business is reduced.

IN Business we must consider the Substance, and the Form. The Substance; for it is great wisdom to make good choice herein, to take in hand good employments, and to leave the bad, the dangerous, and burthensome, which do nothing but stop up the mind, and choke all feeling of devotion; especially, when there is no obligation to undertake them. They are truly sick even in health, who interpose out of curiosity, to know, to do, and solicite the business of others. It is sufficient (said the Emperour Antonius) that every one in this life do that well which belongs to his calling. The Sun doth not the office of the rain, nor the rain that of the Sun. Is it not absolute madness of some in the world, whose onely employment is to attempt all things, but perform none?

As for the Form, in the exercise of charge, offices, and business, there is required knowledge, conscience, industry, and diligence. Knowledge, 1. In learning that which is requisite to be known for the discharge of your duty. 2. In informing your self of that which of your self you cannot apprehend. 3. In hearkning very willingly to advice, examining and weighing it with prudence, and governing your self altogether by counsel. Conscience, in performing every thing with good intention and great integrity, according to the Divine and Humane laws. Industry, in doing all discreetly and peaceably, with more fruit then noise: so that we express no anxiety in business, like that Prince of whom it was said, That he seemed always vacant in his most serious employments. Diligence, in spying out occasions, & doing every thing in due time and place, without disorder, confusion, passion, haste, irresolution, precipitation: For these are the faults which commonly destroy good government. He that hath never so little wit & good inclination, shal ever find wherein to busie himself, especially in works of mercy, amongst so many objects of the miseries of his neighbour.

The third SECTION.

Of the government of a Family.

THat man hath no little business, who hath a Family to govern; a good Father who breedeth his Children well, that they may one day serve the Common-wealth, is employed in an important affair for the publick. A Mother, who bringeth up a little Samuel for the service of the tabernacle, (as S. Monica did her son Augustine) obliged all posterity. A Master and Mistriss, who keep their servants in good order, please both God and men. Four things very considerable are here required, Choice, Discretion, Example. Entertainment. Choice, in considering the Quantity, Quality, Capacity, Faithfulness, of those you take into your service. For the Quantity, it is evident that it ought to be proportionable to your estate and revenues. It is a great folly to make ostentation of many servants meerly through vanity. As Herod the sophist did, according to the relation of Philostratus, who allowed his son 24. Pages, every one of them bearing the name of some letter in the Alphabet; for so blockish was the child, that he could not any way else learn the first rudiments. Stars which have least circuit are nearest the Pole, and men who are least perplexed with business, are commonly nearest to God. A great retinue is a mark of a great want. Were there such a beast as the Hebrew fables have feigned, that must have the grass of a thousand mountains for his daily allowance, would you account him happier then a Nightingale, which is satisfied with a few seeds, or a Bee, which liveth on dew? The rich need many pounds, the poor a little bread; both are indigent, but the one not so much as the other, for his want is the lesser. A great number of servants make not a man happy; for none is a greater Master, or better obeyed, then he that serves himself.

For Quality, take heed of resembling witches, who care not to give the devil wages, so they may make use of his service for their own ends: you must either take good servants, or make them such; in the one, there is good luck, and in the other, for the most part, difficulty. For many are like the ass of Vincent Ferrarius, that did more for a Carter, who swore by the devil, then for his Master who led him in the name of God; which the holy man seeing, turned him off, not able to endure such brutishness in a beast; and can you think, that for the necessities of your business, it may be lawfull for you to maintain one, who hath neither God nor conscience; that your children may at the very first be corrupted by his poisonous conversation?

For Capacity, it is necessary, that besides honesty, there must be an ability to discharge his office: and though we say the saints are good at all things, yet God doth not ever give them either desire or means to undergo all kinds of business. Our abilities are limited, as well as our minds; and every one hath his particular talent, which must be known by those that will make use of him.

For Faithfulness, it is one of the qualities, which the Gospel gives a good servant; you have reason to require it, and discreetly to make trial of it, not by suspicions and jealousies, which onely serve to provoke such as have a disposition to do well: A man is oftentimes made faithful, by being thought faithfull; and many through continual fear to be cozened, have taught others to cozen, justifying their deceit by their own distrust, as the Roman Philosopher saith: you must allow your officers, what command and freedom their charges require, not quarrelling with them every minute for trifles; notwithstanding you must carefully reserve the state of your affairs for your own private knowledge: For it is an equal fault indifferently to trust all, or to distrust all.

The fourth SECTION.

Of Government in spiritual things.

WHen you have met with a good choice, the government is not hard: For S. Augustine saith, nothing is so easie as to perswade those to good, who have a great desire to put it in practice. Govern your family proportionably as the good Eleazar did his, which Binet hath so lively designed. First banish vice and scandal from your house; let wanton love and impurity never come near it, no more then the serpent to the flower of the vine; Let not surfetting, drunkenness, or excess, know so much as the gate; let neither unclean speech nor blasphemy be heard in it. For, as Nebuchadnezzar made the pages that attend on him learn his language, so the devil teacheth those of his acquaintance, his Dialect.

Haveth exiled vice, accustom your Family to some devotion, causing them to hear diligently the word of God, especially on Sundays and Holydays; inviting them to frequent the Sacrament according to their condition, assembling them as Charles Borromeus did, at evening or some time of the day, to say certain prayers together, if convenience of place permit, and to see how they are instructed in the Articles of Faith.

Your example will do more then all your words: For the life of a Good Master and Mistriss is a perpetual monitour in a house. Those that seek to gain their good opinion, study to be like them, and in endeavouring to be beloved, become good. We live in an age, where we have more need of patterns then precepts, servants adhere to the pillars of a house, as Ivie to great trees, and in a word, to the commands of great-ones, all affections are of wax, they become so pliable.

It is fitting likewise that to preserve this opinion you be liberal, according to your means, in ordering your Family, honourable in such expences, as are requisite both for necessity and decorum. For we make use of nets, to take fishes, and of liberality, as a golden hook to take men.

Remember besides, in managing your business, more peculiarly to invoke Gods assistance; saying often unto him these words of Solomon. Wisd. 9. O God, give me Wisdom that sitteth by thy Throne; O send her out of thy holy Heavens, and from the Throne of thy glory; that being present she may labour with me, that I may know what is pleasing unto thee, to put it in execution.

Take heed of indiscreet precipitation in the beginning of an enterprise, of anxiety in the progression, & of despair in the conclusion. If your project have good issue, give the praise to God, & an example of modesty to your neighbour, but if business keep not time to your will, learn you to keep time to the Divine providence, which maketh all harmony in the world; you have power over your own designs, but not over their events; you are not to pray, that things may prove as you desire, but to desire them as they prove. Accustom your self not to be grieved at worldly accidents, no more then for an ill dream; For all things here below, pass away like a dream, & we do much, if in losing all, we retain that belief. But by long soothing our own wills, we have forsaken (as Cassian saith) the very shadow of patience.

The fifth SECTION.

Advice for such as are in office and government.

Bonaventure hath made an excellent Treatise, which he calleth The wings of the Seraphin; wherein he giveth very wise instructions to those that are in office and government; whereof in part I present you here with the quintessence and marrow desiring you to tast of it. He gives his Seraphin six wings. The first is Zeal of Gods honour; which you shall exercise in observing four things; that is,

1. Neither to do, or shew to those under you, the least shadow of evil or sin.

2. Nor to give way to it in any kind, notwithstanding allurements on one side, and importunities on the other.

3. Never to be pleased that an evil act be done, though without your knowledg; for that were to betray your own conscience.

4. To correct, and take away disorders, as much as possibly you can.

The second wing, which you must have is, The spirit of compassion, to help the sick, the aged, the weak, the faint-hearted, the afflicted; for these are poor Porcupines laden with prickles and acerbities, to whom you must be a Sanctuary and Rock of refuge: Petra refugium Herinaceis.

The third, Patience in the many labours and cares, as are (in a manner) inseparable from offices and governments. Patience, in ill success of business, which doth not always answer our endeavours and wishes. Patience, in bearing with the ungrateful, who often throw stones at those that give them honey; like the Atlantes, who shot arrows at the Sun. Patience, in occasions of speech and dealing with such as easily take distast, and are galled with their own harness. It is a great virtue, to soften them with a peaceful, still, and charitable sweetness, as if we cast oyl into the raging sea. It was said long since, He that can bear an injury is worthy an Empire. His very silence will disarm the passionate man, & lay him prostrate at his feet, who seemed to thunder over his head.

The fourth wing is Example; which is observed in three things. 1. In putting in practise the good counsel and precepts which we give others. 2. In managing your dignity in such a way, as is neither harsh, imperious, nor arrogant; but mild, affable, and communicative. 3 In retaining withall a decent and moderate gravity, that the stamp which God sets on those he calleth to offices and commands, may not be debased.

The fifth and principal Wing, is called Discretion, without which all virtues become vices: For the honour of great actions, lies not so much in doing good, as in doing well.

This discretion consisteth in four things. To govern the good with good judgement; To correct the bad; To administer well the temporal affairs of your charge; To uphold & preserve your self amidst these encumbrances, like fresh water in the salt sea.

The ordering of good is maintained in three principal Acts. The first, to cause those under us to observe strictly such things as are necessary, and cannot be omitted without disorder or scandal. The second, To invite, and sweetly attract every one according to his condition, capacity and judgment, to works of most perfection; whereunto they have no formal obligation. The third, to dispose charges and burthens with a good Oeconomy, according to their inclinations and strength of mind, whom you are to govern.

For correction; Either they are sleight faults of well conditioned persons, which you are to correct, and such are to be handled very gently; or they are hidden vices of some evil conscience, which you neither must nor can make known; and there you must use much industry, patience, and wisdom to dislodge vice, and to draw the crooked serpent out of his cave obstricante manu, as the Scripture speaketh, Job 26.23. Or they are known sins of desperate people, who offend without hope of amendment infecting a multitude; and here you must set your self with all your strength, to take away both the fault and the faulty.

For temporal affairs, manage them as we have already shewed, and take heed of entangling your mind in them, like a fish in a net, depriving your self of the liberty of Gods children, to serve the earth.

But above all, continually look into your self, as the first piece of your government. Let your conscience be pure, firm & peaceable; speaking and doing every thing with much consideration; and never despising the counsel of those who are able to advise you.

Lastly, your sixth wing is Devotion; which is divided into three kinds, the common, the singular, the continual. The common consisteth in performing exactly those duties of piety, which are within the bounds of your profession; and to do them by way of imitation of that celestial Militia, which is always employed in praising God, and by way of edification of those, to whom you ow this good example. Singular gular devotion obligeth you to ſeek your principal refuge, in the tabernacle (following Moſes ſteps) for the neceſſities of your charge. Continual devotion ties you to a moſt fervent exerciſe of Gods preſence, which you teſtifie by a deſire to pleaſe him in all places, occaſions and actions, by dedicating all your works to him, before you begin them; and when you end them, always to ſet upon them the ſeal of thanks-giving due to his Divine Majeſty.

Engrave deeply in your heart this ſaying of S. Bernard, in his firſt book of Conſideration, Chap. 5. Cum omnes te habeant, eſto etiam tu ex habentibus unus. Quid ſolus fraudaris munere tuo? Uſquequò vadens ſpiritus, & non rediens? If you are one full of buſineſs, and that all the world ſhare in you; take a part as well as others in your ſelf. Deprive not your ſelf of a good ſo juſtly your's, and be not one of thoſe that are ever travelling, yet never return home.

THE FOURTH PART OF THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The firſt SECTION.

RECREATION, how neceſſary.

AS concerning Recreation uſed in company, at meals, in lawful games, in taking the air, in good converſation, it is neceſſary to divert the mind, and refreſh the ſtrength. Caſſian in his 24. Collation chap. 21. relates, how an Archer finding S. John the Evangeliſt playing with a Partridge, wondred that ſo renowned a man could paſs the time with ſo ſlight a recreation: The Saint looking towards the bow in his hand, asked him why he did not always carry it bent, who anſwering, it would ſpoil it; the Apoſtle replied, ſo it is with the mind of man, which muſt ſometimes be unbent, that it may ſhoot the better.

The ſecond SECTION.

Of the Pleaſures of the Taſte.

MArk, that our minds muſt onely be unbent, not unſtrung: Avoid thoſe exceſſes which make men now adays as gluttonous in the eye, as the belly. It is a ſtrange vanity to affect the repute of a good taſte; to ſet the whole mind to ſerve that part of the body, which hath leaſt of the mind, and to nouriſh an eſteem which is fed onely with the ſteam of the kitchin.

Treat not your belly as Caligula did his horſe, for he allow'd a Beaſt (for whom nature intended nothing but oats and hay) Princely delicacies and attendance. And you do the like, if you beſtow ſo much coſt and pains to feed your moſt ſenſual part, which the Divine Providence wills, ſhould be nouriſhed ſparingly. Great feaſts, which begin in vanity, and continue in riot, end always in folly, and often in repentance. Nothing is got by pleaſures in the Taſte, but a more crazy body, a more cloſe priſon of fleſh, and a more ſtinking ſepulchre. Unhappy are thoſe feaſts, which the hunger of the poor accuſeth before God. Above theſe ſixteen ages the tongue of the Rich Glutton hath burned in hell, all his tuns of delicious wine, not having left him ſo much as one drop to refreſh himſelf.

If you deſire to know what were the banquets of the Primitive Chriſtians, which ought to be models for ours) Tertullian gives you a diſcourſe thereon in his Apology, Our feaſts (ſaith he) expreſs what they are, in their names. They are called Ἀγάπαι (Charities) becauſe they are inſtituted for relief of the poor: Our Table reſembleth an Altar, and our Supper a Sacrifice: We mind not the expence; to ſpend in the name of Piety, is gain. Our Table hath nothing ſavouring of baſeneſs, ſenſuality, or immodeſty; We feed by meaſure: we drink the rules of temperance; we ſatiate our ſelves as much as is neceſſary for thoſe, who muſt riſe at midnight, to offer up their prayers unto God; We ſpeak and converſe as in the preſence of God, our hands waſhed, and candles lighted, every one repeateth what he knoweth out of the holy Scriptures, and his own invention to the praiſe of God. Prayer, as it began the banquet, concludes it: From the table we go unto the exerciſe of modeſty and decency: you would ſay, if you behold us, that we were not at ſupper, but at a lecture of holyneſs Alaſs! Conſer the feaſts of moſt Chriſtians with theſe, and you compare the table of the Centaurs to that of the Angels.

The third SECTION.

Of Gaming.

BE not over-violent likewiſe at thoſe games of chance, which have in them ſo much covetouſneſs, heat, and flame: Did a man commit no other ſin, but converſing the third part, or half of his life with Kings and knaves of cards, being invited to the converſation of Angels; yet were he guilty of no ſmall offence: But beſides, gaming was the invention of that devil Zabulon, as S. Cyprian obſerves, in a Treatiſe upon this ſubject. It is the altar of Fortune, deteſted by the Prophet; It is the ſhop of deceit, the ſchool of covetouſneſs, the apprentiſhip of blaſphemy, the academy of anger; where are begot mad amities, unpuniſhed theſts, pleaſing murthers, and whence nothing for the moſt part is brought away, but a tempeſt in the mind, gall in the heart, and air in the purſe: What excuſe at the laſt day can he have, who gameth with a ful hand, and detains (in the mean while) the wages of a ſervant, or the relief of ſome beggar that pineth and quaketh at his gate?

Pilat's Souldiers caſt lots on the garments of the Son of God, whileſt the blood diſtilled from his body; but they were executioners and infidels, who would not be ſtruck with horrour to ſeea Chriſtian, amidſt ſo many images of the Son of God, without regard either of time, of God, or of man, play away the blood of his family, whom he neglecteth, or of the poor, whom he deſpoileth? Away with theſe delights, which are bred (like the Salamander) in the tears of heaven.

Elemen

Clemens Alexandrinus in his Padagogus, sheweth plainly, that these games of cards, dice, and the like, were not allowed in the Primitive Church; for he teacheth us, that such pastimes are often as an ebullition of ungovern'd delights, and an indigestion of evil idleness.

If we must of necessity play in complacence to others, we ought at least to have a care, that it be for some good end; that it be with our equals, without passion, little, moderate, & to the profit of the poor.

The fourth SECTION

Dancing

AS for Dancing, Balls, and Mask, it is true what the pious Bishop and excellent Authour hath said in his Introduction; they resemble mushrooms, the best which are worth nothing. Luxury, vanity, foolish expence, masking, good chear, night, youth, love, liberty, are as dangerous counsellours of wisedom, as ill teachers of modesty: some may be sanctified in them by miracle, but every day more are lost in them, through weakness: since our force is weak, not miraculous, we ought, by flying from occasions, to seek that safety which we cannot find in our own strength.

The fable saith, that the butterfly asked the owl how she should deal with the fire, which had singed her wings; who counselled her, not to behold so much as its smoak. With what conscience can a faithful soul frequent those worldly recreations, which have stain'd her purity with so many blemishes? Must we stay till we are burned, ere we retire from the flame? I wonder at those who would spiritualize dancing, and make it agree with frequent communion; such in effect, with the Emperour Adrian, Lay Adonis in the manger of Jesus. There must be so many circumstances, of the intention, time, place, persons, and manner, to season such pleasures, that it were easier to abstain from them, then to use them well.

The fifth SECTION.

Of wanton songs, and plays.

IF you speak of wanton songs, of reading il books, of unchast comedies and plays, your conscience (which is the School-mistriss of the soul) will perhaps tell you more then you are willing to believe. Such recreations are fore-runners of disorder, instruments of sensuality, tinder to sin, and scandal to virtue; evil, at that time entreth into you, by every gate of the sence, and goeth out only at the gate of repentance, which is not always open to our indispositions. A young soul is surprized in these, as in a golden snare; to whom the description of sin, is invitation. For we live now in an age, where to know ill, and to do it, have scarce any Medium to sever them; and if at any time we are good, it is rather through ignorance of vice, then principles of virtue, saith Salvian.

The sixth SECTION.

Of walking, and running.

REcreations, the most innocent, are ever the most commendable; as those in the countrey, for exercise of the body; for the Country life (saith Columella) is the cousin germane to wisdom.

Setting aside the comfort of Churches, Justice, Learning, Arts and Traffick, what are great Cities but great prisons? Men live there, like birds in a cage, they crowd, defile one onother, and by frequent and infectious conversation, the trouble of business, the importunity of visits, the foolish tyranny of complements steal from them half their life. In the Country, the heaven, air, earth and waters, (which Cities snatch from us) are restored with greatest liberty. There, all the creatures of God speak to us face to face, to tell us the wonders of the Creatour. The Christians of the primitive Church made hermitages of their farms, to found a retreat from worldly business, and to prepare for their time of rest: but many now make gardens temples of Baal-peor, where no God is worshipped, but the belly, luxury, gaming, and uncleanness.

Many make walks and races, wherein none can run far without stumbling; for they resemble the list of Atalanta & Hippomenes, rather then the race wherein S. Paul exhorted Christians to run; there the senses flattered with a thousand delightful objects, many times put themselves in array; there the blond is inflamed; the tongue untied; concupiscence enkindled there, licentiousness often rendeth the vail, which until then was over the face of modesty; and impudently becomes portress to love; These are the sacrileges, which dry up years, breed disorder amongst seasons, barrenness in the bowels of the earth and despair in our miseries.

The seventh SECTION.

The four conditions of recreation.

YOur recreation must have four especial things; choice of persons, good intention, innocency, moderation.

Choice of persons, in avoiding evil company as the most dangerous shelf of life; for the friendship of wicked men is like a bundle of thorns, tied together to burn and crackle in the fire. Your friendship must be virtuous, faithful, disinteressed, if you mean to have any fruits of it.

Good intention, as to cherish health and strength, that they may serve the soul; for a good man should seek good even in play and at meals; like the saint who rose in the night, and fed with a poor hungry brother, that he might not be ashamed of eating at a disorderly hour.

Innocency, for much consideration must be used therein, lest nature should dissolve into brutish life unworthy a generous heart. Behind, comes gluttony intemperate gaming, foolish jesting, and detraction in this age hard to be avoided.

The book most ordinary in companies of men, is man himself: Nowvery few take delight to discourse of the Old and New Testament; nay not so much as of the old Roman Councils, Ægyptian Pyramids, or ancient wars of Cæsars. Men study books of the time, talk of garbs, clothes, looks, conditions, business, customs, alliances; and though we have no intent to wrong any, yet is it very easie, in such variety of discourse to let fall many words of far less value then silence; it is an excellent quality to still good matter into company; either upon occasion, by question, consequence, narration or proposition, as the reverend Jaquinot observes in his Address.

Moderation. For as the wise man saith, Prov. 25. 16. We glut our selves with honey: so ought we to have a care, that recreations (made to refresh the mind) tend not by excess to dissoluteness. You must observe what the time, place, and persons require; and to pass the time, must not exceed your self by prosuseness.

The

The eighth SECTION.

Of vicious converſation; and firſt of impertinent.

THe Hebrews ſay, play, anger, the cup, and converſation, are the windows of the ſoul; through which ſhe is many times ſeen more then ſhe would be; he is wiſe, who makes uſe of meetings and company, as of a file to poliſh his mind, and to make it continually more apt for its functions.

Vicious converſation, may be reduced almoſt to three heads, that is, impertinent, vain, evil. Impertinent, as the clowniſh, fooliſh, troubleſome, which many have through want of diſcretion, faſhion and civility.

Theophraſtus, one of the quainteſt wits of antiquity, relateth ſome paſſages, which he ſaith he obſerved in his time, arguing a great weakneſs of judgment; ſome (ſaith he) lay hold on one that is going about buſineſs of concernment, to tell him ſomething (as they pretend) of great importance, which when told, is nothing but foolery. Others invite a traveller, newly come out of the countrey very weary, to walk up and down; others pull a man out of a ſhip ready to weigh anchor, to entertain him with follies on the ſhore; others come to bear witneſs, after the cauſe is judged, and bring with much ſweat, a Phyſitian to the dead: others pretend to know the way, and undertake to lead the reſt, but go wrong at the very firſt, and proteſt, they have forgot it. Others make rude inquiry into buſineſs, and ask a General of an Army, whether he goes, and what is his deſign. Some alſo there are (ſaith he) ſo ruſtick, that (not admitting any thing worth admiration in civil life) they ſtand ſtill to look upon an ox, as men in rapture; and in company, have no better behaviour, then to take their dog by the muzzle, and ſay, what a fine dog this is, well he keeps the houſe! Such converſation is able greatly to vilifie a man, and to take from him all eſtimation he can gain in his profeſſion.

The ninth SECTION.

Of vain converſation.

VAin converſation, is that of talkers, flatterers, vain-glorious, and the like; poor Theophraſtus (in my opinion) was much tormented with a talker; ſince he ſo well deſcribeth one, who, with much paſſion, praiſed his wife; told what he dreamed the laſt night; what he had to dinner; that he had a weakneſs of ſtomack: From thence taking flight, he diſcourſed of times; and aſſured him, the men of ours came not near the ancients in any thing: Then he told him, that corn was cheap: that there were many ſtrangers in the city: that if it would rain, the year would be fruitfull; that he had a field to be ploughed; that Damippus gave the greateſt wax light at an offering: that there were ſo many ſtairs in ſuch a building, and that he had counted them, with a thouſand of the like. Such people (adds the Author) are more to be feared then a feaver. He that would live in quiet, muſt ſeldom keep them company. Horace mentions one very like, who put him into a great ſweat, and when he ſaw he was ſo tired, that he knew not which way to turn himſelf. I ſee Sir, ſaith he, that I am troubleſome, but there is no remedy: ſince I have met with you, I muſt needs wait on you; for (God be thanked) I have nothing elſe to do.

Flatterers, are much more acceptable, though many times more dangerous, for they will tell you, that all the world caſt their eyes upon you: that you are much eſteemed; that the whole town talks of ſuch a fortunate action of yours: that you have an excellent wit, a handſom body, a good grace, winning behaviour: that every thing becomes you, and that it ſeems Nature, when ſhe had made you, broke her mold, becauſe ſhe never ſince framed the like: If you ſpeak, they bid ſilence to all the world: then extol your words as oracles: and if you jeſt at any, they burſt with laughter to pleaſe you; and deifie your imperfections: This is that which poyſons friendſhip, and blinds humane life.

The Vain-glorious, will for the moſt part entertain you with commendations of themſelves; and have a thouſand petty ſingularities in their carriage, their attire, their ſpeech, their houſes, their attendants, to ſhew, that they have ſomething more then others. The aforeſaid Authour ſaith, he hath obſerved ſome, that held it a great honour to have a Blackamore lackey, that they might be the more noted: and if they ſacrificed an ox, they nailed the horns at their gates, to give the world notice of their offering: and to conclude, they were ſo great ſelf-lovers, that they made Epitaphs, even upon their dogs, ſpecifying their age, qualities and conditions: Theſe are teſtimonies of a ſoul very frivolous, and deſtitute of all Humility.

The tenth SECTION.

Of evil Converſation.

EVil Converſation, is the worſt of all; as is that of the Harſh, who make themſelves unſociable in company: that of the Opinionated, who bear for their motto, It is ſo, and, It is not ſo: ever contradicting, even the cleareſt truths: that of the Craſty and Deceitfull, who endeavour to diſcover all the ſecrets of others, whileſt they diſguiſe themſelves with a mask of diſſimulation and intricate ſpeech, feigning ignorance of what they know, knowledge of what they are ignorant, forgetfulneſs of promiſe, good will to thoſe they would circumvent, and many ſuch like. That of the Proud, who ſcorn and deſpiſe all but themſelves. That of the Choleriek, who are diſpleaſed upon every accident: That of Scoffers, Buffons, and Slanderers, who are obſcene, biting, and offenſive in all occaſions.

It were a long buſineſs to examine all theſe particularly: and I had freely unfolded them, in a Treatiſe of Manners and Paſſion, wherein I hoped to give the Reader ſatisfaction, but that the deſign of this little book diverted me. It were to ſmall purpoſe, to make ſo long a work of it; and it is always better to conclude well, then to enlarge ill.

The eleventh SECTION.

The Conditions of good Converſations.

I Tell you in brief, S. Bernard, Thomas Aquinas and other learned men are of opinion, that in Converſation we ought to be affable and pleaſing, yet not too familiar, nor inquiſitive into other mens buſineſs, not ſuſpicious, not light, not riotous, not diſcontented, not affected, not imperious, not croſs, not exceptious, not jeering, not fretfull, not trivial, not churliſh, not too ceremonious, not too talkative, not too ſoft and compliant, not cholerick, not too reſerved, not proud, not vain, all thoſe through vanity (which is onely rich in fooleries) diſcourſe perpetually of themſelves, as if they were deities. But we muſt govern our ſelves with great diſcretion and modeſty: we muſt play, but not debaſe baſe our ſelves, laugh, but not to exceſs: take recreation, but not to effeminacy; be conſtant but not obſtinate; prudent, but not crafty; ſimple, but not ſtupid; concealing ill, furthering good; correcting our own faults by thoſe we diſlike in others, always bringing home ſome fruit from this garden of Graces; and if acquainted with any ſecret fit to be concealed, we muſt make our breaſt its tomb.

You will find, there are ordinarily five qualities, which make converſation pleaſant; The firſt is, an obliging way, which ſweetly ſcatter eth benefits, from which (in their due time and place) ſpring up recompences: This deſire of doing good to all the world, is a bait we muſt keep ever in the water; for by it men are taken more eaſily then fiſhes; And ſuch there have been, who by giving a glaſs of water opportunely, have obtained a Kingdom; as we ſee in the ſtory of Thaumaſius, and King Agrippa.

The ſecond, Affability, joyned with a grace and ſweet behaviour, which hath a moſt powerful charm over ſouls naturally inclined to honeſty. To do good, and not to do it handſomely, is nothing. A benefit given with grudging, is a ſtony loaf, onely taken for neceſſity.

The third, a quick and wary prudence, to diſcern the diſpoſitions, capacities, manners, humours, affections, and aims of thoſe with whom we converſe; and to ſuit our carriage to every mans temper.

The fourth, Humility, without ſottiſhneſs or ſervile baſeneſs, which teacheth to yield to reaſon, and not to preſume upon our own ſtrength.

The fifth, (whereof we have already ſpoken) is a diſcreet Patience, to bear with men and buſineſs unmoved, ſo that you may keep your heart always in a good poſture, even in unexſpected, and thorny accidents. He that underſtands this myſtery well, deſerves to cōmand men, being here placed by virtue in a degree next the Angels.

A good rule for converſing well, is to propoſe unto your ſelf for pattern, one of a perfect converſation: So S. Auguſtine referred thoſe that deſired to profit in virtue, to the converſation of S. Paulinus. Vade in Campaniam, diſce Paulinum.

But the moſt effectual precept is, to think how the Incarnate Word would converſe, if he were in our room; by his example, we ſhall do as Joſeph in Ægypt, of whom the Scripture Pſal. 105. (according to the Hebrew phraſe) ſaith, he tied the Princes of Pharaoh's Court about his heart.

The reverend Gontery, a man of great Judgement, and no leſs virtue, hath written a little Treatiſe of Converſation, wherein he deſcendeth very far to particulars. He that will read it, ſhall find wiſe inſtructions in it.

The twelfth SECTION.

Concluſion of the Diary.

AT night before you go to bed, you are to make the examen of Conſcience (which is the little Conſiſtory of the ſoul, as Philo terms it) where having given thanks to God, and invoked his holy grace, you muſt recal your thoughts, your words, your actions, your faults, and neglects, to account, that you may ſee thegain, the loſs, & reckonings of that day; to further good, to correct evil; remitting the one to your own diſcretion, and the other to Gods mercy.

Eſteem this ſaying of S. Bernard; (in his book of the Interiour houſe.) as an oracle, that one of the chiefeſt mirrours to behold God in, is a reaſonable ſoul, which finds it ſelf out.

There we muſt ſeat the Conſcience in a Throne with a ſcepter in one hand; and all paſsions, and imperfections at her feet.

There ſhe muſt take the liberty to ſay to you, Wicked ſervant, thou haſt loſt a day: what ſluggiſhneſs at thy riſing? what negligence in labour? how great words? how little works? Why this curious queſtioning? this raſh judgement? theſe wanderings eyes? theſe ſtraying thoughts? Should you have been angry for ſo ſlight a cauſe, upon ſuch an occaſion? ſhould you ſo freely have cenſured and murmured at the actions of another? ſhould you have taken your refection ſo ſenſually? and ſought your eaſe in, and by all things, ſo greedily? and ſo of the reſt. If by the grace of God, you ſhall find ſome kind of virtues, yet muſt you well pick and ſift them (as the perfume, which was to be ſet before the Tabernacle) to preſent them before the face of God; and ſay in concluſion with all humility, as the devout Southwell, Quod fui, Domine, ignoſce; quod ſum, corrige; quod ero, dirige. O Lord, forgive what I have been; correct what I am; direct, what I ſhall be.

This done, ſay ſome vocal prayer, to ſhut the day up happily with ſome acts of contrition of faith, of hope, of ſupplication, for your ſelf & friends.

Say here.

O Light of the Children of light! bright day which haſt no evening! The world is buried in the darkneſs of night, and this day quite finiſhed, wherein I ſee, as in a little Map, how my life ſhall end. O God, what benefits do I ſee in it on thy part; what ingratitudes on mine? Preſerve me in what is thine; and waſh away with the precious blood of thy Son, what is mine. Shelter me under the wings of thy protection, from ſo many ſhadows, apparitions, and ſnares of the father of darkneſs; and grant, that though ſleep cloſe my eyes, yet my heart may never be ſhut to thy love.

Laſtly, fall aſleep upon ſome good thought that your night (as the Prophet ſaith) may be enlightned with the delights of God; and if you chance to have any interruption of ſleep, ſupply it with ejaculatory prayers, and elevations of heart; as the juſt did of old, called for this reaſon, The crickets of the night.

Thus ſhall you lead a life full of honour, quiet, and ſatisfaction to your ſelf, and ſhall make every day a ſtep to Eternity. The marks, which may amongſt others give you good hope of your predeſtination, are eleven principal.

1. Faith, lively, ſimple, and firm. 2. Purity of life exempt ordinarily from grievous ſins. 3. Tribulation. 4. Clemency and mercy. 5. Poverty of ſpirit diſengaged from the earth. 6. Humility. 7. Charity to your neighbour. 8. Frequentation of the bleſſed Sacrament. 9. Affection to the word of God. 10 Reſignation of your own mind to the will of your Sovereign Lord. 11. Some remarkable act of virtue, which you have upon occaſion exerciſed.

You will find this Diary little in volume, but great in virtue, if reliſhing it well, you begin to put it in practiſe. It contains many things, worthy to be meditated at leiſure; for they are grave and wiſe precepts, choicely extracted out of the moral doctrin of the Fathers. Though they ſeem ſhort, they coſt not the leſs pains. Remember, that famous Artiſt Myrmecides, employed more time to make a Bee, then an unskilful workman to build a houſe.

A Prayer of Thomas Aquinas before study.

OUnspeakable Creatour, who out of the treasure of thy wisdom, hast ordained Hierarchies of Angels, and hast placed them above the highest heaven, in a wonderful order, and disposed them sweetlie for all parts of the world; Thou, the true fountain, and incomprehensible principle of light and wisdom, vouchsafe to illuminate the darkness of my understanding with a beam of thy light; remove the darkness wherein I was born, sin and ignorance,

Thou

Thou who makeſt the tongues of infants eloquent, looſen my tongue, and pour forth the grace of thy ſpirit upon my lips; give me acuteneſs to apprehend, capacity to retain, ſubtlety to interpret, aptnes to learn, readineſs to ſpeak, direct my beginning, further my progreſſion, and perfect my concluſion.

THE PENITENT, OR, ENTERTAINMENTS for LENT:

And for the firſt day upon the Conſideration of Aſhes.

THou art Duſt, and to Duſt thou ſhalt return, Geneſ. 3.

1. It is an excellent way to begin Lent with the conſideration of Duſt, whereby Nature gives us beginning, and by the ſame, Death ſhall put an end to all our worldly vanities. There is no better way to abate and humble the proudeſt of all Creatures, then to repreſent his begining & his end. The middle part of our life (like a kind of Proteus) takes upon it ſeveral ſhapes not underſtood by others; but the firſt and laſt part of it deceive no man; for they do both begin and end in Duſt. It is a ſtrange thing, that Man knowing well what he hath been, and what he muſt be, is not confounded in himſelf, by obſerving the pride of his own life, and the great diſorder of his paſsions. The end of all other creatures is leſs deformed then that of man: Plants in their death retain ſome pleaſing ſmell of their bodies: The little roſe buries it ſelf in her natural ſweetneſs, and carnation colour. Many Creatures at their death leave us their teeth, horns, feathers, skins, of which we make great uſe. Others after death are ſerved up in ſilver and golden diſhes, to feed the greateſt perſons of the world. Onely mans dead carcaſe is good for nothing but to feed worms: and yet he often retains the preſumptuous pride of a Giant, by the exorbitancy of his heart, and the cruel nature of a murderer, by the furious rage of his revenge. Surely that man muſt either be ſtupid by nature, or moſt wicked by his own election, who will not correct and amend himſelf, having ſtill before his eyes Aſhes for his Glaſs, and Death for his Miſtriſs.

2. This conſideration of Duſt is an excellent remedy to cure vices, and an aſſured Rampire againſt all temptations. S. Paulinus ſaith excellently well; That holy Job was free from all temptations, when he was placed upon the ſmoke and duſt of his humility. He that lies upon the ground can fall no lower, but may contemplate all above him, and meditate how to raiſe himſelf by the hand of God, which pulls down the proud, and exalts the humble. Is a man tempted with pride? The conſideration of Aſhes will humble him. Is he burned with wanton love, (which is a direct fire?) But fire cannot conſume Aſhes. Is he perſecuted with covetouſneſs? Aſhes do make the greateſt Leeches and Bloud-ſuckers caſt their Gorges. Every thing gives way to this unvalued thing, becauſe God is pleaſed to draw the inſtruments of his power out of the objects of our infirmities.

3. If we knew how to uſe rightly the meditation of death, we ſhould there find the ſtreams of life: All the world together, is of no eſtimation to him, that rightly knows the true value of a juſt mans death. It would be neceſſary, that they who are taken with the curioſity of Tulips, ſhould ſet in their Gardens a Plant called Napel, which carries a flower that moſt perfectly reſembles a Deaths head. And if the other Tulips do pleaſe their ſenſes, that will inſtruct their reaſon. Before our laſt death, we ſhould die many other deaths, by forſaking all thoſe creatures and affections which lead us to ſin. We ſhould reſemble thoſe creatures (ſacred to the Egyptians) called Cynocephales, which died piece-meal, and were buried long before their death: So ſhould we bury all our concupiſcences before we go to the grave, and ſtrive to live ſo, that when death comes, he ſhould find very little buſineſs with us.

Aſpiration.

O Father of all Eſſences, who giveſt beginning to all things, and art without end; This day I take Aſhes upon my head, thereby profeſſing (before thee) my being nothing; and to do thee homage for that which I am, and for that I ought to be by thy great bounties. Alas, O Lord, my poor ſoul is confounded to ſee ſo many ſparkles of pride and covetouſneſs, ariſe from this caitiff duſt which I am: ſo little do I yet learn how to live, and ſo late do I know how to die, O God, of my life and death, I moſt humbly beſeech thee, ſo to govern the firſt in me, and ſo to ſweeten the laſt for me, that if I live, I may live onely for thee; and if I muſt die, that I may enter into everlaſting bliſs, by dying in thy bleſſed love and favour.

The Goſpel for Aſhwedneſday.

S. Matthew 6.

Of Hypocritical Faſting.

WHen you faſt, be not as the hypocrites, ſad; for they diſfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to faſt. Amen, I ſay to you that they have received their reward. But thou when thou doeſt faſt, anoint thy head, and waſh thy face; that thou appear not to men to faſt, but to thy Father which is in ſecret: and thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret, will repay thee.

Heap not up to your ſelves treaſures on the earth: where the ruſt and moth do corrupt, and where thieves dig through and ſteal. But heap up to your ſelves treaſures in heaven: where neither the ruſt nor moth doth corrupt, and where thieves do not dig through nor ſteal. For where thy treaſure is, there is thy heart alſo.

Moralities.

1. THat man goes to Hell by the way of Paradiſe, who faſts and afflicts his body, to draw the praiſe of Men. Sorrow and vanity together, are unable to make one Chriſtian Act. He deſerves everlaſting hunger, who ſtarves himſelf, that he may ſwell and burſt with vain glory. He ſtands for a ſpectacle to others, being the murtherer of himſelf, and by ſowing vanity, reaps nothing but wind. Our intentions muſt be wholly directed to God, and our examples for our neighbour. The Father of all virtues is not to be ſerved with counterfeit devotions; ſuch lies are abominations in his ſight, and Tertullian ſaith, they are, as many adulteries.

2. It imports us much to begin Lent well, entering into thoſe liſts, in which ſo many holy ſouls have run their courſe with ſo great ſtrictneſs, have been glorious before God, and honourable before men. The difficulty of it, is apprehended only by thoſe who have their underſtandings obſtructed by a violent affection to kitchin-ſtuff. It is no more burthenſom to a courageous ſpirit, then feathers are to a bird. The chearfulneſs which a man brings to a good action in the beginning, does half the work. Let us waſh our faces by confeſſion: let us perfume our head (who is Jeſus Chriſt) by alms-deeds. Faſting is a moſt delicious feaſt to the conſcience, when it is accompanied with pureneſs and charity: but it breeds great thirſt, when it is not nouriſhed with devotion, and watered with mercy.

3. What great pain is taken to get treaſure, what care to preſerve it; what fear to loſe it; and what ſorrow when it is loſt? Alas, is there need of ſo great covetouſneſs in life, to encounter with ſuch extreme nakedneſs in death? We have not the ſouls of Giants, nor the body of a Whale. If God will have me poor, muſt I endeavour to reverſe the decrees of Heaven and earth, that I may become rich? To whom do we truſt the ſafety of our treaſures? To ruſt, to moths, and thieves: were it not better we ſhould in our infirmities depend only on God Almighty, and comfort our poverty in him who is only rich, and ſo carry our ſouls to heaven, where Jeſus on the day of his Aſcention did place our Sovereign good. Only Serpents and covetous men deſire to ſleep among treaſures, as Saint Clement ſaith. But the greateſt riches of the world is poverty, free from Covetouſneſs.

Aſpiration.

I Seek thee (O inviſible God) within the abyſs of thy brightneſs, and I ſee thee through the veil of thy creatures. Wilt thou always be hidden from me? Shall I never ſee thy face, which with a glimpſe of thy ſplendour canſt make Paradiſe? I work in ſecret, but I know thou art able to reward me in the light. A man can loſe nothing by ſerving thee, and yet nothing is valuable to thy ſervice, for the pain it ſelf is a ſufficient recompence. Thou art the food of my faſtings, and the cure of my infirmities. What have I to do with Moles, to dig the earth like them, and there to hide treaſures? Is it not time to cloſe the earth, when thou doſt open heaven? and to carry my heart where thou art, ſince all my riches is in thee? Doth not he deſerve to be everlaſtingly poor, who cannot be content with a God ſo rich as thou art?

The Goſpel for the firſt Thurſday in Lent, S. Matthew 18. of the Centurions words.

O Lord I am not worthy.

AND when he was entred into Capernaum, there came to him a Centurion, beſeeching him, and ſaying, Lord my boy lieth at home ſick of the palſie, and is ſore tormented.

And Jeſus ſaith to him, I will come and cure him.

And the Centurion making anſwer, ſaid, Lord, I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt enter under my roof: but onely ſay the word, and my boy ſhall be healed. For I alſo am a man ſubject to Authority, having under me ſouldiers; and I ſay to this, go, and he goeth: and to another, come; and he cometh: and to my ſervant, do this, and he doth it: And Jeſus hearing this, marvelled, and ſaid to them that followed him, Amen, I ſay to you, I have not found ſo great faith in Iſrael.

And I ſay to you, that many ſhall come from the Eaſt and Weſt, and ſhall ſit down with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob in the Kingdom of Heaven: but the children of the Kingdom ſhall be caſt out into exteriour darkneſs, there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth. And Jeſus ſaid to the Centurion, Go, and as thou haſt believed, be it done to thee. And the boy was healed in the ſame hour.

Moralities.

1. OUr whole Salvation conſiſts in two principles; The one is, in our being ſenſible of God: and the other, in moving toward him. The firſt, proceeds from faith, the other, comes of charity and other virtues. O what a happy thing it is to follow the examples of this good Centurion, by having ſuch elevated thoughts of the Divinity, and to know nothing of God, but what he is: To behold our heavenly Father within this great Family of the world, who effects all things by his ſingle word: Creates by his power, governs by his counſel, and orders by his goodneſs this great univerſality of all things. The moſt inſenſible creatures have ears to hear him. Feavers and tempeſts are part of that running camp, which marcheth under his Standard. They advance and retire themſelves under the ſhadow of his command: he only hath power to give meaſures to the Heaven, bounds to the Sea, to joyn the Eaſt and Weſt together in an inſtant, and to be in all places where his pleaſure is underſtood.

2. O, how goodly a thing it is to go unto him, like this great Captain. To go ſaid I? Nay, rather to fly as he doth, by the two wings of Charity and Humility. His Charity made him have a tender care of his poor ſervant, and to eſteem his health more dear, then great men do the rareſt pieces in their Cabinets. He doth not truſt his ſervants, but takes the charge upon himſelf: making himſelf (by the power of love) a ſervant to him, who by birth was made ſubject to his command. What can be ſaid of ſo many Maſters and Miſtriſſes now adays, who live always ſlaves to their paſſions? having no care at all of the ſalvation, health, or neceſſities of their ſervants, as if they were nothing elſe but the very ſcum of the world. They make great uſe of their labours and ſervice, (which is juſt) but neglect their bodies, and kill their ſouls by the infection of their wicked examples. Mark the humility of this Souldier, who doth not think his houſe worthy to be enlightned by one ſole glimpſe of our bleſſed Saviour's preſence. By the words of S. Auguſtine we may ſay, he made himſelf worthy by believing and declaring himſelf ſo unworthy: yea, worthy that our Saviour ſhould enter, not only into his houſe, but into his very ſoul. And upon the matter he could not have ſpoken with ſuch faith and humility, if he had not firſt incloſed (in his heart) him, whom he durſt not receive into his houſe.

3. The Gentiles come near unto God, and the Jews go from him: to teach us, that ordinarily the moſt obliged perſons are moſt ungrateful; and diſeſteem their benefactours for no other reaſon, but becauſe they receive benefits daily from them. If you ſpeak courteouſly to them, they anſwer churliſhly; and in the ſame proportion wherein you are good, you make them wicked: therefore we muſt be careful that we be not ſo toward God. Many are diſtaſted with devotion, as the Iſraelites were with Manna. All which is good, doth diſpleaſe them, becauſe cauſe it is ordinary: And you ſhall find ſome, who (like naughty grounds) caſt up thornswhere roſes are planted. But we have great reaſon to fear, that nothing but hell fire is capable to puniſh thoſe, who deſpiſe the graces of God, and eſteem that which comes from him as a thing of no value.

Aſpirations.

O Almighty Lord, who doeſt govern all things in the family of this world, and doeſt bind all inſenſible creatures (by the bare ſound of the voice) in a chain of everlaſting obedience: Muſt I only be ſtill rebellious againſt thy will? Feavers and Palſies have their ears for thee, and yet my unruly ſpirit is not obedient. Alas, alas, this family of my heart is ill governed; It hath violent paſſions; my thoughts are wandering, and my reaſon is ill obeyed. Shall it never be like the houſe of this good Centurion, where every thing went by meaſure, becauſe he meaſured himſelf by thy commandments? O Lord, I will come reſolutely by a profound humility, and an inward feeling of my ſelf, ſince I am ſo contemptible before thine eyes. I will come with Charity toward theſe of my houſehold, and toward all that ſhall need me. O God of my heart, I beſeech thee, let nothing from henceforth move in me, but only to advance my coming toward thee, who art the beginning of all motions, and the only repoſe of all things which move.

The Goſpel for the firſt Friday in Lent, S. Matth. 5. Wherein we are directed to pray for our Enemies.

YOu have heard that it was ſaid, thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemie. But I ſay to you, Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you: and pray for them that perſecute and abuſe you: that you may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven, who maketh his Sun to riſe upon good and bad, and raineth upon juſt and unjuſt. For if you love them that love you, what reward ſhall you have? Do not alſo the Publicans this? And if you ſalute your brethren onely, what do you more? Do not alſo the heathen this? Be you perfect therefore, as alſo your heavenly Father is perfect.

Moralities.

1. A Man that loves nothing but according to his natural inclination, loves only like a beaſt or an infidel. The beſt ſort of love is that which is commanded by God, and is derived from judgment, conducted by reaſon, and perfected by Charity. Me thinks it ſhould be harder for a good Chriſtian to hate, then love his enemy. Hate makes him our equal, whereas love placeth us quite above him. By hating a mans enemy, he breaks the laws of God; he fights againſt the Incarnation of Chriſt, which was acted to unite all things in the bands of love: he gives the lie to the moſt bleſſed Euchariſt, whoſe nature is to make the hearts of all Chriſtians the ſame: he lives (like another Cain in the world) always diſquieted by ſeeking revenge, and it is a very death to him to hear another mans proſperity. Whereas to love an enemy, doth not bind us to love the injury he hath done us; for we muſt not conſider him as a malefactour, but as a man of our own nature, as he is the Image of God, and as he is a Chriſtian. God doth only command perfect things, not impoſſible. That which is very hard to fleſh and blood, become eaſie by the help of grace and reaſon. Our bleſſed Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, being the Father of all harmony, can, and doth reconcile all contrarieties at his will and pleaſure.

2. If revenge ſeem ſweet, the gaining of it is moſt bitter: But there is nothing in the world more profitable, then to pardon an enemy by imitation of our Saviour. For it is then that our conſcience can aſſure us to be the children of God, and inheritours of his glory. We muſt not fear to be deſpiſed for eſteeming virtue, for ſuch contempt can only proceed from thoſe, who know not the true value of that glory which belongs to the juſt. There is no better way to revenge, the leave it to God, who always doth his own buſineſs. When David wept for Saul, who was his enemy, his Clemency did inſenſibly make degrees, by which he mounted up to the throne of Judah. A good work which comes from the ſpirit of vanity, is like an emptied Mine, good for nothing. God, who is inviſible, would have our aſpects turned always towards him, & blind toward the world. Alms given by the ſound of a Trumpet, makes a great noiſe on earth, but reaps little fruit in Heaven. The ſtie of vanity is a miſchievous thing, which deſtroys all the perfumes of Charity. What need we any ſpectatours of our good works, every place is full where God is, and where he is not, there only is Solitude.

Aſpirations.

O God of all holy affections, when ſhall I love all which thou loveſt, and have in horrour all that diſpleaſeth thy divine Majeſty: If I cannot love in ſome perſon his defects and ſins, I will love in him thine Image, and in that will I acknowledg thy mercies. If he be a piece of broken glaſs, in that little piece there will ſhine ſome lines of a God-Creatour, and of a God-Redeemer. If thou haſt choſen him to exerciſe my patience, why ſhould I make him the object of my revenge, ſince he gives me trouble to gain me a Crown. He is a hammer to poliſh and make me bright, I will not hurt him, but reverence the arm that ſtrikes me. I reſign all vengeance into thy hands, ſince it is a Right reſerved for thy Almighty power. And certainly, the beſt revenge I can take, is to gratifie my enemy. Give unto me (O moſt merciful Prince) the grace to ſuffer, and let the ſacrifice of my ſufferings mount up to thy propitiatory Throne.

The Goſpel for the firſt Saturday in Lent, S Matth. 6.

Of the Apoſtles danger at Sea, and relief by our SAVIOUR.

ANd when he had diſmiſſed them, he went into the mountain to pray, and when it was late, the boat was in the midſt of the Sea, and himſelf alone on the land. And ſeeing them labouring in rowing (for the wind was againſt them) and about the fourth watch of the night, he cometh to them, walking upon the Sea: and he would have paſſed by them. But they ſeeing him walking upon the Sea, thought it was a ghoſt, and cried out, for all ſaw him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them; and ſaid to them, Have confidence, it is I, fear yte not. And he went up to them into the ſhip, and the wind ceaſed; and they were far more aſtonied within themſelves: for they underſtood not concerning the loaves, for their heart was blinded.

And when they had paſſed over, they came into the land of Geneſareth, and ſet to the ſhore. And when they were gone out of the boat, incontinent they knew him, and running through that whole Country, they began to carry about in couches, thoſe that were ill at eaſe, where they heard he was. And whitherſoever he entred into townes, or into villages, or cities, they laid the ſick in the ſtreets, and beſought him, that they might touch but the hem of his garment, and as many as touched him, were made whole.

Moralities.

1. WHat a painful thing it is to row, when Jeſus is not in the boat; all our travel is juſt nothing without Gods favour: A little blaſt of wind is worth more then an hundred ſtrokes of oars. What troubleſome buſineſſes there are: how many intricate families do labour much, and yet advance nothing, becauſe God withdraws himſelf from from their iniquities; if he do not build, the workman destroyes what he is building. But all falls out right to those, that embark themselves with Jesus. They may pass to the Indies in a basket, when others shall miscarry in a good ship, well furnished.

2. But how comes it about, that the ship of the poor Apostles is beaten so furiously by the winds and tempests? There are many ships with silver beaks, with fine linnen sails, and silken tackles, upon which the sea seems to smile. Do the waters reserve their choller, only to vent it upon that ship which carries just persons? This is the course of mans life: The brave and happy men of this world enjoy their wishes, but their ship doth perish in the harbour, as it is sporting; whereas God by his infinite providence, gives tempests to his elect, that he may work a miraculous calm by his Almighty power. Dangers are witnesses of their floting, and Combats are causes of their merit. Never think any man happy in his wickedness, for he is just like a fish that playes with the bait, when the hook sticks fast in his throat. We must wait and attend for help from Heaven patiently (without being tired) even till the fourth, which is the last watch of the night. All which proceeds from the hand of God, comes ever in fit time, and that man is a great gainer by his patient attendance, who thereby gets nothing but perseverance.

3. They know Jesus very ill, that take him for a Phantome or an illusion, and cry out for fear of his presence, which should make them most rejoyce: so do those souls which are little acquainted with God, who live in blindness, and make much of their own darkness. Let us learn to discern God from the illusions of the world: The tempest ceaseth when he doth approach; & the quietness of our heart is a sure mark of his presence, which fills the soul with splendour, and makes it a delicious garden. He makes all good whereso ever he comes, and the steps which his feet leave, are the bounties of his heart. To touch the Hem of his Garment, cures all that are sick; to teach us, that the forms which cover the blessed Sacrament, are the fringes of his holy humanity, which cures our sins.

Aspiration.

O Lord, my soul is in night and darkness, and I feel that thou art far from me. What billows of disquiet rise within my heart; what idle thoughts which have been too much considered? Alas (most redoubted Lord and Father of mercy) canst thou behold from firm land this poor vessel, which labours so extreamly, being deprived of thy most amiable presence? I row strongly, but can advance nothing, except thou come into my soul. Come (O my adored Master) walk upon this tempestuous Sea of my heart; ascend into this poor vessel, say unto me, Take courage, It is I. Be not conceited that I will take thee for an illusion, for I know thee too well by thy powers and bounties, to be so mistaken. The least thought of my heart will quiet it self to adore thy steps. Thou shalt reign within me; thou shalt disperse my cares; thou shalt recover my decayed senses; thou shalt lighten my understanding; thou shalt inflame my will; thou shalt cure all my infirmities: And to conclude, thou onely shalt work in me, and I will be wholly thine.

The Gospel for the first Sunday in Lent, S. Matthew 4.

Of our SAVIOUR'S being tempted in the Desart.

Then Jesus was led of the Spirit into the Desart, to be tempted of the Devil, and when he had fasted fourty days and fourty nights, after ward he was hungry? And the Tempter approached, and said to him, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread: Who answered and said, It is written, not in bread alone doth man live, but in every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God.

Then the Devil took him up into the holy City, and set him upon the pinacle of the Temple, and said to him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thy self down, for it is written, That he will give his Angels charge of thee, and in their hands shall they hold thee up, lest perhaps thou knock thy foot against a stone. Jesus said to him again, It is written, thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

Again the Devil took him up into a very high mountain, and he shewed him all the Kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, and said to him, all these will I give thee, if falling down thou wilt adore me. Then Jesus said to him, Avant Satan; for it is written, the Lord thy God thalt thou adore, and him onely shalt thou serve. Then the Devil left him, and behold Angels came, and ministred to him.

Moralities.

1. JESUS suffered himself to be tempted (saith Saint Augustine) to the end he might serve for a Mediatour, for an example, and for a remedy to work our victory over all temptations. We must fight on his side: Our life is a continual warfare, and our dayes are Champions which enter into the lists. There is no greater temptation, then to have none at all; Sleeping water doth nourish poison. Motion is the worlds soul; fighting against temptations, is the soul of virtues, and glory doth spring and bud out of tribulations. Virtue hinders not temptation, but surmounts it. Jesus fasted (saith the ordinary glos) that he might be tempted, and is tempted because he did fast. He fasted forty days, and then was hungry; he did eat with his Disciples the space of forty days after his resurrection, without any more necessity of meat, then the Sun hath of the earth's vapours: to make us thereby know, that it onely appertained to him, to teach that great secret how to manage want and abundance, by which S. Paul was glorified.

2. The first victory over a Temptation, is, to know that which tempts us: Some temptations are gay and smiling at their beginning, as those of love and pleasure, which end in terrible and bitter storms: Others are troublesom and irksom: Others doubtfull and intricate: Others rapid and sudden, which seize upon their prey like an Eagle: Others are close and catching. These are the snares of Satan, who comes like a Bore, roars like a Lion, and hisseth like a Serpent. We should always have an eye ready, to mark from whence the Temptation comes, whither it tends, what is the root of it, what the course, what the progress, and what power it may have over our spirit.

3. Solitude of heart, fasting, prayer, the word of God, are weapons of an excellent temper, which the word Incarnate teacheth us to use in this conflict. These things are to be used with discretion, by the counsel of a good director, to whom a man must declare all his most secret thoughts, and bear a breast of chrystal toward him, with a firm purpose to let him see all the inward motions of his heart. It is also good to note here, that our Lord would expressly be tempted in that Desart, which is between Jerusalem and Jericho, where the Samaritane (mentioned in the Parable) did pour wine and oyl into the sores of the poor wounded man; to teach us, that by his combat, he came to cure the wounds of Adam and all his race, in the very place where they were received.

4. Sin is killed by flying the occasions of it. Absence, resistance, coldness, silence, labour, diversion, have overcome many assaults of the enemy. Sometimes a Spiders web is strong enough to preserve chastity, ſtity, and at other times the thick walls of Semiramis are not ſufficient. God governs all; and a good will to concur with him, is a ſtrong aſſurance in all perils, and it will keep us untouch'd amidſt the flames of luſt.

5. Since it imports us ſo much to fight valiantly, let us bring the hearts of Lions. Where is our Chriſtianity, if we do not give teſtimony of it to God, both by our fidelity and courage? How many Martyrs have been roaſted and broiled, becauſe they would not ſpeak an ill word? What honour can you expect, by yielding at the firſt entrance, to a temptation? Look not upon the violence of it, but contemplate the Crown, which you ſhould gain by conquering it: think at your entrance how you will come off; and know for certain, that he who truly conſiders the conſequence of a wicked action, will never begin it.

6. Lent is the Spring-time for ſanctified reſolutions, it mortifies the body, that the ſpirit may triumph, it is a time of grace which tends to ſalvation and mercy. It imports extremely to commend all to God at the beginning, to ſanctifie this faſting, which is part of our devotion: we muſt abſtain from fleſh and be content with one meal at ſeaſonable hours, without making over-large collations; except age, infirmity, or weakneſs, labour, or neceſſity of other functions, ſhall diſpence with our diet: for thoſe who are unable to faſt, ſuffer more by their diſability, then others do by faſting. It is good to follow the counſel of Athanaſius, who adviſeth to eate late, and little, and at a table where there is but one ſort of meat. We muſt alſo faſt by abſtinence from vice. For to weaken our body, and yet nouriſh our naughty paſſions, is to faſt as the devils do, who eat nothing, and yet devour the world by the rage of their malice. Sobriety is a ſtream which waters all virtues. Our ſoul and body are as the ſcales of a ballance; if you pull down the one, you raiſe up the other: and if you tame your fleſh, it makes the ſpirit reign and govern.

Aſpirations.

O Moſt merciful Lord, Father, and Protectour of all my life, how great are the temptations and ſnares, whereunto I am ſubject, when I eat, drink, ſleep, when I do buſineſs, when I am both in converſation and ſolitude? Whither ſhall this poor ſoul go, which thou haſt thrown into a body ſo frail, in a world ſo corrupt, and amongſt the aſſaults of ſo many pernicious enemies? Open, O Lord, thine eys for my guidance, and compaſſionate my infirmities: without thee I can do nothing, and in thee I can do all that I ought. Give me, O Lord, a piercing eye, to ſee my danger, and the wings of an Eagle, to fly from it, or the heart of a Lion, to fight valiantly, that I may never be wanting in my duty and fidelity to thee. I ow all that I am, or have, to thy gracious favour, and I will hope for my ſalvation, not by any proportion of my own virtues (which are weak and ſlender) but by the boundleſs liberalities, which only do crown all our good works.

The Goſpel upon Munday, the firſt week of Lent, out of Saint Matthew 25.

Of the Judgment-Day.

And when the Son of man ſhall come in his Majeſty, and all the Angels with him, then ſhall he ſit upon the ſeat of his Majeſty. And all Nations ſhall be gathered together before him, and he ſhall ſeparate them one from another, as the Paſtour ſeparateth the ſheep from the goats: And ſhall ſet the ſheep at his right hand, but the goats at his left.

Then ſhall the King ſay to them that ſhall be at his right hand, Come ye bleſſed of my Father, poſſeſs you the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was an hungred, and you gave me to eat: I was athirſt, and you gave me to drink: I was a ſtranger and you took me in: naked, and you covered me: ſick, and you viſited me: I was in priſon, and you came to me. Then ſhall the juſt anſwer him, ſaying, Lord, when did we ſee thee an hungred, and fed thee: athirſt, and gave thee drink? And when did we ſee thee a ſtranger, and took thee in? Or naked, and covered thee? Or when did we ſee thee ſick, or in priſon, and came to thee? And the King anſwering, ſhall ſay to them, Amen I ſay to you, as long as you did it to one of theſe my leaſt brethren, you did it to me.

Then ſhall he ſay to them alſo that ſhall be at his left hand, Get you away from me you curſed into fire everlaſting, which was prepared for the Devil and his Angels. For I was an hungred, and you gave me not to eat: I was athirſt, and you gave me not to drink: I was a ſtranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and you covered me not: ſick and in priſon, and you did not viſit me. Then they alſo ſhall anſwer him, ſaying, Lord, when did we ſee thee an hungred, or athirſt, or a ſtranger, or naked, or ſick, or in priſon, and did not miniſter to thee? Then ſhall he anſwer them, ſaying, Amen I ſay to you, as long as you did it not to one of theſe leſſer, neither did you it to me. And theſe ſhall go into puniſhment everlaſting: but the juſt, into life everlaſting.

Moralities.

1. BEhold here a Goſpel of great terrour, where our ſpirit, like the Dove of Noah, is placed upon the great deluge of God's wrath, and knows not where to find footing. Every thing is moſt dreadful: But what can be more terrible then the certainty of God's judgment, joyned with the great uncertainty of the hour of our death? It is an unchangeable decree, that we muſt all be preſented before the high Tribunal of the living God, to render a juſt account of all which our ſoul hath done, while it was joyned with our body, as we are taught by S. Paul. We muſt make an account of our time ſpent, of our thoughts, words, actions, of that we have done, and that we have omitted, of life, death, and of the blood of Jeſus Chriſt; and thereupon receive a judgment of everlaſting life, or death. All men know that this muſt certainly be done, but no man knows the hour or moment when it ſhall be. So many clocks ſtrike about us every day, and yet none can let us know the hour of our death.

2. O how great is the ſolitude of a ſoul in her ſeparation! from ſo many great enticements of the world (wherein many men live) and in an inſtant to ſee nothing but the good or ill we have done on either ſide us, what an aſtoniſhment will it be for a man ſuddenly to ſee all the actions of his life (as upon a piece of Tapiſtre) ſpred before his eys; where his ſins will appear like ſo many thorns, ſo many ſerpents, ſo many venomous beaſts. Where wil then be that cozening vail of reputation, and reaſon of ſtate, which as yet cover ſo many wicked actions? The ſoul ſhall (in that day of God) be ſhewed naked to all the world, and her own eys will moſt vex her, by witneſſing ſo plainly what ſhe hath done.

3. O what a parting water is God's judgment, which in a moment ſhal ſeparate the mettals ſo different? O what a diviſion will then be made of ſome men which now live upon earth? Some ſhall be made clear and bright like the ſtars of Heaven, and others like coals burning in Hell. O what a dreadful change will it be to a damned ſoul at her ſeparation from this life, to live only in the company of Devils, in that piercing ſenſe of torments and eternal puniſhment? It is a very troubleſom thing, to be tied with ſilken ſtrings in a bed of Roſes, for the ſpace of eight days together. What may we think of a damned ſoul, which muſt dwell in a bed of flames, ſo long as there ſhall be a God.

4. Make uſe of the time given you to work your ſalvation, and live ſuch a life as may end with a happy py death, and so obtain that favourable judgment, which shal say; Come, O thou soul blessed of God my Father, possess the kingdom which is prepared for thee from the beginning of the world. There is no better means to avoid the rigour of Gods judgments, then to fear them continually. Imitate the tree (mentioned in an Emblem) which being designed to make a ship, and finding it self wind-shaken as it grew upon the land, said, What will become of me in the sea? If we be already moved in this world, by the bare consideration of the punishment due to sin, think what it will be in that vast sea, and dreadful Abyss of Gods judgments.

Aspirations.

O King of dreaful Majesty, who dost justly damn and undeservedly save souls; save me, O Fountain of Mercie. Remember thy self (sweet Jesus) that I was the cause of that great journie which thou tookest from God to man; and do not destroy me in that dreadful day, which must decide the Question of my life or death for all eternitie. Take care of my last end, since thou art the cause of my beginning, and the onlie cause of all that I am. O Father of bounties, wouldest thou stop a mouth which desires so earnestlie to praise and confess thee everlastinglie? Alas (O eternal Sweetnes) wouldest thou damn a soul which hath cost thee so much sweat and blood, giving it for ever to those cruel and accursed powers of darknes? Rather, O Lord, pierce my heart with such a fear of thy judgment, that I may always dread, and never feel them. If I forget, awake my memorie, if I flie from thee, recal me again: If I defer my amendment, stay for me; If I return, do not despise my soul, but open those arms of mercie, which thou didst spread upon the Cross, with such rigorous justice against thy self, for satisfaction of my sins

The Gospel upon Tuesday, the first week in Lent, out of Saint Matthew 21.

JESUS drove the Buyers and Sellers out of the Temple.

AND when he was entred Jerusalem, the whole City was moved, saying, Who is this? And the people said, This is Jesus the Prophet, of Nazareth in Galilee. And Jesus entred into the Temple of God, and cast out all that sold and bought in the Temple, and the tables of the bankers, and the chairs of them that sold Pigeons he overthrew: and he said to them, It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer, but you have made it a den of theeves. And there came to him the blinde and the lame in the Temple: and he healed them. And the chief Priests and Scribes seeing the marvellous things that he did, and the children crying in the Temple, and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David: they had indignation, and said to him, Heares thou what these say? And Jesus said to them, Very well; have you never read, that out of the mouthes of infants and sucklings thou hast perfected praise? And leaving them, he went forth out of the City into Bethania, and remained there.

Moralities.

1. JEsus entring in Jerusalem, went streight to the Temple, as a good Son goes to his Fathers house; as a High-Priest to the Sanctuary; and as a sacrifice to the Altar. He doth verie livelie interest himself in the goods of his Heavenlie Father, and chaseth out every prophane thing out of that sacred place, to give thereby glorie to the living God, and to put all things in order. It is a wicked stain to Religion, when Ecclesiastical persons are vicious, and when Churches are prophaned. Saint John Chrysostom saith, That Priests are the heart of the Church, but when they are wicked, they turn all into sin. A decaying tree hath alwaies some ill qualitie about the root, so when any people are without discipline, the Pastours are without virtue. The want of reverence in Churches, begets the contempt of God, they cannot have Jesus in their hearts, when they give him affronts even in his own Temple.

2. His house (saith he) is a house of Praier, but your heart should be the Sanctuarie, and your lips the door. So long as you are without the exercise of Praier, you shal be like a Bee without a sting, which can make neither honie nor wax. Praier is the chiefest and most effectual means of that Angelical conversation, to which God calls us by the merits of his passion, and by the effects of his triumphant resurrection. It is the sacred business which man hath with God, and (to speak with S. Gregory Nazianzen) it is the art, to make our souls divine. Before all things you must put into an order, the number, the time, the place, the manner of your praiers; and be sure that you pay unto God this tribute, with respect, fervour, and perseverance. But if you desire to make a verie good praier, learn betimes to make a praier of all your life. Incense hath no smell without fire, and praier is of no force without charitie. A man must converse innocentlie and purelie with men, that desire to treat worthily with God.

3. Keep your person and your house clean from ill managing all holy things, and from those irreverences, which are sometimes committed in Churches. It is a happie thing for a man to be ignorant of the trade of buying and selling benefices, and to have no intercourse with the tribunals of iniquitie. Manie other sins are written in sand, and blown away with a small breath of Gods mercie; But the faults of so great impietie, are carved upon a corner of the Altar, with a graver of steel, or with a diamond point, as the Prophet saith. He deserves to be made eternallie culpable, who dries up the fountain, which should waste himself, or poisons the stream, which he himself must drink; or contaminates the Sacraments, which are given him to purifie his soul.

Aspirations.

SPirit of God, which by reason of thy eminent height, canst pray to no body, and yet by thy divine wisdom, makest all the world pray to thee; Give me the gift of praier, since it is the mother of wisdom, the seal of virginitie, the sanctuarie for our evils, and fountain of all our goods. Grant that I may adore thee in Spirit with reverence, stedfastnes, and perseverance: and if it be thy divine pleasure that I pray unto thee as I ought; inspire into me (by thy virtue) such praiers as thou wilt hear by thy bountie.

The Gospel for Wednesday the first week of Lent, Saint Matthew 12.

The Pharisees demand a Sign of JESUS.

THEN answered him certain of the Scribes and Pharisees, saying, Master, we would see a sign from thee, who answered, and said to them.

The wicked and adulterous generation seeketh a sign: and a sign shall not be given it, but the sign of Jonas the Prophet: For as Jonas was in the whales belly three days, and three nights: so shal the son of man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights. The men of Nineveh shall rise in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it, because they did penance at the preaching of Jonas, and behold more then Jonas here. The Queen of the south shall rise in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it; because she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold more then Solomon here. And when an unclean spirit shall go out of a man, he walketh through drie places, seeking rest and findeth not. Then he saith, I will return into my house whence I came out. And coming, he findeth it vacant, swept with besoms, and trimmed, then goeth he, and taketh with him seven other spirits, more wicked then himself, and they enter in, and dwell there; and the last of that man be made made worse then the first. So shall it be also to this wicked generation.

As he was yet speaking to the multitudes, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, seeking to speak to him. And one said to him, Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without seeking thee. But he answering him that told him, said, who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And stretching forth his hand upon his Disciples, he said, Behold my mother and my brethren: for whosoever shall do the will of my Father that is in Heaven, he is my brother, sister and mother.

Moralities.

IT is a very ill sign, when we desire signs to make us believe in God. The signs which we demand to fortifie our faith, are oft-times marks of our infidelity. There is not a more dangerous plague in the events of worldly affairs, then to deal with the Devil, or to cast Nativities. All these things fill men with more faults then knowledge. For divine Oracles have more need to be reverenced, then interpreted. He that will find God, must seek him with simplicity, and profess him with piety.

2. Some require a sign, and yet between Heaven and earth, all is full of signs. How many creatures soever they are, they are all steps and characters of the Divinity. What a happy thing it is to study what God is, by the volume of time, and by that great book of the world. There is not so small a flower of the Meadows, not so little a creature upon earth, which doth not tell us some news of him. He speaks in our ears by all creatures, which are so many Organ-pipes to convey his spirit and voice to us. But he hath no sign so great as the Word Incarnate, which carries all the types of his glory and power. About him only should be all our curiosity, our knowledg, our admiration, and our love, because in him we can be sure to find all our repose and consolation.

3. Are we not very miserable, since we know not our own good, but by the loss of it, which makes us esteem so little of those things we have in our hands? The Ninivites did hear old Jonas the Prophet. The Queen of Sheba came from far to hear the wisdom of Solomon. Jesus speaks to us usually from the Pulpits, from the Altars: in our conversations, in our affairs and recreations; and yet we do not sufficiently esteem his words nor inspirations. A surfeited spirit mislikes honey, and is distasted with Manna, raving after the rotten pots of Egypt. But it is the last and worst of all ills, to despise our own good. Too much confidence is mother of an approaching danger: a man must keep himself from relapses, which are worse then sins, which are the greatest evils of the world; he that loves danger, shall perish in it. The first sin brings with it one Devil but the second brings seven. There are some who vomit up their sins, as the Sea doth cockles, to swallow them again. Their life is nothing but an ebbing and flowing of sins, and their most innocent retreats, are a disposition to iniquity. For as boiled water doth soonest freeze, because the cold works upon it with the greater force: so those little fervours of Devotion, which an unfaithful soul feels in confessions, and receiving, (if it be not resolute quite to forsake wickedness) serve for nothing else but to provoke the wicked spirit, to make a new impression upon her. It is then we have most reason to fear God's justice, when we despise his mercy. We become nearest of kin to him, when his Ordinances are followed by our manners, and our life by his precepts.

Aspirations.

O Word Incarnate, the great sign of thy heavenly Father, who carriest all the marks of his glory, and all the characters of his powers. It is thou alone whom I seek, whom I esteem and honour: All that I see, all I understand, all that I feel, is nothing to me, if it do not carry thy name, and take colour from thy beauties, nor be animated by thy Spirit. Thy conversation hath no trouble, and thy presence no distast. O let me never lose by my negligence, what I possess by thy bounty. Keep me from relapses, keep me from the second gulf, and second hell of sin. He is too blind, that profits nothing by experience of his own wickedness, and by a full knowledge of thy bounties.

The Gospel for Thursday, the first week in Lent, out of Saint Matthew 5.

Of the woman of Canaan.

AND Jesus went forth from thence, and retired into the quarters of Tyre and Sidon. And behold a woman of Canaan came forth out of those coasts, and crying out, sayd to him, Have mercy upon me, O Lord, the Son of David, my Daughter is sore vexed of a Devil, who answered her not a word. And his Disciples came and besought him, saying, Dismisse her, because she crieth out after us: And he answering, said; I was not sent but to the sheep that are lost of the house of Israel. But she came and adored him, saying, Lord help me; who answering, said: It is not good to take the bread from Children, and to cast it to the dogs: but she said, Yea Lord, for the dogs also eat of the crums that fall from the tables of their masters. Then Jesus answering, said to her, O woman, great is thy faith, be it done to thee as thou wilt: and her daughter was made whole from that hour.

Moralities.

1. OUr Saviour Jesus Christ, after his great and wondrous descent from heaven to earth; from being infinite to be finite; from being God to be man; used many several means for salvation of the world. And behold entring upon the frontiers of Tyre and Sidon, he was pleased to conceal himself. But it is very hard to avoid the curiosity of a woman, who seeking his presence, was thereby certain to find the full point of her felicity. A very small beam of illumination reflecting upon her, carried her out of her Country, and a little spark of light brought her to find out the clear streams of truth. We must not be tired with seeking God, and when we have found him, his presence should not diminish, but encrease our desire to keep him still. We are to make entrance into our happiness, by taking fast hold of the first means offered for our salvation; and we must not refuse or lose a good fortune which knocks at our door.

2. Great is the power of a woman, when she applies her self to virtue: behold at one instant, how one of that Sex assails God and the Devil, prevailing with the one by submission, and conquering the other by command. And he which gave the wild Sea, arms to contain all the world, finds his own arms tied by the chains of a prayer, which himself did inspire. She draws unto her (by a pious violence) the God of all strength, such was the fervency of her prayer, such the wisdom of her answers, and such the faith of her words. As he passed away without speaking, she hath the boldness to call him to her: whilest he is silent, she prays; when he excuseth himself, she adores him; when he refuseth her suit, she draws him to her. To be short, she is stronger then the Patriarch Jacob, for when he did wrastle with the Angel, he returned lame from the conflict: but this woman, after she had been so powerful with God, returns strait to her house, there to see her victories, and possess her conquests.

3. Mark with what weapons she over-came the greatest of all Conquerours. Charity drew her from home to seek health for her daughter, because like a good mother she loved her not with a luxurious love, but in her affliction, feeling all her dolours, by their passionate reflection upon her heart. Her faith was planted upon so firm a rock, that amongst all the appearances of despair, her hope remained constant. Humility did effect, that the name of Dog was given her for a title of glory, the making profit of injuries, and converting into honour the greatest contempt of her person. Her words were low and humble, but her faith was wondrous high, since in a moment she chased away the devil, saved her daughter, and changed the word Dog, into the name of a Sheep of Christs flock, as Sedulius writes. Perseverance was the last of her virtues in the Combat, but it was the first which gained her Crown. If you will imitate her in these four virtues, Love, Faith, Humility, and Perseverance: they are the principal materials of which the body of your perfection must be compounded.

Aspirations.

O Jesus Christ, Son of David, I remember well that thy forefather did by his Harp chase away the devil from Saul. And wilt not thou, who art the Father of all blessed harmonies, drive away from me so many little spirits, of Affections, of Appetites and Passions, which trouble and discompose my heart? This poor soul, which is the breath of thy mouth, & daughter of thine infinite bounties, is (like the Sun under a cloud) possessed with many wicked spirits, but it hath none worse then that of self love. Look upon me (O Lord) with thine eies of mercy, and send me not away with silence, since thou art the Word. Rather cal me Dog, so that I may be suffered to gather up the crums which fall from thy table: Whatsoever proceeds from thy mouth is sacred, and must be taken by me as a relique. If thou say I shal obtain my desire, I say I wil have no other then what thou inspirest, and I can be contented with nothing, but what shal be thy blessed will and pleasure.

The Gospel upon Friday, the first week in Lent, Saint John 5.

Of the Probatick Pond.

After th ſe things, there was a festival day of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem: and there is at Jerusalem upon Probatica, a Pond, which in Hebrew is named Bethsaida, having five porches. In these lay a great multitude of sick persons, of blind, lame, withered, expecting the stirring of the water.

And an Angel of our Lord descended at a certain time into the Pond; and the water was stirred. And he that had gone down first into the Pond, after the stirring of the water, was made whole, of whatsoever infirmity he was holden. And there was a certain man there, that had been eight and thirty years in his infirmity. Him, when Jesus had seen lying, and knew that he had now a long time, he saith to him, Wilt thou be made whole? The sick man answered him, Lord, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the Pond: for whiles I come, another goeth down before me. Jesus saith to him, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk. And forthwith he was made whole: and he took up his bed, and walked. And it was the Sabbath that day. The Jews therefore said to him that was healed, It is the Sabbath, thou mayest not take up thy bed. He answered them, He that made me whole, he said to me, take up thy bed, and walk. They asked him therefore, What is that man that said to thee, Take up thy bed, and walk? But he that was made whole, knew not who it was. For Jesus shrunk aside from the multitude standing in the place. Afterward Jesus findeth him in the Temple, and said to him. Behold thou art made whole, sin no more, lest some worse thing chance to thee. That man went his way, and told the Jews that it was Jesus that made him whole.

Moralities.

1. ALL the world is but one great Hospital wherein so many persons languish, expecting the moving of the water, and the time of their good fortune. The Angels of earth which govern our fortunes, go not so fast as our desires. But Jesus, who is the great Angel of Counsel, is alwaies ready to cure our maladies, to support our weaknesses, and make perfect our virtues. We need only to follow his motions and inspirations, to meet with everlasting rest. It is a lamentable thing, that some can patiently expect the barren favours of men twenty or thirty years together, and yet will not continue three daies in prayer to seek the inestimable graces of God.

2. The first step we must make toward our salvation, is to desire it. That man is worthy to be eternally sick, who fears nothing else but the loss of his bodily health. Men generally do all what they can possibly, to cure their corporal infirmities, they abide a thousand vexations (which are but too certain) to recover a health, which is most uncertain. And as for the passions of the mind, some love the Feavers of their own love, and their worldly ambition above their own life. They suck the head of a venomous aspick, and are killed by the tongue of a viper. They will not part with that which kills them, and if you take from them the worm which makes them itch, or the executioner who doth indeed torment them, they believe you take away the chiefest of their felicity. Happy is that soul which holds nothing so dear in this world, but will forsake it willingly to find God, and will spare nothing, to gain Paradise.

3. There is nothing more common, nor so rare as man. The world is full of vicious and unprofitable men. But to find one very compleat in all good things, is to find a direct Phœnix. There are more businesses without men, then men without businesses. For how many charitable employments might many lazy and idle persons find out? So many poor mens affairs continue at a stand: so many miserable creatures languish: so many desolate persons long to find some man, who (with little trouble to himself) would take some small care of their affairs, and make up some little piece of their fortunes. Jesus is the man of God desired of all Ages, to him we must apply our selves, since he is both life and truth. By him we may come to all happiness, by him we may live in the fountains and streams of life, and in him we may contemplate the chiefest of all truths.

Aspirations.

WHat patience have I in committing sins, and how impatient am I in my sufferings for them? I am ever most ready to execute vice, and unwilling to abide the punishment. O good God, there are many years in which I have retained an inclination to this disorder, to that sin. My soul is bound, as it were, with iron chains in this unhappy bed: will there be no Angel to move the water for me? But art not thou the Lord and Prince of Angels? Then I must humbly beseech thee (O blessed Saviour) do thou command, and by thy only word my affairs will go well, and receive a happy dispatch, my body will become sound, my soul innocent, my heart at rest, and my life an eternal glory.

The Gospel upon Saturday the first week in Lent, and the Sunday following, out of Saint Matthew 17.

Of the Transfiguration of our Lord.

And after six days, Jesus taketh unto him Peter and James, and John his brother, and bringeth them into a high mountain apart: and he was transfigured before them. And his face did shine as the sun: and his garments became white as snow. And behold there appeared to them, Moses and Elias talking with him. And Peter answering, said to Jesus,

Lord

Lord, it is good for us to be here, if thou wilt, let us make here three Tabernacles, one for thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias. And as he was yet speaking, behold a bright cloud overshadowed them. And lo, a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my well-beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him. And the Disciples hearing it, fell upon their face, and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them: and he said to them, Arise, and fear not. And they lifting up their eys, saw no body but only Jesus. And as they descended from the Mount, Jesus commanded them, saying, Tell the vision to no body, till the Son of man be risen from the dead.

Moralities.

1. THe words of the Prophet Osee are accomplished, the nets and toils planted upon mount Tabor, not to catch birds, but hearts. The mountain which before was a den for Tigers and Panthers (according to the story) is now beautified by our Saviour, and becomes a place full of sweetness and ravishments. Jesus appears transfigured in the high robes of his glory. The cloud made him a pavillion of gold, and the Sun made his face shine like it self. The heavenly Father doth acknowledge his Son as a true Prince of glory; Moses and Elias both appear in brightness, the one bearing the Tables of the Law, and the other carried in a burning Chariot (as Origen saith) which made the Apostles know him. For the Hebrews had certain figures of the most famous men of their Nation in Books. They both (as S. Luke saith) were seen in glory and majesty, which fell upon them by reflection of the beams which came from the body of Jesus, who is the true fountain of brightness. The Apostles lose themselves in the deliciousness of this great spectacle; and by seeing more then they ever did, desired to lose their eyes. O that the world is most contemptible to him, that knows how to value God as he ought. So many fine powders, so many pendents and favours of glass, so many Towers and Columns of dirt plaistred over with gold, are followed by a million of Idolaters. To conclude, so many worldly jewels are like the empty imaginations of a sick spirit, not enlightned by the beams of truth. Let us rely upon the word (saith S. Augustine) which remains for ever, while men passe like the water of a fountain, which hides it self in the Spring, shews it self in the stream, and loseth it self at last in the Sea. But God is always himself, there needs no Tabernacle made by the hands of man, to remain with him; for in Paradise, he is both the God and the Temple.

2. Tabor is yet but a small pattern, we must get all the piece; we must go to the Palace of Angels and brightness, where the Tabernacles are not made by the hands of men. There we shall see the face of the living God clearly and at full: There the beauties shall have no vails to hide them from us: Our Being shall haue no end: Our knowledges will not be subject to errour, nor our loves and affections to displeasure. O what a joy will it be to enjoy all, and desire nothing; to be a Magistrate without a successour, to be a King without an enemy, to be rich without covetousness, to negotiate without mony, and to be ever living without fear of death.

3. But who can get up to this mountain, except he of whom the Prophet speaks? who hath innocent hands and a clean heart, who hath not received his soul of God in vain, to bury it in worldly pelf. To follow Jesus, we must transform our selves into him, by hearing and following his doctrine, since God the Father proposeth him for the Teacher of mankind, and commands us to hearken unto him. We must follow his examples, since those are the Originals of all Virtues. The best trade we can practise in this world, is that of transfiguration: and we may do it by reducing our form to the form of our Lord, and walking upon earth like men in Heaven. Then will the Sun make us have shining faces, when purity shall accompany all our actions and intentions. Our cloaths shall be as white as snow, when we shall once become innocent in our conversations, we shall then be ravished like the Apostles, and after we have been at Mount Tabor, we shall be blind to the rest of the world, and see nothing but Jesus. It is moreover to be noted, that our Saviour did at that time entertain himself with discourse of his great future sufferings, and of his death; to teach us, that his Cross was the step by which he mounted up to beatitude.

Aspirations.

O Blessed Palace! O magnificent Tabor! which this day didst hold upon thee the Prince of glory; I love and admire thee, but I admire somewhat else above thee: It is the Heavenly Jerusalem, that triumphant company, that face of God, where all those beauties are, which shall never cease to be beauties. It is for that I live, for that I die, for that I languish with a holy impatience. O my Jesus, my most benign Lord, transform me then into thee, that I may thereby be transformed into God. If I have carried the earthly Image of Adam, why should I not also carry the form of Jesus? Catch me, O Lord, within those tissued nets, and golden toils of brightness, which thou didst plant upon this sacred mountain. It is there I would leave mine eyes, it is there I resolve to breath out my soul. I ask no Tabernacles to be there built for me, I have long since contemplated thy heart, (O Father of essences and all bounties) as the most faithfull abode of my eternity.

The Gospel upon Munday, the second week in Lent, Saint John 8.

Jesus said to the Jews, where I go, ye cannot come,

AGain therefore Jesus said to them, I go, and you shall seek me, and shall die in your sin. Whither I go you cannot come. The Jews therefore said, Why, will he kill himself, because he saith, whither I go, you cannot come? And he said to them, You are from beneath, I am from above: you are of this world, I am not of this world. Therefore I say to you, That you shall die in your sins. For if you believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins. They said therefore to him, Who art thou? Jesus said to them, The Beginning, who also speak to you: Many things I have to speak and judg of you: but he that sent me, is true: and what I have heard of him, these things I speak in the world. And they knew not that he said to them, that his Father was God. Jesus therefore said to them, When you shall have exalted the Son of man, then you shall know that I am he, and of my self I do nothing, but as the Father hath taught me, these thing I speak: and he that sent me, is with me: and he hath not left me alone, because the things that please him, I do always.

Moralities.

1. ONe of the greatest misfortunes of our life, is, that we never sufficiently know our own good, till we lose it. We flie from that we should seek: we seek that we should avoid, and never begin to bewail our losses, but when they are not to be recovered. Those Jews possessed an inestimable treasure, by the presence and conversation of the Son of God. But they set light by it, and so at last they lamented amongst eternal flames, what they would not see in so clear a light. Let us take heed of despising holy things, and avoid hardness of heart, which is a gulf of unavoidable mischiefs.

2. It is a strange thing that God is so near us, and yet we so far from him. That which hinders us from finding him is, because he is above, and we below.

We are too much for the world; too fast nailed to the earth, too much bound to our superfluous businesses and cares of this life: and too much subject to our own appetites. He must not be slave to his body, that pretends to receive good from God, who is a Spirit. He must not embarque himself deeply into worldly matters, who desires the society of Angels. He must pass from his sense to his reason, from reason to grace, from grace to glory. If you desire to find God, search for him as the three Kings did in the Manger, in his humility. Look for him as the blessed Virgin did, in the Temple, in his piety: Seek him as the Maries did, in his Sepulchre, by the meditation of death: but stay not there, save only to make a passage to life.

3. When you have lifted me up to the Cross, (saith our Saviour) you shall know that I am the true Son of God. And indeed it is a great wonder, that the infinite power of that Divinity, would manifest it self in the infirmity of the Cross. It was only for God to perform this great design, and ascend up to his throne of glory, by the basest disgraces of the world. The good thief saw no other title or sign of his Kingdom, but only his body covered over with blood, and oppressed with dolours. He learned by that book of the Cross, all the glory of Paradise: and he apprehended that none but God could endure with such patience, so great torments. If you will be children of God, you must make it appear by participation of his Cross, and by suffering tribulation. By that Sun, our Eagle tries his young ones; he who cannot abide that shining ray sprinkled with blood, shall never attain to beatitude. It is not comely to see a head crowned with thorns, sit in a rotten chair of delicacies.

Aspirations.

1 O Blessed Saviour, who dost lift up all the earth with three fingers of thy power, raise up a little this painful mass of my body, which weighs down it self so heavily. Give me the wings of an Eagle to flie after thee, for I am constantly resolved to follow thee, whithersoever thou goest: for though it should be within the shadow of death, what can I fear being in the arms of life? I am not of my self, nor of the world, which is so great a deceiver. Since I am thine by so many titles, (which bind me to adoration) I will be so in life, in death, in time, and for all Eternitie. I will take part of thy sufferings, since they are the scarffs of our Christian warfare. Tribulation is a most excellent engine; the more a man is kept under, the higher he mounts: He descends by perfect humility, that he may ascend to thee by the steps of glory.

The Gospel for Tuesday, the second week in Lent, Saint Matthew 23.

Jesus said, The Pharisees sit in Moses chair, believe therefore what they say.

Then Jesus spake to the multitudes, and to his Disciples, saying, Upon the chair of Moses have sitten the Scribes and Pharisees. All things therefore whatsoever they shall say to you, observe ye, and do ye: but according to their works do ye not for they say and do not: for they binde heavy burthens and importable, and put them upon mens shoulders, but with a finger of their own they will not move them. But they do all their works for to be seen of men, for they make broad their Phylacteries, and enlarge their Fringes. And they love the first places at Suppers, and the first chairs in the Synagogues, and salutations in the market-place. and to be called of men, Rabbi: But be not you called Rabbi; for one is your Master, and all you are brethren. And call none father to your self upon earth, for one is your Father, he that is in Heaven; neither be ye called Masters, for one is your Master, Christ: he that is the greater of you, shall be your servitour. And he that exalteth himself shall be humbled: and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

Moralities.

1. IT is a very dangerous errour, to think that our Saviour in this Gospel, had a purpose to introduce an Anarchy, and to make all men equal. He sheweth in many places, that he would have Kings, Princes, Magistrates, Fathers, and Doctours. But he would not have men to come to honours by a vain ambition, nor others to honour them, but only as they have dependency upon the power of God Almighty. Let every soul (saith the Apostle) be subject to higher Powers, for there is no power, but it cometh from God. He gives us Superiours, not for us to judge, but to obey them. If a man cannot approve their manners, he must at least reverence the character of their authority. They should be good Christians for themselves, but they are Superiours for us. He that resisteth their power, doth resist God, who ordained them. And all the great evils happening by heresies and rebellions, proceed from no other fountain, but from contempt of powers established by the decree of heaven. A man may pretend zeal, but there is no better sacrifice then that of obedience. If great persons abuse their offices, God will find it out; and as their dignities are great, so their punishment shall be answerable.

2. One of the greatest disorders of this life is, that we go for the most part outwardly, to please the world, and are little careful of a good inward application of our selves to please God. In stead of taking the way of God's image (from whence we all come) we are content to have virtues only by imagination, and vices in their true essence. Nembroth professed himself a servant of the true God, and yet adored the fire in secret. Jesus hath many worshippers in words, but few in truth. Some stand upon formalities, others upon disguised habits, others amuse themselves about ceremonies, others go as upon certain springs, to make themselves counted wise. Most men would seem what they are not, and much troubled to be seen what they are. All their time doth pass in fashions and countenances; but death and God's judgments take off all those masks.

3. To say, that we have seen a man exteriourly devout and spiritual (except he be so inwardly) is to say, we have seen a house without a foundation, a tree without a root, a vessel move upon the Sea without a bottom, and an excellent clock without a spring. For the same which the foundation is to a house, the root to a tree, the bottom to a ship, and the spring to a clock, the same is a man's interiour life to all virtue. What is a man the better, who resembles window-cushions, which are covered with velvet, and stuft with hay: or to be like the Picture of Diana, in Homer's Iland, which wept to some, and laught to others. A little spark of a good conscience is better then all the lights of the world. Why do we crucifie our selves with so many dissimulations, so many ceremonies, so many enforcements upon our natures, to serve and please men only to get smoak? He that sows wind (saith the Prophet) shall reap a storm. Let us live to our selves in the purity of a good conscience, and of a perfect humility, if we desire to live for ever with God. Those shadows of false devotion proceed from the leaves of that fig-tree, wherewith Adam and Eve covered their nakedness: do not we know that hypocrisy is the same thing to virtue, which painting is to faces? and that it is the very moth which devours sanctity, and will at the day of judgment make all those appear naked, which to the world seem well apparelled.

Aspiration.

Aspiration.

O God of all truth, wherefore are there so many fictions, and counterfeit behaviours? Must we alwaies live to please the eies of others, and run after the shadow of vanity, which leaves nothing but illusion within our eies, and corruption in our manners. I will live unto thee (O fountain of lives) within whom all creatures have life. I will retire my self into my own heart, and negotiate with it by the secret feeling of a good conscience, that I may treat with thee. What need I the eies of men, if I have the eies of God? They alone are sufficient to do me good, since by their aspect they give happiness to all the Saints. I will seek for thee (O my beloved Lord) from the break of day, till the dead time of the night. All places are solitarie where thou art not, and where thou art, there only is the fullness of all pleasures.

The Gospel for Wednesday, the second week in Lent, S. Matth. 20.

The Request of the Wife of Zebedee, for her sons James and John.

And Jesus going up to Jerusalem, took the twelve Disciples secretly, and said to them, Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man shal be delivered to the chief Priests, and to the Scribes, and they shal condemn him to death, and shal deliver him to the Gentiles, to be mocked, and scourged, and crucified, and the third day he shal rise again.

Then came to him the mother of the Sons of Zebedee, with her sons, adoring and desiring something of him: who said to her, What wilt thou? She saith to him, Say that these my two sons may sit one at thy right hand, and one at thy left hand in thy Kingdom. And Jesus answering, said, You know not what you desire. Can ye drink of the cup that I shal drink of? They say to him, We can. He saith to them, My cup indeed you shal drink of: but to sit at my right hand and left, is not mine to give to you, but to whom it is prepared of my Father.

Moralities.

1. WHat a short life have we, and yet such large and vast ambitions? We fear everie thing like mortal men, and yet desire all, as if we should be immortal upon earth. It is a strang thing to observe how the desire of honour slides even amongst the most refined devotions. Some one is counted an Angel of Heaven amongst men, who hath not forsaken his pretence upon earth. Ambition sleeps in the bosoms of persons consecrated for the Altars. It overthrows some whom luxurie could not stir; and moves those whom avarice could not touch. We desire all to be known, and to seem what we are not: but this seeming is that which doth bewitch us. All passions grow old and weaker by age; only the desire of worldly riches and honours, is a shirt which we never put off, till we come to the grave. Why do we so extreamly torment our poor life, by running after this shadow of honour, which we cannot follow without trouble, nor possess without fear, nor lose without sorrow? Is it not a strange folly, that men love such vanities, till the very last instant of their own ruins, and fear nothing, so they may tumble into precipices of gold and silver?

2. What great pains you take for these children, as if they did not more belong to God then you: you cast day and night where to place them, when the Providence of God (which is the great Harbinger of the world) hath already markt their lodgings. One is setled in a good Religious course, another in the grave, another perhaps shal have more then is necessary to make him a good man. Eve imagined that her son Cain (having all the world) would have become some great god, when ambition made him a devil incarnate. You shal rarely make your children great Saints, by getting them great honours. You desire they should possess all that which overthrows them; and pretending to make a building with one hand, you destroy it with the other. By all your earnest wishes; and all your laborious endeavours (for advancement of your children) you effect nothing, but thereby give them enticements to pleasure, and weapons for iniquity.

3. Whereupon should we build our ambitions, if not upon the bloud of the holy Lamb? At the foot of the Cross we behold a God covered with bloud, crowned with thorns and reproaches, who warns us to be humble; and at the same time we eagerly pursue worldly glory and ambition: We resemble that unhappy daughter of Miltiades, who did prostitute her self under her fathers Tropheys. By our unmeasurable hunting after honours, amongst the ignominies of Jesus Christ, we abandon our selves to dishonour, and make no other use of the Cross, but only to be a witness of our infidelity.

Aspirations.

AVoid, be gone you importunate cares of worldly goods and honours! you little tyrants, which burn the bloud within our veins, and fill the most innocent pleasures of our life, with bitter sorrows, what have I more to do with you? My children shal be what God will. They shal be but too rich, when they have virtue for their portion, and but too high, when they shal see a true contempt of the world under their feet. God forbid that I should go about any worldly thron upon the holy Lambs bloud, or that I should talk of honours, when there is mention made of the holy Cross, O Jesus, thou father of all true glories, thou shalt from henceforth be my only crown. All greatness where thou art not, shal to me be only baseness, I will mount up to thee by the stairs of humility, since by those thou camest down to me. I will kiss the paths of Mount Calvary, which thou hast sprinkled with thy precious bloud, and esteem the Cross above all worldly things, since thou hast consecrated it by thy cruel pains; and brought us forth upon that dolorous bed, to the day of thy eternity.

The Gospel upon Thursday, the second week in Lent, out of Saint Luke 16.

Of the rich Glutton, and poor Lazarus.

THere was a certain rich man, and he was clothed with purple and silk, and he fared every day magnifically. And there was a certain beggar called Lazarus, that lay at his gate full of sores, desiring to be filled of the crums that fell from the rich mans table, but the dogs also came, and licked his sores. And it came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried of the Angel into Abraham's bosom. And the rich man also died, and he was buried in hell, and lifting up his eys, when he was in torments, he saw Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he crying, said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger into water, to cool my tongue, because I am tormented in this flame. And Abraham, said to him, Son, remember that thou didst receive good things in thy life time, and Lazarus, likewise evil: but now he is comforted, and thou tormented. And And besides all these things, between us and you there is fixed a great Chaos: that they which will pass from hence to you, may not, neither go from thence hither. And he said, Then father, I beseech thee that thou wouldest send him unto my fathers house, for I have five brethren, for to testifie unto them, lest they also come into this place of torments. And Abraham said to them, They have Moses and the prophets: let them hear them. But he said, No, father Abraham, but if some man shall go from the dead to them, they will do penance. And he said to him, If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither if one shall rise again from the dead, will they believe.

Morali-

Moralities.

1. A Rich man and a poor meet in this world, the one loaden with treasures, the other with ulcers. They both meet in the other world, the one in a gulf of fire, the other in Abyss of delights: Their ends are as different, as their lives were contrary: to teach us, that he which shall consider rightly, the end of all worldly sins and vanities, will have in horrour the desire of them. And as there is nothing, for which goodly poor men may not hope, so is there nothing, which wicked rich men should not fear. He that is proud of riches, is proud of his burdens and chains, but if he unload them upon the poor, he will be eased of his pain, and secured in his way.

2. The life of man is a marvellous Comedy wherein the greatest part of our actions are plaid under a curtain, which the Divine Providence draws over them, to cover us. It concealed poor Lazarus, and kept him in obscurity, like the fish, which we never see till it be dead. But Jesus draws the curtain, and makes himself the historian of this good poor man, shewing us the state of his soul, of his body, of his life and death. He makes him appear in Abraham's bosom, as within the temple of rest and happiness, and makes him known to the rich man, as to the treasurer of hells riches. Are we not unworthy the name which we carry, when we despise the poor, and hate poverty, as the greatest misery? since the Son of God having once consecrated it upon the throne of his manger, made it serve for his spouse during life, and his bride-maid at the time of his death.

3. This rich glutton dreamed, and at the end of his dream found himself buried in hell. All those pomps of his life, were scattered in an instant, as so many nocturnal illusions, and his heart filled with eternal grief and torment. His first misery is a sudden, unexpected, and hideous change, from a huge sea of delicacies, into an insufferable gulf of fire: where he doth acknowledge, that one of the greatest vexations in misery, is to have been happy. Another disaster which afflicts him, is to see Lazarus in Abraham's bosom; to teach us, that the damned are tormented by Paradise, even to the very lowest part of hell; and that the most grievous of their torments, is, they can never forget their loss of God. So saith Theophylact, that Adam was placed over against the terrestrial Paradise, from whence he was banished, that in his very punishment, he might see the happiness he had lost by his foul fault. Now you must add to the rest of his sufferings, the great Chaos which (like a diamond wall) is between hell and Paradise, together with the privation of all comfort; those losses without remedy; that wheel of eternity; where death lasteth for ever, and the end begins again without ceasing, and the torments can never fail or diminish.

4. Do good with those goods which God hath given you, and suffer them not to make you wicked; but employ your riches by the hands of virtue: If gold be a child of the Sun, why do you hide him from his father? God chose the bosom of rich Abraham, to be the Paradise of poor Lazarus. So may you make the needy feel happiness by your bounty; your riches shall raise you up, when they are trodden under feet. The Prophet saith, you must sow in the field of Alms, if you desire to reap in the mouth of Mercy.

Aspirations.

O God of Justice, I tremble at the terrour of thy judgments. Great fortunes of the world (full of honour and riches) are fair trees, oft-times the more ready for the axe: Their weight makes them apt to fal, and prove the more unhappy fuel for eternal flames. O Jesus, father of the poor, and King of the rich, I most humbly beseech thee, never give my heart in prey to covetousness, which (by loading me with land) may make me forget Heaven. I know that death must consume me to the very bones, and I shal then possess nothing, but what I have given for thee. Must I then live in this world (like a Griffin) to board up much gold, and silver whereof I shall never have use, and still be vexed with care how to preserve it? O most merciful Lord, suffer me not to be taught by hell fire, that which I may have neglected to learn out of thy Gospel. I most heartily renounce all luxury and pomp of the world, and this carnal life, which would always busie it self about my body. If thou be pleased to make me rich, I will be so for the poor; and if thou make me poor, I will make my self rich in thee, who art the true riches of all thine elect.

The Gospel upon Friday, the second week in Lent, Saint Matthew 21.

Of the Master of a Vineyard, whose son was killed by his Farmers.

Another Parable hear ye: A man there was, an housholder, who planted a Vineyard, and made an hedge round about it, and digged in it a press, and builded a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went forth into a strange Country. And when the time of fruits drew nigh, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, to receive the fruits thereof. And the husbandmen apprehending his servants, one they beat, another they they killed, and another they stoned. Again, he sent other servants, more then the former; and they did to them likewise. And last of all, he sent to them his Son, saying, They will reverence my Son. But the husbandmen seeing the Son, said within themselves, This is the heir, come, let us kill him, and we shall have his inheritance. And apprehending him, they cast him forth out of the Vineyard, and killed him. When therefore the Lord of the Vineyard shall come, what will he do to those husbandmen? They say to him, The naughty men he will bring to naught: and his Vineyard he will let out to other husbandmen, that shall render him the fruit of their seasons.

Jesus saith to them, Have you never read in the scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is made into the head of the corner? By our Lord was this done, and it is marvellous in our eys. Therefore I say to you, That the Kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a Nation, yielding the fruits thereof. And he that falleth upon this stone, shall be broken: and on whom it falleth, it shall all to bruise him. And when the chief Priests and Pharisees had heard his Parables, they knew that he spake of them. And seeking to lay hands upon him, they feared the multitudes: because they held him as a Prophet.

Moralities.

WE have reason to fear all that is in us, yea, even the gifts of God: All his favours are so many chains; if they bind us not to do our duty, they will bind us to the punishment due for that neglect. Our soul is given us by God, as a thing borrowed from Heaven, we must not be too prodigal of it. We must dig up ill roots, as we do in land cultivated: The time will come, that we must render up the fruits; and shall we then present thorns? Examine every day how you profit, and what you do: draw every day a line, but draw it toward eternity. What can you hide from God who knows all? What can you repay to God who gives all? and how can you requite Jesus who hath given himself?

2. How many messengers doth God send to our hearts without intermission, and how many inspirations which we reject? So many Sermons which we do not observe, & so many examples which we neglect. Jesus comes in person by the Sacrament of the Altar, and we drive him from us, to crucify him, when when we place the Devil and mortal sin in his room. What other thing can we expect for reward of all these violences, but a most fearful destruction, if ye do not prevent the sword of justice, by walking in the paths of mercy? Our vanities, which at first are like small threads, by the contempt of God's grace come to be great cables of sin. He that defers his repentance is in danger to lose it, and will be kept out of the Ark, with the croaking Raven, since he hath neglected the mourning of the sorrowful Dove.

3. It is a most horrible thing, to see a soul left to it self, after it hath so many times forsaken the inspirations of God. It becomes a desolate Vineyard, without inclosure. The wild Boar enters into it, and all unclean and ravenous creatures do there sport and leap without controle. God hangs clouds over it, but will let no drop of water fall upon it. The Sun never looks upon it with a loving eye: all there is barren, venomous, and near to Hell. Therefore above all things we must fear to be forsaken of God. Mercy provoked, changes it self into severe Justice. All creatures will serve (as God's instruments) to punish a fugitive soul, which flies from him by her ingratitude, when he draws her to him by the sweetness of his benefits.

Aspirations.

Alas, O great Father of the world's family, I am confounded to see thy Vineyard so ill ordered, made so barren, and spoiled. My passions domineer like wild beasts, and devours the fruits due to thy bounty. I am heartily sorry I have so little esteemed thy graces, and to have preferred all that, which makes me contemptible before thee. I do this day renounce all the abuses of my soul. I will grow and prosper under thy blessings: I will flourish under thy aspect, and fructifie under thy protection. Command only thy graces and sweet dews of Heaven (which are as paps of thy favours) to rain upon me, and water this rotten trunk of my heart. Speak to that eye of love that beautiful eye of Jesus, that it will shine upon me but once with that ray, which doth make souls happy for ever.

The Gospel upon Saturday, the second week in Lent, S Luke 15.

Of the prodigal Child.

And he said, A certain man had two sons; and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of substance that belongeth to me; and he divided unto them the substance. And not many days after, the youngest son gathering all his things together, went from home into a far Country, and there he wasted his substance, living riotously. And after he had spent all, there fell a sore famine in that Country, and he began to be in need: and he went and cleaved to one of the Citizens of that Country, and he sent him into his Farm to feed Swine. And he would fain have filled his belly of the husks that the Swine did eat, and no body gave unto him. And returning to himself, he said; How many of my father's hirelings have abundance of bread, and I here perish for famine? I will arise, and will go to my father, and say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, I am not now worthy to be called thy son, make me as one of thy hirelings. And rising up, he came to his father, and when he was yet far off, his father saw him, and was moved with mercy, and running to him, fell upon his neck and kissed him. And his son said to him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, I am not now worthy to be called thy son. And the father said to his servants, Quickly bring forth the first stole, and do it on him, and put a Ring upon his hand, and Shoes upon his feet, and bring the fatted Calf, and kill it, and let us eat and make merry, because this my son was dead, and is revived, was lost, and is found. And they began to make merry. But his elder son was in the field, and when he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard musick and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things should be? And he said to him, Thy brother is come, and thy father hath killed the fatted Calf, because he hath received him safe. But he had indignation, and would not go in. His father therefore going forth, began to desire him. But he answering, said to his father, Behold, so many years do I serve thee, and I never transgressed thy commandment, and thou didst never give me a Kid to make merry with my friends. But after that thy son, this, that hath devoured his substance with whores, is come, thou hast killed for him the fatted Calf. But he said to him, Son, thou art always with me, and all my things are thine. But it behoved us to make merry and be glad, because this thy brother was dead, and is revived; was lost, and is found.

Moralities.

1. THis parable is a true table, expressing the excursions of a prodigal soul, and her return to the mercy of God, by the way of repentance. Note, that the first step which she trode toward her own destruction (as Cain did) was her departing from God, not by changing of place, but of heart. It departed from the chiefest light, which made it fall into an eclipse of reason, and so into profound darkness. She diverted her self from the greatest bounty, which made her incline toward all wickedness, (being straied from her Sovereign being) which made her become just nothing.

2. She continued in sin, as in a Country which was just nothing, where she was vexed on all sides with disquiet, with cares, with fears and discontents. All sins toss their followers, as the ball is tossed at Baloon. Vanity sends them to pride: pride to violence: violence to avarice: avarice to ambition: ambition to pomp and riot: pomp to gluttony: gluttony to luxury: luxury to idleness: idleness to contempt and poverty: and that poverty brings them to all worldly misery. For all mischiefs follow a wicked soul, which departing from God, thinks to find a better condition.

3. Affliction opens the eys of man, and makes him come to himself, that he may the better return to God. There is no journey so far, as when a man departs from himself, not by place but my manners. A Sea of licentiousness interposeth it self between his soul and innocence, to divorce her from the way of goodness. But God's grace is a burning wind, which dries it up; and having brought man to himself, takes him by the hand, and leads him even to God.

4. O what a happy thing it is, to consider the effects of God's mercy in the entertainment of the good father, to his prodigal son. The one had lost all which he had of a good son: but the other had not lost what belonged to a good father. The son had yet said nothing, when fatherly affection pleaded for him in the heart of his father, who felt the dolours of a spiritual labour, and his entrails were moved to give a second birth to his son. Though he were old, yet he went the pace of a young man. Charity gives him wings to fly to the embracements of his lost child. He is most joyful of that comes with him, even of his very poverty. This without doubt, should give us a marvellous confidence in Gods mercy, when we seek it with hearty repentance. It is a Sea of bounty, which washeth away all that is amiss. Since he hath changed the name of master, into that of father, he will rather command by love, then reign by a predominant power. No man ought to despair of pardon, except he, who can be as fully wicked, as God is good: none is so merciful as God, none is so good a father as he: for when you may have lost your part of all his virtues, you can never (while you live) lose the possibility of his mercy. He will receive you between his arms without any other reason, but your return by repentance.

5. The same Parable is also a true glass, shewing the the life of those young unthrifts, who think they are born onely for sport, for their bellies, and for pleasure. They imagine their Fathers keep for them the golden mines of Peru, and their life being without government, their expences are without measure. Some of them run through the world, they wander into all places, but never enter into consideration of themselves. They return from forrain parts loaden with debts, and bring home nothing but some new fantastical fashions, cringes, and corantoes. There are many of them in whom pride and misery continue inseparable, after they have lost their mony and their brains. Their Fathers are causes of their faults, by gathering so much wealth for those, who know not how to use it. Yet if they have the true repentance of the prodigal child, he must not deny them pardon: But mercy must not be had of those who ask it by strong hand, or seek it by a counterfeit sorrow.

Aspirations.

IT is an accursed wandring to travel into the country of nothing, where pleasure drops down as water from a storm; the miserable consequences whereof have leaden feet, which never remove from the heart. Good God what a country is that, where the earth is made of quick-silver, which steals it self from under our feet, when we think to tread upon it. What a country is that, where if a man gather one bud of roses, he must be forced to eat a thousand thorns, and be companion with the most nasty, filthy beasts in their stinking ordures, and be glad to eat of their loathsom draffe for want of other meat. Alas, I have surfeited, and such a misery as this, is necessary to make me remember the happinesse which I possessed in thy house: O mercifull Father, behold my prodigal soul which returns to thee and will have no other advocate but thy goodnes; which as yet pleads for me within thy heart. I have consumed all which I had, but I could not consume thy mercy. For that is as an Abyss which surpasseth that of my sins and miseries. Receive me as a mercenary servant, if I may not obtain the name of a son. Why shouldest not thou receive that which is thine, since the wicked spirits have taken that which was not theirs? Either shew me mercy, or else shew me a heart more fatherly then thine, and if neither earth nor heaven can find the like, to whom wouldst thou have me go but to thy self, who doest not yet cease to call me?

The Gospel upon the third Sunday in Lent, S. Luke 11.

Jesus cast out the Devil which was dumb.

AND he was casting out a devil, and that was dumb. And when he had cast out the devil, the dumb spake, and the multudes marvelled. And certain of them said, in Belzebub the Prince of Devils he casteth out Devils. And others tempting, asked him a sign from Heaven. But he seeing their cogitations, said to them: Every Kingdom divided against it self, shall be made desolate, and house upon house shall fall. And if Satan also be divided against himself, how shall his Kingdom stand? because you say, that in Belzebub I do cast out Devils. And if I in Belzebub cast out Devils; your children, in whom do they cast out? Therefore they shall be your judges. But if I in the finger of God do cast out Devils, surely the Kingdom of God is come upon you. When the strong armed keepeth his court, those things are in peace that he possesseth; but if a stronger then he come upon him, and overcome him, he will take away his whole armour, wherein he trusted, and will distribute his spoils. He that is not with me, is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth. When the unclean spirit shall depart out of a man, he wandreth through places without water, seeking rest; and not finding, he saith, I will return into my house whence I departed. And when he is come, he findeth it swept with a besom, and trimmed. Then he goeth and taketh seven other spirits worse then himselfs, and entring in, they dwell there. And the last of that man be made worse then the first.

And it came to passe, when he said these things, a certain woman lifting up her voice out of the multitude, said to him, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that thou didst suck. But he said, yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it.

Moralities.

1. THe Almond-tree is the first which begins to flourish, and it is often first nipt with frost. The tongue is the first thing which moves in a mans body, and is soonest caught with the [illegible] of Satan. That man deserves to be [illegible] all his life, who never speaks a word bet[illegible] silence.

2. Jesus, the eternal word of God, came upon earth to reform the words of man: his life was a lightning, and his word a thunder, which was powerfull in effect, but always measured within his bounds. He did fight against ill tongues in his life, and conquered them all in his death. The gall and vinegar which he took to expiate the sins of this unhappy tongue, do shew how great the evil was, since it did need so sharp a remedy. He hath cured by suffering his dolours, what it deserved by our committing sins. Other vices are determined by one act, the tongue goes to all: it is a servant to all malicious actions, and is generally confederate with the heart in all crimes.

3. We have just so much Religion as we have government of our tongues: A little thing serves to tame wild beasts, and a small stern will serve to govern a ship? Why then cannot a man rule so small a part of his body? It is not sufficient to avoid lying, perjuries, quarrels, injuries, slanders and blasphemies, such as the Scribes and Pharisees did vomit out in this Gospel against the purity of the Son of God: We must also repress idle talk, and other frivolous and unprofitable discourses. There are some persons who have their hearts so loose, that they cannot keep them within their brests, but they will quickly swim upon their lips, without thinking what they say, and so make a shift to wound their souls.

4. I mitate a holy Father called Sisus, who prayed God thirty years together every day to deliver him from his tongue, as from a capitall enemy. You shall never be very chaste of your body, except you do very well bridle your tongue. For looseness of the flesh proceeds sometimes from liberty of the tongue: Remember your self that your heart should go like a clock, with all the just and equal motions of his springs; and that your tongue is the finger, which shews how all the hours of the day passe. When the heart goes of one side, and the tongue of another, it is a sure desolation of your spirits Kingdom. If Jesus set it once at peace and quiet, you must be very careful to keep it so, and be very fearfull of relapses. For the multiplying of long continued sins, brings at last hell it self upon a mans shoulders.

Aspirations.

O Word incarnate, to whom all just tongues speak, and after whom all hearts do thirst and languish; chase from us all prating devils, and also those which are dumb: the first provoke and loose the tongue to speak wickedly, and the other bind it when it should confesse the truth. O peace-making Solomon, appease the divisions of my heart, and unite all my powers to the love of thy service. Destroy in me all the marks of Satans Empire, and plant there there thy Tropheys and Standards, that my ſpirit be never like thoſe devils which ſeek for reſt, but ſhall never find it. Make me preſerve inviolable the houſe of my conſcience, which thou haſt cleanſed by repentance, and cloathed with thy graces: that I may have perſeverance to the end without relapſes, and ſo obtain happineſs without more need of repentance

The Goſpel upon Munday, the third week in Lent, Saint Luke 4.

Jeſus is required to do Miracles in his own Countrey.

AND he ſaid to them Certes, you will ſay to me this ſimilitude, Phyſitian cure thy ſelf: as great things as we have heard done in Capernaum, do alſo here in thy Countrey. And he ſaid, Amen, I ſay to you, that no Prophet is accepted in his own Countrey. In truth I ſay to you, there were many widows in the days of Elias in Iſrael, when the heaven was ſhut three years and ſix months, when there was a great famine made in the whole earth; and to none of them was Elias ſent, but into Sarepta of Sidon, to a widow woman. And there were many Lepers in Iſrael under Eliæus the Prophet, and none of them made clean but Naaman the Syrian. And all in the Synagogue were filled with anger, hearing theſe things. And they roſe, and caſt him out of the City: and they brought him to the edge of the hill whereupon their City was built, that they might throw him down head long. But he paſſing through the midſt of them, went his way.

Moralities.

1. THE malignity of mans nature undervalueth all that which it hath in hand, and little eſteems many neceſſary things, becauſe they are common. The Sun is not counted rare, becauſe it ſhines every day, and the elements are held contemptible, ſince they are common to the poor as wel as the rich. Jeſus was deſpiſed in his own Countrey, becauſe he was there known to all the world, and the diſdain of that ungrateful Nation cloſed the hands of his great bounty. Is it not a great unhappineſs to be weary and tired with often communicating? to be wicked becauſe God is good? and to ſhut up our ſelves cloſe, when he would impart himſelf to us? Men make little account of great benefits and ſpiritual helps, for that they have them preſent. They muſt loſe thoſe favours to know them well, and ſeek outrageouſly without effect, what they have kickt away with contempt, becauſe it was eaſily poſſeſt.

2. The choices and elections of God are not to be comprehended within our thoughts, but they ſhould be adored by our hearts. He is Maſter of his own favours, and doth what he will in the Kingdoms of Nature, Grace, and Glory. He makes veſſels of Potters earth, of gold and ſilver. He makes Holy-dayes and working-days (ſaith the Wiſeman) his liberalities are as free to him, as his thoughts. We muſt not examine the reaſon why he doth elevate ſome, and abaſe others. Our eye muſt not be wicked, becauſe his heart is good. Let us content our ſelves that he loves the humble, and to know that the loweſt place of all, is moſt ſecure. No man is made reprobate without juſtice, no man is ſaved without mercy. God creates men to repair in many, that which he hath made; and alſo to puniſh in the perſons of many, that which he hath not made.

3. Jeſus doth not cure his brethren; and yet cures ſtrangers; to ſhew, that his powers are not tied to any nation, but his own will. So likewiſe the graces of God are not to be meaſured according to the nature of him who receives them, but by the pure bounty of him who gives them. The humility of ſome doth call him, when the preſumption of others doth eſtrange him. The weak grounds of a dying law, did no good to the Jews, who diſdained the grace of Jeſus Chriſt. And that diſdain deprived them of their adoption, of the glory of the New Teſtament, of all the promiſes, and of all Magiſtracy. They loſt all, becauſe they would keep their own wills. Let us learn by the grace of God to deſire earneſtly that good, which we would obtain effectually. Perſons diſtaſted and ſurfetted, cannot advance much in a ſpiritual life. And he that ſeeks after perfection coldly, ſhall never find it.

Aſpirations.

THy beauties (moſt ſweet Jeſus) are without ſtain, thy goodneſs without reproach, and thy converſation without importunity. God forbid I ſhould be of the number of thoſe ſouls which are diſtaſted with Manna, and languiſh after the onions of Egypt. The more I taſte thee, the more I incline to do thee honour. Familiarity with an infinite thing, begets no contempt but onely from thoſe whom thou doeſt deſpiſe for their own faults. O what high ſecrets are thy favours. O what Abyſſes are thy graces. We may wiſh and run: But except thou cooperate, nothing is done. If thou ceaſe to work, all is undone. I put all my happineſs into thy hands: It is thou alone which knoweſt how to chuſe what we moſt need by thy Sovereign wiſdom, and thou giveſt it by thy extream bounty.

The Goſpel upon Tueſday, the third week in Lent, S. Matth. 18.

If thy brother offend thee, tell him of it alone.

BUT if thy Brother ſhall offend againſt thee, go and rebuke him between thee and him alone: if he ſhall hear thee, thou ſhalt gain thy brother, and if he will not hear thee, joyn with thee beſides, one or two, that in the mouth of two or three witneſſes every word may ſtand. And if he will not hear them, tell the Church; and if he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the Heathen and the Publican. Amen, I ſay to you, whatſoever ye ſhall bind upon earth, ſhall be bound alſo in heaven: and whatſoever ye ſhall looſe upon earth, ſhall be looſed alſo in heaven. Again I ſay to you, that if two of you ſhall conſent upon earth, concerning every thing whatſoever they aſk, it ſhall be done to them of my Father which is in heaven: for where there be two or three gathered in my name, there am I in the midſt of them. Then came Peter unto him, and ſaid, Lord, how often ſhall my brother offend againſt me and I forgive him? until ſeven times? Jeſus ſaid to him, I ſay not to thee until ſeven times but until ſeventy times ſeven times.

Moralities.

1. THE heavens are happy that they go always in one meaſure, and in ſo great a revolution of ages do not make one falſe ſtep: but man is naturally ſubject to fail: He is full of imperfections, and if he have any virtues, he carries them like duſt againſt the wind, or ſnow againſt the ſun. This is the reaſon which teaches him that he needs good advice.

2. It is ſomewhat hard to give right correction, but much harder to receive it profitably. Some are ſo very fair ſpoken, that they praiſe all which they ſee, and becauſe they will find nothing amiſs, they are ordinarily good to no body. They ſhew to thoſe whom they flatter, their virtues in great, and their faults in little; they will ſay to thoſe who are plunged in great diſorders, they have no other fault, but that they are not ſufficiently careful of their own health. Others do correct with ſuch ſharpneſs and violence, that they wound their own hearts to cure other mens, and ſeem to have a greater minde to pleaſe their own paſſions, then to amend thoſe whom they would inſtruct. Correction ſhould be accompanied with ſweetneſs, but it muſt carry withall a little vigour to make a right temper, and to keep a mean between ſoftneſs and auſterity. Jeſus in the Prophet Iſaiah is called both a rod and a flower: to ſhew us (according to Origen) that he carries ſe-verity mingled with sweetness; to use either of them according to the diversity of persons.

3. It is not a very easie thing to receive brotherly correction patiently, we are so far in love with being well thought of. And after we have lost the tree of life, (which is virtue it self) we would keep the bark of it, which is onely reputation. All shadows proceed from those bodies upon which somewhat shines; honour is the child of a known virtue: and many, when they cannot get one lawfull, are willing to have a Bastard. This is the cause, why so many resemble those serpents, which requite them with poison, who sing to them pleasant songs. Whatsoever is spoken to instruct them, makes them passionate, and dart out angry speeches against those, who speak to them mild and gentle words of truth, and tending to their salvation. Rest assured, you can never get perfection, except you count it a glory to learn, and discover your own imperfections.

4. There is nothing of more force then the prayers of just men: which are animated by the same spirit, and cemented together with perfect concord. They are most powerful both in heaven and earth. When they desire what God will, they are always heard; if not according to the wishes of their own nature, yet according to the greater profits of his grace. He is always happy, who hath that which he would; because he knows how to wish what is fitting, and finds means to obtain what he desires by reason of his abstinence from coveting that which cannot be had.

5. We must not offer to limit our goodness, but as it comes from an infinite God, we should make it as near, being infinite, as we can. He gives the lie to virtues, who will reduce them to a certain number. We must never be weary of well doing, but imitate the nature of celestial things, which never make any end but to begin again.

Aspiration.

O God, what spots are in my soul, and how little do I look into my own imperfections? Wilt thou never shew me to my self, (for some good time) that I may cure my self by horrour of seeing what I am, since I do so often wound my self, by being too indulgent to my own naughty affections. It is a great offence to break the glass which representeth me to my self by brotherly correction, & to think, I shall commit no more sins when no body will take liberty to reprove me. I will humble my self to the very dust, and mount up to thy glory by contempt of my own baseness: Alas, must my soul be always so far in love with it self, that it cannot suffer the remonstrance of a friend? how will it then endure the tooth of an enemy? what can she love being so partial to her self, if she do not love most ugly darkness, O my redoubted Master, I fear thine eyes which see those obscurities, which the foolish world takes to be brightness. If I cannot be always innocent, make me at least acknowledg my self faulty, that I may know my self as I am, to the end thou mayest know me for an object capable of thy mercy.

The Gospel upon Wednesday the third week in Lent, S. Matthew 15.

The Pharisees asked Jesus, Why do thy Disciples contradict ancient Traditions

THen came to him from Jerusalem, Scribes, and Pharisees saying, Why do thy Disciples transgress the tradition of the ancients? For they wash not their hands when they eat bread. But he answering, said to them, Why do you also transgress the commandment of God for your tradition? For God said, Honour Father and Mother: and he that shall curse father or mother, dying let him dy. But you say, Whosoever shall say to father or mother, The gift whatsoever proceedeth from me, shall profit thee, and shall not honour his father or his mother: and you have made frustrate the Commandment of God for your own tradition. Hypocrites, well hath Esaiah prophesied of you, saying, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. And in vain do they worship me, teaching doctrins and commandments of men.

And having called together the multitudes unto him, he said to them, Hear ye and understand, Not that which entreth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, that defileth a man. Then came his Disciples and said to him, Dost thou know, that the Pharisees when they heard this word, were scandalized? But he answering, said, All planting which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Let them alone; blind they are, guides of the blind: and if the blind be guide to the blind, both fall into the ditch. And Peter answering, said to him, Expound us this Parable But he said, Are you also as yet without understanding? Do you not understand, that all that entreth into the mouth, goeth into the belly, and is cast forth into the privy? But the things that proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart, and those things defile a man. For from the heart come forth evil cogitations, murders, adulteries, fornications, theefts, false testimonies, blasphemy: These are the things that defile: but to eat with unwashen hands, doth not defile a man.

Moralities.

1. THe spirit of man is wretched, and makes it self businesse by being disquieted with petty little things: and tormenting it self with formalities, whiles it lives in a deep neglect of all that, which is most essential to her salvation. The Pharisees did place their perfections in washing themselves every hour of the day in bearing writs of the Law upon their foreheads, and thorns upon their heels, but made no scruple to take away the honour due to fathers and mothers from their children: to make spoil of the world by a ravenous avarice (which took upon it the appearance of piety) and to give up innocent blood under the shew of justice. The world doth now furnish it self with such like devotions. Some make it a sin to look upon a fair flower with delight: to eat with a good appetite: to drink cool wine in hot weather: to burn a paper, upon which the name of Jesus is written: to tread upon two straws that lie a cross. But to set money to usury, to remember injuries for ever, to keep a poor workmans wages, to oppress the weak, to accuse the innocent, to spoil miserable persons: These are the little sins which pass for virtues in this world. Assure your self that such proceedings are abominable before God; and there can be no better devotion in the world, then to have a true and right feeling of God, and to live in honesty, not sophisticated, but such as is produced out of the pure lights of nature. The conscience of hypocrites is a spiders web, whereof no garment can ever be made. Hypocrisie is a very subtil fault, and a secret poison, which kils other virtues with their own swords.

2. Jesus is our great master, who hath abridged six hundred and thirteen Precepts of the old Testament within the Law of love. Do but love (saith Saint Augustine) and do what you will: but then your love must go to the right fountain, which is the heart of God. It is in him you must cherish and honour your neerest friends; and for him also you are bound to love even your greatest enemies. Be not afraid to shew him your heart stark naked, that he may pierce it with his arrows; for the wounds of such an archer are much more precious then rubies. You shall gain all by loving him; and death it self, which comes from this love, is the gate of life. If you love him truly, you will have the three condititions of love, which are, to serve him, to imitate him, and to suffer for him. You must serve him with all fidelity in your prayers, and all your actions: you must imitate him (what possibly you can) in all the passages of his life; And you must hold it for a glory to participate (with a valiant patience) all the fruits of his Cross.

Aspirations.

O Great God, who judgest all hearts, and doest penetrate the most secret retirements of our consciences, drive away from me all counterfeit Pharisaical devotions, which are nothing but shews, and cannot subsist but by false apparencies. O my God, my Jesus, make me keep the Law of thy love, and nothing else. It is a yoke which brings with it more honour then burden; It is a yoke which hath wings, but no heavines: Make me serve thee, (O my Master) since thou beholdest the services of all the Angels under thy feet: Make me imitate thee, (O my Redeemer) since thou art the original of all perfections: make me suffer for thee, (O King of the afflicted) and that I may not know what it is to suffer, by knowing what it is to love.

The Gospel upon Thursday the third week in Lent, S. Luke 4.

Jesus cured the Feaver of Simon's Mother in Law.

AND Jesus rising up out of the Synagogue, entred into Simon's house, and Simon's wives mother was holden with a great Feaver, and they besought him for her. And standing over her, he commanded the Feaver, and it left her: And incontinent rising, she ministred to them. And when the Sun was down, all that had diseased of sundry maladies, brought them to him: But he imposing hands upon every one, cured them. And Devils went out from many, crying and saying, that thou art the Son of God. And rebuking them, he suffered them not to speak that they knew he was Christ. And when it was day, going forth, he went into a desart place, and the multitudes sought him, and came even unto him: and they held him, that he should not depart from them. To whom he said, That to other Cities also must I Evangelize the Kingdom of God: because therefore I was sent. And he was preaching in the Synagogues of Galilee.

Moralities.

1. A Soul within a sick body, is a Princess that dwels in a ruinous house: Health is the best of all temporal goods; without which, all honours are as the beams of an eclipsed sun: Riches are unpleasing, and all pleasures are languishing. All joy of the heart subsists naturally in the health of the body. But yet it is true, that the most healthfull persons are not always the most holy. What profit is there in that health, which serves for a provocation to sin, for an enticement to worldly pleasure, and a gate to death? The best souls are never better nor stronger, then when their bodies are sick: their diseases are too hard for their mortal bodies, but their courage is invincible. It is a great knowledge to understand our own infirmities. Prosperity keeps us from the view of them, but adversity shews them to us. We should hardly know what death is, if so many diseases did not teach us every day that we are mortal. Semiramis the proudest of all Queens had made a law, whereby she was to be adored in stead of all the gods, but being humbled by a great sickness, she acknowledged her self to be but a woman.

2. All the Apostles pray for this holy woman which was sick, but she her self asked nothing, nor did complain of any thing. She leaves all to God, who is onely Master of life and death. She knew that he which gives his benefits with such bounty, hath the wisdom to chuse those which are most fit for us: How do we know, whether we desiring to be delivered from a sickness, do not ask of God to take away a gift which is very necessary to our salvation? That malady or affliction which makes us distaste worldly pleasures, gives us a disposition to taste the joys of heaven.

3. How many sick persons in the heat of a Feaver promise much, and when they are wel again, perform nothing. That body which carried all the marks of death in the face, is no sooner grown strong by health (which rejoyceth the heart, and fils the veins with blood) but it becomes a slave to sin. The gifts of God (being abused) serve for nothing but to make it wicked; and so the soul is killed by recovery of the flesh. But this pious woman is no sooner on foot, but she serves the Authour of life, and employes all those limbs, (which Jesus cured of the Feaver) to prepare some provisions to refresh him. He that will not use the treasures of heaven with acknowledgment, deserveth never to keep them. When a man is recovered from a great sickness, as his body is renewed by health: so on the other side, he should renew his spirit by virtue. The body, (saith S. Maximus) is the bed of the soul, where it sleeps too easily in continual health, and forgets it self in many things. But a good round sickness doth not onely move, but turn over this bed, which maketh the soul awake, to think on her salvation, and make a total conversion.

Aspirations.

O Word Incarnate, all Feavers and Devils flie before the beams of thy redoubted face. Must nothing but the heat of thy passions always resist thy powers and bounties? To what maladies and indispositions am I subject? I have more diseases in my soul then limbs in my body. My weakness bends under thy scourges, and yet my sins continue stil unmoveable. Stay, (O benign Lord) stay thy selfe near me. Cast upon my dull and heavy eyes, one beam from those thine eyes, which make all storms clear, and all disasters happy. Command that my weakness leave me, and that I may arise to perform my services due to thy greatness, as I will for ever owe my salvation to thine infinite power and bounty.

The Gospel upon Friday the third week in Lent, Saint John 4.

Of the Samaritan woman at JACOB's Well, near Sichar.

HE cometh therefore into a City of Samaria, which is called Sichar, beside the Mannour that Jacob gave to Joseph his Son. And there was there the fountain of Jacob. Jesus therefore wearied of his journey, sate so upon the fountain. It was about the sixth hour,

There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water, Jesus saith to her, Give me to drink: for his Disciples were gone into the City to buy meats: therefore that Samaritan woman saith to him, How dost thou, being a Jew, ask of me to drink, which am a Samaritan woman? for the Jews do not communicate with the Samaritans. Jesus answered and said to her, If thou didst know the gift of God, and who he is that saith unto thee, Give me to drink, thou perhaps wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water. The woman saith to him, Sir, neither hast thou wherein to draw, and the Well is deep; whence hast thou the living water? Art thou greater then our Father Jacob who gave us the Well, and himself drank of it, and his children and his Cattel. Jesus answered, and said to her, Every one that drinketh of this water, shall thirst again; but he that shall drink of the water that I will give him, shall not thirst for ever: but the water, that I will give him, shall become unto him a fountain of water springing up unto life everlasting. The woman saith to him, Lord, give me this water, that I may not thirst, nor come hither to draw.

Jesus said to her, Go call thy husband, and come hither. The woman answered and said, I have no husband. Jesus saith to her, Thou hast said well that I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands, and he whom thou now hast, is not thy husband. Thou thou hast said truly.

The Woman saith to him, Lord, I perceive that thou art a Prophet. Our Fathers adored in this Mountain, and you say, that Jerusalem is the place where men must adore. Jesus saith to her, woman believe me, that the hour shall come, when you shall neither in this Mountain, nor in Jerusalem, adore the Father. You adore that you know not: we adore that we know; for salvation is of the Jews: but the hour cometh, and now is, when the true adorers shall adore the Father in spirit and verity. For the Father also seeketh such to adore him. God is a spirit, and they that adore him, must adore in spirit and verity. The woman saith to him, I know that Messias cometh, (which is called Christ) therefore when he cometh, he will shew us all things. Jesus saith to her, I am he that speake with thee.

And incontinent his Disciples came: and they marvelled that he talked with a woman. No man for all that said, What seekest thou, or why talkest thou with her? The Woman therefore left her water pot, and she went into the City, and saith to those men, Come and see a man that hath told me all things whatsoever I have done: Is not he Christ? They went forth therefore out of the City, and came to him.

In the mean time the Disciples desired him, saying, Rabbi, eat. But he said to them, I have meat to eat which you know not. The Disciples therefore said one to another, hath any man brought him for to eat? Jesus saith to them, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, to perfect his work. Do not you say, that yet there are four months, and harvest cometh? Behold I say to you, lift up your eyes, and see the Countries, that they are white already to harvest: and he that reapeth, receiveth hire, and gathereth fruit unto life everlasting, that both he that soweth, and he that reapeth, may rejoyce together. For in this is the saying true, that it is one man that soweth, and it is another that reapeth. I have sent you to reap that for which you laboured not: others have laboured, and you have entred into their labours.

And of that City many believed in him of the Samaritans, for the word of the Woman giving testimony, that he told me all things whatsoever I have done. Therefore when the Samaritans were come to him, they desired him that he would tarry there. And he tarried there two days. And many more believed for his own word: and they said to the Woman, That now, not for thy saying do we believe: for our selves have heard, and do know, that this is the Saviour of the world indeed.

Moralities.

1. THe God of all power is weary, the main sea desires a drop of salt water: the King of Angels becomes a suppliant for a little part of all that, which is his own. This Gospel shews us clearly the love of God toward humane nature, and the infinite zeal which he hath to the salvation of souls. Is it not a thing, which should load us with confusion, to see, that he who is filled with all felicities hath only one thirst, which is, that we should thirst after him? and that we should make chief account of that living water, which he carrieth within his breast, which indeed properly is grace, the onely way to glory.

2. Behold the difference between Jacobs Well and the Well of Jesus; between contentments of the world, and the pleasures of God. The Well of Jacob is common to men and beasts; to shew unto us, that a man which glorifieth himself of his sensual delights, makes a Trophey of his own baseness, and a Triumph of his fault. It is just as if Nebuchadnezzar forsaking his Crown and throne (to transform himself into a beast) should brag, that he had gotten a handsom stable, and very good hay. But the fountain of Jesus holds in it the water of graces, a wholesom water, pure and Christalline, which brings us to the society of Angels. The water of Jacob, though it be but a water for beasts, yet it is hard to obtain: There are many which run mad after riches, honours and contentments of this world, and can never come to possess them: They live in a mill, and gain nothing out of it, but the noise and dust. They turn round about upon the wheel of disquiet, and never rest. But if good fortune sometime cast them a bone, there are a hundred dogs which strive to catch it. All their life is nothing but expectation, and their end onely despair. Whereas the Well of Jesus is open to all the world, he seeketh, he asketh, he calleth, he giveth gratis, he requireth nothing of us but our selves, and would have us for no other reason but onely to make us happy. The Well of Jacob begetteth thirst, but doth not quench it. Do not you consider that the Samaritan woman left her pot there, and did not drink? After so many fantasms and illusions, which do amuse worldlings, they must part from the world with great thirst. But the fountains of our Saviour free us from the desire of all creatures, and do establish within mans spirit, an object of which the heart can never lose the delight. O happy Samaritan! (saith Saint Ambrose) which left her pot empty, that she might return full of Jesus Christ. She did no wrong to her fellow Citizens, for if she brought no water to the Town, yet she made the fountain it self come thither.

3. Is it not a shameful thing that God should seek us amongst the heats of his love and sufferings, desireth nothing but us, is contented with the possession of our heart, and yet we cannot be content with him? Shall not we forsake all the disorders of a sensual life which hinder the effect of Gods grace? Shall not we forsake and leave behind us our pitcher, bidding farewel to all those occasions which lead us to sin, to avoid that fire whereof we have reason to fear the smoke?

Aspirations.

O (Unexhaustible fountain of all beauties) that my soul hath been long alienated from thee! I have so many times run after the salt waters of worldly pleasures and contentments which have not ceased to kindle a wicked thirst within my veins, in such a violent proportion, that I could not quench it. But now (O sweet Saviour) my soul (being weary and distasted with all the fading delights of this transitory world) doth languish incessantly after thee. Whether the break of day begin to gild the mountains with his brightness, whether the Sun be advanced high in his course, or whether the night do cast a dark vail over all mortal things. I seek and desire thy entertainments, which are the only sweet Idea's of my soul. I plunge my self within the contemplation of thy greatness, I adore thy powers. The first, which torments me (by loving thee) is so precious, that I would not lose it to drink Nectar; and I can never quench it, but in the streams of those delights and pleasures, which proceed from the throne of the holy Lamb.

The Gospel upon Saturday the third week in Lent, S. John the 8.

Of the woman found in adultery.

AND Jesus went into the Mount Olivet, and early in the morning again he came into the Temple, and the people came to him, and sitting he taught them.

And the Scribes and Pharisees bring a woman taken in adultery, and they did set her in the midst, and said to him, Master, this woman was even now taken in adultery. And

in

in the law Moſes commanded to ſtone ſuch. What ſayeſt thou therefore? and this they ſaid tempting him, that they might accuſe him. But Jeſus bowing himſelf down, with his finger wrote in the earth. When they therefore continued asking him he lifted up himſelf, and ſaid to them, He that is without ſin of you, let him firſt throw the ſtone at her. And again bowing himſelf, he wrote in the earth. And they hearing, went out one by one, beginning at the Seniours, and Jeſus alone remained, and the woman ſtanding in the midſt. And Jeſus lifting up himſelf, ſaid to her, woman, where are they that accuſed thee? Hath no man condemned thee? who ſaid, No man, Lord. And Jeſus ſaid, Neither will I condemn thee. Go, and now ſin no more.

Moralities.

1. MEn naturally love better to cenſure the life of another, then to examine their own. The Ravens accuſe Doves, and he ſits often upon a Tribunal to condemn vice, who doth lodge it in his heart. Many reſemble the Cocks which crow againſt a Baſiliſk, and yet bear the ſeed of it in their entrails. Reaſon would alwayes, that we begin to reform others, by the cenſure of our own life. No word can carry ſuch life and vigour with it, as that which is followed by action. To talk all and do nothing, is to build with one hand, and deſtroy with the other. The land of the living ſhall never be for thoſe, who have their tongues longer then their arms.

2. To what purpoſe is it to ſpeak good words, and yet lead an ill life? A man can neither hide himſelf from God nor himſelf: his conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes. Thoſe, who were ready to lift up their hands to ſtone the adulterous woman, were diverted, and departed with confuſion, ſeeing their ſins written in the duſt, with certain figures to expreſs them. If we could always behold our own life before our eyes (as a piece of Tapiſtry) we ſhould there ſee ſo many Serpents amongſt flowers, that we would have more horrour of our own ſins, then will to cenſure thoſe who are like our ſelves.

3. God ſhews mercy, but would not ſuffer his mildneſs to be abuſed, ſin muſt not print its ſteps upon his clemency. It is a falſe repentance for a man to act that which himſelf hath condemned: and after ſo many relapſes, to take but one fall into everlaſting pain. The ordinary Gloſs obſerves, that our Saviour bended down, when he wrote upon the earth; to ſhew, that the remembrance of our ſins lay heavy upon him: But when he began to pardon, he aroſe up; to teach us, what joy and comfort he takes in the Kingdom of his mercy.

Aſpirations.

O Sovereign Judge, who ſitteſt upon a Tribunal ſeat, borne up with truth and power; make me rather judge mine own life, then cenſure the lives of others. Muſt I be full of eyes without, and blind within? ſhew me my ſtains, and give me water to waſh them out. Alaſs! I am altogether but one ſtain, and thou art all purity. My ſoul is aſhamed to ſee it ſelf ſo dark before thy light, and ſo ſmutted over, before thine immortal whiteneſs. Do not write me upon the ground, as a child of earth; write me in heaven, ſince I am the portion which thou haſt purchaſed with thy precious blood: Blot out my ſins, which are but too deeply graven upon my hands; and pardon, by thine infinite mercy, what thou mayeſt condemn by juſtice.

The Goſpel upon Sunday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 6.

Of the five Fiſhes, and two Barly loaves.

After theſe things Jeſus went beyond the Sea of Galilee, which is of Tiberias; and a great multitude followed him, becauſe they ſaw the ſigns which he did upon thoſe that were ſick. Jeſus therefore went up into the mountain, and there he ſate with his Diſciples. And the Paſcha was at hand, the feſtival day of the Jews. When Jeſus therefore had lifted up his eyes, and ſaw that a very great multitude cometh to him, he ſaith to Philip, whence ſhall we buy bread, that theſe may eat? and this he ſaid, tempting him, for himſelf knew what he would do. Philip anſwered him, two hundred penyworth of bread is not ſufficient for them, that every man may take a little piece. One of his Diſciples, Andrew the brother of Simon Peter, ſaith to him, There is a boy here, that hath five Barly loaves, and two Fiſhes, but what are theſe among ſo many? Jeſus therefore ſaith, Make the men ſit down. And there was much graſs in the place. The men therefore ſate down, in number about five thouſand. Jeſus therefore took the loaves, and when he had given thanks, he diſtributed to them that ſate. In like manner alſo of the Fiſhes, as much as they would. And after they were filled, he ſaid to his Diſciples, Gather the fragments that are remaining, leſt they be loſt. They gathered therefore, and filled twelve baſkets with fragments of the five Barly loaves which remained to them that had eaten. Thoſe men therefore when they had ſeen what a ſign Jeſus had done, ſaid, That this is the Prophet indeed that is to come into the world. Jeſus therefore when he knew that they would come to take him, and make him a King, he fled again into the mountain himſelf alone.

Moralities.

1. WHat a happy thing it is to ſerve God, whoſe converſation is ſo worthy all love! See how he carried himſelf toward this poor multitude, which followed him with ſuch zeal and conſtancy. It ſeems they were his children, that he carried them all upon his ſhoulders, that he had their names, their Countries, their qualities, and the conditions of their ſmall fortunes graven in his heart. He is ſo tender over them, he ſo afflicts himſelf about them, as a Shepherd over his poor flock. He inſtructs them, he ſpeaks to them of heavenly things, he heals their maladies, he comforts their ſadneſs, he lifts his eyes up to heaven for them; and for them he opens his divine hands (the treaſures of Heaven) and nouriſhes them by a miracle, as they had wholly reſigned themſelves to him with ſuch abſolute confidence. O how are we cheriſhed by heaven, ſince God doth bind himſelf to help us! And we ſhould be unfaithfull not to truſt him, who makes nature it ſelf ſo faithful to us. It is here much to be obſerved, that God doth no miracles for his own profit: he doth not change ſtones into bread in the deſart to nouriſh himſelf after that long faſt which he did there make: but for his faithful ſervants he alters the courſe of nature; and being auſtere to himſelf, he becomes indulgent to us; to teach us, that we ſhould deſpoil our ſelves of ſelf-love, which ties us to our own fleſh, and makes us ſo negligent to our neighbour.

2. What precious thing is to be gotten by following the world, that we ſhould forſake Jeſus in the Deſart, and run after vaine hopes at Court, and great mens houſes, where we pretend to make ſome fortune? How many injuries muſt a man diſſemble? How many affronts muſt he ſwallow? How many deadly ſweats muſt he endure, to obtain ſome reaſonable condition? How many times muſt he ſacrifice his children, engage his own conſcience, and offer violences to others, to advance the affairs of great men? And after many years ſervice, if any fore-air'd or ruinous buſineſs committed to his charge (in the purſuit whereof he muſt walk upon thorns) ſhall chance to miſcarry, all the fault muſt be laid upon a good officer; and if he prove unlucky, he ſhall ever be made culpable, and in the turning of a hand, all his good ſervices forgotten and loſt: and for a final recompence, he muſt be loaden with infinite diſgraces. It is quite contrary in the ſervice of God: for he encourages our virtues, he ſupplies our defects, governs our ſpiritual, and yet neglects not our temporal occaſions.

casion. He that cloaths the flowers of the Meadows more gorgeously then Monarchs, who lodges so many little Fishes in golden and azure shels, he, who doth but open his hand and repleniſhes all nature with bleſſings, if we be faithful in keeping his Commandments, will never forſake us at our need. But yet we find all the difficulties of the world to put our truſt in him, we vilifie our cares of eternity: and by ſeeking after worldly things whereby to live, we torment our ſelves, & in the end loſe our own lives. A man that muſt dy, needs very few worldly things; a very little Cabbin will ſuffice nature, but whole Kingdoms will not ſatisfie covetouſneſs.

3. Jeſus flies from Scepters, and runs to the Croſs; he would have no worldly Kingdoms, becauſe their Thrones are made of Ice, & their Crowns of Glaſs. He valued the Kingdom of God above all things, that he might make us partakers of his precious conqueſt, and infinite rich prize. But now it ſeems that heaven is not a ſufficient Kingdom for us; men run after land, & itch after the ambition of fading greatneſs: and ſometimes all their life paſſeth away in great ſins, and as great troubles, to get a poor title of three letters upon their Tomb. Alaſs! do we know better then God, in what honour conſiſts, that we muſt ſeek after that which he did avoid, and not imitate that which he followed?

Let us follow God, and believe that where he is, there can be no deſart or ſolitude for us. They ſhall never taſte the delights of virtue that feed upon the joys of vanity. All worldly pleaſures are Comets, made fat with the ſmokes and vapours of the earth; and inſtead of giving light and brightneſs, they bring forth murders and contagions: but the following of God is always ſweet, and he which ſuffers thereby, changes his very tears into nouriſhment.

Aſpiration.

O My God! Shall I always run after that which flies from me, and never follow Jeſus who follows me by incomparable paths, and loves me even while I am ungrateful. I will no more run after the ſhadows of worldly honour, I will no more have my own will, which both is, and hath proved ſo unfaithful. I will put my ſelf into the happy courſe of Gods diſpoſition, for all which ſhall happen unto me, either in time or eternity; his careful eye watches over me, it is for me that his hands have treaſures, and the very Deſarts poſſeſs abundance. O crucified love, the moſt pure of all beauties, it is for thee that ſo many generous Champions have peopled the Deſarts, and paſſed the ſtreams of bitterneſs and ſorrow, bearing their croſſes after thee; and thereupon have felt the ſweetneſs of thy viſits among their cruel rigours. God forbid, that I ſhould give the ly to ſo great and ſo generous a company. I go to thee and will follow thee amongſt the deſarts; I run not after bread, I run after thy divine perſon, I will make much of thy wounds, I honour thy torments, I will conform my ſelf to thee, that I may find joy amongſt thy dolours, and liſe it ſelf amongſt thine infinite ſufferings.

The Goſpel upon Munday, the fourth week in Lent, S. John 2.

Of the whipping buyers and ſellers out of the Temple.

And the Paſche of the Jews was at hand, and Jeſus went up to Jeruſalem, and he found in the Temple them that ſold Oxen, and Sheep, and Doves, and the Bankers ſitting. And when he had made, as it were, a whip of little cords, he caſt them all out of the Temple, the ſheep alſo and the oxen, and the mony of the Bankers he poured out, and the tables he overthrew. And to them that ſold Doves, he ſaid, Take away theſe things hence, and make not the houſe of my Father, a houſe of merchandiſe. And his Diſciples remembred that it is written, The zeal of thy houſe hath eaten me. The Jews therefore anſwered, and ſaid to him, What ſign doeſt thou ſhew us, that thou doeſt theſe things? Jeſus anſwered, and ſaid to them, Diſſolve this Temple, and in three I will raiſe it. The Jews therefore ſaid, in fourty and ſix years was this Temple built, and wilt thou raiſe it in three days? But he ſpake of the Temple of his body. Therefore when he was riſen again from the dead, his Diſciples remembred that he ſaid this, and they believed the Scripture, and the word that Jeſus did ſay. And when he was at Jeruſalem in the Paſche upon the feſtival day, many believed in his name, ſeeing his ſigns which he did. But Jeſus did not commit himſelf unto them, for that he knew all, and becauſe it was not needful for him that any ſhould give teſtimony of man: for he knew what was in man.

Moralities.

1 Piety is a ſilver chain hanged up aloſt, wch ties heaven and earth, ſpiritual and temporal, God and man together. Devotion is a virtue derived to us from the Father of all light, who gives us thereby means to hold a traffick or commerce with Angels. All which is here below, ſinks by its proper weight, and leans downward toward natural corruptiō: Our ſpirit though it be immortal, would follow the weight of our bodies, if it were not indued with the knowledge of God which works the ſame effect in it, as the Adamant doth with iron: for it pierceth and gives it life, together with a ſecret and powerful ſpirit, from which all great actions take their beginning: You ſhall never do any great act, if the honour of God, and the reverence of ſacred things ſhall not accompany all your pretences. For if you ground your piety upon any temporal reſpects, you reſemble that people, which believes the higheſt mountains do ſupport the skies.

2. There are no ſins which God doth puniſh more rigorouſly, nor ſpeedily, then thoſe which are committed againſt devotion and piety: He doth not here take up the ſcourge againſt naughty Judges, uſurers and unchaſte perſons, becauſe the Church is to find remedy againſt all faults which happen in the life of man. But if a man commit a ſin againſt Gods Altar, the remedy grows deſperate. King Ozias felt a leproſie riſe upon his face at the inſtant when he made the ſume riſe from the cenſer, which he uſurped frō the high Prieſts. Ely the chief Prieſt was buried in the ruins of his own houſe, for the ſacriledge of his children, without any conſideration of thoſe long ſervices, which he had performed at the Tabernacle. Keep your ſelf from ſimonies, from irreverence in Churches, and from abuſing Sacraments. He can have no excuſe, which makes his Judge a witneſs.

3. Jeſus was violently moved by the zeal which he bare to the houſe of his heavenly Father. But many wicked rich men limit their zeal onely to their own families. They build great Palaces upon the peoples blood, and they nothing care though all the world be in a ſtorm, ſo long as they (and what belongs to them) be well covered. But there is a revenging God who doth inſenſibly dry up the roots of proud Nations, and throws diſgrace and infamy upon the faces of thoſe, who neglect the glories of Gods Altars to advance their own. He who builds without God, doth demoliſh, and whoſoever thinks to make any great encreaſe without him, ſhall find nothing but ſterility.

Aſpiration.

O Moſt pure Spirit of Jeſus, which waſt conſummate by zeal toward the houſe of God, wilt thou never burn my heart with thoſe adored flames, wherewith thou inſpireſt chaſte hearts? Why do we take ſo much care of our houſes (which are

are built upon quick-silver, and roll up and down upon the inconstancies of humane fortunes) while we have no love nor zeal towards Gods Church, which is the Palace which we should choose here upon earth, to be as the Image of heaven above? I wil adore thy Altars (all my life) with a profound humility. But I wil first make an Altar of mine own heart, where I will offer sacrifice; to which I doubt not but thou wilt put fire with thine owne hand.

The Gospel upon Tuesday, the fourth week in Lent, S. John. 7.

The Jews marvel at the learning of Jesus who was never taught.

And when the festivity was now half done, Jesus went up into the Temple and taught. And the Jews marvelled, saying, how doth this man know letters, whereas he hath not learned? Jesus answered them, and said my doctrine is not mine but his that sent me. If any man will do the will of him, he shall understand of the doctrine, whither it be of God, or I speak of my self; he that speaketh of himself, seeketh his own glory, but he that seeketh the glory of him that sent him, he is true, and injustice in him there is not. Did not Moses give you the Law, and none of you doth the Law? Why seek you to kill me? The multitude answered and said; thou hast a Devil; who seeketh to kill thee? Jesus answered and said to them, One work I have done, and you do all marvel, Therefore Moses gave you circumcision, not that it is of Moses, but of the Fathers, and in the Sabbath ye circumcise a man. If a man receive circumcision in the Sabbath, that the law of Moses be not broken; are you angry at me because I have healed a man wholly in the Sabbath? Judge not according to the face, judge just judgement.

Certain therefore of Jerusalem said, Is not this he whom they seek to kill: And behold, he speaks openly, and they say nothing to him. Have the Princes known indeed that this is Christ? But this man we know, whence he is. But when Christ cometh no man knoweth whence he is. Jesus therefore cried in the Temple, teaching and saying, Both me you do know, and whence I am you know, and of my self I am not come. But he is true that sent me, whom you know not. I know him, because I am of him, and he sent me. They sought therefore to apprehend him, and no man laid hands upon him, because his hour was not yet come. But of the multitude many believed in him.

Moralities.

1. IT appears by this Gospel that Jesus was judged according to apparencies, not according to truth. It is one of the greatest confusions which is deeply rooted in the life of man, that every thing is full of painting, and in stead of taking it off with a spunge, we foment it, and make our illusions voluntary. The Prophet Isaiah adviseth us to use our judgement, as men do leaven to season bread. All the objects presented to our imaginations, which we esteem, are fading, if we do not add some heavenly vigour to help our judgment.

2. To judge according to apparences is a great want both of judgment and courage. The first makes us prefer vanity before truth; the second gives that to silk and golden cloaths, which is properly due to virtue: We adore painted coals, and certain dark fumes covered outwardly with snow; But if we did know how many great miseries, and what beastly ordure is hidden under cloth of Gold, silk, and scarlet, we would complain of our eyes for being so far without reason. It is a kind of Apostacy and rebellion against Gods providence, to judge without calling God to be a president in our counsel; or to take in hand any humane inventions without the assistance of his Spirit.

3. God is pleased to lodge pearls within cockles; and bestows his treasures of wisdom and virtue, many times upon persons, who have the most unfashionable outsides, to countercheck humane wisdom, He makes his orators of those who are speechless; and numbers of frogs and flies to overthrow mighty armies. He makes Kings out of shepherds, and serves himself of things which are not, as if they were. The most pleasing Sacrifice which he receives upon earth, is from the humble; and when we despise those, we divert the honours of God. We offer Sacrifice to the worlds opinion, like the Sages of Egypt; who did light candles and burn incense to Crocodiles. The Jews lost their faith to follow apparences: and there is no shorter way to Apostacy, then to adore the world and neglect God.

4. An ill opinion make folks many times pass a rash judgment: They mount into Gods chair to judge the hearts of men: The chast doves are used like Ravens, and Ravens like Swans. Opinion puts false spectacles upon our eyes, which make faults seem virtues, and virtues crimes. Yet nevertheless we should think that virtuous persons will not conceive an ill suspicion of their neighbour without a very sure ground: Saint John Climacus saith, fire is no more contrary to water, then rash judgment is to the state of repentance. It is a certain sign, that we do not see our own sins, when we seek curiously after the least defects of our neighbour. If we would but once enter into our selves, we should be so busie to lament our own lives, that we should not have time to censure those of others.

Aspirations.

O Judge most redoubtable, who dost plant thy Throne within the heart of man, who judgest the greatest Monarchs, without leaving them power to appeal; Thy judgments are secret and impenetrable: That which shines to our eyes like a Diamond, is like a contemptible worm in thy ballance. That which we value as a Star thou judgest to be a coal. We have just so much greatness, virtue, and happiness, as we have by entrance into thy heart. And he whom thou esteemest, needs not the judgment of mortal man. No innocent is justified, nor guilty person condemned without thee, and therefore I will from henceforth judge onely according to thee. I will lay down all my affections, and take thine, so far as I shall be able; and I will account nothing great, but what shall be so in thy esteem.

The Gospel upon Wednesday the fourth week in Lent, Saint John 9.

Of the blind man cured by clay and spittle.

And Jesus passing by, saw a blind man from his nativity: and his Disciples asked him, Rabbi, who hath sinned, this man or his parents, that he should be born blind, Jesus answered, Neither this man sinned, nor his parents; but that the works of God may be manifested in him. I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day, the night cometh when no man can work. As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. When he had said these things, he spit on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and spread the clay upon his eyes, and said to him, Go, wash in the Pool of Silo, which is interpreted, sent. He went therefore and washed, and he came seeing.

Therefore the neighbours, and they which had seen him before, that he was a beggar, said, Is not this he that sate and begged? Others said, that this is he. But others no, but no, but he is like him. But he said I am he. They said therefore to him, How were thine eyes opened? He answered, that man that is called Jesus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said to me, Go to the Pool of Silo and wash: and I went and washed, and I saw. And they said to him, Where is he? He saith, I know not. They bring him that had been blind, to the Pharisees; and it was the Sabbath when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes.

Again therefore the Pharisees asked him, how he saw. But he said to them, he put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and I see. Certain therefore of the Pharisees said, This man is not of God, that keepeth not the Sabbath. But others said, How can a man that is a sinner do these signs? And there was a schism among them. They say therefore to the blind again. Thou, what sayest thou of him that opened thine eyes? And he said, that he is a Prophet. The Jews therefore did not believe of him, that he had been blind, and saw, until they called the Parents of him that saw, and asked them saying; Is this your son, whom you say that he was born blind? how then doth he now see? His parents answered them, and said, we know that this is our son, and that he was born blind: but how he now seeth we know not, or who hath opened his eyes we know not, ask himself, he is of age, let himself speak of himself. These things his parents said, because they feared the Jews. For the Jews had now conspired, that if any man should confess him to be Christ, he should be put out of the Synagogue. Therefore did his parents say, that he is of age, ask himself. They therefore again called the man that had been blind, and said to him, Give glory to God, we know that this man is a sinner.

He therefore said to them, Whether he be a sinner, I know not; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. They said therefore to him, What did he to thee? How did he open thine eyes? He answered them; I have now told you, and you have heard, why will you hear it again? will you also become his Disciples? They reviled him therefore, and said, be thou his Disciple; but we are the Disciples of Moses: we know that to Moses God did speak: but this man we know not whence he is. The man answered and said to them, For in this it is marvellous, that you know not whence he is and he hath opened mine eyes. And we know, that sinners God doth not hear. But if a man be a server of God, and do the will of him, him he heareth. From the beginning of the world it hath not been heard, that any man hath opened the eyes of one born blind; and unless this man were of God, he could not do any thing. They answered and said to him, Thou wast wholly born in sins, and dost thou teach us? And they did cast him forth.

Jesus heard that they had cast him forth, and when he had found him, he said to him, Dost thou believe in the Son of God? He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I may believe in him? And Jesus said to him, Both thou hast seen him, and he that talketh with thee, he is. But he said, I believe Lord: and falling down, he adored him.

Moralities.

1. JEsus the Father of all brightness (who walked accompanied with his twelve Apostles, as the Sun doth with the hours of the day) gives eyes to a blind man, and doth it by clay and spittle: to teach us, that none hath power to do works above nature, but he that was the Authour of it. On the other side, a blind man becomes a King over persons of the clearest sight; and being restored to light, he renders again the same, to the first fountain from whence it came. He makes himself an Advocate to plead for the chiefest truth, and of a poor beggar becomes a confessour; and after he had deplored his misery at the Temple gate, teacheth all mankind the estate of its own felicities. We should (in imitation of him) love the light by adoring the fountain of it, and behave our selves as witnesses, and defenders of the truth.

2. God is a light, and by his light draws all unto him: he makes a break of day by his grace in this life, which becomes afterward a perfect day for all eternity. But many lose themselves in this world; some for want of light, some by a false light, and some by having too much light.

3. Those lose themselves for want of light, who are not at all instructed in the faith and maxims of Christian Religion; and those in stead of approaching near the light, love their own darkness. They hate the light of their salvation, as the shadow of death: and think, that if you give them eyes to see their blindness, you take away their life. If they seem Christians, they yet have nothing but the name and the appearance, the book of Jesus is shut from them, or if they make a shew to read, they may name the letters, but never can produce one right good word.

4. Others destroy themselves by false lights, who being wedded to their own opinions, and adoring the Chimera's of their spirit, think themselves full of knowledge, just and happy; that the sun riseth onely for them, and that all the rest of the world is in darkness; they conceive they have the fairest stars for conductours; but at the end of their career, they find (too late) that this pretended light was but an Ignis fatuus, which led them to a precipice of eternal flames. It is the worst of all follies to be wise in our own eye-sight, and the worst of all temptations is, for a man to be a devil to himself.

5. Those ruin themselves with too much light, who have all Gods law by heart, but never have any heart to that law. They know the Scriptures, all learning and sciences: they understand every thing but themselves: they can find spots in the Sun; they can give new names to the stars; they perswade themselves, that God is all that they apprehend: But after all this heap of knowledg, they are found to be like the Sages of Pharaoh: and can produce nothing but blood and frogs: They embroil & trouble the world; they stain their own lives, and at their deaths leave nothing to continue but the memory of their sins. It would be more expedient for them (rather then have such light) to carry fire, wherewith to be burning in the love of God, and not to swel and burst with that kind of knowledge. All learning which is not joyned with a good life, is like a picture in the air, which hath no table to make it subsist. It is not sufficient to be elevated in spirit (like the Prophets) except a man do enter into some perfect imitation of their virtues.

Aspirations.

O Fountain of all brightness, before whom right can have no vail, who seest the day spring out of thy bosom, to spread it self over all nature, will thou have no pity upon my blindness? will there be no medicine for my eyes, which have so often grown dull and heavy with earthly humours. O Lord, I want light, being always so blind to my own sins. So many years are past, wherein I have dwelt with my self, and yet know not what I am. Self-love maketh me sometimes apprehend imaginary virtues in great, and see all my crimes in little. I too often believe my own judgment, and adore my own opinions as gods, and goddesses, and if thou send me any light, I make so ill use of it, that I dazle my self, even in the brightness of thy day; making little or no profit of that which would be so much to my advantage, if I were so happy as to know it. But henceforth I will have no eyes but for thee: I will onely contemplate thee, (O life of all beauties) and draw all the powers of my soul into my eyes, that I may the better apprehend the mystery of thy bounties. O cast upon me one beam of thy grace so powerfull, that it may never forsake me till I may see the day of thy glory.

The Gospel upon Thursday, the fourth week in Lent, S. Luke the 7.

Of the widows Son raised from death to life at Naim by our SAVIOUR.

And it came to pass afterward he went into a City that is called Naim, and there went with him his Disciples, and a very great multitude: And when he came nigh to the gate of the City, behold a dead man was carried forth, the onely Son of his mother: and she was a widow and a great multitude of the City with her; whom when our Lord had seen, being moved with mercy upon her, he said to her, Weep not. And he came near, and touched the Coffin: And they that carried it, stood still: and he said: Young man, I say to thee, Arise. And he that was dead sate up, and began to speak. And he gave him him to his mother: and fear took them all; and they magnified God, saying, That a great Prophet is risen among us: and that God hath visited his people. And this saying went forth into all Jewry of him, and into all the Country about.

Moralities.

JEsus met at the Gates of Naim, (which is interpreted the Town of Beauties) a young man carried to burial; to shew us, that neither beauty nor youth, are freed from the laws of death. We fear death, and there is almost nothing more immortal: here below every thing dies, but death it self. We see him always in the Gospels, we touch him every day by our experiences, and yet neither the Gospels make us sufficiently faithful, nor our experiences well advised.

2. If we behold death by his natural face, he seems a little strange to us, because we have not seen him well acted. We lay upon him sythes, bows, and arrows, we put upon him ugly antick faces, we compass him round about with terrours and illusions, of all which he never so much as thought. It is a profound sleep, in which nature lets it self fail insensibly, when she is tired with the disquiets of this life. It is a cessation of all those services which the soul renders to the flesh. it is an execution of God's will, and a decree common to all the world. To be disquieted and drawn by the ears, to pay a debt which so many millions of men (of all conditions) have paid before us, is to do as a frog that would swim against a sharp stream of a forcible torrent. We have been, as it were dead, to so many ages which went before us: we die piece-meal every day: we assay death so often in our sleep; discreet men expect him, fools despise him, and the most disdainful persons must entertain him. Shall we not know and endeavour to do that one thing well, which being once well performed, will give us life for ever? Methinks it is rather a gift of God to die soon, then to stay late amongst the occasions of sin.

3. It is not death, but a wicked life we have cause to fear. That only, lies heavy, and both troubles us, and keeps us from understanding and tasting the sweets of death. He that can die to so many little dead and dying things (which makes us die every day by our unwillingness to forsake them) shall find that death is nothing to him. But we would fain (in death) carry the world with us upon our shoulders to the grave, and that is a thing we cannot do. We would avoid the judgment of a just God, and that is a thing which we should not so much as think. Let us clear our accounts before we die, let us take order for our soul by repentance, and a moderate care of our bodies burial: let us order our goods by a good and charitable testament, with a secret direction for the poor, for our children and kindred, to be executed by fit persons. Let us put our selves into the protection of the Divine Providence, with a most perfect confidence: and how can we then fear death, being in the arms of life?

Aspirations.

O Jesus, fountain of all lives, in whose bosom all things are living: Jesus, the fruit of the dead, who hast destroyed the Kingdom of death; why should we fear a path, which thou hast so terrified with thy steps, honoured with thy blood, and sanctified by thy conquests? Shall we never die to so many dying things? All is dead here for us, and we have no life, if we do not seek it from thy heart. What should I care for death, though he come with all those grim, hideous, and antick faces, which men put upon him; for when I see him through thy wounds, thy blood, and thy venerable death, I find he hath no sting at all. If I shall walk in the shadow of death, and a thousand terrours shall conspire against me on every side, to disturb my quiet, I will fear nothing, being placed in the arms of thy providence. O my sweet Master, do but once touch the winding-sheet of my body, which holds down my soul so often within the sleep of death and sin. Command me to arise and speak, and then the light of thy morning shall never set, my discourses shall be always of thy praises, and my life shall be only a contemplation of thy beautiful countenance.

The Gospel upon Friday the fourth week in Lent, S. John. 11.

Of the raising of Lazarus from death.

And there was a certain sick man, Lazarus of Bethania, of the Town of Mary and Martha her sister. (And Mary was she that anointed our Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick) his sisters therefore sent to him, saying, Lord, behold he whom thou lovest, is sick. And Jesus hearing, said to them, This sickness is not to death, but for the glory of God, that the Son may be glorified by it. And Jesus loved Martha and her sister Mary, and Lazarus. As he heard therefore that he was sick, then he tarried in the same place two days: Then after this he saith to his Disciples, Let us go into Jewry again. The Disciples say to him, Rabbi, now the Jews sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again? Jesus answered, Are there not twelve houres of the day? If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world: but if he walk in the night, he stumbleth, because the light is not in him. These things he said: and after this he saith to them, Lazarus our friend sleepeth; but I go that I may raise him from sleep. His Disciples therefore said, Lord, if he sleep he shall be safe. But Jesus spake of his death, and they thought that he spake of the sleeping of sleep. Then therefore Jesus said to them plainly, Lazarus is dead, and I am glad for your sake, that you may believe, because I was not there; but let us go to him. Thomas therefore who is called Didymus, said to his condisciples, Let us also go to dy with him. Jesus therefore came, and found him now having been four days in the grave. And Bethania was nigh to Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs. And many of the Jews were come to Martha and Mary to comfort them concerning their brother. Martha therefore, when she heard that Jesus was come, went to meet him: but Mary sate at home. Martha therefore said to Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. But now also I know, that what thing soever thou shalt ask of God, God will give thee. Jesus saith to her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith to him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection in the last day. Jesus said to her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, although he were dead, shall live. And every one that liveth, and believeth in me, shall not dy for ever. Believest thou this? She said to him, Yea, Lord, I have believed that thou art Christ the Son of God, that art come into this World.

Moralities.

1 OUr Saviour Jesus makes here a strong assault upon death, to cure our infirmities at the cost of his dearest friends: He suffered Lazarus, whom he loved tenderly, to fall into a violent sickness; to teach us, that the bodies of God's favourites are not free from infirmities; and that, to make men Saints, they must not enjoy too much health. A soul is never more worthy to be a house for God, then when she raiseth up the greatness of her courage, the body being cast down with sickness. A soul which suffers, is a sacred thing. All the world did touch our Saviour before his passion, the throng of of people pressed upon him; but after his death he would not be touched by S. Mary Magdalen, because he was consecrated by his dolours.

2. The good sisters dispatch a messenger, not to a strange God, as they do who seek for health by remedies, which are a thousand times worse then the disease: But they addressed themselves to the living God, the God of life and death, to drive away death. And to recover life, they were content only to shew the wound to the faithful friendship of the Physician, without prescribing any remedies: for that is better left to his providence, then committed to our passion.

3. He defers his cure to raise from death. The delay of Gods Favours, is not alwaies a refusal, but sometimes a double liberality. The vows of good men are paid with usury: It was expedient that Lazarus should die, that he might triumph over death, in the triumph of Jesus Christ. It is here that we should alwaies raise high our thoughts, by considering our glory in the state of resurrection; he would have us believe it, not only as it is a lesson of Nature imprinted above the skies, upon the plants or elements of the world, and as a doctrine which many ancient Philosophers had by the light of nature; but also as a belief, which is fast joyned to the faith we have in the Divine Providence, which keeps our bodies in trust under its seal within the bosom of the earth; so that no prescription of time can make laws to restrain his power, having passed his word, and raised up Lazarus, who was but as one grain of seed in respect of all posterity.

4. Jesus wept over Lazarus, thereby to weep over us all. Our evils were lamentable, and could never sufficiently be deplored, without opening a fountain of tears within heaven, and within the eies of the Son of God. This is justly the River which comes from that place of all pleasure to water Paradise. How could those heavenly tears come from any other, then the place of all delight, since they issued from a brain, and from eyes which were united to the divinity? And how should they not water Paradise, since for so many Ages they have flowed over the Church for producing the fruits of justice. The balm of Egypt could not grow without water of that Well, which was commonly called the Fountain of Jesus: because the blessed Virgin had there washed the Cloaths of her dear Son: And we have no Odour of virtue, nor good conversation, (which is not directly barren) except it be indued with the merit of our Saviours tears.

Aspirations.

O Eies of my Saviour, from whence the Sun receives his clearest light: fair eies which only deserve eternal joyes and delights. Why should you this day be moistned with tears? Thou dost give me (O only love of my heart) the bloud of thy soul, before thou shedst that of thy body. There are so many things to make me weep, and I feel them so little; that if thy tears do not weep for me, I shal alwaies be miserable. Water then (O my sweet Master) the barrenness of my soul from the fountain of blessing, which I have opened within thine eies and heart: I have opened it by my sins, and let it, I beseech thee, bless me by thine infinite mercies.

The Gospel upon Saturday, the fourth week in Lent, S. John 8.

Upon our Saviours words, I am the light of the world.

AGain therefore Jesus spake to them, saying, I am the light of the world, he that followeth me, walketh not in darkness, but shal have the light of life. The Pharisees therefore said to him, Thou givest testimony of thy self, thy testimony is not true. Jesus answered and said to them, although I do give testimony of my self, my testimony is true; because I know whence I came, and whither I go: but you know not whence I came, or whither I go. You judge according to the flesh, I do not judge any man. And If I do judge, my judgment is true, because I am not alone, but I and he that sent me, the Father. And in your law it is written, that the testimony of two men is true. I am he that give testimony of my self: and he that sent me, the Father, giveth testimony of me. They said therefore to him, Where is thy Father? Jesus answered, Neither me do you know, nor my Father: if you did know me, perhaps you might know my Father also, these words Jesus spake in the Treasury teaching in the Temple, and no man apprehended him, because his hour was not yet come.

Moralities.

1. THere is in the blessed Trinity a communicating light, to which nothing is communicated: another light which is communicative and communicated: and a third light which is communicated, but not communicating. The first is the heavenly Father, who gives but takes nothing. The second is that of the Son, who takes from his Father and gives to the Holy Ghost all that can be given; The third is the Holy Ghost, which receives equally from the Father and the Son and doth produce nothing in the Trinity. But Jesus illuminating from all eternity, this state (for ever to be adored) did vouchsafe to descend into the country of our darkness, to scatter it by his brightness. It is he that hath thrown down the Crocodiles and Bats from Prophane Altars; who hath broken so many idols; who hath overthrown so many Temples of the adulterers and murdering gods, to plant the honours of his heavenly Father. He hath invested the world during so many ages, with the shining of his face. He doth not cease to give light, nor to kindle in our hearts many inspirations, which are like so many stars to conduct us to the fountain of all our happiness. You are very blind if you do not see this, and much more miserable if you despise it.

2. It is most dangerous to do as the Jews did, to speak every day to the light, and yet love their own darkness. Screech-owls find holes and nights to keep themselves from day, which they cannot abide. But he that flies from the face of God, where can he find darkness enough to hide himself? When he shal be within the gulf of sin, his own conscience will light up a thousand torches to see his punishments. It is the worst of all mischiefs, to pay for the contempt of the fountain of light by suffering eternal darkness.

3. Let us behold the conversation of Jesus Christ as a sea mark, stickt all over with lights: his life gives Testimony of his Sanctity: his miracles publish his power; his law declares his infinite wisdom, his Sanctity gives us an example to imitate, his power gives the strength of Authority, to make him the more readily obeyed; and from his wisdom, faith is given us to regulate and govern our belief.

Aspirations.

O My Lord Jesus, the spirit of all beauties, and the most visible of all lights, what do the eies of my soul, if they be not alwaies busied in the contemplation of thy brightness. When I find thou art departed from me, me thinks I am buried within my self, and that my soul is nothing else, but a sepulchre of terrours, phantasms and deaths; But when thou returnest by thy visits and consolations, I am chearfully revived, and my heart leaps in thy presence, as a child rejoyceth at sight of his dear nurse. O Light of lights, which dost illuminate man coming into this world, I will contemplate thee at the sun-rising above all creatures. I will follow thee with mine eies all the day long, and I will not leave thee at sun-setting, for there is nothing can be in value near like thee. It belongs only to thee, (O Sun of my Soul) to arise at all hours, and to give light at Mid-night, as well as at Noon-day.

The

The Gospel upon Passion Sunday, Saint John the 8.

Upon these words, Who can accuse me of sin?

WHich of you shall argue me of sin? If I say the verity, why do you not believe me? He that is of God, heareth the words of God: therefore you hear not, because you are not of God. The Jews therefore answered, and said to him, Do not we say well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a Devil? Jesus answered, I have no Devil: but I do honour my Father, and you have dishonoured me. But I seek not mine own glory. There is that seeketh and judgeth. Amen, Amen, I say to you, if any man keep my word, he shall not see death for ever. The Jews therefore said, now we have known that thou hast a Devil; Abraham is dead, and the Prophets, and thou sayest, if any man keep my word, he shall not taste death for ever. Why, art thou greater then our Father Abraham who is dead? And the Prophets are dead. whom doest thou make thy self? Jesus answered, if I do glorify my self, my glory is nothing. It is my Father that glorifieth me, whom you say that he is your God, and you have not known him, but I know him. And if I shall say that I know him not, I shall be like to you, a liar: but I do know him, and do keep his word. Abraham your father rejoyced that he might see my day, and he saw and was glad. The Jews therefore said to him, Thou hast not yet fifty years, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said to them, Amen, Amen, I say to you, before that Abraham was made, I am. They took stones therefore to cast at him. But Jesus hid himself, and went out of the Temple.

Moralities.

1. THe Saviour of the world being resolved to suffer death as the Priest of his own sacrifice, and sacrifice of his priesthood, shews that it is an effect of his mercy, and not a suffering for any fault. He doth advance the standard of the Cross (which was the punishment of guilty persons) but he brought with him innocency, which is the mark of Saints: he honours it with his dolours, and sanctifies it with his bloud, to glorifie it in the estimation of all the just. He is without spot, and capable to take all stains, by his infinite sanctity: and yet he suffered as a sinner, to blot out all our sins. It is in this suffering he would have us all imitate him. He doth not require us to make a heaven, nor stars, nor to enlarge the sea, or to make the earth firm, but to make our selves holy as he is holy (according to our capacity.) And this we may gain by his favour, which he hath by his own nature. No man is worthy to suffer with Jesus, who doth not purifie himself by the sufferings of Jesus. If we suffer in sin, we carry the Cross of the bad thief. We must carry the Crosse of Jesus, and consecrate our tribulations by our own virtues.

2. It is said that the venomous serpent called a Basilisk (which kills both men and beasts by his pestilent breath) kills himself when he looks upon a looking glass, by the very reflection of his own poison. The Jews do here the very same. They come about this great mirrour of sanctity, which carried all the glory of the living God; he casts his beams upon them, but envy, the mother of murder (which kills it self onely by the rayes of golden arrows) makes them dart out venomous words to dishonour him: yet his incomparable virtue kills them, without losing any of his own brightnes; to teach us, that the beauty of innocency, is the best buckler against all slanders. Though it seem to be tarnished for a time, yet her brightnes will thereby become more lively: for it is a star which the blackest vail of night cannot darken.

3. Abraham did rejoyce at this day of God 2000. years before it was manifested to the world: All the Patriarchs did long after it; and did anticipate their felicities by the purity of their thoughts. This blessed Day hath been reserved for us, and yet many of us despise it. We so much love the day of man, that by the force of too much love to it, we forget the love of God. We should, and must contemn those perishing dayes of worldly honours and pleasures, which are covered with eternal night, that we may partake the eternity of that beautifull day, which shall never have any evening.

Aspirations.

O God of purity, in whose presence the Angels (ravished with admiration) do cover their faces with their wings, and have no sweeter extasies, then the admiration of thy beauty: The stars are not pure enough before thy redoubted Majesty. The Sun beholds thee as the true Authour of his light. Thou onely canst purifie all humane kind, by a sanctity which spreads it self over all Ages. Alas, I am confounded to see my sinfull soul so often dyed black with so many stains, and beastly ordures, before those most pure beams of thy glory. Wash, O wash again out all that which displeaseth thee. Regenerate in my heart a Spirit, that shall be worthy thy self. How shall I follow thee to Mount Calvarie, if I be pursued with so many ill habits, which I have often detested before thine eyes? How can I go in company with the first and greatest of all Saints, drawing after me so many sins? The increase of my offences would multiply thy crosses: I will therefore do my best to drown all my imperfections within thy bloud. I will procure light to my nights (by that bright and beautifull day which Abraham saw) from that glorious day which took beginning from thy Cross. I will no more care for the day of man, that I may the better apply my self to the day of God.

The Gospel upon Munday the fifth week in Lent, Saint John 7.

Jesus said to the Pharisees, You shall seek and not find me: and he that is thirsty, let him come to me.

AND the Princes and Pharisees sent Ministers to apprehend him. Jesus therefore said to them: Yet a little time, and I will be with you, and I go to him that sent me: you seek me, and shall not find, and where I am ye cannot come. The Jews therefore said among themselves, whether will this man go, that we shall not find him? Will he go into the dispersion of the Gentile, and teach the Gentiles? what is this saying, that he hath said? You shall seek me, and shall not find: and where I am, you cannot come.

And in the last, the great day of the festivity, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. He that believeth in me, as the Scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. (And this he said of the Spirit) that they should receive, which believed in him.

Moralities.

1. TAke for your comfort this excellent word of our Saviour: he that is thirsty and desires in this world to thirst after God, let him come unto me, and he shall quench his thirst at the chiefest fountain. S. Augustine saith, We are all here, as David was in the desart of Idumea: our life is a perpetual alteration, which will never be settled while we live. If we be weary, we desire rest, and if we rest over-long, our bed becomes troublesom, though it should be all of roses. Then again, we thirst to be in action and business, which also in a short time tires us, and puts us into another alteration, and that carries us again to a desire to do nothing. All our life goeth like Penelopes web: what one hour effects, the next destroys. We do sufficiently perceive that we are not well in this world: It is a large bed, but very troublesom, wherein every man stirs and tumbles himself up and down, but no man can here attain to his perfect happines.

2. This ſhews us plainly that we are made for God, & that we ſhould thirſt after divine things, if we deſire true contentment. There is no default in him, becauſe all that can be deſired, is there; and yet there is no ſuperfluity, becauſe there can be nothing beyond him. There only we abound without neceſſity, we are aſſured without fear, and glorious without change. And it is there only where we find all our ſatisfactions perfectly accompliſhed. For to ſpeak truth, contentment conſiſteth in four principal things, which are; to have a contenting object; to have a heart capable to apprehend it; to feel a ſtrong inclination to it, and to enter into an abſolute full poſſeſſion of it. Now God hath provided for all this by his infinite bounty. He will not have us affect any other object of pleaſure but his own. He is God, and therefore can have nothing but God for his ſatisfaction, and intends graciouſly that we ſhall have the ſame. He will have us thirſt after him, and quench our thirſt within himſelf: and to this, our ſoul is ſingularly diſpoſed; for as God is a ſpirit, ſo is our ſoul only ſpiritual. We have ſo ſtrong an inclination to love God, that even our vices themſelves (without thinking what they do) love ſomewhat of God. For if pride affect greatnes, there can be nothing ſo great, as the Monarch of it. If luxury, love pleaſure, God containeth all pure delights in his boſom: and this which I ſay, may be verified of all ſins whatſoever. If the preſence of a right object, and the enjoying be wanting, we have nothing ſo preſent as God. S. Paul ſaith, We are all within him, within him we live, and within him we have the fountain of all our motions: we ſee him through all his creatures, until he take off the veil, and ſo let us ſee him, and taſt of his Glory.

3. A true and perfect way to make us thirſt after God, is to forſake the burning thirſt which we have after bodily and worldly goods. Our ſoul and fleſh go in the ſeveral ſcales of a ballance, the riſing of one, pulls down the other. It is a having two wives, for us to think we can place all our delights in God, and withal enjoy all worldly contentments. A man muſt have a conſcience free from earthly matters, to receive the infuſion of grace: we muſt paſs by Calvary, before we come to Tabor; and firſt taſt gall with Jeſu, before we can taſt that honey-comb, which he took after his reſurrection.

Aſpirations.

O God, true God of my ſalvation, My heart which feeleth it ſelf moved with an affectionate zeal, thinks always upon thee, and in thinking, finds an earneſt thirſt after thy beauties, which heats my veins. My ſoul is all conſumed, and I find that my fleſh it ſelf inſenſibly followeth the violence of my ſpirit. I am here, as within the Deſarts of Africa, in a barren world, the drought whereof makes it a direct habitation for Dragons. O my God, I am tormented with this flame, and yet I cheriſh it more then my ſelf. Will there be no good Lazarus found to dip the end of his finger within the fountain of the higheſt Heaven, a little to allay the burning of my thirſt? Do not tell me (O my dear Spouſe) that there is a great Chaos between thee and me. Thou haſt already paſſed it in coming to me by thy bounty; and wilt not thou lift me up then by thy mercy?

The Goſpel upon Tueſday the fifth week in Lent, S. John 7.

Jeſus went not into Jewry, becauſe the Jews had a purpoſe to take away his life.

After theſe things Jeſus walked into Galilee; for he would not walk into Jewry, becauſe the Jews ſought to kill him. And the feſtival day of the Jews Scenopegia was at hand. And his brethren ſaid to him, Paſs from hence, and go into Jewry, that thy Diſciples alſo may ſee thy works which thou doſt. For no man doth any thing in ſecret, and ſeeketh himſelf to be in publick; if thou do theſe things, manifeſt thy ſelf to the world. for neither did his brethren believe in him; Jeſus therefore ſaith to them, My time is not yet come: but your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you, but me it hateth, becauſe I give teſtimony of it, that the works thereof are evil. Go you up to this feſtival day, I go not up to this feſtival day; becauſe my time is not yet accompliſhed.

When he had ſaid theſe things, himſelf tarried in Galilee: But after his brethren were gone up, then he alſo went up to the feſtival day, not openly, but as it were in ſecret. The Jews therefore ſought him in the feſtival day, and ſaid, where is he? And there was much murmuring in the multitude, of him. For certain ſaid, that he is good. And others ſaid, No, but he ſeduceth the multitudes: yet no man ſpake openly of him for fear of the Jews.

Moralities.

1. JEſus hides himſelf in this Goſpel, (as the Sun within a cloud) to ſhew himſelf at his own time: to teach us, that all the ſecrets of our life conſiſteth in well concealing, and well diſcovering our ſelves. He did conceal the life which he took from nature, when he might have been born a perfect man, as well as Adam, and yet did he hide himſelf in the hay of a baſe ſtable. He concealeth his life of grace, diſſembling under ſilence, ſo many great and divine virtues, as if he had lockt up the ſtars under lock and key, as holy Job ſaith. He keeps ſecret his life of Glory, retaining for thirty three years the light of his ſoul, which ſhould without intermiſſion have glorified and caſt a divine brightneſs upon his body. But when he concealed himſelf, the ſtars diſcovered him at his birth, the Sun at his death; all the Elements did then confeſs him, & all creatures gave teſtimony of his Divinity.

2. We ſhould be well known of God, if we did not ſo curiouſly enquire into the knowledge of the world. Vanity at this day opens all her gates to manifeſt divers men to the world, who ſhould otherwiſe be buried in obſcurity and darkneſs. It maketh ſome appear by the luxurious acceſs of their apparel, as ſo many ſale creatures, whoſe heads (being high and coſtly dreſt up) go to the market of idle love. Others by the riches and pomps of this world: others by honours and dignities: others by the ſpirit of induſtry; and others by the deeds of arms and policy. Every one ſets out himſelf to be ſeen and eſteemed in the world. It ſeemeth that life is made for nothing but to be ſhewed, and that we ſhould always live, for that which makes us die. We are a kind of walking ſpirits, which return late to our lodgings: but yet nevertheleſs, giving our ſelves ſo continually to the world, me-thinks we ſhould at leaſt ſtay with our ſelves every day one ſhort hour. It is ſaid, that the Pellican hides her Eggs, and that they muſt be ſtollen from her, to make them diſcloſe. But vanity is an egg, which all the world hatcheth under her wings, and none are willing to forſake it.

3. If it be needful to ſhew your ſelf to the world, be the known by your virtues, which are characters of the Divinity. Let men know you by your good examples, which are the ſeeds of eternity, and of all fair actions. You muſt be known by your alms and bounty, which are the ſteps which God left imprinted printed in this world. If you muſt riſe to honours and dignities, take them as inſtruments of holineſs: and be not powerful, but to be more obliged to do good by ſo being.

Aſpirations.

O God, which didſt conceal thy ſelf; how comes it about, that I deſire ſo much to be ſeen, and make my ſelf known to the world? What can I diſcover, if I ſhew that which I am, but only ſin, vanity, miſery, and inconſtancy, which make the four elements of my life? To what ſerves this itch of ſeeing, but only to receive into our eies the ſeeds of curioſity? Why do we covet to be ſo much ſeen, but to expoſe our ſelves to vanity, and to carry a Torch in a blaſt of wind? Alaſs (O merciful Lord) I have very long lived for my ſelf, and for the eies of the world, when ſhal I begin to live for thee? Shal I never ſee thoſe happy moments of my life, which will receive light only from the day of thy face? Let me (O moſt beloved of my heart) be blind to all the world, ſo that I may have eies for thee. If the condition of my eſtate muſt needs ſhew me to the world, let it be to give it part of thy light, without receiving any part of that darkneſs which covereth it. Let me be in the world to do good, but let me dwell in thee, as within the Fountain of all goodneſs,

The Goſpel upon Wedneſday the fifth week in Lent, S. John 10.

The Jews ſaid, If thou be the Meſſias tell us plainly.

And the Dedication was in Jeruſalem, and it was in winter: And Jeſus walked in the Temple in Solomons Porch. The Jews therefore compaſſed him round about, and ſaid to him, How long doſt thou hold our ſoul in ſuſpence? if thou be Chriſt, tell us openly. Jeſus anſwered them, I ſpeak to you, and you believe not. The works that I do in the name of my Father, they give teſtimony of me. But you do not believe, becauſe you are not of my ſheep. My ſheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give them life everlaſting, and they ſhal not periſh for ever, and no man ſhal pluck them out of my hand. My Father, that which he hath given me, is greater then all, and no man can pluck them out of the hand of my Father. I and the Father are one.

The Jews took up ſtones to ſtone him: Jeſus anſwered them, Many good works I have ſhewed you from my Father, for which of theſe works do you ſtone me? The Jews anſwered him, for a good work we ſtone thee not, but for blaſphemy, and becauſe thou, being a man, makeſt thy ſelf God. Jeſus anſwered them: Is it not written in your Law, that I ſaid, You are Gods? If he called them Gods, to whom the word of God was made, and the Scripture cannot be broken: whom the Father hath ſanctified, and ſent into the world, ſay you, That thou blaſpemeſt, becauſe I ſaid, I am the Son of God? If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, and if you will not believe me, believe the works, that you may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in the Father.

Moralities.

1. THe Wolfs encompaſs the good ſhepheard, counterfeiting Lambs, to draw truth out of his mouth, which they would perſecute. They reſembled a certain plant, which carrieth the name and ſhape of a Lamb, but hath a contrary ſubſtance, and different qualities; for it is ravenous as a wolf, and devours all the herbs which grow about it. So are there many who do inſinuate themſelves into the friendſhip of good men, by fair (but counterfeit) reſpects, to the end that afterward they may be made the object of their cruelty. Thoſe men look after the Meſſias in the Porch of Solomon, as Herod ſought after him in the Manger, not to adore, but to kill him. Their mouth carries hony, when their heart hatcheth poiſon: but nothing is unknown to God, from whom hell it ſelf hath not darkneſs enough to hide it ſelf.

2. Jeſus knows his flock, and his flock reciprocally knows him, and in that conſiſts all our happineſs, to know God, and to be known of him. The chiefeſt of all wiſdom, is to know him, and to be known by him, and to be written in the Book of life, which is the laſt and chiefeſt of all felicities. It is true, that he knows all things by the knowledg of a clear intelligence, which ſerves the wicked only to diſcover plainly their crimes: whereas he knows the juſt by a ſcience of favour and approbation which indeed is eternal predeſtination. If we be unknown to God, we muſt make our ſelves known to him by ſome good virtue, which doth not depend only upon us. The firſt beam is of prevenient grace, and our vocation to Chriſtianity, which is part of our predeſtination, and is not all within our power. We have not been elected, becauſe we have believed in God by our own forces; but we believe, becauſe we have been elected. The firſt knowledg come purely from God, but it is in us by his grace, to purſue this firſt light, and to advance our predeſtination to glory, by forcing our ſelves to know him perfectly, who hath known us ſo liberally.

3. Jeſus will not be known ſingly by his words, but by his works. Our words muſt agree with our good actions, as the needle of a clock agrees with the ſprings. When we have heard or read ſome good doctrine, that Sermon, or reading, muſt paſs into our manners. It is ſurely a ſtrange thing, that many employ their leiſure to know much, and yet will not ſpend ſome conſiderable time, to make themſelves good Chriſtians. We muſt be Philoſophers, more by imitating the example of God, then by any curious enquiry of his greatneſs. Our Chriſtianitie teacheth us, that we ſhould be more knowing and skilful in the practiſe of our life, then of our tongue; and that we are rather made to perform great actions, then to ſpeak them. We muſt have a ſpecial care that our hands do not give our mouth the lie. What can we gain (in the judgment of God) by being like thoſe trees, which have a fair outſide, garniſhed with leaves, yet good for nothing but to give a ſhadow, and to make a little noiſe when the wind blows? God requires of us fruit, ſince he is the Father of all fertilitie, and nothing is barren in the land of the living.

Aſpirations.

O My God, I know thee, becauſe thou was firſt pleaſed to know me: Thou haſt known me by thy goodneſs, and I will do my beſt to know thee, that I may obtain all happineſs. O that I might know that my name is written in the Book of life; & alſo know the life which I may poſſeſs within the heart of Jeſus, in which ſo many lives do live. O how ſhould I then find my ſpirit raviſhed in thoſe beautiful Idæa's of glory? Fix thine eies on me (O Lord) and thou ſhalt thereby bring to me the fountain of all happineſs. The Father hath given me to thee, and I am the conqueſt of thy precious blood: Suffer not a ſoul to be taken away from thee, which hath coſt thee ſo many ſweats and ſufferings. I am thine by ſo many titles, that I will be no more mine own, but only to have the right of renouncing that which I am, and to eſtabliſh what ſhal be thine in this little kingdome of my heart.

The Goſpel upon Thurſday, the fifth week in Lent, S. John 7.

Upon S. Mary Magdalen's waſhing our Saviour's feet in the Phariſees houſe.

And one of the Phariſees deſired him to eat with him. And he being entred into the houſe of the Phariſee, he ſate down down to meat. And behold, a woman that was in the Citie, a sinner, as she knew that he sat down in the Pharisees house, she brought an Alabaster box of ointment; and standing behind, beside his feet, she began to water his feet with teares, and wiped them with the haires of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with ointment. And the Pharisee that had bid him, seeing it, spake within himself, saying, This man, if he were a Prophet, would know certes, who and what manner of woman she is which toucheth him, that she is a sinner. And Jesus answering, said to him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee. But he said, Master, say. A certain Creditour had two debtours, one did ow five hundred peace, and the other fifty; they having not wherewith to pay, he forgave both, whether therefore do'h love him more? Simon answering, said, I suppose that he to whom he forgave more. But he said to him, Thou hast judged rightly. And turning to the woman, he said unto Simon, Doest thou see this woman? I entred into thy house, water to my feet thou didst not give: but she with teares hath watered my feet, and with her haires hath wiped them. Kiss thou gavest me not; but she, since I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet. With oyl thou didst not anoint my head but she with ointment hath anointed my feet. For the which I say unto thee, many sins are forgiven her, because she hath loved much. But to whom less is forgiven, he loveth less. And he said to her, Thy sins are forgiven thee. And they that sate together at the table, began to say within themselves, Who is this that also forgiveth sins? And he said to the woman, Thy faith hath made thee safe, Go in peace.

Moralities.

1. SAint Mary Magdalen is under the feet of Jesus Christ, as is that work of Saphires (mentioned in Exodus) under the feet of God. It is a work wrought by the right hand of the Highest, the wonder of women, the most happy of all lovers; who made profit of sin, which destroyes all; who sanctified that love, which so little knew the way to any sanctity. This is the fountain mentioned in the Book of Esther, in the vision of Mordocheus; A fountain which became a river, and after changes it self into the Sun, which gives beams and showers at one instant. She is a fountain at the Pharisees table, she is a river in her solitary grove, she is a Sun both in Paradise, and in that great exaltation, wherein the Catholick Church now beholds her. Being now in glory, she doth not yet forbear to open fountains of teares (by imitation of her) within the souls of repentant sinners, of whom incessantly she procures the conversion. Happy is that heart which is pierced with the imitation of her virtues, thereby to gain some part of her crowns.

2. Every thing is admirable in her conversion: A sinner wounded with love, cures her self by love. She changes the fire of Babylon, into that of Jerusalem. She plucks out of her wound the venomous dart of worldly love, to make large room for the arrows of Jesus, which pierce her heart; and at an instant make a harmony of heavenly passions within the bottom of her soul. She holds the wound dearer then life, and goes streight to her conquerour, to desire death, or increase of love.

3. She appears most ingenious in her affections, to provide no water wherewith to wash her Masters feet, since she could draw it so fitly out of her own eyes. This was the water which Jesus did thirst after, when he asked of the Samaritan woman some to drink; But that poor woman was so astonished, that she forsook her pitcher, and forgot that which Jesus asked. Now the holy Magdalen brings her eyes to the Pharisees table, as to vessels full of Chrystall water, which was of that pure stream which comes from the holy Lamb. Heaven is wont to water the earth, but here the earth waters Heaven. A soul which was before black, and burnt up with the fire of concupiscence, provides a Fountain for the KING of highest Heaven. She draws tears from her sins, to make them become the joyes of Paradise.

4. She sanctifies all that which was esteemed most prophane. Her hairs, which were the nets wherein so many captive souls did sigh under the yoke of wanton love, are now (as the ensigns and standards of wicked Cupid) trampled under the feet of her Conquerour. Those kisses, which carried the poison of a luxurious passion in her heart, do now breath from her nothing but the delicacies of chastity. Her pleasing odours which were before vowed to sensuality, are now become the sweetest exhalations from that Amber Isle, which brings an odoriferous perfume to Jesus Christ. She brings with her, Aromatick spices, to burn her self at the Mountain of her Sun who makes himself her Priest, her Advocate, and Bride-man.

5. She had gained the great Jubilee, and was assured of it, by the word of the Eternal Bishop; and yet during all the rest of her life, she practised upon her self a sanctified revenge, and her penance never ends, but with her life; to confound our coldness, who know so little what it is to bewail a sin. She is as timorous in the assurance of her pardon, as we are secure at the approach of Gods justice. No body could be so patient, and so constant in her love, but she, that had a holy emulation toward heavenly charity. It is her perseverance which draws to the earth a perfect copy of that life (without limit) which the blessed souls enjoy in heaven. It is she alone to whom eternity was then given, because she had power to offer repentant frailty to Eternity it self.

Aspirations:

Upon Saint Mary Magdalens great Repentance.

O Jesus, my Conquerour, and my Sovereign Bishop, thou art pleased to be satisfied of thy unworthy servant; but I am not yet content with my self. No, no, my life and penance shall end together, since I have lost that which should never have been separated from my body, before the separation of my soul. And since I cannot enter chast into my grave, I will now go repentant into an obscure and savage Cave, where the Sun shal shine no more upon a head so sinfull as mine. Mine eyes (O mine eyes) who have first received that fire which hath so passionately devoured my soul, I will make you imitate the Pond of Hesebond, and sooner shall those two fountains be dried up, which serve the stream of Jordan, then you shal want water to wash the steps of your Concupiscences. I will have that neck (which hath suffered it self to be embraced by unlawfull Arms) held under the yoke of him that hath overcome me, and so happily subjected me to his Empire. These arms and hands, which have been the chains of wanton embracements, shall henceforth for ever be lifted up to Heaven in prayer, and they shall have no other Altars, but the feet of my Lord and Master, if I dare think my self worthy to kiss them. This mouth, which hath been the gate of unchastity, shall now become a Temple of God's praises. And this heart, which hath been a burning furnace of worldly love, shall be a burning lamp of holy affections before God; and shall have no other oyl to maintain it, but that water which shall be drawn from mine eyes. O my God, since I have so betrayed my heart, abused my youth, spent prodigally thy Treasures, and made crowns to Baal out of thy silver; since I have forsaken thee, who art eternal, unchangeable, and incomparable Goodness (without whom all other goods are nothing) to follow low a wanton fire, which hath brought me to the brim of everlasting precipice: where shall I find sufficient tears to wash my offences? where shall I find enow parts of my body, to be continually offered up as the sacrifice of my repentance? I would make my life immortal, to have my pains so lasting, and if thy mercy will not let me be the object of thy vengeance, let me at least serve for a sacrifice at thy Altars.

The Gospel upon Friday the fifth week in Lent, S. John. 11.

The Jews said, What shall we do? for this man doth many miracles.

The chief Priests and the Pharisees, gathered a Council, and said, What shall we do? for this man doth many signs: if we let him alone so, all will believe in him, and the Romans will come and take away our place and Nation. But one of them named Caiaphas, being the High Priest of that year, said to them, You know nothing, neither do you consider that it is expedient for us, that one man dy for the people, and the whole Nation perish not. And this he said not of himself, but being the High Priest of that year, he prophesied that Jesus should dy for the Nation: and not only for the Nation, but to gather in one, the children of God that were dispersed. From that day therefore they devised to kill him. Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews, but he went into the Country beside the Desert, unto a City that is called Ephrem, and there he abode with his Disciples.

Moralities.

1. ONe of the greatest Tragedies acted in the life of man, which makes curious persons to question, wise men to wonder, good men to groan, and the wicked to rejoyce; is to see an innocent man oppressed by colour of justice. Now Jesus being resolved to espouse our miseries, as far as they can reach, was pleased to pass through those rigours and formalities of the wicked, coloured with a pretext of equity. He is not here condemned by a mean people without consideration, without power, without formality of process. But by these chief Priests and principal men of that Nation assembled in Council; they informed themselves, they reason, and conclude his death. The Lions of Solomon's throne, did anciently bear certain Writs of the Law, to signifie, that it was to be handled by courageous and clear-seeing Judges. But here Foxes got it into their hands, and did manage it by crafty deceits and wickedness. Alas, we are far from the Laws of God, when we cannot abide the least word spoken against our reputation. We are troubled to suffer for innocency, as if it were a greater honour to suffer for a direct offence. Shall we never think, that the triumph of virtue consists in well doing, and thereby sometimes receiving harm, even from those who are esteemed good men?

2. There are some difficulties in affairs, where truth is shut up, as within a cloud. Wise men can hardly find out where the point lies; but God doth so order it, that falshood leaves always certain marks by which it may be known; and the beauty of truth is ever like that lake of Africk, which early or late discovers all that is cast into it, and makes all impostures plainly appear, when we think they are most concealed. And this appears by the proceeding of Caiaphas, who chose to condemn Christ, for those things which were the certain tokens, that he was the true Messias. He concluded his death by reason of his miracles, and those gave him authority, as to the Prince of life. A troubled spirit makes darts of every thing, (which it can) to fight against reason, and kills it self, not suspecting its own poyson.

3. The Devil publisheth Jesus for the true Messias, and so doth likewise Caiaphas prophesie the same. It is not always a certain mark of goodness to speak that which is good, but it is an assurance of virtue to avoid that which is ill. There are many from whom good works do escape, while they both think and do ill. Truth makes use of their tongues, when Devils command their hearts. It is this which makes us to see our Saviour's Empire, and the extent of his conquests, which is not limited by time, he being already entred into possession of Eternity: and it is not bounded by place; because it contains all Immensity. Night hath no power to cover it, because it is light it self: It cannot be shut up in any deceitful shadow, because it scatters and discovers all falshood: it cannot be comprehended within our senses, because it exceeds their capacity; and it is present in all places, being omnipotent and eternal in all time.

Aspirations.

O Jesus, Father of all blessed unions, who hast suffered death to unite all the children of God together, who are scattered over all the Countries of the world; wilt thou have no pity of my heart, so many times torn in pieces, and strayed among a great multitude of objects, which estrange and draw me from the first of all Unities? My soul melts through all the Gates of my senses, by running after so many creatures which do kindle covetousnes, but never serve to refresh or cool the heat of it. Draw me (O Lord) from the great throng of so many exteriour things, that I may retire into my own heart, and from thence arise to thine, where I may find that peace, which thou hast cemented fast with thy most precious blood.

When shall I see the first beams of that liberty, which thou grantest to thy children? When shall my thoughts return from wandring in those barren regions, where thou art not acknowledged? When shall I be re-united, and so purified by thy favours, that they may celebrate continual days of feast in my soul? I am already there in desire, and shall be there in presence, when by help of thine infinite grace and mercy, I can be wholly thine.

The Gospel upon Saturday, the fifth week in Lent, S. John. 12.

The chief Priests thought to kill Lazarus, because the miracle upon him, made many follow JESUS.

But the chief Priests devised for to kill Lazarus also; because many for him of the Jews went away, and believed in Jesus.

And on the morrow a great multitude that was come to a festival day, when they had heard that Jesus cometh to Jerusalem, they took the boughs of Palms, and went forth to meet him, and cried, Hosanna, blessed is he that cometh in the name of our Lord, the King of Israel. And Jesus found a young Ass, and sate upon it, as it is written, Fear not daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting upon an Asses colt. These things his Disciples did not know at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then they remembered that these things had been written of him, and these things they did to him. The multitude therefore gave testimony, which was with him when he called Lazarus out of the grave, and raised him from the dead. For therefore all the multitude came to meet him, because they heard that he had done this sign. The Pharisees therefore said among themselves, Do you see that we prevail nothing? Behold the whole world is gone after him.

And there were certain Gentiles of them that came up to adore in the festival day. These therefore came to Philip, who was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and desired him, saying, Sir, we are desirous to see Jesus. Philip cometh and telleth Andrew. Again, Andrew and Philip told Jesus: but Jesus answered them, saying, the hour is come that the Son of man shall be glorified. Amen, Amen, I say to you, unless the grain of wheat falling into the ground, dy, it self remaineth alone: but if it dy, it bringeth much fruit. He that loveth his life, shall loose it: and he that hateth his life in this world, doth keep it to life everlasting. If any man minister to me, let him follow me: and where I am, there also shall my minister be. If any man minister to me, my Father will honour him.

Moralities.

1. ADmire here the extasies of our sweet Saviour: He is ravished by the object of his death, and is transported by the Idæa of his sufferings. The trumpet of Heaven sounded in the voice which was heard by this great multitude. He encourages himself to his combat; he looks confidently upon the Cross, as the fountain of his glories, and planted his elevation upon the lowest abasements. Shall not we love this Cross, which Jesus hath cherished as his Spouse? He gave up his soul in the arms of it to conquer our souls. We shal never be worthy of him, till we bear the Ensigns of his war, and the ornaments of his peace. Every thing is a Paradise to him, that knows how to love the Cross: and every thing is hell to those who flie from it; and no body flies it, but shal find it. It is the gate of our mortality, whither we must all come, though we turn our backs to it.

2. What a great secret it is, to hate our soul, that we may love it; To hate it for a time, that we may love it for all eternity; to punish it in this life, to give it thereby a perpetual rest in that to come; To despise it, that we may honour it? To handle it roughly, that it may be perfectly established in all delights? And yet this is the way which all just men have passed, to arrive at the chiefest point of their rest. They have resembled the Flowers-de-luce, which weep for a time, and out of their own tears produce seeds which renew their beauties. The salt sea for them becomes a flourishing field, as it did to the people of God, when they came forth of the chains of Egypt. The cloud which appeared to the Prophet Ezechiel, carried with it winds and storms: but it was environed with a golden circle; to teach us, that the storms of afflictions which happen to Gods children, are encompassed with brightness, and smiling felicity. They must rot as a grain of wheat, that they may bud out and flourish in the ear. They must abide the diversity of times, and endure the sythe and flail; They must be ground in a mill, and pass by water and fire, before they can be made bread pleasing to Jesus Christ. Our losses are our advantages; we loose nothing, but to gain by it; we humble and abase our selves, to be exalted; we despoil our selves to be better cloathed, and we mortifie our selves, to be revived. O what a grain of wheat is Jesus Christ, who hath past all these trials, to make the heighth of all heavenly glories bud out of his infinite sufferings.

Aspirations.

O God, I have that passionate desire, which these strangers had, to see Jesus. I do not ask it of Philip, nor shal Philip have cause to ask Andrew. My Jesus, I ask it of thy self. Thou art beautiful even in the way of the Cross; Thou didst shew thy self courageous in the Abyss of thy pains: thou art admirable in the contempt of death. The heavenly trumpet hath already sounded for thee, and chearfulness gives wings to carry thee to this great combat, where death and life fight singly together: which makes life die for a time, and death live for ever. I will forsake my very soul, to follow thee in this Agony, and find my life in thy death, as thou hast extinguished death in thy life.

The Gospel upon Palm-Sunday, S. Matthew 21.

Our SAVIOUR came in triumph to Jerusalem a little before his Passion.

AND when they drew nigh to Jerusalem, and were come to Bethphage, unto mount Olivet, then Jesus sent two Disciples, saying to them, Go ye into the Town that is against you, and immediately you shall find an Ass tied, and a colt with her: loose them, and bring them to me. And if any man shall say ought unto you, say ye, That our Lord hath need of them, and forthwith he will let them go. And this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Prophet, saying, Say ye to the daughter of Sion, Behold thy King cometh to thee, meek, and sitting upon an Ass, and a Colt, the foal of her that is used to the yoke. And the Disciples going, did as Jesus commanded them: and they brought the Ass and the Colt, and laid their garments upon them, and made him to sit thereon. And a very great multitude spred their garments in the way: and others did cut boughs from the trees, and strawed them in the way, and the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying: Hosanna to the Son of David, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

Moralities.

1. OUr Saviour goes to his death in triumph: he appears to be a King, but a King of hearts, who requires nothing of us, but our selves, only to make us happy and contented in him. He triumphs before the victory, because none but he could be sure of the future certainty of his happiness. But he watered his triumphs with tears, to weep for our joys, which were to proceed out of his sadness. It is related by an ancient Oratour, that when Constantine made his entry into great Britany, (where he was born) the people received him with so great applause, that they kissed the Sails and Oars of the vessel which brought him, and were ready to pave the streets with their bodies for him to tread on. If they did so for a mortal man, what should we not do for an eternal God, who comes to buy us with his precious blood, and demands entrance into our hearts, only to give us Paradise.

2. He walks towards his Cross, amongst the cries of favours and joy; to teach us, with what chearfulness we should conform our selves to abide our own sufferings; imitating the Apostles, who received their first reproaches, as Manna from heaven. He would have us prepared and resolved always to suffer death patiently; whether it be a death which raiseth up our spirit to forsake sensuality, or a natural death. Whether soever it be, we should embrace it as the day which must bring us to our lodging, after a troublesom pilgrimage. Doth it not appear plainly, that those who are loath to forsake the world, are like herbs put into an earthen pot among straw and dung, and yet would be unwilling to come forth of it. The furniture of our worldly lodging grown rotten, the roof is ready to fall upon our heads, the foundation shakes under our feet, and we fear that day, which (if we our selves will) shal be the morning of our eternall happiness. It is not death, but only the opinion of it, which is terrible, and every man considers it according to the disposition of his own spirit.

3. The Palm-branches which we carry in our hands, require from us the renewing of a life purifi'd and cleansed in the bloud of the holy Lamb. In the beginning of Lent we take upon our heads the ashes of Palm-branches, to teach us, that we do then enter (as it were) into the Sepulchre of repentance: But now we carry green bows, to make us know, that now we come out of the tomb of Ashes, to enter again into the strength of doing good works, in imitation of the trees, which having been covered with snow, and buried in the sharpness of winter, do again begin to bud out in the Spring-time.

4. The garments spread under the feet of Jesus, declare, that all our temporal goods should be employed towards his glory; and that we must forsake our affections to all things which perish, that we may be partakers of his Kingdom. No man can stand firm, that is delighted with moveable things. He that is subject to worldly affections, binds himself to a wheel which turns about continually. Jesus accepted this triumph, only to despise it: he reserved the honour of it in his own hands, to drown it in the flood of his tears, and in the sea of his precious blood. If you be rich and wealthy, do not publish it vainly, but let the poor feel it. You must live amongst all the greatness and jollity of this world, as a man whose only business must be to go to God.

Aspirations.

O Sovereign King of hearts, after whom all chast loves do languish, I am filled with joy to see thee walk amongst the cries of joy, and the Palms and garments of thy admirers, which served for carpets. I am ravished with thy honours and the delights of thy glory, and I applaud thy triumphs. Alas, that all the earth is not obedient unto thy laws; and that the tongues of all people do not make one voice, to acknowledge thee sole Monarch of Heaven and earth. Triumph at least in the hearts of thy faithful servants (O my magnificent Master) make a triumphal Ark composed of hearts; Put fire to it with thy adored hand: pour out one spark of that heat, which thou camest to spread upon the earth. Let every thing burn for thee, and consume it self in thy love. I do irrevocably bind my heart to the magnificence of thy triumph, and I love better to be thy slave, then to be saluted King of the whole world.

The Gospel upon Munday in holy week Saint John 12.

Saint Mary Magdalen anointed our Saviours feet with precious Ointment: at which Judas repined.

JEsus therefore six days before the Pasche, came to Bethania, where Lazarus was, that had been dead, whom Jesus raised and they made him a supper there, and Martha ministred, but Lazarus was one of them that sate at the table with him. Mary therefore took a pound of Ointment of right Spikenard, precious, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled of the odour of the Ointment. One therefore of his Disciples, Judas Iscariot, he that was to betray him, said; Why was not this Ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? And he said this, not because he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and having the purse, carried the things that were put in it. Jesus therefore said, Let her alone, that she may keep it for the day of my burial: for the poor you have always with you: but me you shall not have always. A great multitude of the Jews knew that he was there: and they came, not for Jesus onely, but that they might see Lazarus, whom he raised from the dead.

Moralities.

1. Lazarus being raised from his grave, converseth familiarly with Jesus; and to preserve the life which he had newly received, he ties himself continually to the fountain of lives: to teach us, that since we have begun to make a stronge conversion from sin to grace, we must not be out of the sight of God: we must live with him, and of him; with him, by applying our spirit, our prayers, our fervours, our passionate sighs toward him: and live of him, by often receiving the blessed Sacrament. Happy they (saith the Angel in the Apocalyps) who are invited to the wedding-supper of the Lamb. But note, that he who invites us to this feast, stands upright amidst the Sun, to signifie, that we should be as pure as the beams of light, when we come unto the most holy Sacrament. Lazarus did eat bread with his Lord: but, (to speak with S. Augustine) he did not then eat the bread of our Lord; and yet this great favour is reserved for you, when you are admitted to that heavenly banquet, where God makes himself meat, to give you an Antepast of his Immortality.

2. God will have us acknowledge his benefits, by the faithfulness of our services. S. Peter's mother-in-law, as soon as she was healed of her Feaver, presently served her Physician. And observe, that Martha served the Authour of life, who had redeemed her brother from the power of death. The faithful Mary, who had shed tears, gave what she had most precious, and observes no measure in the worth, because Jesus cannot be valued. Cleopatra's pearl (estimated to be worth 200000 crowns) which she made her friend swallow at a Banquet, this holy woman, thought too base; she melts her heart in a sacred Limbeck of love, and distils it out by her eys. And Jesus makes so great account of her waters and perfumes, that he would suffer no body to wash his feet, when he instituted the blessed Sacrament, as not being willing to deface the sacred characters of his sacred Lover.

3. Judas murmures and covers his villanous passion of Avarice, under the colour of charity and mercy towards the poor. And just so do many cover their vices with a specious shew of virtue. The proud man would be thought magnanimous; the prodigal would pass for liberal: the covetous for a good husband; the brain-sick rash man, would be reputed courageous: the glutton a hospitable good fellow: sloath puts on the face of quietness, timorousness of wisdom, impudence of boldness, insolence of liberty, and over-confident or sawcy prating, would be taken for eloquence. Many men (for their own particular interests) borrow some colours of the publick good; and very many actions, both unjust and unreasonable, take upon them a semblance of piety. S. Irenæus saith, that many give water coloured with sleckt white-lime or plaster, in stead of milk. *And all their life is but a Farse, where Blackamoors are whited over with meal. Poor truth suffers much more amongst these cozenages: but you must take notice, that in the end, wicked and dissembling Judas did burst, and shew his damned soul stark naked. Yet some think fairly to cover foul intentions, who must needs know well, that hypocrisie hath no veil to cozen death.

*A Farse is a French Jig, wherein the faces of all the actours are whited over with meal.

Aspirations.

I See no Altars in all the world more amiable then the feet of our Saviour; I will go by his steps to find his feet; and by the excellencies of the best of men, I will go find out the God of gods. Those feet are admirable, and S. John hath well described them to be made of mettal, burning in a Furnace: they are feet of mettal by their constancy, and feet of fire by the enflamed affections of their Master. Let Judas murmure at it, what he will: but if I had a Sea of sweet odours, and odoriferous perfumes, I would empty them all upon an object so worthy of love. Give (O mine eys) give at least tears to this precious Holocaust, which goes to sacrifice it self for satisfaction of your libidinous concupiscences. Wash it with your waters, before it wash you with its blood. O my soul, seek not after excrements of thy head to dry it: thy hairs are thy thoughts, which must only think of him, who thought so kindly and passionately of thee, on the day of his Eternity.

The Gospel upon Maunday Thursday, S. John the 13.

Of our Saviours washing the feet of his Apostles.

And before the festival day of the Pasche, Jesus knowing that his hour was come, that he should pass out of this world to his Father: whereas he had loved his that were in the world, unto the end he loved them. And when supper was done, whereas the devil now had put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon, to betray him, knowing that the Father gave him all things into his hands, and that he came from God, and goeth to God: he riseth from supper, and layeth aside his garments, and having taken a towel, girded himself. After that he put water into a basin, and began to wash the feet of the Disciples, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded. He cometh therefore to Simon Peter; and Peter saith to him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? Jesus answered, and said to him, That which I do, thou knowest not now, hereafter thou shalt know. Peter saith to him, Thou shalt not wash my feet for ever. Jesus answered him, if I wash thee not, thou shalt not have part with me. Simon Peter saith to him, Lord, not only my feet, but also hands and head. Jesus saith to him, He that is washed, needeth not but to wash his feet, but is clean wholly: and you are clean, but not all; for he knew who he was that would betray him, therefore he said, You are not clean all.

Therefore after he had washed their feet, and taken his garments, being set down, again he said to them, Know you what I have done to you? You call me Master, and Lord, and you say well, for I am so. If then I have washed your feet, Lord and Master, you ought also to wash one anothers feet. For I have given you an example, that as I have done to you, so do you also.

Moralities.

1. JEsus loves his servants for an end, and till the full accomplishment of that end. The world loves his creatures with a love which tends to concupiscence; but that is not the end for which they were made, or should be loved. There is a very great difference between them: for the love of worldly men, plays the tyrant in the world, snatching and turning all things from the true scope and intention, for which they were made by God, diverting them to profane uses, by turbulent and forcible ways. The world pleaseth it self to set up Idols every where, to make it self adored in them, as chief Sovereign. It makes use of the Sun to light his crimes; of the fatness of the earth to fatten his pleasures, of apparel for his luxury, of all mettals to kindle Avarice, and of the purest beauties to serve sensuality. And if by chance it love any creature, with a well-wishing love, and as it ought to be loved, that is not permanent. The wind is not more inconstant, nor a calm at Sea more unfaithful, then worldly friendship. For sometimes it begins with Fire, and ends in Ice. It is made as between a pot and a glass, and is broken sooner then a glass. The ancient Almans tried their children in the Rhine, but true friendship is tried in a sea of tribulation. It is only Jesus (the preserver and restorer of all things) who loves us from Eternity to Eternity. We must follow the sacred steps of his examples, to reduce our selves to our first beginning, and to bring our selves to the final point of our happiness.

2. The water at first was a mild element, which served the Majesty of God, as a floating chariot, since (as the Scripture saith) his Spirit was carried upon the waters, from whence he drew the seeds which produced all the world. But after man had sinned; like a Supreme Judge, he made use of the gentlest things to be the instruments of our punishments. The water which carried the Divine Mercies, was chosen at the deluge, to drown all mankind. Now at this time Jesus sanctified it by his sacred touch: He took the bason, which being in his hands, became greater and more full of Majesty, then all the Ocean. Our spots, which eternity could not wash clean, are taken away at Baptism, by one only drop of water, sanctified by his blessing. He prevents the bath of his blood, by the bath of an element: which he doth expressly before his institution of the blessed Sacrament; to teach us, what purity of life, of heart, of faith, of intentions and affections, we must bring to the Holy Eucharist. It is necessary to chase away all strange gods (which are sins and passions) before we receive the God of Israel: we must wash our selves in the waters of repentance, and change our attire by a new conversation. Is it too much for us to give flesh for flesh, the body of a miserable man, for that of Jesus Christ? The consideration of our sins should bring up the blood of blushing into our cheeks, since they were the only cause why he shed his most precious blood upon the Cross for us. Alas, the Heavens are not pure before his most pure Spirit, which purifies all nature: Then how can we go to him, with so many voluntary stains and deformities? Is it not to cast flowers upon a dunghil, and to drive Swine to a clear fountain, when we will go to Jesus (the Authour of innocency) carrying with us the steps and spots of our heynous sins?

3. Jesus would not only take upon himself the form of man, but also of a base servant, as S. Paul saith. It was the office of slaves to carry water to wash bodies; which made David say, that Moab should be the Bason of his hope, expressing thereby, that he would humble the Moabites so low, that they should serve only to bring water to wash unclean houses. Alas, who would have said, that the Messias was come amongst us to execute the office of a Moabite (What force hath conquered him, what arms have brought him under, but only love? How can we then become proud, and burn incense to that Idol, called Point of honour, when we see how our God humbled himself in this action? observe with what preparation the Evangelist said, that his Heavenly Father had put all into his hands: that he came from God, and went to God; yet in stead of taking the worlds Scepter, he takes a Bason, and humbles himself to the most servile offices. And if the waters of this Bason cannot burst in us the foul impostume of vanity, we must expect no other remedy, but the eternal flames of hell fire.

Aspirations.

O King of Lovers, and Master of all holy Loves, Thou lovest for an end, and till the accomplishment of that end. It appertains only to thee, to teach the Art of loving well, since thou hast practised it so admirably. Thou art none of those delicate friends, who only make love to beauties, to gold, and silk; thou lovest our very poverty, and our miseries; because they serve for objects of thy charity. Let proud Michol laugh (while she list) to see my dear David made as a water-bearer; I honour him as much in that posture, as I would sitting upon the throne of all the world. I look upon him holding this Bason, as upon him that holds the vast seas in his hands. O my merciful Jesus, I beseech thee wash; wash again, and make clean my most sinful soul. Be it as black as hell, being in thy hands, it may become more white then that Dove (with silver wings) of which the Prophet speaks. I go, I run to the fountain; I burn with love amongst thy purifying waters. I desire affectionately to humble my self, but I know not where to find so low a place as thine, when thou thus wast humbled before Judas, to wash his traiterours feet.

Upon

Upon the Garden of Mount Olivet.

Moralities.

1. JEsus enters into a Garden, to expiate the sin committed in a Garden by the first man. The first Adam stole the fruit, and the second is ordained to make satisfaction. It is a strange thing, that he chose the places of our delights, for suffering his pains, and never lookt upon our most dainty sweets, but to draw out of them most bitter sorrows. Gardens are made for recreations, but our Saviour finds there onely desolation. The Olives, which are tokens of peace, denounce war unto him. The plants there do groan, the flowers are but flowers of death, and those fountains are but fountains of sweat and bloud. He that shall study well this Garden, must needs be ashamed of all his pleasant Gardens: and will forsake those refined curiosities of Tulips, to make his heart become another manner of Garden, where Jesus should be planted, as the onely Tree of Life, which brings forth the most perfect fruits of justice.

2. It was there that the greatest Champion of the world undertook so great Combats, which began with sweat and bloud, but ended with the loss of his life. There were three marvellous Agonies, of God and Death; of Joy and Sorrow; of the Soul and Flesh of Jesus. God and Death were two incomparable things; since God is the first, and the most universal of all lives, who banisheth from him all the operations of death, and yet his love finds means to unite them together for our redemption.

The joy of beatitude was a fruition of all celestial delights, whereunto nothing which displeased, could have access; and yet Jesus suffered sorrow, to give him a mortal blow, even in the Sanctuary of his Divinity. He afflicted himself for us, because we knew not what it was to afflict our selves for him, and he descended by our steps to the very anguishes of death, to make us rise by his death, to the greatest joyes of life.

To be short, there was a great duel between the affectionate love, and the virginal flesh of Jesus. His soul did naturally love a body, which was so obedient; and his body followed wholly the inclinations of his soul: There was so perfect an agreement between these two parties, that their separation must needs be most dolorous. Yet Jesus would have it so, and signed the decree by sweating bloud. And, as if it had been too little to weep for our sins with two eyes, he suffered as many eyes as he had veins, to be made in his body, to shed for us tears of his own bloud.

3. Observe here how this soul of Jesus amongst those great anguishes, continued alwaies constant, like the Needle of a Sea-compass in a storm. He praies, he exhorts, he orders, he reproves, and he encourages; he is like the Heavens, which (amongst so many motions and agitations) lose no part of their measure or proportion. Nature and obedience make great convulsions in his heart: but he remains constantly obedient to the will of his Heavenly Father: he tears himself from himself, to make himself a voluntary sacrifice for death, amongst all his inclinations to life; to teach us that principal lesson of Christianity, which is to desire onely what God will, and to execute all the decrees of his divine Providence, as our chiefest helps to obtain perfection.

Aspirations.

O Beauteous garden of Olives, which from henceforth shalt be the most delicious object of my heart. I will lose my self in thy walks, I will be lost with God, that I may never be lost. I will breath onely thy air, since it is made noble by the sighs of my dear Master. I will gather thy flowers, since Jesus hath marked them with his bloud. I will wash my self in those fountains, since they are sanctified by the sweat of my Jesus. I will have no other joy, but the sorrow of the Son of God, nor any other will but his. O my sweet Saviour, Master and teacher of all humane kind, wilt thou be abridged of thine own will (which was so reasonable and pure) to give me an example of mortifying my passions, and shall I (before thy face) retain any wicked or disordinate appetites? Is it possible I should desire to be Lord of my self (who am so bad a Master) when I see the Authour of all goodness separate himself from himself, onely to make me and all mankind, partakers of his merits.

Of the Apprehension of JESUS.

IN that obscure and dolorous night, wherein our Saviour was apprehended, three sorts of darkness were cast; upon the Jews, upon Judas, and upon Saint Peter: A darkness of obduration upon the hearts of the Jews; a darkness of ingratefull maligniy upon Judas; and a darkness of infirmity upon Saint Peter. Was there ever any blindness like that of the Jews, who sought for the shining Sun with lighted torches, without knowing him by so many beams of power, which shined from him? They are strucken down with the voice of the Son of God, as with lightning; and they rise again upon the earth to arm themselves against Heaven. They binde his hands to take away the use of his forces, but they could not stop the course of his bounties. To shew that he is totally good, he is good and charitable, even amongst his mercilesse executioners, and he lost all he had (saving his Godhead) onely to gain patience.

When S. Peter struck the high Priests servant, the patience of our Lord Jesus received the blow, and had no patience till he was healed. If goodness did shew forth any one beam in the garden, modesty sent forth another in the house of Annas, when his face was strucken by a servile hand, his mouth opened it self as a Temple, from whence nothing came but sweetness and light. The God of Truth speaketh to Caiphas, and they spit upon his brightness, and cover that face which must discover Heaven for us. The mirrour of Angels is tarnisht with the spittle of infernal mouthes, and wounded by most sacrilegious hands, without any disturbance of his constancy. That was invincible by his virtue, as the wilfulness of the Jews stood immoveable by their obduration. There are souls, which after they have filled the earth with crimes, expect no cure of their diseases, but by the hell of the reprobate.

2. The second darkness appeareth by the black passion of Judas, who falls down into hell with his eies open; and after he had sold his soul, sold Jesus, and both all he had, and all he was, to buy an infamous halter to hang himself. A soul become passionate with wanton love, with ambition or avarice, is banished into it self, as into a direct hell, and delivered to her own passions, as to the Furies. The Poets Hydra had but seven heads; but the spirit of Avarice (S. John Climacus saith) hath ten thousand. The conversation of Jesus, which was so full of infinite attractions, could never win the spirit of Judas, when it was once bewitched with covetousness. The tinkling of silver kept him from rightly understanding

Jesus. He makes use of the most holy things, to betray Holiness it self. He employs the kiss of peace, to begin war. He carries poyson in his heart, and honey in his mouth: he puts on the spirit of Jesus, to betray him. This shews us plainly, that covetous and traiterous persons are fartheſt from God, and neareſt to the Devils.

3. The third power of darkneſs appeared in the infirmity of S. Peter, who after so many protestations of fidelity, for fear of death, renounced the Authour of life. One of the Ancients said, The greateſt frailty of Humanity, was, that the wiſeſt men were not infallibly wise at all times. And all men are astoniſhed to see, that the greateſt spirits (being left to themselves) become barren, and suffer eclipses, which give examples to the wiſeſt, and terrour to all the world. God hath suffered the fall of S. Peter, to make us have in horrour all presumption of our own forces: and to teach us, that over-great assurance is oftentimes mother of an approaching danger. Besides, it seemeth he would by this example, consecrate the virtue of repentance in this fault of him, whom he chose to be head of his Church; to make us see, that there is no dignity so high, nor holiness so eminent, which doth not owe Tribute to the mercy of God.

Upon S. Peter's Tears.

IT is most true (saith S. Peter) that a proud felicity hath always reeling feet. Thou which didſt defie the gates of Hell, haſt yielded thy self to the voice of a simple woman. All those conqueſts which thou didſt promise to thy self, are become the tropheys of so weak a hand. Return to the combat, and since she hath triumphed over thee, do thou at leaſt triumph over thy self. Alaſs, I am afraid even to behold the place of my fall, and the weak snares of a simple woman appear to me as boiſtrous chains. Yet what can he fear, who is resolute to die? If thou find death amongſt these maſſacres, thou shouldſt rather embrace then decline it. For what can it do, but make thee companion of life it self? Our soul is yet too foul to be a sacrifice for God; let us first waſh it with tears. I fell down before the fire, and I will riſe by water. I have walked upon the Sea to come to Jesus, and I will now return to him by the way of my tears. I will speak now only by my tears; since I have lately talked so wickedly with my mouth. Since that which should open to speak Oracles for the Church, hath been employed to commit soul treason: since we have nothing left free to us, but sighs and groans; let us make use of the laſt liberty which is left us, and when all is spent, return to the mercy of Jesus, which all the sins of the world can never evacuate. I will from henceforth be a perpetual example to the Church by my fall and riſing again from death, for the comfort of sinners: and the fault of one night shall be lamented by me all the days of my life.

Moralities upon the Pretorian, or Judgment-Hall.

1. IN the paſſion of our Saviour, all things are divine, and it seemeth they go as high as they could be raiſed by that Sovereign power, joyned with extreme love. Jesus the most supreme and redoubted Judge, who will come in his great Majeſty to judge the world, fire and lightning streaming from his face, and all things trembling under his feet; was pleaſed at this time to be judged as a criminal person. Every thing is most admirable in this judgment: The Accuſers speak nothing of those things, which they had reſolved in their counsels: but all spake againſt their consciences. As soon as they are heard, they are condemned; juſtice forsaketh them, and they are wholly poſſeſt with rage. Pilate, before he gave judgment upon Jesus, pronounced it againſt himself: for after he had so many times declared him innocent, he could not give judgment, without proteſting himself to be unjuſt. The silence of Jesus is more admired by this Infidel, then the eloquence of all the world: and truth, without speaking one word, triumpheth over falſhood. A Pagan Lady (the wife of Pilate) is more knowing then all the Laws: more religious then the Prieſts: more zealous then the Apoſtles: more courageous then the men of Arms. When she sleepeth, Jesus is in her sleep: when she talketh, Jesus is upon her tongue. If she write, Jesus is under her pen: her letter defendeth him at the Judgment-Hall, when all the world condemned him; she calleth him holy, when they used him like a thief. She maketh her husband waſh his hands, before he touched that blood, the high price of which she proclaimed. She was a Roman Lady by Nation, called Claudia Procula; and it was very fit she should defend this Jesus, who was to plant the Seat of his Church in Rome. All this while Jesus doth good amongſt so many evils: he had caused a place to be bought newly for the burial of Pilgrims at the price of his blood; he reconciles Herod and Pilate, by the loſs of his life. He sets Barrabas at liberty, by the loſs of his honour: he speaks not one word to him that had killed S. John the Baptiſt, who was the voice. And the other, to revenge himself (without thinking what he did) shewed him as a King. He appears before Pilate as the King of dolours, that he might become for us the King of glories. But what a horrour is it to consider, that in this judgment, he was used like a slave, like a sorcerer, like an accurſed sacrifice? Slavery made him subject to be whipped, the crown of thorns was given only to Enchanters, and that made him appear as a Sorcerer. And so many curses pronounced againſt him, made him as the dismiſſive Goat, mentioned in Leviticus, which was a miserable beaſt, upon which they caſt all their execrations, before they sent it to die in the Desart. He that bindeth the showers in clouds, to make them water the earth, is bound and drawn like a criminal person. He that holds the vaſt Seas in his fiſt, and ballanceth Heaven with his fingers, is struck by servile hands. He, that enamels the boſom of the earth, with a rare and pleasing diverſity of flowers, is most ignominiously crowned with a crown of thorns. O hideous prodigies, which took away from us the light of the Sun, and covered the Moon with a sorrowful darkneſs. Behold, what a garland of flowers he hath taken upon his head, to expiate the sins of both Sexes. It was made of briars and thorns, which the earth of our fleſh had sowed for us, and which the virtue of his Croſs took away. All the pricks of death were thruſt upon this prodigious patience, which planted her throne upon the head of our Lord. Consider how the Son of God would be used for our sins, while we live in delicacies? and one little offensive word goeth to our hearts; to which, though he that spake it, gave the swiftneſs of wings, yet we keep it so shut up in our hearts, that it getteth leaden heels, which make it continue there fixed.

ALas, what do I ſee here? A crown of thorns grafted upon a man of thorns: A man of dolours, who burns between two fires, the one of love, the other of tribulation; both which do inflame and devour him equally, and yet never can conſume him. O thou the moſt pure of all beauties, where have my ſins placed thee? Thou art no more a man, but a bloudy skin taken from the teeth of Tigers and Leopards. Alas, what a ſpectacle is this to diſpoil this ſilk * worm, which at this day attires our Churches and Altars? How could they make thoſe men (who looked upon thy chaſte body) ſtrike and disfigure it? O white Alabaſter, how haſt thou been ſo changed into ſcarlet? Every ſtroke hath made a wound, and every wound a fountain of bloud. And yet ſo many fountains of thy ſo precious bloud, cannot draw from me one tear. But O ſacred Nightingale of the Croſs, who hath put thee within theſe thorns, to make ſo great harmonies only by thy ſilence? O holy thorns, I do not ask you where are your Roſes. I know well they are the bloud of Jeſus, and I am not ignorant that all roſes would be thorns, if they had any feeling of that which you have. Jeſus carried them upon his head, but I will bear them at my heart: and thou (O Jeſus) ſhalt be the object of my preſent dolours, that thou mayeſt after be the Fountain of my everlaſting joys.

* Ego ſum vermis & non homo. Pſalm. 21.

Moralities for Good Friday upon the death of JESUS CHRIST.

MOunt Calvary is a marvellous ſcaffold, where the chiefeſt Monarch of all the world, loſeth his life, to reſtore our ſalvation which was loſt, and where he makes the Sun to be eclipſed over his head and ſtones to be cloven under his feet; to teach us by inſenſible creatures, the feeling which we ſhould have of his ſufferings.

This is the ſchool where Jeſus teacheth that great Leſſon, which is the way to do well. And we cannot better learn it then by his examples, ſince he was pleaſed to make himſelf paſſible and mortal, to overcome our paſſions, and to be the Authour of our immortality.

The qualities of a good death may be reduced to three points: of which the firſt is to have a right conformity to the will of God, for the manner, the hour, and circumſtances of our death.

The ſecond is, to forſake as well the affections, as the preſence of all creatures of this baſe world.

The third is, to unite our ſelves to God by the practiſe of great virtues, which will ſerve as ſteps to glory.

Now theſe three conditions are to be ſeen in the death of the Prince of Glory upon Mount Calvary; which we will take as the pureſt Idea's, whereby to regulate our paſſage out of this world.

1. COnſider in the firſt place, that every man living hath a natural inclination to life, becauſe it hath ſome kind of divinity in it. We love it, when it ſmileth upon us, as if it were our Paradiſe; and if it be troubleſom, yet we ſtrive to retain it, though it be accompanied with very great miſeries. And if we muſt needs forſake this miſerable body, we then deſire to leave it by ſome gentle and eaſie death. This maketh us plainly ſee the generoſity of our Saviour, who being Maſter of life and death, and having it in his power to chuſe that manner of death which would be leaſt hideous, (being of it ſelf full enough of horrour) yet nevertheleſs, to conform himſelf to the will of his heavenly Father, and to confound our delicacies, he would needs leave his life by the moſt dolorous and ignominious, which was to be found among all the deaths of the whole world. The Croſs among the Gentiles, was a puniſhment for ſlaves, and the moſt deſperate perſons of the whole world. The Croſs amongſt the Hebrews was accurſed: It was the ordinary curſe which the moſt uncapable and moſt malicious mouths did pronounce againſt their greateſt enemies. The death of a crucified man, was the moſt continual, languiſhing, and tearing of a ſoul from the body, with moſt exceſſive violence and agony. And yet the Eternal Wiſdom choſe this kind of puniſhment, and drank all the ſorrows of a cup ſo bitter. He ſhould have died upon ſome Trophey, and breathed out his laſt amongſt flowers, and left his ſoul in a moment: and if he muſt needs have felt death, to have had the leaſt ſenſe of it that might be. But he would try the rigour of all greateſt ſufferings: he would fall to the very bottom of diſhonour: and (having ever ſpared from himſelf all the pleaſures of this life) to make his death compleat, he would ſpare none of thoſe infinite dolours. The devout Simon of Caſſia asketh our Saviour, going toward Mount Calvary, ſaying, O Lord, whither go you with the extreme weight of this dry and barren piece of wood? Whither do you carry it, and why? Where do you mean to ſet it? Upon mount Calvary? That place is moſt wild and ſtony: how will you plant it? Who ſhall water it? Jeſus anſwers, I bear upon my ſhoulders a piece of wood, which muſt conquer him, who muſt make a far greater conqueſt by the ſame piece of wood: I carry it to mount Calvary, to plant it by my death, and water it with my blood. This wood which I bear, muſt bear me, to bear the ſalvation of all the world, and to draw all after me. And then (O faithful ſoul) wilt not thou ſuffer ſome confuſion, at thine own delicacies? to be ſo fearful of death by an ordinary diſeaſe, in a down-bed, amongſt ſuch neceſſary ſervices, ſuch favourable helps, conſolations and kindneſſes of friends ſo ſenſible of thy condition? We bemoan and complain our ſelves of heat, cold, diſtaſte, of diſquiet, of grief: Let us allow ſome of this to Nature; yet muſt it be confeſt, that we lament our ſelves very much: becauſe we have never known, how we ſhould lament a Jeſus Chriſt crucified. Let us die as it ſhall pleaſe the Divine Providence: If death come when we are old, it is a haven: If in youth, it is a direct benefit antedated: If by ſickneſs, it is the nature of our bodies: If by external violence, it is yet always the decree of Heaven. It is no matter how many deaths there are, we are ſure there can be but one for us.

2. Conſider further, the ſecond condition of a good death, which conſiſts in the forſaking of all creatures, and you ſhall find it moſt punctually obſerved by our Saviour at the time of his death. Ferrara, a great Divine, who hath written a book of the hidden Word, toucheth twelve things abandoned by our Saviour.

1. His apparel, leaving himſelf naked.
2. The marks of his dignity.
3. The Colledge of his Apoſtles.
4. The ſweetneſs of all comfort.
5. His own proper will.
6. The authority of virtues.
7. The power of Angels.
8. The perfect joys of his ſoul.
9. The proper clarity of his body.
10. The honours due to him.
11. His own skin.
12. All his bloud.

Now

Now, do but consider his abandoning the principal of those things, how bitter it was. First, the abandoning of neareſt and moſt faithfull friends, is able to afflict any heart: Behold him forſaken by all his ſo well-beloved Diſciples, of whom he had made choice (amongſt all mortal men) to be the depoſitaries of his doctrine, of his life, of his bloud. If Judas be at the myſtery of his Paſſion, it is to betray him. If S. Peter be there aſſiſting, it is to deny him: If his ſorrowfull mother ſtand at the foot of the Croſs, it is to increaſe the grief of her Son; and after he had been ſo ill handled by his cruel executioners, to crucifie him again by the hands of Love. The courageous Mother, to triumph over her ſelf by a magnanimous conſtancy, was preſent at the execution of her dear Son. She fixed her eyes upon all his wounds, to engrave them deep in her heart. She opened her ſoul wide, to receive that ſharp piercing ſword, with which ſhe was threatned by that venerable old Simeon at her Purification: And Jeſus, who ſaw her ſo afflicted for his ſake, felt himſelf doubly crucified upon the wood of the Croſs, and the heart of his dear Mother. We know it by experience, that when we love one tenderly, his afflictions and diſgraces will trouble us more then our own, becauſe he living in us by an affectionate life, we live in him by a life of reaſon and election. Jeſus lived and repoſed in the heart of his bleſſed Mother, as upon a Throne of love, and as within a Paradiſe of his moſt holy delights. This heart was before as a bed covered with flowers: But this ſame heart (on the day of his Paſſion) became like a ſcaffold hanged with mourning, whereupon our Saviour entred, to be tormented and crucified upon the Croſs of Love, which was the Croſs of his Mother. This admirable Merchant, who deſcended from Heaven to accompliſh the buſineſs of all Ages; (who took upon him our miſeries, to give us felicities) was plunged within a ſea of bloud: and in this ſo precious ſhipwrack, there remained one onely ineſtimable pearl, (which was his divine Mother) and yet he abandons her, and gives her into the hand of his Diſciple. After he had forſaken thoſe neareſt to him, ſee what he does with his body; Jeſus did ſo abandon it (a little before his death) that not being content onely to deliver it as a prey to ſorrow, but he ſuffered it to be expoſed naked, to the view of the world. And amongſt his ſharpeſt dolours, (after he had been refuſed the drink which they gave to malefactours, to ſtrengthen them in their torments) he took for himſelf vinegar and gall. O what a ſpectacle was it to ſee a body torn in pieces, which reſted it ſelf upon its own wounds, which was dying every moment, but could not die, becauſe that life diſtilled by drops? What Martyr did ever endure, in a body ſo ſenſible and delicate, having an imagination ſo lively, and in ſuch piercing dolours, mixt with ſo few comforts? And what Martyr did ſuffer for all the ſins of the whole world, as he did, proportioning his torments according to the fruits which were to proceed from his Croſs? Perhaps, O faithfull ſoul, thou lookeſt for a mans body in thy Jeſus, but thou findeſt nothing but the appearance of one, cruſted over with gore bloud: Thou ſeekeſt for limbs, and findeſt nothing but wounds: Thou lookeſt for a Jeſus, which appeared glorious upon Mount Tabor, as upon a Throne of Majeſty, with all the Enſigns of his Glory, and thou findeſt onely a skin all bloudy, faſtened to a Croſs between two thieves. And if the conſideration of this cannot bring drops of bloud from thy heart, it muſt be more inſenſible then a diamond.

3. To conclude, obſerve the third quality of a good death, which will declare it ſelf by the exerciſe of great and heroick virtues. Conſider that incomparable mildneſſe which hath aſtoniſhed all Ages, hath encouraged all virtues, hath condemned all revenges, hath inſtructed all Schools, and crowned all good actions: He was raiſed upon the Croſs, when his dolours were moſt ſharp and piercing; when his wounds did open on all ſides, when his precious bloud was ſhed upon the earth, and moiſtened it in great abundance; when he ſaw his poor cloaths torn in pieces, and yet bloudy in the hands of thoſe who crucified him. He conſidered the extream malice of that cruel people, how thoſe which could not wound him with iron, pierced him with the points of their accurſed tongues. He could quickly have made fire come down from Heaven upon thoſe rebellious heads. And yet forgetting all his pains to remember his mercies, he opened his mouth, and the firſt word he ſpake, was in favour of his enemies, to negotiate their reconciliation, before his ſoul departed. The learned Cardinal Hugues admiring this exceſſive charity of our Saviour toward his enemies, applies excellent well that which is ſpoken of the Sun in Eccleſiaſticus. He brings news to all the world at his riſing, and at noon day he burns the earth, and heats thoſe furnaces of Nature, which makes it produce all her feats.

So Jeſus the Sun of the intelligible world, did manifeſt himſelf at his Nativity; as in the morning. But the Croſſe was his bed at noon, from whence came thoſe burning ſtreams of Love, which inflame the hearts of all bleſſed perſons, who are like furnaces of that eternal fire, which burns in holy Sion.

On the other part, admire that great magnanimity which held him ſo long upon the Croſſe, as upon a throne of honour and power; when he beſtowed Paradiſe upon a man that was his companion in ſuffering. I cannot tell whether in this action we ſhould more admire the good fortune of the good thief, or the greatneſs of Jeſus. The happineſſe of the good thief, who is drawn for a cut-throat to priſon, from priſon to the Judgment-hall, from thence to the Croſſe, and thence goes to Paradiſe, without needing any other gate, but the heart of Jeſus.

On the other ſide, what can be more admirable then to ſee a man crucified, to do that act, which muſt be performed by the living God, when the world ſhall end? To ſave ſome, to make others reprobate, and to judge from the heighth of his Croſſe, as if he ſate upon the chiefeſt throne of all Monarchs.

But we muſt needs affirm, that the virtue of patience in this, holds a chief place, and teaches very admirable leſſons. He endures the torments of body, and the pains of ſpirit, in all the faculties of his ſoul, in all the parts of his virgin fleſh; and by the cruelty and multiplicity of his wounds, they all become one onely wound, from the ſole of his foot, to the top of his head.

His delicate body ſuffers moſt innocently, and all, by moſt ingrate and hypocritical perſons, who would colour their vengeance with an apparance of holineſſe. He ſuffers without any comfort at all, and (which is more) without bemoaning himſelf, he ſuffers whatſoever they would, or could lay upon him, to the very laſt gaſp of his life. Heaven wears mourning upon the Croſſe; all the Citizens of Heaven weep over his torments: the earth quakes, ſtones rend themſelves; Sepulchers open; the dead ariſe: Only Jeſus dies unmoveable upon this throne of patience,

To conclude, who would not be astonished at the tranquillity of his spirit, and amongst those great convulsions of the world, which moved round about the Cross, amongst such bloody dolours, insolent cries, and insupportable blasphemies, how he remained upon the Cross, as in a Sanctuary, at the foot of an Altar, bleeding, weeping, and praying, to mingle his prayers with his blood and tears. I do now understand why the Wiseman said, He planted Isles within the Abyss, since that in so great a gulf of afflictions, he shewed such a serenity of spirit; thereby making a Paradise for his Father (amongst so great pains) by the sweet perfume of his virtues. After he had prayed for his enemies, giving a promise of Paradise to the good thief, and recommended his Mother to his Disciple, he shut up his eys from all humane things, entertaining himself only with prayers and sighs to his heavenly Father. O that at the time of our deaths, we could imitate the death of Jesus, and then we should be sure to find the streams of life.

Aspirations.

O Spectacles of horrour, but Abyss of goodness and mercy. I feel my heart divided by horrour, pity, hate, love, execration, and adoration. But my admiration being ravished, carries me beyond my self. Is this then that bloody sacrifice which hath been expected from all ages? This hidden mystery, this profound knowledge of the Cross, this dolorous Jesus, which makes the honourable amends between Heaven and earth, to the eternal Father, for expiation of the sins of humane kind.

Alas, poor Lord, thou hadst but one life, and I see a thousand instruments of death, which have taken it away. Was there need of opening so many bloody doors to let out thine innocent soul? Could it not part from thy body without making (on all sides) so many wounds? which after they have served for the objects of men's cruelty, serve now for those of thy mercy? O my Jesus, I know not to whom I speak; for I do no more know thee in the state thou now art: or if I do, it is only by thy miseries, because they are so excessive, that there was need of a God to suffer what thou hast endured. I look upon thy disfigured countenance, to find some part of thy resemblance, and yet can find none but that of thy love. Alas, O beautiful head, which dost carry all the glory of the highest Heaven, divide with me this dolorous Crown of thorns: they were my sins which sowed them, and it is thy pleasure that thine innocency should mow them. Give me, O sacred mouth, give me that Gall which I see upon thy lips: suffer me to sprinkle all my pleasures with it, since after a long continuance, it did shut up and conclude all thy dolours. Give me, O sacred hands, and adored feet, the Nails which have pierced you: love binds you fast enough to the Cross without them. But do thou, O Lord, hold me fast to thy self, by the chain of thine immensity.

O Lance, cruel Lance, Why didst thou open that most precious side? Thou didst think perhaps to find there the Son's life, and yet thou foundest nothing but the Mother's heart. But without so much as thinking what thou didst, in playing the murtherer, thou hast made a Sepulcher, wherein I will from henceforth bury my soul. When I behold these wounds of my dear Saviour, I do acknowledge the strokes of my own hand: I will therefore likewise engrave there my repentance: I will write my conversion with an eternal character. And if I must live, I will never breath any other life, but that only which shall be produced from the death of my Jesus crucified.

The Gospel for Easter Day, S. Mark 16.

And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalen, and Mary of James, and Salome bought spices, that coming they might anoint Jesus. And very early the first of the Sabbaths, they come to the Monument; the Sun being now risen. And they say one to another, who shall roll back the stone from the door of the Monument? And looking, they saw the stone rolled back, for it was very great. And entring into the Monument, they saw a young man sitting on the right hand, covered with a white Robe: and they were astonished. Who saith to them, Be not dismayed, you seek Jesus of Nazareth that was crucified: he is risen, he is not here, behold the place where they laid him. But go, tell his Disciples, and Peter, that he goeth before you into Galilee: there you shall see him, as he told you.

Moralities.

1. THe Sepulcher of Jesus becomes a Fountain of life, which carries in power, all the glories of the Highest Heaven. Our Saviour riseth from thence, as day out of the East, and appears as triumphant in the ornaments of his beauties, as he had been humbled by the acces of his mercies. The rage of the Jews loseth here its power, death his sting, Satan his Kingdom, the Tomb his corruption, and Hell his conquest. Mortality is destroyed, life is illuminated; all is drowned in one day of glory, which comes from the glorious light of our Redeemer. It is now (saith Tertullian) that he is revested with his Robe of honour, and is acknowledged as the eternal Priest for all eternity. It is now (saith S. Gregory Nazianzen) that he re-assembles humane kind, (which was scattered so many years, by the sin of one man) and placeth it between the arms of his Divinity. This is the Master-piece of his profound humility; and I dare boldly affirm (saith S. Ambrose) that God had lost the whole world, if this Sacred Virtue, which he made so clearly shine in his beloved Son, had not put him into possession of his Conquests. We should all languish after this triumphant state of the Resurrection, which will make an end of all our pains, and make our Crowns everlasting.

2. Let us love our Jesus as the Maries did, that, with them, we may be honoured with his visits. Their love is indefatigable, courageous, and insatiable. They had all the day walk'd round about the Judgment-Hall, Mount Calvary, the Cross, and the Sepulcher. They were not wearied with all that: And night had no sleep to shut up their eys. They forsook the image of death, which is sleep, to find death it self, and never looked after any bed, except the Sepulcher of their Master: they travel amongst darkness, Pikes, Launces, the affrights of Arms, and of the night; nothing makes them afraid. If there appear a difficulty to remove the stones, love gives them arms. They spare nothing for their Master and Saviour: they are above Nicodemus and Joseph, they have more exquisite perfumes, for they are ready to melt and distil their hearts upon the Tomb of their Master. O faithful lovers, seek no more for the living amongst the dead; that cannot die for love, which is the root of life.

3. The Angel in form of a young man (covered with a white Robe) shews us, that all is young and white in immortality. The Resurrection hath no old age: it is an age, which can neither grow, nor diminish. These holy Maries enter alive into the Sepulcher, where they thought to find death, but they learn news of the chiefest of lives. Their faith is there confirmed, their piety satisfied, their promises assured, and their love receives consolation.

I Do not this day look toward the Eaſt, O my Jeſus, I conſider the Sepulcher, it is from thence this fair Sun is riſen. O that thou appeareſt amiable, dear Spouſe of my ſoul. Thy head, which was covered with thorns, is now crowned with a Diadem of Stars, and Lights, and all the glory of the higheſt Heaven reſts upon it. Thine eyes, which were eclipſed in bloud, have enlightned them with fires and delicious brightneſſe, which melt my heart. Thy feet and hands, ſo far as I can ſee, are enamel'd with Rubies, which after they have been the objects of mens cruelty, are now become eternal marks of thy bounty. O Jeſus, no more my wounded, but my glorified Jeſus, where am I? What do I? I ſee, I flie, I ſwound, I die, I revive my ſelf with thee. I do beſeech thee, my moſt ſacred Jeſus, by the moſt triumphant of thy glories, let me no more fall into the image of death, nor into thoſe appetites of ſmoke and earth, which have ſo many times buried the light of my ſoul. What have I to do with the illuſions of this world? I am for Heaven, for Glory, and for the Reſurrection, which I will now make bud out of my thoughts, that I may hereafter poſſeſſe them with a full fruition.

The Goſpel upon Munday in Eaſter-week, S. Luke the 24.

AND behold, two of them went the ſame day into a Town which was the ſpace of ſixty furlongs from Jeruſalem, named Emmaus. And they talked betwixt themſelves of all thoſe things that had chanced. And it came to paſs, while they talked and reaſoned with themſelves, Jeſus alſo himſelf approaching, went with them, but their eyes were held, that they might not know him. And he ſaid to them, What are theſe communications that you confer one with another, walking, and are ſad? And one whoſe name was Cleophas, anſwering, ſaid to him, Art thou only a ſtranger in Jeruſalem, and haſt not known the things that have been done in it theſe days? To whom he ſaid, What things? And they ſaid, Concerning Jeſus of Nazareth, who was a man, a Prophet, mighty in work and word before God and all the people. And how our chief Prieſts and Princes delivered him into condemnation of death, and crucified him. But we hoped that it was he that ſhould redeem Iſrael: And now beſides all this, to day is the third day ſince theſe things were done. But certain women alſo of ours made us afraid; who, before it was light, were at the Monument, and not finding his body, came, ſaying, That they ſaw a viſion alſo of Angels, who ſay that he is alive. And certain men of ours went to the Monument, and they found it ſo as the women ſaid, but him they found not.

And he ſaid to them, O fooliſh, and ſlow of heart, to believe in all things which the Prophets have ſpoken. Ought not Chriſt to have ſuffered theſe things, and ſo enter into his glory? And beginning from Moſes and all the Prophets, he did enterpret to them in all the Scriptures, the things that were concerning him. And they drew nigh to the Town whither they went; and he made ſemblance to go further. And they forced him, ſaying, Tarry with us, becauſe it is towards night, and the day now far ſpent, and he went in with them. And it came to paſs, while he ſate at the Table with them, he took bread, and bleſſed, and brake, and did reach to them. And their eyes were opened, and they knew him: and he vaniſhed out of their ſight. And they ſaid one to the other, Was not our heart burning in us whiles he ſpake in the way, and opened unto us the Scriptures? And riſing up the ſame hour, they went back into Jeruſalem, and they found the eleven gathered together, and thoſe that were with them, ſaying, That, our Lord is riſen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. And they told the things that were done in the way: and how they knew him in the breaking of bread.

Moralities.

1. IT is a ſtrange thing, that God is always with us, and we are ſo little with him. We have our being, our moving, our life from him: he carries us in his arms, he keeps us as a nurſe doth her dear child; and yet all this while we ſcarce know what he is, and uſe him ſo often as a ſtranger. He is in our being, and yet we keep him far from our heart, as a dead man, who is quite forgotten. And Enoch walked with him, and for that, he was taken from the converſation of men, and reſerved for Paradiſe. To ſpeak truth, our ſoul ſhould alwaies be languiſhing after her Jeſus, and count it a kind of Adultery to be ſeparated from him, ſo much as by thought. Let us learn a little to talk with him; we commonly have that in our tongue, which we keep in our heart. Let us ſweeten the ſadneſſe of our pilgrimage, by the contemplation of his beauties. Let us look upon him as God and man; the God of gods; the Man of men: our great Saviour and Prophet, powerfull both in word and work; for if his word be thunder, his life is a lightning. He hath been here doing good to all the world, and ſuffering hurt from all the world; doing good without reward, and enduring evil without impatience. We all paſſe here as Torrents into valleys; the onely queſtion is of our paſſing well: whether we look on worldly goods as on waters which paſſe under a bridge, and as upon the furniture of an Inn which is none of ours. If we be embarked in the Veſſel of life, let us not amuſe our ſelves to gather Cockles upon the ſhore; but ſo, that we may always have our eys fixt upon Paradiſe.

2. Two things do hinder thoſe Pilgrims from knowing Jeſus as they ſhould. The one is, their eyes are dazled; and the other is, the little account they make of the Croſſe, which drives them into the miſtruſt of the Reſurrection. And this is it which croſſeth us all our life, and ſo oft diverts us from the point of our happineſſe. Our eyes are dazled with falſe lights of the world, they are darkened with ſo many miſts and vapours of our own appetites and paſſions, that we cannot ſee the goods of heaven in the brighteſt of their day. Worldly chains have a certain effective vigour and pleaſure, which is only painted, but they have a moſt certain ſorrow, and a moſt uncertain contentment: They have a painfull labour, and a timorous reſt: A poſſeſſion full of miſery, and void of all beatitude. If we had our eys wel opened, to penetrate and ſee what it is, we ſhould then ſay of all the moſt raviſhing objects of the world; How ſenſeleſſe was I when I courted you? O deceitfull world, thou didſt appear great to me, when I ſaw thee not as thou art: But ſo ſoon as I did ſee thee rightly, I did then ceaſe to ſee thee: for thou waſt no more to me but juſt nothing. We run in full career after al that pleaſeth our ſenſe; and the Croſſe, which is ſo much preached to us, is much more upon our Altars, then in our hearts. We will not know, that the throne of Mount Calvarie, is the path-way to Heaven; and as this truth wanders from our hearts, Jeſus departs from our eyes. Let us at leaſt pray Jeſus to ſtay with us, for it is late in our hearts, and the night is far advanced by our want of true light. We ſhall not know Jeſus by diſcourſe, but by feeding him in the perſons of his poor, ſince he gives the continual nouriſhment of his body.

O Onely Pilgrim of the world, and firſt dweller in the heart of thy heavenly Father, what a pilgrimage haſt thou made, deſcending from Heaven to earth, and yet without forſaking Heaven? Thou haſt markt thy ſteps by thy conqueſts, made viſible thy way by thine own light, thou haſt watered it with thy precious bloud, and paved it with thy wounds. O what a goodly thing it is to walk with thee, when thou openeſt thy ſacred mouth, as the opening of a temple, to diſcover the beauties and myſteries of it. O that is moſt pleaſing to underſtand that mouth, which diſtils ſo much honey through lips of Roſes. But wherefore (My good Lord) art thou pleaſed to hide thy ſelf from a ſoul which languiſhes guiſhes after thee? Take away the veil from mine eys, and ſuffer thy ſelf to be ſeen in the veſture of thy heavenly beauties. If I muſt bear the Croſs, and paſs by the throne of Mount Calvary, to come to Heaven, I moſt humbly ſubmit to thy divine pleaſure, that I may poſſeſs all that thou art.

The Goſpel upon Tueſday in Eaſter week, S. Luke the 24.

And whileſt they ſpake theſe things, Jeſus ſtood in the midſt of them, and he ſaith to them, Peace be to you; it is I, fear not. But they being troubled and frighted, imagined they ſaw a Spirit. And he ſaith to them, Why are you troubled, and cogitations ariſe in your hearts? See my hands and feet, that it is I my ſelf, handle, and ſee: for a ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones, as you ſee me to have. And when he had ſaid this, he ſhewed them his hands and feet. But they yet not believing, and marvelling for joy, he ſaid, Have you here any thing to be eated? But they offered him a piece of fiſh broiled, and a honey comb. And when he had eaten before them, taking the remains, he gave to them. And he ſaid to them, Theſe are the words which I ſpake to you when I was yet with you, that all things muſt needs be fulfilled, which are written in the Law of Moſes, and the Prophets, and the Pſalms, of me. Then he opened their underſtanding, that they might underſtand the Scriptures. And he ſaid to them, That ſo it is written, and ſo it behoved Chriſt to ſuffer, and to riſe again from the dead the third day, and penance to be preached in his Name, and remiſſion of ſins unto all Nations.

Moralities.

WE think ſometimes that Jeſus is far from us, when he is in the midſt of our heart: he watches over us, and ſtretches out his divine hands for our protection. Let us live always as if we were actually in his preſence, before his eys, and in his boſom. An ancient Tradition doth obſerve, that after our Lord's Aſcention, the Apoſtles did never eat together, but they left the firſt Napkin for their good Maſter, conceiving, that according to his promiſe, he was always with them. Let us accuſtom our ſelves to this exerciſe of God's preſence. It is a happy neceſſity to make us do well, to believe and apprehend that our Judge is always preſent. If reſpect make him formidable, love will teach us, that he is the Father of all ſweetneſs. There can be no greater comfort in this world, then to be preſent in heart and body with that which we love beſt.

2. Jeſus is taken by his Apoſtles for a Spirit, becauſe after the Reſurrection he pierced the walls, and appeared ſuddenly as Spirits do. S. Paul alſo ſaith in the ſecond of the Corinthians, that now we do no more know Chriſt according to the fleſh, that is to ſay, by the paſſions of a mortal body, as S. Epiphanius doth expound it. We muſt make little uſe of our bodies, to converſe with our Jeſus, who hath taken upon him the rare qualities of a Spirit. We muſt raiſe our ſelves above our ſenſes, when we go to the Father of light, and the Creatour of ſenſe. He teacheth us the life of Spirits, and the commerce of Angels, and makes eſſays of our immortality, by a body now immortal. Why are we ſo tied to our ſenſe, and glued to the earth? Muſt we ſuffer our ſelves to enter into a kingdom of death, when we are told of the reſurrection of him, who is the Authour of all lives?

3. Admire the condeſcending and bounties of our Lord to his dear Diſciples. He that was entred into the kingdom of ſpirits and immortal converſation, ſuffers his feet and hands to be touched, to prove in him the reality of a true body. He eats in preſence of his Apoſtles, though he was not in more eſtate to digeſt meat, then the Sun is to digeſt vapours. He did no more nouriſh himſelf with our corruptible meats, then the Stars do by the vapours of the earth. And yet he took them to confirm our belief, and to make us familiar with him. It is the act of great and generous ſpirits to abaſe themſelves, and condeſcend to their inferiours. So David being anointed King, and inſpired as a Prophet, doth not ſhew his perſon terrible in the height of his great glory, but ſtill retained the mildneſs of a Shepherd. So Jeſus, the true ſon of David, (by his condeſcending to us) hath conſecrated a certain degree, whereby we may aſcend to Heaven. Are not we aſhamed that we have ſo little humility or reſpect to our inferiours, but are always ſo full of our ſelves, ſince our Lord, ſitting in his throne of glory and majeſty, doth yet abaſe himſelf to the actions of our mortal life? Let it be ſeen by our hands whether we be reſuſcitated, by doing good works, and giving liberal alms. Let it appear by our feet, that they follow the paths of the moſt holy perſons. Let it be ſeen by our nouriſhment (which ſhould be moſt of honey) that is, of that celeſtial ſweetneſs which is extracted from prayer. And if we ſeem to refuſe fiſh, let us at leaſt remain in the element of piety, as fiſh is in the water.

Aſpirations.

THy love is moſt tender, and thy cares moſt generous (O mild Saviour.) Amongſt all the torrents of thy paſſion, thou haſt not taſted the waters of forgetfulneſs. Thou returneſt to thy children, as a Nightingale to her little Neſt. Thou doſt comfort them with thy viſits, and makeſt them familiar with thy glorious life. Thou eateſt of a honey-comb by juſt right, having firſt taſted the bitter gall of that unmerciful Croſs. It is thus, that our ſorrows ſhould be turned into ſweets. Thou muſt always be moſt welcom to me in my troubles, for I know well, that thou only canſt pacifie, and give them remedy. I will govern my ſelf towards thee, as to the fire: too much near familiarity will burn us, and the want of it will let us freeze. I will eat honey with thee in the bleſſed Sacrament: I know that many there do chew, but few receive thee worthily. Make me (O Lord) I beſeech thee, capable of thoſe which here on earth ſhall be the true Antepaſts to our future glory.

The Goſpel upon Low-Sunday, S. John the 20.

THerefore when it was late that day, the firſt of the Sabbaths, and the doors were ſhut where the Diſciples were gathered together for fear of the Jews, Jeſus came and ſtood in the midſt, and ſaith to them. Peace be to you. And when he had ſaid this, he ſhewed them his hands and ſide. The Diſciples therefore were glad when they ſaw our Lord. He ſaid therefore to them again, Peace be to you. As my Father hath ſent me, I alſo do ſend you. When he had ſaid this, he breathed upon them, and he ſaid to them, Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt; whoſe ſins you ſhall forgive, they are forgiven them: and whoſe you ſhall retain, they are retained. But Thomas, one of the twelve, who is called Didymus, was not with them when Jeſus came? The other Diſciples therefore ſaid to him, We have ſeen our Lord. But he ſaid to them, Unleſs I ſee in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the place of the nails, and put my hand into his ſide, I will not believe.

And after eight days, again his Diſciples were within, and Thomas with them. Jeſus cometh, the doors being ſhut, and ſtood in the midſt, and ſaid, Peace be to you. Then he ſaith to Thomas, Put in thy finger hither, and ſee my hands, and bring hither thy hand, and put it into my ſide, and be not incredulous, but faithful. Thomas anſwered and ſaid to him, My Lord and my God. Jeſus ſaith to him, Becauſe thou haſt ſeen me, Thomas, thou haſt believed: Bleſſed are they that have not ſeen, and have believed.

Aſpirations.

1. JEſus the Father of all bleſſed harmonies (after ſo many combats) makes a general peace in all nature. He pacifieth Limbo, taking the holy Fathers out of darkneſs, to enjoy an eternal light, and ſending the damned into the bottom of Hell. He pacifieth cifieth the earth, making it from thenceforth to breathe the air of his mercies. He pacifieth his Apoſtles, by delivering them from that profound ſadneſs, which they conceived by the imaginary loſſe of their dear Maſter. He pacifieth Heaven, by ſweetning the ſharpneſs of his Heavenly Father, quenching by his wounds, the fire which was kindled of his juſt anger. Every thing ſmileth upon this great Peace-maker, Nature leaveth her mourning, and putteth on robes of chearfulneſs, to congratulate with him his great and admirable conqueſts. It is in him that the Heavenly Father (by a ſingular delight) hath poured out the fulneſs of all Graces, to make us an eternal dwelling, and to reconcile all in him, and by him; pacifying by his blood from the Croſs, all that is upon earth, and in Heaven. This is our Joſhua, of whom the Scripture ſpeaketh, that he clears all differences, and appeaſeth all battels. No ſtroke of any hammer or other iron was heard at the building of Solomon's Temple; and behold the Church (which is the Temple of the living God) doth edifie ſouls with a marvellous tranquillity.

2. The Sun is not ſo well ſet forth by his beams, as our Saviour is magnificently adorned with his wounds. Thoſe are the characters which he hath engraved upon his fleſh, after a hundred ingenious faſhions. The Ladies count their Pearls and diamonds, but our Saviour keeps his wounds in the higheſt attire of his Magnificences. It is from thence, that the beauty of his body, taketh a new ſtate of glory, and our faith in the reſurrection is confirmed: that the good fill themſelves with hope, miſcreants with terrour, and Martyrs find wherewith to inflame their courage. Theſe divine wounds open themſelves as ſo many mouthes, to plead our cauſe before the Celeſtial Father. Our Saviour Jeſus never ſpake better for us, then by the voice of his precious Blood. Great inquiry hath been made for thoſe mountains of mirrh and frankincenſe, which Solomon promiſeth in the Canticles, but now we have found them in the wounds of Jeſus. It is from thence that there cometh forth a million of ſanctified exhalations of ſweetneſs, of peace and propitiation, as from an eternal Sanctuary. A man may ſay they are like the Carbuncle, which melteth the wax upon which it is imprinted, for they melt our hearts by a moſt profitable impreſſion. At this ſight the Eternal Father calms his countenance, and the ſword of his juſtice returneth into the ſheath. Shal not we be worthy of all miſeries, if we do not arm theſe wounds againſt us, which are ſo effectual in our behalf? And if this blood of our Abel (after it hath reconciled his cruel executioners) ſhould find juſt matter to condemn us for our ingratitudes? John the Second, King of Portugal, had made a ſacred vow, never to refuſe any thing which ſhould be asked of him in the virtue of our Saviour's wounds; which made him give all his ſilver veſſel to a poor gentleman, that had found out the word, And why ſhould not we give our ſelves to God, who both buyeth and requireth us by the wounds of Jeſus?

3. Jeſus inſpireth the ſacred breath of his mouth upon the Apoſtles, as upon the firſt fruits of Chriſtianity: to repair the firſt breath, and reſpiration of lives, which the Authour of our race did ſo miſerably loſe. If we can obtain a part of this, we ſhall be like the wheels of Ezekiels myſterious chariot, which are filled with the ſpirit of life. That great Divine called Matthias Vienna, ſaid, that light was the ſubſtance of colours, and the ſpirit of Jeſus is the ſame of all our virtues. If we live of his fleſh, there is great reaſon we ſhould be animated by his Spirit. Happy a thouſand times are they, who are poſſeſſed with the Spirit of Jeſus, which is to their ſpirit as the apple of the eye. S. Thomas was deprived of this amorous communication, by reaſon of his incredulity. He would ſee with his eyes, and feel with his hands, that which ſhould rather be comprehended by faith: which is, an eye bleſſedly blind: which knoweth all within its own blindneſs, and is alſo a hand, which remaining on earth, goeth to find God in Heaven.

GReat Peace-maker of the world, who by the effuſion of thy precious blood, haſt pacified the wars of fourty ages, which went before thy death. This word of peace hath coſt thee many battels, many ſweats and labours, to cement this agreement of Heaven and earth, of ſence and reaſon, of God and man. Behold thou art at this preſent like the Dove of Noah's Ark, thou haſt eſcaped a great deluge of paſſions, and many torrents of dolours, thrown head-long one upon another. Thou bringeſt us the green Olive branch, to be the mark of thy eternal alliances. What? ſhall my ſoul be ſo audacious and diſordered, as to talk to thee of war, when thou ſpeakeſt to her of peace? To offer thee a weapon, when thou offereſt her the Articles of her reconciliation, ſigned with thy precious blood? O, what earth could open wide enough her boſome to ſwallow me, if I ſhould live like a little Abiram, with a hand armed againſt Heaven, which pours out for me nothing but flowers and roſes? Reign (O my ſweet Saviour) within all the conquered powers of my ſoul, and within my heart as a conqueſt which thou haſt gotten by ſo many titles. I will ſwear upon thy wounds, which after they have been the monuments of thy fidelity, ſhall be the adored Altars of my vows and ſacrifices. I will promiſe thereupon, an inviolable fidelity to thy ſervice. I will live no more but for thee, ſince thou haſt killed my death in thy life, and makeſt my life flouriſh within thy triumphant Reſurrection.

EXCELLENT PRINCESSE,

The DUTCHESSE of

BUCKINGHAM.

Excellent Princeſs;

THis Tranſlation of the Holy Court, as it had its firſt life breathed into it by the animating ſpirit of her Sacred Majeſty's Royal acceptance; ſo in this laſt, and concluding piece, it infinitely deſires ſuch your favourable entertainment. Nor, verily, can I (where ſo bright and reſplendent a Star, from a ſphear of Greatneſs, hath already lighted up a flame to direct others in their approbation) but with much confidence hope the like propitious rays, may benignly reflect from your ſo near a confining Influence.

Here ſhall your Grace behold the powerful predominance of Reaſon over Paſſions, not taught in Epictetus, or Seneca's prophane Schole; but dictated from the Truth-teaching ſacred Oracles of Chriſtian Piety.

Here the Soul is informed, and Judgment rectified, to hate Vice, and fly it; to love Virtue, and practiſe it, not in exteriour garbs, and petty ſlight formalities, which only ſerve to amuſe vulgar ſpirits: but by the interiour Habits, and ſerious embracement of the moſt ſolid virtues. The pretious memory (Excellent Princeſs) of your thrice noble Father, whoſe living Image, and ſecond-ſelf you repreſentatively are, together with your known love of pious Books, and daily practiſe in your life, of the wholeſom precepts couched in this, hath encouraged my preſent addreſs, to ſerve for the entertainment of your vacant hours, which thus ſilently ſpent, and maturely digeſted, will have the force and efficacy of the moſt ſerious employment, and may exemplarily invite other eminent Spirits, to imitate your Graces profitable, and well-ſeaſoned retirements. I wiſh (excellent Lady) there were any thing wherein I might better expreſs the devoted ſervice I owe to your eminent ſelf, and illuſtrious Family: but ſince weak endeavours can produce but ſlender effects, and noble diſpoſitions do readily pardon incident imperfections; I will reſt in the chearful hope of excuſe, and in the ardent Vow of a ſtudious willingneſs to become worthy the Title of

Your Grace's humbleſt, and moſt obſequious Servant,

To my Lord,

MY LORD THE DUKE OF ANGUIEN,

ELDEST SONNE OF MY LORD THE PRINCE.

MY LORD,

I Finish the HOLY-COURT in my Books, when your age inviteth you to begin it in your manners; and for your first exercise of arms, I offer you the Combats and Empire over Passions, which is greater then that of the world.

There it is, where you shall know the industry of a warre, which nature wageth, and reason teacheth us; which is never too soon learned, and which is ordinarily but too late understood. Princes in other battels speak with mouths of fire, and make use of a million of hands; but in this which I represent, they are alone, and therein employ but the moity of themselves, one part of Man being revolted against the other. Besides, all the honour of the victory rests in themselves; arms, fortresses, and Regiments not at all participating therein, and if they prove fortunate in these encounters, they stand in the esteem of wise men, for Demy-Gods.

Their quality obligeth them to this duty more then other men, since Passions are winds, which in popular life raise but little waves, but in them stir up mountains of water. For which, I am perswaded, that, as you so dearly have loved the labours of my Pen, and sought for your instruction out of my Books; I could not do a better service, or more suitable to your age, then by arming you against these plagues, which have so often tarnished Diadems on the brow of Cæsars, and turned Conquerours into Slaves.

Sir, I promise my self much from your Greatness in this Conquest, seeing it already hath given testimonies to the world, worthy of your eminent Birth, which oblige you to virtue, out of a necessity as strong, as your disposition is sweet. Wit, which is as the principal Genius of your house, hath in you cast forth glimmers, that have flown throughout Europe, when you publickly answered throughout all Philosophy, in an age wherein other Princes begin to learn the first elements. You have placed wisdom on the highest Throne of Glory, and it by your mouth hath rendred Oracles to instruct the learned, and astonish Doctours. In the first season of life, which so many other spend in delights, you have heightned the lights of your understanding by the labour and industry of study, lining, as certain Plants, which bear the figure of Stars all inuironed with Thorns.

It is time, that all your Brightness change into Fire, and since Sciences are but Colours, which appear not in the night-time. if Virtue do not illuminate them, they must be gilded with the rayes of your good life, and enkindled with the ardours of your courage, as you very happily have already begun.

Sir, I do assure my self, that of all those things you know, you will only approve the good, and that of all such as you can, you will do none but the just. This is it you owe to the King, to whom you have the honour to be so near. This is it, which the education of the most prudent of Fathers, and the tender care of the best of Mothers, exact. This is it, that France, which looketh on you (as a Sien of its Lillies) wisheth. This is it, which blond, the most noble on Earth, breeding the most happy in the world, and that face where Grace and Majesty make so sweet a commixion, cease not to promise us.

As there is nothing little in you, so we must not endure any thing, imperfect: and if that, which we take to be spots in the Sun, be Stars; it plainly sheweth us, that all must be splendour in your condition, and that we must not expect years, since the wit of Princes is much swifter then time.

Your great Uncle, who gained the battle of Cerisoles, said to those who upbraided him with his youth, that he did not cut with his beard, but with his sword: and I am perswaded, that you will imitate his valour, to take part in his glory, yea even in this your minority, wherein the Kings colours being already to flie under your name.

My Lord, remember, the throne of the Sun among the Egyptians was supported by Lions, and that you must be all heart to support that of our most Christian King, in imitation of the great Prince, to whom you ow your Birth; For whose sake I wish you as many blessings as Heaven promiseth you, esteeming my self most happy to be able to contribute my labours and services to the glory of your education, since I have the honour to call my self by just title:

SIR,

Your most humble and most affectionate servant in the Lord,

N. CAUSSIN.

A TASTE OF THE SEVERAL DISPOSITIONS OF MEN,

Which serves for a Foundation to the Discourse of PASSIONS.

THE HOLY COURT was not (as yet) sufficiently beautified with the eminent lustre of Glory (wherein I represented it) but it was necessary, that taking possession of the Empire over passions, it should wear a crown which it hath gained by its travel, and wrought by its proper virtues. In this last Tome (dear Reader) I present thee the absolute reformation of the soul by eternal principles, and the victory over powers which oppose Reason.

Thou art not ignorant, that Angels and bruit beasts are not of one piece, the one being wholly Spirit, and the other Flesh: But Man (a middle creature between Angels and bruit beasts) participateth both of flesh and Spirit by an admirable tye, which in him occasioneth continual war of Passions, which are properly commotions of animal and sensitive nature, caused by the imagination of good and evil, with some alteration of body. They take their origin from two Appetites, of which the Concupiscible causeth Love, Hatred, Desire, Aversion, Joy and Sadness: The Irascible, causeth Hope, Despair, Boldness, Fear and Anger. To this ordinary number, I add Shamefac'dness, Envy, Jealousie and Compassion, to accomplish our work in all its parts.

All Passions are generally in all men, but all appear not in all. There is a certain mixture in nature, which is the cause, that the worst have something of good, and the best something of bad. Now note, that as the Platonists distinguish five sorts of devils; to wit, Fierie, Airie, Aquatick, Terrestrial and Subterranean: so humane spirits are divided into as many forms, which produce marvellous diversities in every nature. The Fiery, are Spirits of fire, whereof some seem to be enkindled with the purest flames of stars, which are magnanimous, pure, vigorous, bold, intelligent, active, amiable, and munificent. And of this sort are the most illustrious of Kings and of Queens, of Princes and of Princesses, good Prelates, great and virtuous Ladies, the wise, the valiant, the most notable States-men, Generals of Armies, Conquerours, yea, and the Saints most eminent in virtue. There are others also Fiery, but burnt with the fire of Comets, which are maligne, counterfeit, vicious, insolent, pevish, crosse, covetous, ambitious, cruel, arrogant, inhumane, violent, and impetuous. Of this matter were composed the Tiberius's, the Herods, the Nero's, and the Domitians, who seemed to be born for the desolation of mankind.

The Airy are likewise of two kinds very different: for the one are of a temperate constitution which maketh them mild, peaceable, pious, cordial, sociable, graceful, affable, courteous, pliant, witty, liberal and active.

Of this kind are many gentle, courteous, modest, and handsome women: men of honour and of quality, who make a noble Company, and are infinitely apt for all the civilities of a laudable conversation. But if they degenerate from this degree, they become great eaters, great scoffers, dissolute, vain flatterers, lascivious, and brutish.

Others, like unto stirred air, are turbulent, stormy, cholerick, suspicious, impatient, nice, biting undertakers, mutable, mutinous, unquiet, murmurers, and slanderers. It is they who raise quarrels, and litigious wranglings in the world, who disturb men and affairs: wherein they many times are as quick-silver in gildings, onely used to make it resolve into smoke.

Of the Aquaticks, some are slow and cold, tasteless, without affection, without cordiality, wedded to their own petty profits, and born for themselves. Of this rank you see many that make a good shew, who resemble those dryed-up or frozen fountains upon a throne of marble, which have ostent enough, but afford no water. Others which like standing and marishy waters, are close, foul, sluggish, traiterous, and dangerous. Others, like the sea, are ambitious, unequal, uncertain, fantastical, and capricious, every moment changing shape in this great Comedy of the world. Others are peaceable and usefull, as goodly Fountains and great Rivers.

As for the Terrestrial, they are stubborn, inflexible, dull and stupid, of the condition of those people who thought they were at the end of numbers, when they had counted to four, and could go no further. Some in the beginning appear what they are, and others have a specious outside, which makes them to passe for handsome beasts. Sometimes they are loutish, cloudy, enemies of joy, of innocent pleasure, of beauty, of witty conceits, of discourse, of inventions, slaves of gain, and traitours to their own life, out of the exorbitancy of their avarice. In this number you shall find many like to those (which Theophrastus describeth) who neither lend fire nor salt to their neighbours; who wear hideous habits, and cause themselves to be shaven very close, that they may be at the lesse cost with their Barber; who have Magazins of pedlers, and who laden with old keyes, walk every day up and down their grounds, to see whither they have not changed place. Some are like Poulcats, others are Fawns and Satyrs, who are addicted to base, and shamefull lusts, captious, shifting, impudent, night-walkers, and Hobgoblings, who extremely disturb the repose of humane life, if laws armed with force endeavour not to dissipate them, to make use of chains to restrain them.

The

The Subterraneans are Melancholick, close, hypocritical, silent, sumish, sad, irreconcileable, bloudy, and venomous. They are very apt to hatch revenges long pondred, to build labyrinths in their hearts, wherein no day light appeareth: Nevertheless, as they most times have an impotency in the execution of bad designs, so they cherish, but not satisfie their passions. Yet do these qualities diversly commix one with another, yea, the highest with the lowest; from whence proceed infinite variations in the spirit of man, so that there is not any thing so changeable in total nature, or so hard to be known, as man.

Some seem to be born with good parts, but through the want of some help of nature, or instruction, they degenerate into bad, and render themselves very capable of deceits and illusions. So many are become Huguenots, for that they want vigour of judgment, and see not that we rather should refer our selves to a General Council, then to their silly arguments. Others abuse themselves in spiritual life, and would willingly refine devotion, even to the talking with Angels, and the seeing a White Pidgeon. Others, to appear strong wits, contemn all ordinary guizes, make themselves extravagant, and as the Antipodes of mankind.

Others put themselves into the number of confused Schollers, who have store of learning, but very ill-digested. There are some who with much endeavour to seem wise, become crafty, they converse not but under a mask, they set snares in every place, they have the talent of plyantnesse. They draw tribute out of the good turns they do their friends, they make profit of all, they become extremely distrustfull, and they would willingly be of that kind, of which Theophrastus speaketh, who every moment tell their money, and make their Lackeys go before them for fear they should run away. Others out of too much desire of Glory, become vain, affected in their speech, in their actions, and in all their proceedings, to the studying and learning by heart the slightest complements, as do some women, whom one would take to be virgins of the Goddess Memory, and such as boast elocution, who traffick in hearers, and invite to their sermons, more then one would to weddings or burials.

Some out of an intemperance of neatness, and of dotage upon health, torment their life, such circumspection use they in their diet, their garments, their furnitures in all things which are for their use. They every where carry their bread and wine along with them, and never sit well but in their own chair. Others take delight to negotiate, they alwayes have their hands full of Papers, they make a Registers-office of their Cabinet: they are great Formalists, and strangely persecute the world with their punctualities. They put one business into an hundred dishes, and incessantly trouble all such as have to do with them. Others desirous to make themselves overmuch pleasing in their conversation, become bablers and ceremonious; they are importune and unseasonable in complements; they go to prattle with their friends whilest they have a feaver; they tell extravagant tales, wherein they take themselves to be very facetious, although at the latter end of the discourse they be asked where the conceit to be laughed at, lies: They burthen themselves also with news of no value; They make a secret of every thing, and give things out for mysteries, which are proclaimed with a Trumpet.

There are some, who not to seem flatterers, tell truth with an ill grace, they are great Censurers, and they see not any one, whom they reform not from the head to the heel. If they put themselves upon matter of doctrine, and eloquence; they are the Fathers of wits, and the creatours of excellent conceits, under whom the Empire of learning circumvolveth: and if they talk of State-matters, of the Church, of Justice, and of War; they are the Gods of Loves and battels, who pronounce Edicts, assemble Councils, levy Arms, raise fortifications, correct Kingdomes, move the earth; and in their own imagination, change the face of the Universe. Others are so diligent, that they tyre all the world with their unreasonable activities; others use afflicting delayes, and stir so little in all their designs, that they seem to be in a perpetual Solstice.

You see some extremely open breasted, who tell all their thoughts, and, as if their heart were a sieve, it keeps nothing which it sends not instantly out by the lips. Some proceed to a simplicity, next door to sottishness, which makes them do many extravagantes; and when it hath a mixture of vanity, men of mean condition imitate the actions of the great: and silly Citizens wives say, my Lord and Husband, as well as Sarah, or the greatest Ladies. There are among these, some subtle Coxcombs, and fortunate fools, who daily deceive themselves to their own gain.

They who have a Magistrall aspect are much more odious, when with a countenance supercilious, and Tone of a voyce affected, they make speeches, and usurp a personage which neither age, quality nor merit alloweth them. Dreamers and pensive are heavy in conversation, and the squeamish, who make their good aspects and fair countenances to be bought, are insupportable; but the apprehensive, who deplore all things, multiply what they can the miseries of the times, and ceasing not to blame the actions of those who govern, raise more mischiefs then remedies.

Good God! what an alteration do passions make in us? but it is a gift from heaven, that they may be changed, and that by Grace and the practice of good instructions, we can dispoil our selves as well of an evil habit, as of an old garment.

It is not expedient to be without passion, nor is it possible to humane nature; but it is much to obtain by discretion the moderation of a thing, of which we by necessity have the experience These motions are given us with our bodies, they are little spirits which are born and dye with us; some find them more mild, others more wayward; but every one hath his part, howbeit there are very few who well understand their own portion. Young people, who shew no desire, no affection, no feeling, are commonly abject spirits; unless this come to them by grace, or some notable constraint, which in the end is the cause, that of a young Angel, an old Divel is often made: We must not lose humanity (saith Saint Augustine) to acquire tranquillity of mind, nor think that, that which is hard and boistrous is alwayes right, or that one hath much health, when he is come to the highest degree of stupidity. All good spirits have delicate apprehensions, and resemble the burning bush which had thorns among lights; but they are none of the best, who, to follow nature, abandon reason.

I affirm the Stars contribute much to our inclinations, and Birth, much more: Education maketh another nature; bloud, choler, melancholy, and flegme, do in our passions, what the elements do in our bodies. Tea, stature it self conduceth: spirit, goodness, grace, ful garb, & courage is very often in little bodies which have their heat moderated and well digested. But if great bodies be destitute of it, they are very lazy, and if they have too much of it, they are flaming fornaces full of violence: which made S. Cyril say, that greatness was given to Giants for a punishment of their wickedness. But this must be understood without any prejudice to well-composed tall statures, which have much Majesty. There are humours so sticking, that what cure soever be used, there is somewhat still remains behind, which (according to Job*) sleeps with us in our graues. I have heard that a good Religious man having been bred with the milk of a Goat, was very modest in publick, by a great reflection he made on his actions: But he ever had some hour in secret, wherein he had his frisks and his capers.*

Nevertheless, one cannot believe, how much one gaineth upon his own nature, when he will take the pain to manure it: but for want of using industry therein, one makes to himself, a turbulent life, a continual torment, a hasty death, and his salvation to be doubtful.

There are some who drive away one devil by another, curing one passion with another, and trying them all, that they may have none; which was the cause that Theodosian said, that they are, as that possessed man, who had a legion of devils in his body. Some by the counsel of certain Directours, would break them all at once, as that souldier, who thought to pull off a horses tail by strength of arme, and not by drawing one hair after another. Others expect remedy from time, from affairs, from change of life and condition, and are rather cured by weariness, then prudence.

Others continually flatter themselves, and think they have got great victories, when they have lessened their fits, and left the root of the Feaver. But they who will therein proceed seriously, endeavour first of all to find out the enemy, and as we all have one passion, which predominateth in our heart above the rest, and which most entertaineth our thoughts, they principally assail that, waging through battels, by prayer, fasting, alms, consideration, reading of good books, continuall examen of conscience, flight from occasions, diversion upon some better thing, good company, imitation of holy personages, counsel of sage directours, and by a thousand stratagems which the spirit of God furnisheth them with, in the fruitfulness of their inventions. After they have pulled down their chief adversary, they easily prevail against the rest, and continuing their progression in the list of generous souls, they come in the end to a great tranquillity.

This is it I intend to shew in this last volume, wherein I treat of Passions in a new tone; my purpose being rather to shew their remedies, then their pictures. I know Mounsieur Coeseteau (the eloquent Bishop of Marseilles) who hath afforded immortal lights to French eloquence, hath set forth the Table of humane Passions. I lay not my pencil upon the line of this Apelles*, I begin where he ends, and if he be content to paint them, I endeavour to cure them.*

For this purpose, having briefly, explicated the nature, proprieties, effects and symptomes of every passion; I set against it two remedies, the first whereof is drawn from some divine perfection, contrary to the disorder of the same Passion: and because that is (yet) too sharp, and dazling by the quickness of its lights, I shew it sweetned and tempered in the virtues of Jesus Christ.

In the end of the Book I bring the examples of those who have overcome their Passions, and of such as have sunck under their violence, deriving profit out of all, for the scope which I aim at. There are certain Flies which live on Monks-hood, a venomous herb, and who make use of an antidote against its poyson. So they who have tried the malice and danger of passions, may profit us, whether they edifie us by their repentance, or divert us by their disasters.

I conclude the HOLY-COURT in this Volume, which I esteem above the rest, by reason of its utility: and, writing of passions to cure them; I wish in my self an incurable one, which is, to desire the progression of my Readers, and to beseech God they may submit Sence to Reason, Time to Eternity, and the Creature to the Creatour.

THE FIRST TREATISE.

Of LOVE.

Sect. 1. Of the Necessity of Love.

Against those Philosophers who teach Indifferency, saying, We must not Love any thing.

All Happiness included in love.

THE Divine Providence, which hath concluded our salvation in Love, very plainly shews us, That the means to be quickly happy is to love Felicity; and that the way we walk in to become singularly happy, is to esteem (as we ought) the chief of Felicities. We lose all our good hap for want of loving; and our Love through the defect of well placing it, which is the cause that we daily learning so many Arts, forget what we should eternally practise, if it be true we desire to be everlastingly happy.

S. Dion. l. de Hierarch. cæleſt. συναγωγὸν πάντων. God the Father of Unions draweth all to unity by the means of love.

I find the great Apostle of France S. Denis, said well, when he called God, The Father of Unions, who ceaseth not to gather and rally together all the creatures into his heart which issued out of his heart. He is, That in the life of Intelligencies, which the Sun is in the celestial world: but one immoveable Sun, about which so many changes and agitations of all creatures circumvolve, who groan and aim at this First Beauty, the true Center of Repose.

It concerneth us since we are made for it, and that God hath given us Love, which is to the soul, That, which wings are to Birds, to carry us to its fruition. It is a riches, which is onely ours, and which would be infinitely profitable, if we could tell how to employ it well: but for want of well loving, we apply the most precious thing, which is Love, to gain wretched Creatures, as if one used a golden hook to fish for Frogs, and a Sceptre to shake Hay. This is it which causeth me to undertake in this discourse, to speak of the well ordering of Love, as the most assured way we can choose to arrive at Tranquillity, and to shew that we first of all most necessarily love to be happy in the world, and that the most loving and tendrest hearts are ordinarily the best.

The Sect of Philosophers of Indifferency.

This age scant enough in goodness, and fruitful in malice, hath of late brought forth a Sect of wits, who term themselves the Philosophers of Indifferency, and who make boast to be very insensible, as well in the fear of the Divinity, as in tenderness towards the miseries of men.

To what purpose is it (say they) to addict ones self to the worship of a God, whom we cannot sufficiently know? And wherefore should we be solicitous for the afflictions of another, which nothing concern us? This is to make our selves eternally miserable, and to be tormented with all manner of objects. He who would live contented in the world, must love nothing but himself, entertein himself within himself, and concerning himself; and derive pleasure, as a tribute, out of all the creatures of the world; but to take heed not to enter into the participation of their troubles, and should we see all to be turned topsie turvey, so it inconvenienteth not us in any thing to let time slide, to catch good by the wings whilest we may, and to let evil fall on the miserable.

These kind of people are so unnatural that they laugh at all, and mock at the miseries which others suffer. If you tell them of a house burnt, they say it is nothing, and that it is but a fire of great wood: If of an inundation of water, that Fishes have a good time of it: If of a war, or contagion, that it is a good harvest for death, and that there are too many bread-eaters: If one say such a friend hath lost an eye, they answer he is very happy, because he shall see but half the bad times.

I do not think there is a vice in the whole world more brutish, or contrary to nature, then this obdurateness, which is the cause I would cast it under the feet of love: and shew you, that tenderness towards God as a Father, towards men as the lively Images of his Goodness, is the principal foundation of all virtues.

1. Reason against the Indifferents.

Consider first, that all the good order of life comes from the knowledge of the First cause, whereon all Creatures have their dependence; as on the contrary, the Disorder of all actions springeth from the ignorance of the submission we owe to the Increated Essence. Now he, who loveth none but himself, and cares not but for his own Interests, maketh himself as the chief end, and the God of himself, which sufficiently proveth it to be the most palpable folly, and the greatest evil may be imagined in Nature.

There is none but God, which is for it self.

It is a remarkable thing, that among all Essences there is none but God alone, who, as he can know nothing out of himself, nor love any thing but in himself, so he doth nothing but for himself. For in doing all for himself, he doth all for us, since we have no good, which tendeth not to him, as to its scope, which subsisteth not in him as on its Basis, which resteth not in him, as in its Centre. Thus did S. Thomas understand that notable saying of Mercury Trismegistus. Unity hath produced unity, and hath reflected its love on it self.

Mens genuit mundum, & in se sinum reflexit amoris. S. Thom. 1. p. q. 32. a. 1. ad 3.

It is not but for an Infinite Essence to do so, but had the highest Angel in heaven the thought onely to behold himself, and hence forward to work for himself, he would instantly be pulled out of heaven, and would of a bright Sun become a sooty Coal.

What may one think then of a man, who sayes in his heart, I am born for my self, and I have no other aim in the world, but to satisfie my mind with all contentments, nor shall the cries of another ever enter into my heart, till Fire commix with Water, and Heaven with Earth, If I obtein my ends all shall go well? Hearken how God speaketh in the Prophet Ezekiel to these wicked ones. Behold, I come to fall upon thee (oh! thou great Dragon) who liest stretched out at length in the midst of thy Rivers, and darest say, this stream is mine, and I made my self. Assure thee I will put a bridle upon thee, and when I have fastned to thy scale all the fishes of the waters wherein thou beareſt sway, I will drag thee from the midst of the Kingdom of waves, and I will throw thee into a wilderness: thou shalt lie upon the dry land, nor shall any one care to see thy obsequies performed. For I have abandoned thee to the beasts of the field, and to the birds of the air, to be devoured.

Ecce ego ad te, draco magne, qui cubas in medio fluminum tuorum, &c.

This sentence of God was executed on the person of the Emperour Tiberius, under whom our Saviour suffered that death which gave life to the world. Verily he was a man, who through the whole course of his Empire made himself the God of himself, the slave of his passions, and the hatred of mankind. He lay close as an Owl in the retirement of his filthy lusts, he was greedy as a Griphon, in such sort, that dying he had above threescore and six millions of gold in his coffers, which he, with the Empire, left to an infamous nephew, who, as it is thought, hastned his death, tearing that sensual soul out of the body, which in the world breathed nothing but the love of it self.

How can a man so wretched, so caitive, behold himself as a Divinity, seeing God in the heighth of glory, riches and beauties, which so happily entertain him within himself, hath so affectionate bowels of mercy for man, that he thinks of him from all eternitie, he presenteth himself unto him on all sides, with hands replenished with benefits in so great a diversitie of Creatures, and hath in general so much care of all men, and of every one in particular, that he who were not well instructed by faith, might have matter to imagine that Man were the God of God himself!

S. Th. quæst. de Beatit. Quasi homo sit Dei Deus.

Let us besides produce another proof, which more evidently convinceth this obdurateness of heart, and this cruel wretchlesness of the Philosophers, who teach Indifferency; which is, that all creatures, yea, the most insensible, are made by God to impart, and to compassionate. If the Sun hath light, it is not for himself, he cloatheth the Air, the Land, and Sea with a golden net, he imparteth it also as well to the little eyes of the Ant, as to those of the mightiest Monarch in the world, he soweth seeds of flames and vigour, to warm and quicken total nature. If the Air hath Rain, it keeps it not eternally within the treasurie of clouds, but distilleth it as in a Limbeck to moisten the earth. If the Sea have waters, it so divideth them among all the Rivers, as to bear men and victual in Vessels, and to make it self a knot of commerce from Land to Land, from Countrey to Countrey, from World to World. If the earth hath fruits, it preserves them not for it self, no more then the trees which bear them; but plentifully opens its bosome profusely to communicate it self to all nature. Every thing, saith a great Bishop of Paris, is bound by the Divine Providence to communicate it self, so true it is, that God hath banished avarice from humane things. As each creature giveth it self by love, so it suffers with others by conformity. All the world is united and collected within it self, as the parts of an Egge are tied one within another; All the members of the Universe mutually love and embrace; and if they make war it is but to establish their peace: If there be want of an element, as of Air, the Water would mount to heaven, or heaven descend to the water, rather then not supply the defect of a neighbour. It is a law which God hath engraven, as with a tool of Adamant, in the bosome of Nature.

2. Reason drawn from the communication of creatures.

Unique sui vero cogitat dumtaxat sum, adeo exclusit Deus curationem à rebus humanis.

Gall. Paris. lede univers.

It hath been observed, that Palmes divided one from another by an arm of the Sea, which had overflowed the countrey, bowed their tops one towards another by a natural inclination, as witnessing their Amitie, and protesting against the fury of that element which had disunited them; and if this sense be in plants, what may we say of living creatures? where we see cares, troubles, anxieties, goings and comings, combats, yells, neglect and loss of body, repose and life, with the sense they have of the detriment and dammage of their like. And shall we not say then, that a man who loveth nothing in the world, and onely studieth the preservation of himself, is a prodigie in Nature, fit to be denied the Air he breatheth, the light which reflecteth on him, the fire which warms him, the viands which feed him, and the earth which bears him?

3. Reason of the tenderness of great hearts.

I adde for a third reason, that pitie & tenderness of heart is not only authorized by God & nature, but it is established as by a common decree of nations. Photius the learned Patriarch of Constantinople observeth in his Bibliotheque, a wonderful judgement given in the Citie of Athens, where he saith, the Senate of Areopagites being assembled together upon a mountain, without any roof but heaven, the Senatours perceived a bird of prey which pursued a little Sparrow, that came to save it self in the bosome of one of their company. This man, who naturally was harsh, threw it from him so roughly that he killed it; whereat the Court was offended, and a Decree was made, by which he was condemned and banished from the Senate: Where the most judicial observe, That this company, which was at that time one of the graveſt in the world, did it not for the care they had to make a law concerning Sparrows; but it was to shew, that clemencie and merciful inclination was a virtue so necessary in a State, that a man destitute of it, was not worthy to hold any Place in government, he having (as it were) renounced Humanitie.

A notable sentence of the Areopagites.

We likewise see, that the wisest & most courageous men in the world have been infinitely tender, full of love, zeal, affection, care, anxietie and travel, for the good of another. David and Jonathan, who were the bravest Princes over the people of God, loved each other so much, that the Scripture speaking of this Amitie, saith, Their souls were tied together with an inseparable band. S. Paul was so affectionate & jealous for the salvation of his Corinthians, that he seemed to carrie them all in his bowels, and daily to bring them forth with convulsions and pains attended by joyes and delights not to be expressed. S. Ambrose bitterly bewaileth the death of his brother Satyrus, that to hear him speak, one would think he meant to distil out his eyes and breathe out his soul on his Tomb. So did S. Bernard at the decease of his brother Gerard. S. Augustine was a man all of fire before & after his conversion with onely this difference, that this fire before the morn-tide of his salvation was nourished with corruptible matter of Earth, but after he became a Christian, he lived upon the most pure influences of heaven. S. Gregory Nazianzen saith, he more breathed S. Basil, then the air it self, and that all his absences were to him so many deaths. S. Chrysostome in banishment was perpetually in spirit with those he most esteemed. S. Jerome better loved to entertain his spiritual amities in little Bethlehem, then to be a Courtier in Rome where he might be chosen Pope. And if we reflect on those who have lived in the light of nature; Plato was nothing but love. Aristotle had never spoken so excellently of friendship, had he not been a good friend. Seneca spent himself in this virtue, being suspected by Nero for the affection he bare to Piso. Alexander was so good that he carried between his arms a poor souldier frozen with cold, up to his throne to warm him, and to give him somwhat to eat from his royal hand. Trajan brake his proper Diadem to bind up the wound of one of his servants. Titus wept over the ruines of rebellious Jerusalem. A man may as soon tell the stars in the heavens as make an enumeration of the brave spirits which have been sacrificed to amity.

to

Wherefore great hearts are the most loving.

If we seek out the causes, we shall find it ordinarily proceedeth from a good temperature which hath fire and vigour, and that comes from good humours, and a perfect harmony of spirit: little Courages are cold, straightned, and wholly tied to proper interests, and the preservation of their own person. They lock themselves up in their proprieties as certain fishes in their shell, and still fear lest elements should fail them; But magnanimous hearts, who more conform themselves to the perfections of God, have sources of Bounty, which seem not to be made, but to stream and overflow such as come near them. This likewise many times proceedeth from education, for those who fall upon a breeding base, wretched, and extremely penurious, having hands very hard to be ungrasped, have likewise a heart shut up against amities, still fearing lest acquaintance may oblige them to be more liberal then they would: contrariwise, such as have the good hap to be nobly bred hold it an honour to oblige, and to purchase friends every where.

Adde also that there is ever some gentleness of spirit among these loving souls, who desiring to produce themselves in a sociable life, and who understanding it is not given them to enlighten sands and serpents, will have spectatours, and subjects of its magnificence. Which happens otherwise to low and sordid spirits; for they voluntarily banish themselves from the conversation of men, that they may not have so many eyes for witnesses of their faults; So that we must conclude against the Philosophers of Indifferency, that Grace, Beauty, Strength and Power of nature are on their side, who naturally have love and affection.

Sect. 2. Of Love in general.

Love, the soul of the Universe.

LOve when it is well ordered is the soul of the universe, which penetrateth, which animateth, which tieth and maintaineth all things: and so many millions of creatures as aspire and respire this love, would be but a burden to Nature, were they not quickned by the innocent flame, which gives them lustre, as to the burning Bush, not doing them any hurt at all.

Fornacem custodiens in operibus arduis. Eccl. 43. Love the superintendent of the great Fornace of the world. Faber ferrarius sedens juxta incudem & considerans opus ferri: vapor ignis uret carnes ejus: & in calore fornacis contorquebitur, &c. Eccl. 29. 38

I may say that of honest love, which the wise man did of the Sun; That it is the superintendent of the great fornaces of the world, which make all the most Pieces of work in Nature.

Have you ever beheld the Forge-master described by the same wise-man? You see a man in his shirt all covered over with swear, grease, and smoke, who sporteth among the sparks of fire, and seemeth to be grown familiar with the flames: He burns gold and silver in the fornace, then he batters it on the Anvil with huge blows of the hammer, he fashioneth it, he polisheth it, he beautifies it, and of a rude & indigested substance, makes a fair piece of plate to shine on the Cup-boards of the most noble houses.

So doth love in the world, it taketh hearts, which are (as yet) but of earth and mortar, it enkindleth them with a divine flame, It beats them under the hammer of tribulations and sufferings, to try them, It filleth them by the assiduity of prayer, It polisheth them by the exercise of virtues, lastly, it makes vessels of them worthy to be placed above the Empyreal heaven.

Thus did it with S. Paul, and made him so perfect, Act. 9. that the First verity saith of him, that he is his vessel of election, to carry his name among nations and the Kings of the earth, and that he will shew him how much he must suffer for his sake. The whole nature of the world tendeth to true love; every thing loves; some of necessity, other by inclination, and other out of reason. He who will love nothing (saith S. Augustine) is the most miserable and wretched man on earth; nor is it without cause, that in imprecations pronounced over the wicked, it is said, Let him not love, nor be beloved by any.

Pigri, merito detestandi erunt, si nihil amatis: Amate, sed quid ametis, videte. August. in Psal. 31. Nec amat, nec amatur ab ullo. Juvenal.

Seven excellent things.

The ancient Sages have observed in the light of Nature, that there are seven excellent things to be esteemed as gifts from heaven, which are clearness of senses, vivacity of understanding, grace to express ones thoughts, ability to govern well, Courage in great and difficult undertakings, fruitfulness in the productions of the mind, and the strength of love; and forasmuch as concerneth the last, Orpheus and Hesiodus have thought it so necessary, that they make it the first thing that came out of the Chaos before the Creation of the world.

Vide Marsilium Ficinum in convivium Platonis. An excellent conceit of the Platonists.

The Platonists revolving upon this conceit, have built us three worlds; which are, the Angelical nature, the Soul, and the Frame of the Universe. All three (as they say) have their Chaos. The Angel before the ray of God, had his in the privation of light; Man, in the darkness of Ignorance and Sin; The material world, in the confusion of all its parts: But these three Chaos's were dissipated by love, which was the cause that God gave to Angelical spirits the knowledge of the most sublime verities, to Man Reason, and to the world, Order.

All we see is a perpetual circle of God to the world, & of the world to God. This circle beginning in God by inestimable perfections, full of charms and attractives, is properly called Beauty: and when it comes to extend it self in the world, and to draw it to it self, it is called love. But if you consider it in the condition wherein it gathereth together all Creatures to the first cause, and makes its works reascend to God, they say then it takes the name of Pleasure, which is a most happy satisfaction of total Nature in its Author. So love is a circle, which turns from good to good by an everlasting revolution.

The nature of love. Lib. 14. de civit. c. 8. Amor inhiat habere quod amatur, cupiditas est; idem amor habens & fruens, Letitia est; fugiens quod adversatur, timor est: quod si acciderit ei, tristitia est: Perinde malè sunt ista, si mala sint quæ amantur, bonè si bona.

Now, if you desire I should in few words explicate the nature thereof, its origin, progress, causes, qualities and effects; you must observe a notable doctrine of S. Augustine, who saith, That Love whilest it is in the search of what it loveth, is called Desire; and when it enjoyeth the thing beloved, it is changed into joy. But if it avoid that thing which is contrary to it, either in effect or opinion, it is Fear; and if the Fear hath its effect by the arrival of the evil it apprehendeth, it turns into Sadness. This love takes sundry countenances, according to divers Circumstances.

I agree all this is said with good reason, yet notwithstanding we must affirm with Divines, that this Oracle of Doctours hath in this definition rather comprised the cause, the effects, & properties of love, then its essence and nature: For to speak properly, love is neither Desire, Fear, Joy, nor Sadness;

5. Definition of love.

but A complacence of the Appetite or Will in an object convenient either according to verity, or appearance; But if we will speak more generally, we say it is nothing, but an inclination propending and moving to a good which is conform to it: For by the definition, we include all the kinds of love, which are divided principally into three branches, to wit, Natural, Animal, and Reasonable love. Natural love consisteth in things inanimate, which have their sympathies and Antipathies, As Palms, male and female, Amber and straw, Iron and the Adamant. Animal love is that Beginning which giveth motion to the sensitive appetite of beasts, to seek for that which is fit for them, and to be pleased in the enjoying what they sought for. Reasonable love is an Act which pursueth and accepteth the good represented by the understanding, wherein we may also comprehend Angelical and Divine love, which S. Denis addeth to these three kinds whereof we speak.

Richard de Midvil. dist. 27. l. 3. Art. 1. q. 1.

Its division.

Reasonable love is also divided into love of Amity, and love of Concupiscence. Love of Amity, which wisheth good to the thing beloved for it self, without enquiry into its own proper interest: As when it desired to one, Health, knowledge, grace, virtues, wealth, honours, without pretence of any benefit to it self. This is to affect with a love of amity, which is very rare now adaies, so mercenary are affections, and when this love is not only Affective (as Divines speak, contenting it self with bare desires) but Effective, by plentifully opening hands to liberality, it mounteth to a huge degree of Complacence.

Gabriel. d. 27. q. 1. l. 3.

Love of Concupiscence is an interessed love, which causeth one to love a thing, not for it self, but for the pleasure and commodity derived from it, or to be hoped (in time) to be derived from it: So the Horseman desireth beauty, strength and courage in his horse and dog; not for their sakes, but his own contentment. Such love is worldly love, commonly defiled with base and animal consideration, nor is ever purified, but when it, for God, loveth that which cannot in it self be lovely.

Behold the Nature and Essence of Love in its whole latitude: Now to speak of the proceedings of the soul in its loves. The first step it makes when it beginneth to love, is the degree of the conformity of the will with the good is proposed. The senses, imagination, understanding, give it notice of some Beauty, Goodness or Commoditie which it conceiveth to be fit for it. Thereupon it beginneth to take fire and to have sparks of desires, which make it to wish the good proposed unto it. Thence it passeth to the second degree, which is that of Short-sweet Complacence, which pleasingly each moment holds it fixed upon the thought of its object. Sometimes between hope to possess it, another while between fear to lose it, and many other passions, which accompany this (never suffering) Complacence.

The steps and progressions of love.

From this degree it goes to the third, which is inquisition and motion, where love putteth on wings to fly speedily into the bosome of its repose, employing all possible means for its contentment; and if it be favoured in its pursuit, it advanceth to the fourth degree, which is union, esteemed the principal scope of Amities. From this union ariseth another Complacence, which is not painful and dolorous; but satisfied and pleased in the fruition of its object which is the heighth of love.

By the sides of love are lodged Beauty and Goodness, for that (as S. Denis saith) they are the objects and motive of love, which are so allied together, that the Grecians call them by one self same name. The Sages have ever sought for the true causes which dispose the wils of men to love: and there are many different opinions upon this point. Some hold it is a quality, which God imprinteth on nature; others imagine it comes from the aspect of stars, and from divers constellations; Others make it to proceed from Parents and education: others from a certain Harmony & consonancy of hearts, which meeting in accord upon the same Tone, have a natural correspondence. Lastly, the Maxime of Divines and Philosophers much swayeth, which saith, that Fair and Good make all loves.

Its cause.

I hold that to accord these opinions, a notable distinction must be made of three loves, which we have proposed in the beginning, to wit, Natural, Animal and Reasonable. Forasmuch as concerneth Natural or Animal love, besides the order of nature it is God which giveth to each creature necessary inclinations to arrive at their end. Well there may be influency of stars, which bear sway over humours and bodies, and with the stars, bands of blood, temperature of Humours, education and secret qualities, which tie creatures with the knot of a certain love, the cause whereof is not well known. For how many are there, who love things which are neither lovely nor good? I not only say in effect, but in their own opinion and judgement; yet are they thereunto fastned by some Tie, nor can they free themselves from it, but by the absolute power of Reason. Do we not daily find by experience, that a Man who is, and who knoweth himself to be deformed and wicked, yet faileth not by Nature, to be in love with himself? So through a love of Concupiscence he may love things which have neither Beauty nor Goodness, although he daily have a blind feeling of some thing suitable to sensuality, and an unperceiveable attractive.

As for love of reason, which is properly Humane love, one may be assured, it alwaies looks directly upon good and fair, not simply, but good, fair acknowledged, agreeable to its contentment: This is the root of all reasonable amities, and hitherto those great sources of love reduced, which are Honestie, Utilitie, Delectation, Resemblance, reciprocal love, obliging and pleasing conversation.

Means to make ones self to be beloved worthily.

Within these six heads (in my opinion) the fifteen means to make one to be beloved, are comprised, which are touched by Aristotle in the second book of his Rhetorick; to wit, to love that which a friend loveth, to entertain his apprehension, his joyes and his discomforts, his hatred and Amities; to keep him in a laudable opinion of our sufficiencie by good parts of wit, courage, virtue, industrie, and reciprocally to hold him in good esteem, to love him, to oblige him, to praise him unto others, to beat with him in his humours, to trust him with your secrets, readily to serve him without forgetfulness or negligence, to be inviolably faithful to him, which we will more amply deduce in the subsequent section.

Notable effects of love in the three worlds.

But if you regard its effects, I find three great empires it exerciseth in the world, natural, civil and supernatural. In the natural it causeth all sympathies, antipathies, accords, ties, generations, productions. In the civil world it builds two cities, as saith S. Augustine, very different. If it be good, it raiseth a Citie of peace, wherein chaste Amitie sway, and with them Truth, Faith, Honour, Virtues, Contentments, Delights. If it be bad, it makes a Babylon full of confusion, where cares, fears, griefs, war, enmities, impurities, adulteries, incests, sacriledges, blood, blood murther, and poison inhabit; and all that, which commonly ariseth from this fatal plague. In the supernatural world, it causeth nine effects, which are very well figured by the celestial throne of love, composed of nine diaphanous globes; whose effects are Solitude, Silence, Suspension, Indefatigability, Languishment, Extatie, and Transanimation, which we more at length will consider in the sequele of this Treatise.

Sect. 2. Of Amity.

Eccl. 6. Medicamentum vitæ. Amity the tree of life.

AMITY is the medicine of health, and Immortality of life, and in a manner doth that in Civil life, which the tree of life in terrestrial Paradise promised in natural life with an infinite number of sweetnesses and pleasures: it immortalizeth us after death in the remembrance of that which is most dear unto us in the world: It is that, which giveth light to dark affairs, certainty to doubtful, support to tottering, goodness to evil, grace to good, order to irregular, ornament to simple, & activeness to dead. By it, the banished find a countrey, the poor a patrimony, great ones find offices, the rich services, the Ignorant knowledge, the feeble support, the sick health, and the afflicted, comfort. Should a man live on Nectar and Ambrosia, among stars and Intelligencies; he would not be happy, if he had not friends to be witnesses of his good fortune: and we may truly say, that Amity continually makes up the greater part of our Felicities. It is not here my purpose to extend my self with full sail upon the praise thereof, since so many excellent wits have already handled this subject; but, to shew how good Amities are to be chosen, and how to be cultivated.

It includeth all blessings.

What Amity is. Affectus ejusmodi & similes ad alios quem inspectio. Casiod. de amicit.

There are some who make profession to be friends, & know not so much as what friendship is; but Aristotle plainly proves, there is difference between affection, Good-will, Love, Amity and Concord. Affection, is a spark of love, not yet throughly formed, in which, understanding hath some slight passion. Good-will, A simple Good-will and consent bathe towards some one, although many times there be no great knowledge of the party, as it happeneth to such, who of two Combatants favour rather the one then the other, not knowing either of them. Love is an affection already formed and inclined with fervour to the good of Conformity; Amity is a love of mutual well-wishing, grounded upon communication. Whence may be inferred, that all those who love, are not friends; but all such as are true friends, necessarily love. The meanest people may love the most eminent; but there can be no Amity, since they therein find not correspondency. There are entranced lovers in the world, who are enamoured of all beauties, none returning them love again: which deserves either laughter or compassion, seeing they may directly go to the fast of Beauties, where they shall find reciprocal contentment. After love, followeth concord, which is the fruit of it, in the union of judgment and will.

Miserable lovers.

Now, well to understand how to chuse good Amities, the Species or kind of them must be known, wherein I find that one Hippadamus a great Platonick Philosopher hit right, when he established three sorts of Amities, whereof, one belongs to beasts, the other to men, & the third to Demi-gods. Animal-Amities are those which subsist only in Nature, and which are common to us with beasts. Thus (saith S. Augustine) a mother which loveth her children for flesh and bloods sake, nor otherwise raising her thoughts towards God, doth but as a Hen, a Dove, a Tigress, a Serpent, and so many other living creatures, which have so great affection towards their little ones. It is not that these Amities are not very necessary, since Nature inspires them, and poureth them into the veins with the soul by admirable infusions, which preserve the estate of the world entire. It is good, much to affect ones own, but we must build upon the first elements of Nature, and by Grace and Reason raise the edifice of true charity. Parents ought to love their children as a part of their own bodies, which Nature hath separated from themselves: But Amity should never divide their hearts. Children are bound to love their parents, as fishes their water. Brothers cannot too much esteem the Love and Concord which they mutually maintain together. A husband and a wife are bound to a most strict commerce of Amity, since as God produced a word in heaven, and with the word the holy Ghost: So, he hath been pleased to create Adam on earth as his own Image; and out of this Image, he hath drawn Eve to be unto man a spirit of peace, and a love of a perpetual lasting.

There is no doubt, but that to fail in these laws, and to break the Knots which God hath tied with his own hands for all the living, is a vice, which surpasseth all kind of brutishness. Notwithstanding, the evil manners of men corrupt things the most sacred, and are the cause that some love their own Blood far above God himself, and others even furiously persecute them. I put likewise in the number of animal-Amities all such as love one another for sport, for the Belly and Lust: For they have no other scope; they do not much better then wanton whelps who cease not to run up and down, turn after turn, dallying and playing one with another. And such as love their wives no otherwise then for pleasure, do like the mate-Creviss, who in his little Cavern hath many females, for whom he fights as for an Empire. All this kind of proceeding smells too much of the brute beast, nor can it have any merit in heaven.

Bodin. in the Theatre of nature.

Humane Amities, and their foundation.

The Amities of men are those which are exercised with reason, and are ordinarily built upon three foundations which Aristotle expresseth in the Treatise he wrote of it, which are utility, pleasure, and moral virtue. Utility, is now adays the most common Cement of worldly Amities, and you find few friends, who hold it not in much esteem. It is that, which hath raised Towns, Cities, and the society of men; That, which having raised, maintaineth them by mutual offices rendred one another in the necessities of ordinary life. The hand must wash the hand; and the finger, the finger. One contributes his counsel; another his industry, another his abilities, another his pain, one his pen, another his tongue, and another his feet. All set themselves a work to do service to Amity. I know Philosophers will say, that this is somewhat mercenary; it notwithstanding preserveth communities, and he who would take it out of the world, should find almost nothing in it, but a meer shadow of Amity.

Interest, the fifth Gospel of many.

Particular Interest is (as it were) the fifth Gospel of Christianity depraved in the minds of many, and is the great God of the Time, to whom millions of souls do homage. Think not, that so many busie spirits, and men fervent to make a fortune, care much for Idle friends, although they were endowed with all the vertues of the Anchorets of the wilderness. They esteem not gods of clay, although they had all the curious draughts of Polycletus upon them. It is gods of gold and silver they would have, men which may give them whatsoever they desire. They carry these dispositions even to Altars, and make piety it self mercenary; For we see, many are little enough moved to hear of the greatest Saints in heaven, when a discourse is made of their excellent virtues: but, if peradventure an extraordinary cure happen, thither they run by heaps, and the saint which is the author of them, hath magnificent Altars waited on by many vows, offerings, and Candles. It is the poverty of the heart of man to measure all things by proper Interest, but it is a maxim deep-setled through all Ages in the opinion of the multitude, and one may truly say, that to him utility is the mother of the Gods. Others who have a more gentle spirit seek for pleasure in their affections. I do not say those pleasures, which we have placed in Animal Amities, but some worthy recreation, as that of the Mathematicks, of Eloquence, of Poesie, of Painting, of Musick, ingenious Sports, pleasant jests, most witty & quaint. This hath much predominance upon spirits who love recreative pastime, and I think the seven Sages of Greece should they live again, would die for hunger in that house, where one who can jest with a good grace, might make a brave fortune. These kind of amities although they may for a time be sweet to sense, are subject to change according to the diversitie of Ages, seasons, humours, employments, and occasions.

men

Tertul. in lib. ad Nationes. Dii vere qui magis tribuunt, magis sanctis, majestas conjungitur in quosdam, vendita totam divinitatem, non licet ex gratis coli.

Amities of pleasure.

Merry jests.

Amities grounded upon Honestie.

The best men tie themselves to the honestie of moral virtues, and singularly love one who is wise, prudent, courageous, just, temperate, liberal, magnificent, weighing all this in the course of a life sutable to Aristotles Philosophy, and do please themselves with the familiaritie of such a man, and are entertained by a Correspondence of manners, a delightful conversation, and an affection very sincere, but not extraordinarie.

Amity of Demi-gods.

The third sort of Amities, which the Pythagorean calleth, of Demi-gods, and which we may attribute to the most rare and excellent souls, is, among such as mutually love another, not for ordinary virtues, but for celestial qualities, graces, & singular gifts of God, and interchangeably love in an extatick manner, to wit, by rapture of spirit, of heart and affection, which causeth all things to be common among them, so much as virtue & honestie permitteth. Such was the Amitie of the first Christians, of whom, with much wonder, the Pagans said; Behold, how they love one another! See how ready they are to die each for other: and that which the Poets found to be a matter so rare, reckoning up some few pairs of true friends. Christianitie made it appear, at that time, in as many subjects as it had men. But at this present, the multiplication of persons hath abbreviated the extent of charitie. That generous spirit (which borrowed the golden wings of the dove of the Prophet, to fly throughout the world, & to sacrifice it self for a neighbour) is waxed cold, & rests immured within its little house, busying it self almost wholly in the preservation of its Individuums.

Vide ut invicem se diligant & pro alterutro mori sint parati. Tertul. Apolog.

From the discourse of these sorts of Amitie, it is now much more easie to judge of the conditions of a good friend, then to meet with the effects of it: but if you will follow the way I shall prescribe, I will shew you what choice is to be used.

Qualities of a good friend.

Great men are not ordinarily the best friends.

First I am of Aristotles opinion, that Great ones (to speak according to the ordinarie course of life) are not verie fit for Amities, because they love themselves too much, and make use of men as of Instruments for their purposes looking after nothing but the establishment of their own greatness. Besides, the licentious life they commonly lead in a fortune which permits them all, is the cause that good men love them not, unless they become as virtuous and magnificent, as they are powerful. Which is the cause, that being usually encompassed with a multitude of flatterers, or of interessed people, who labour to enrich themselves in the manage of their affairs, they have verie few good friends. But there are some among them, who are endowed with so eminent virtues, affabilitie, and bounty, that they win affections, and find friends, who would willingly offer themselves up as a sacrifice for their glory. Amity desireth equality; If it find it not, it makes it: and although one cannot alwaies exact it in an Arithmetical proportion, and that two friends of divers qualities cannot be in all kinds equal in offices rendred one to another, yet its ever necessary therein to observe some proportion; which many great ones do not, thinking all is due to them, and that having usurped the blood and sweat of men, they are but victims born to be sacrificed to their magnificence. Which made the great Aristotle say, That if of two friends the one should become a God, he would cease to be a friend. In which he spake as a man, & a man ignorant of the Divinity; For he figured to himself a god of a luskish & proud humour, wholly busied within himself, and disesteeming all whatsoever under himself. But had he known the ineffable sweetness of the divine Bounty, he would rather with Tertullian have said, that there is nothing so worthy of God, as the salvation of man.

Aristot. 8. & 9. Moral.

Tertul. contra Marcionem. Nihil tam Deo dignum, quam salus hominis.

Who loves too much, loveth little.

Men too endearing incapable of amity.

Secondly, its most certain, that those who love too much, are not verie proper for great and strong amities, for with overmuch eagerness to love all, they love nothing. You find men of honor in the world, who are extremely endearing, and who create amities innumerable, their heart resembleth the weathercock on a steeple, which turns with every wind; they no sooner see one, but they oppress him with favours, promises & courtesies: but such amities resemble those bubbles of water which rise upon a river during the time of a showre, and break as soon as they grow. Birds, which have yet their shell on their backs, are taken with the sweetness of their bait, and think they have gotten their favour upon the first acquaintance; but the prudent well see, that they say to all the world, is not spoken to them.

The Judgement of Plato. Seneca lib. 6. de Benefic. c. 18. Negavit illi jam apud Platonem positum ofpicium.

They do as Plato, who in the beginning thought himself much obliged to a Ferriman, that courteously without asking ought, had wafted him, imagining this was done in respect of his merit, but when he afterward, perceived, he thus entertained persons of the meanest condition, He then could well say, Friend I owe thee nothing.

One must not adhere too much to ones self to be a good friend.

Moreover, we may truly affirm, that such are never good friends, who too much adhere to themselves, and rest fully satisfied with themselves; For amitie being a certain transportment of a friend to a friend, it loveth to go out & readily succour such as stand in need of its help: but the man who is fast tied to his own interests, captived by his own employments, irrevocably squared out to its own hours, is a piece not to be stirred, but with many engines. Add also to those the fantastical suspicions & unequal spirits, who daily at least, have some fit of folly, and infinitly vary both in manners & visage, which makes poor Amitie to fare ill in their hands. But prudent, and patient friends, who have need of them, strive to find out the folds of their hearts, to observe their good fits, and the lightsom seasons of their mind.

Unequal spirits.

Men banished from the Temple of amity.

Lastly, I would banish out of the Temple of Amity all wicked lives, and evil humours, weak brains, and and indiscreet tongues, which are not retentive of a secret; the over-curious, the light, the exorbitant, flouters, Buffons, the sad, mischievous murmurers, great talkers, and the Ceremonious.

The choice of a friend.

To chuse a friend well, it is necessary he be honest, prudent, of a good disposition, cordial, obliging, faithful, and patient. Honesty is the foundation of all the most eminent amities, without which there is not any thing can be of a solid subsistence. Prudence is the instrument for every thing, and the Rule of all the actions of mans life. Good disposition seasoneth the greatest pleasures of conversation. Cordiality makes a commixion of hearts and minds, which is the principal scope of Amity. Obligations, maintained by mutual offices, straightly knit affections. Fidelity, which is an unmoveable rock against all the assaults of men and time, which tend to the division of hearts; and Patience in the defects of a friend, is that which crowneth the perfections of Love.

Sect. 4. Of Amity between persons of different Sex.

I Hold my self obliged by the necessity of the subject, to speak here of the Amity of different Sexes, especially between people of the world, as also, because many complain, that men of our profession would willingly handle them as Hermits of Thebais, and wholly forbid the conversation of women; I will deliver what conscience and civility permit in this. It is often asked whether women be capable of good Amity, and whether it may be tied between sex and sex out of wedlock bands?

This is a very hard question for me to resolve, because, having all my time been employed (according to the laws of my profession) to court wisdom and virtue, and having had little practice, but amongst the sagest and most virtuous women, it is not so easie for me to judge of the humours of such as are bred otherwise.

If we consult with Histories, we see millions of lovers, who complain of the infidelity of their Mistrisses: On the other side, women wage war with men, ceasing not to accuse their inconstancy: and all your feigned Romans eternally chant forth the same song, which were able to tire spirits any thing serious: but it is evident, that these vices with which they reproach one another, chastising with severity, that, which they commit through idleness, proceedeth not so much from sex, as from the nature of a shameful passion of love, which hath no more stability, then the wind in the spring, & the sea in a calm.

It is certain, that evil love hath its disloyal ones every where, but since we are insensibly engaged to treat of Amity, after so many excellent pens who have handled the same subject, we are rather to observe what is commonly done in virtuous love, then that which is acted out of the madness of Concupiscence.

Reasons for which women seem less capable of Amity. Felicitas cogitationum, animi celeritas, & ingenii varietas multiformes illis tot inspirauit. Plin. l. 7. cap. 12.

Some have thought, women were not so proper for Amities, because they resemble a cloud in the Rainbow, which receiveth the impression of all colours in their natural diversified forms: besides, for that according to Pliny, they are imaginative more then any creature in the world, which suggesteth to them infinite many thoughts, divers inflexions of the heart, tastes, distasts, which thrust on one another as the waves of the sea. They likewise thereunto add, that they very easily are turmoiled with suspicions, jealousies, and distrusts; the least matters offend them, and many once displeased, are irreconcileable. And which is more, that the most part of them have narrow hearts, and hands not open enough to help their good friends at a need, they being ordinarily much tied to the interest of their family; so that there are many who love not so much for love, as for gain.

Reasons for the modest love of women. Amor magis sentitur cum pudis cum indigenis. August. l. 10. de Trin. c. 12. S. Thom. 1. 2. q. 25.

This may well happen in certain humours, but there are some grievous spirits, who do not so easily receive the impressions of these ill qualities, and who persevere till death in an unshaken constancy of affection. And verily it seemeth, that contrary to what hath been spoken, nature more favoureth them therein, because Love, as saith S. Thomas after S. Augustine, appears best in indigence, and those love most fervently and powerfully, who besides other attractives see themselves bound unto it by some kind of necessity. Now, the inclination which a woman hath towards man, is (as it were) necessary: For it is more easie for a man to be without a woman (having regard to spirituall and temporall assistances, as Sacraments and Physick) then for a woman to be without a man. Adam was for a while all alone in Paradise, in a vast world, but God permitted not that Eve should be there alone one moment: for this solitude would have gone hard with her to see so many living creatures, and in so divers kinds, and not meet with one to bear her resemblance.

This being so, one may with reason say, that as we love things necessary, with more endeavour and stabilitie, so women are tied with the more indissoluble chains in virtuous inclinations. But not to speak of this motive (which proceeding from a meet motion of nature) cannot be the most generous; we find men, who rest upon Indifferency, and seek nothing but to content their own senses and to idolatrize themselves: but women very rarely stay upon neutrality, needs they must love or hate, there is no third condition for them; and since, according to the Philosopher, it is fit to judge of Contraries by proportion, we will truly say, that if they be susceptible of the impresions of hatred above all may be said, so are they likewise capable of noble Amities. They think themselves more engaged in honour to entertain them, when they have begun, fearing to be disparaged by the multitude of wandring and flitting affections.

Add also to this, that they are more tender then men, and that softness of temperature, is to love, as the air to the ray of the Sun; seeing the affections more easily penetrate where they find dispositions which have already prepared a way for them. Lastly, as they commonly are more devout & religious then men, so they observe virtuous Amities with respect, and entertain them out of conscience, & especially such as are grounded on piety, which is the thing that most powerfully predominateth over their heart.

I speak this in respect of those who are verie virtuous. But as we find, few rare virtues and strong amities accompanied with all necessary circumstances, are not so frequent in their sex.

It seemeth also, that the Examples we derive as well from Nature, as Civil life, insensibly lead us to the proof of that we propose.

Among living creatures, the Females are the more sharp and ardent, as well in their affection as in their anger: the cuttle-fish takes revenge on that which striketh her male; but the male flyeth if his female catch a blow, as Aristotle hath observed in the ninth book of his living Creatures. I well remember the Antients studiously reckoned up the pairs of friends which they had observed throughout all Ages, and that Lucian in his Toxaris hath strange strange examples of amity between men, as of him who left his whole family in a fire, to carry out his dearest friend on his shoulders: and of another, who gave his own eyes for the ransome of him whom he most tenderly affected. But who likewise would in particular decipher the notable acts of love, which many wives have witnessed to their husbands, should find wherewith to be moved to admiration, and to settle his constancy. If we talk of preserving a widow-hood, inaccessible to second wedlocks, how many may we find of them, even in Gentilisme, who, after the death of their dear husbands, have said, (what the antient Valeria did) My husband is dead to others, but not to me. If we speak of suffering great toils of body, Queen Hipsicrates followed King Mithridates her husband, as one of his bravest Captains, gallantly corvetting a horse, and galloping through snows & wildernesses not to be separated from him. If we discourse of banishment & ignominies, Sulpitia brake up doors and locks to run (maugre her mother) after her exiled husband, among the proscripts of the Triumvirat. If imprisonment be put into the list of account, Eponina was nine years shut up with her husband in the hollow cavern of a Tomb. If you regard maladies, a daughter of Spain, daily with her tongue, licked the envenomed wound of King Edward of England her dear husband. If you look on the terrible of terribles, death; Blaunch the Italian Lady, scorning the flatteries of the Tyrant Aclolin, who passionately woed her, (captive though she were) escaping out of the hands of souldiers, she went to breathe out her life upon the tomb of him to whom she first of all had given her heart and affections. Yea, I much more admire those, who willingly have deprived themselves of all riches, greatnes, yea, even of the presence of their husbands, whom they dearly loved, to procure them liberty, wealth, and honour. Cedrenus observeth in his history, that Constantine the ninth exercising tyranny, as well in matter of love, as within his Empire, caused the Roman Argyropylus to be sought out, and commanded him to repudiate his wife, whom he had lawfully married, to take his daughter, on condition that he would make him Cæsar, and associate him with himself in his dignity: but if he condescended not to his will, he threatned to pull out his eyes, and to make him all the dayes of his life miserable. The Lady, who was present, seeing her husband involved in all the perplexities that might be, and ignorant what answer to give unto the Emperour. Ah Sir (said she) I see you are much hindered in a brave way, if it onely rest in your wife, that you be not great and happy; I freely deprive of my self of all, yea, of your company (which is more precious to me then all the Empires of the world) rather then prejudice your fortune; For know, I love you better then my self: And saying this, she cut off her hair; and voluntarily entred into a Monastery, which the other was willing enough to suffer, preferring ambition before love, a matter very ordinary among great ones.

Excellent loyalty of a Lady.

Out of all this it may be inferred, that women are to be found very virtuous, and most constant in their affections. But the question I proposed in the second place, if in case it so fall out, whether amities may be fixed out of marriage, between sex and sex, is a passage very dangerous, and worldlings must not think it strange, if I look into it with much precaution. It is a pleasant thing to hear how Pelagius the Arch-heretick talks in S. Jerome; For he makes a Rhodomontade suteable to a spirit swoln up with pride, and blinded within the opinion of his own worth. There are (saith he) who shut themselves within cells, and never see the face of any one woman, yet suffer themselves to be inflamed with love, and tormented with desires: which may very well happen, for they are miserable creatures, who well deserve to be so handled. As for me, I freely profess, I am daily environed with an host of women, and feel not the least spark of concupiscence. S. Basil was of another opinion, when he sheweth, that a man, who perpetually converseth with women, and saith he feeleth not any touch thereof, participateth not at all of humane nature, but rather is some extraordinary prodigie; For, as he learnedly disputeth in the Book he composed of Virginity, the body of a woman is (as it were) a section, and a fragment of that, of the first man, which is the cause he naturally desireth her, as a part taken from himself. The palm hath not more inclination to the palm, nor the iron to the adamant, then one sex hath towards another. When God created the mother of the living, it is written, he built, as if the Scripture would say, That woman is a house wherein the heart of man lodgeth but too often. Sole glances (saith this great man) are spiritual hands, which cause wonderful effects; From thence the first battery of Concupiscence beginneth, as saith Clement Alexandrinus. Adde, that after the corruption of sin, we have in us an evil source of carnal desire, which floweth from the bottome of our soul by our five senses as by so many conduit-pipes. Nature is extremely subtle and busie, and when one hath a hundred times together by strong hand chased it away, a hundred times it returneth; it insinuates it self, it presseth forward with sweet violences, with charming sweetnesses, it insensibly spinneth the web, and doth what it list.

Moreover, it is seconded with a certain curiosity, to know all that which is most pernicious to it. It kicketh against the laws of honesty and modesty, and thinks the forbiddance of an evil is the greatest of all torments. It will know to much, to be chaste, and makes a snare to it self of proper science. O God of purity, how many do we now adayes see, who, to give entrance to a wicked curiosity, through too free conversation, receive as many wounds as they give glances, and as many deaths as beauty shoots arrows against them! Solomon, who well knew the effect of this passion, said, Thy eyes shall see forreign women, and thy heart shall entertain a very evil discourse within thee: Thou shalt be as one fast asleep in the midst of the waves of the sea, or as a lazy pilot, who, oppressed with drowsines, hath forsaken the helm. Thou wilt say, It is true, they struck me, but I feel no pain of it: They have drawn me this way and that way, but I am not sensible of it, when shall I be awakened, to be again drunk with love, and to return to my accustomed pleasures? See how a sensless soul talketh, which having not well guarded its senses in the first assault, delivereth the heart over as a prey, and sinks into the bottome of Abyss. But to rest within the limits of honest amities, it is undoubted, one cannot use too much precaution, so subtle and penetrative are the stings thereof, especially, when it is sharpned by Beauty, Bounty, and Benefits. Yea, misery therein doth sometimes bear so sensible a part, that a beautiful and virtuous woman, being in her innocency afflicted, shooteth arrows of victorious love into the heart of man: And very well the Philosopher Seneca hath observed, that love is great, when it grows out of commiseration.

Cassiod. de amicitia.

It is true which Cassiodorus said in the book of Amity, that one affection degenerateth insensibly into another. Love, in the beginning, is wholly divine, then it becometh humane, being yet within the limits of reason: From humane it passeth to natural, wherein it quickly feels the sting of nature, and the first fervour of Concupiscence. From natural, it becometh officious, entertaining it self with discourses, complements, complacence, offices, and services. From officious, it most times becometh carnal, and from carnal, absolutely unchaste.

Degeneration-amity.

Observation of Iamblichus applied to the amities of women.

Iamblichus, a Philosopher very curious, saith, that those who professed to consult with spirits by this divine operation, as is pretended, saw in the beginning obscurities, spectres, and night; but persisting in their search they perceived the air by little and little waxed bright with a pleasing serenity, & the apparitions became more lightsome. It falleth out quite otherwise in the matter of Amities, indiscreetly tied with women: For at first, those shews are fair and specious, but the issues of them (if one be not heedful) are black and hideous. A soul which feareth God, might sometimes be very confident among such as make profession to be none of the honestest, because it is prevented by some aversion which hindereth its perdition; but virtue, consorted by sweet disposition, hith another manner of power: for it insinuateth it self into the soul with admirations & satisfactions, which attract the inclination before the consideration can be permitted to frame any further discourse. So S. Bonaventure in the Treatise he composed of the Purity of Confession, saith, The Amity of virtuous women is more to be feared, and the testimonies of mutual affections which one sex rendereth to another, are infinitely able to enkindle love. One, who is not extremely exorbitant, beginneth not the practice of vice on the top; iniquity hath its apprentiships, none comes in an instant to the utmost of impudency. Above all, heed must be had of the beginnings, before vice take much predominance to our prejudice.

S. Bon. l. de Purit. Conf.

Have you observed what a stone doth, thrown into a pond? it maketh at first a small circle, which causeth another, and the other a third, the third out of that produceth a fourth, and they are still infinitely upon encrease so much, that the water onely curled with a little pibble, makes a long chain of circles, which fill up the total superficies. This happeneth in love, it falls into our heart not perceived, nor foreseen, and in the beginning causeth some slight touch, which according as it is entertained, distends it self, and is in such sort multiplied, that it repleniſheth the whole capacity of our soul with arrows and chain-links, which we cannot but with much labour dissolve and unloose. A spirit which before rested in a generous liberty, becomes captive. This imperious visage perpetually knocks at the gate of his heart. It enters into game, study, repose, repast, sleep and action. It insinuateth it self into prayer, with distractions pleasingly troublesome, it busieth the thoughts, it exerciseth the discourse, it inflameth the desire, to go, to visit, to speak; it repleniſheth the memory with what is past, the imagination with the future, and the present with disturbance. A soul finds it is not well, that it dissolves, that it consumes by the senses, and hath already dried up all its smiling beauties, and weakned that vigour which is in devotion. It notwithstanding flattereth it self with the colour of innocency; it feigneth to it self that this is an act of charity, that it is a duty of civility; that it is an act of the souls that burns not but for virtue; but the mischief is, this soul is not an intelligence separated from matter, and that in the guelt thereof, we pass by the veil of body, which becometh a snare to chastity.

Subtleties of the passion of love.

How many Bulls have we seen feeding in a pasture, strong & sound, who having heedlesly swallowed a little worm called by the Grecians, The fire of Oxen, become meagre & faint, retaining nothing at all of their bodies but bones, and figure? And how many great spirits have we beheld which were in excellent state, and in full vigour of the functions of intellectual life, who, by approaching over-near to this sex, have entred into affections of fire and flames: which, like little creeping serpents, have stoln into their hearts and destroyed virtue. I will not soil the purity of my Pen with the exorbitancies, which both antient and modern histories have observed upon this subject. I pass over it, as bees over hemlock, without any stay; it seeming unto me that many Authours had done better to have covered the stains of their mother, then to have divulged them to maligne spirits, who make use of poison, and readily impute the disorders of particular, to the general body.

Love compared to the fire of Oxen.

The opinion of Fathers concerning the Amity of women.

All I have said hereupon, hath been to suit my self to the sense of Scripture and holy Fathers, who so notably have condemned the over-much familiar conversation with women, and if they seem sometimes to speak of it with too much rigour, it is, for that in great crimes the evil might be diverted by exaggeration of the peril, to the end, that since the fire is to be feared, the very smoke might be avoided.

Pro. 6. 27.

It is not to be wondered at, what the Wise-man said, That the too free familiarity with women was a fire-brand in the bosome: That S. Ephraim thought it was as easie to live among burning-coals, as to converse with this sex, and not to wound the soul! That S. Bernard wrote, that to be alwaies among women without hurt, was to do more then to raise the dead: That S. Cyprian imagined it was to erect a precipice, to be addicted to such society: That S. Jerome advised, that we should either equally love them all, or equally not know them.

Shipwracks happened by the love of women.

We see many shipwracked fools standing on promontory tops, who tell us of the ruines which these passions have caused. Simon Magus was undone by a Hellen, being more bewitched by her love, then he inchanted others by his sorcery. Apelles was corrupted by Philumene: Montanus, by Prisca and Maximilla: Donatus, by Lucilia: Elpidius, by Agape. Women have ended among all these, what Magick and Heresie had but begun. O good God! what man would not be astonished at the Roman Macarius, who having overcome love in the world, was surprised in the wilderness by finding a womans shoe? To conclude, Heaven is most happy, said Tertullian very wittily, because though it hath Angels, it hath not Angelicals; though it hath a God, it hath no Goddesses; and it might be feared, if there were diversity of Sex there, it would alter something of its tranquillity.

Ex moribus.

In cœli non Angelus & Angela. Tertul. ad versus Val.

So many great men, who were much accomplished in sanctity, have thought of women upon the brink of the grave, and have found, we must ever fear, that we may never fall. Besides, I leave you to think with what conscience a spruce youth who hath a body full of blood, and a spirit repleniſhed with flames, can say, He will love God in his works, and that he findeth not any one better then a handsome woman. He knoweth how to manage his love, he will take in no more fire then he list, and this fire shall not burn, but at his discretion. This beauty shall serve to raise him towards God;

he still goes from the creature to the Creatour without any difficulty; It is a ladder of gold, which God hath set for him to climb up into heaven by. But it is to be doubted lest it prove Archimedes his engine, whereon the higher they mounted, the lower they descended. Such an one by this way thinks to touch heaven with a finger, who already hath a foot in hell. But since I write this Treatise for Courtiers, and for the well-ordering of divine and humane love; I neither must, nor will, by my discourse put any prejudice upon the virtuous and civil Amities which may be between persons of different sex, who are endowed with singular and excellent virtues, and who manage their affections with admirable discretion: which, although rarely, may be done; and if there be any who abuse it, it is not fit, by reason of blasted members, to blame sound parts, and suspect them of corruption, nor to censure the actions of many great Saints, who, being obliged by duty to converse with other sex then their own, have therein comported themselves with so much prudence and charinesse.

This thing may be allowed of, Amities between persons of different Sexes, endowed with great virtue and rare prudence. Nec inferorum regnum in terra. Eqq. I.

S. Augustine, in the fourth Book of the City of God, saith, The Antients had three Goddesses of Love; one for the irregular, another for the married, and a third for virgins. We must not think the kingdom of hell perpetually swayeth upon the earth (to speak with the Wise man) and that one cannot look on a woman, and not take in the fire of evil love. How many be there, who, wholly are estranged from all tender and affectionate inclinations? Briars and thorns are as full of courtesie as their greetings, and the ice of Scythia is not more cold then their conversation. How many do we find, who, having their spirits wholly possessed by other passions; one of Ambition, another of Avarice, another of Revenge, another of Envy, another transported by the sollicitude of a suit, and the turmoil of a family, who think very little upon love? How many other are there, from whom study, affairs, and charges (wherein they strive supereminently to transcend) free their minds from all other thoughts? And how many Ladies see we in the world, with a countenance ever smiling, of a humour cheerful, and conversation most pleasing, who make love to wits and spirits, as Bees to flowers, but have with the body no commerce at all?

But, if this may sometimes proceed from humour; by a much stronger reason we must think, great souls, that are powerfully possessed by the love of God, which replenisheth the whole latitude of their hearts, & who live in continual exercises of prayer and mortification, may converse with women for the affairs of salvation, by a conversation sweetly grave, and simply prudent, not changing the love which they bear to the virtue of chastitie.

It is an act of a base or maligne spirit, to measure all by ones own self, and to think that, what he would do in a slipperie occasion, must be done by all such who are farre otherwise eminent in grace and virtue, then are the ordinarie sort of men.

The Basilisk cannot be enchanted.

The Author of the Theatre of Nature holdeth, that the Basilisk alone, among serpents, cannot be enchanted; and, I dare affirm, there are men, who have the like priviledge, and have their eyes love-proof, & their hearts shut up against all the assaults of concupiscence, whether it proceed from singular habits of virtue, or whether it be some very extraordinary gift from God. Democritus voluntarily made himself blind, by looking stedfastly upon the beams of the sun, to free himself from the importunities of the love of women; He (perhaps) shut up two gates against love, to open a thousand to his imagination. Origen deprived himself of the distinction of sex, to rebate the stings of sensualitie, which bred him much mischief. Grace, and the gift of God, doth more then all the endeavours of men, it forsaketh not those, who, by obligation of their charge, and out of the necessitie of their profession, converse with women, within all the limits and due proportions of decorum.

Tertul. Apologetico.

The extraordinary practice of S. Athanasius.

The Ecclesiastical Historie assureth us, that the glorious S. Athanasius, seeing himself persecuted by the Arrians with rage, thirstie of his blood, and not knowing whom to trust, hid himself in the night-time in the house of a devout Virgin, where he was long concealed, and protected against the fury of his persecutours. Whosoever will weigh this, shall find it an extraordinarie act, for the historie saith, the Virgin was a miracle of beautie; and being not fully twentie years of age, had made a vow to preserve a perpetual virginity to God. It much amazed her at first, seeing the great Prelate had chosen her little habitation for the place of his retreat: but he assuring her it was the will of God, she entertained him with an open heart, & served him with so much puritie, obedience, and reverence, that she seemed to have lodged an Angel, not a Man in her house.

Sozom. & Palladius.

She furnished him with all necessaries for life, she washed his feet; yea, she borrowed Books for him, with singular heed, that he might entertain time in this his imprisonment. Cardinal Baronius calleth this historie into question, and thinks it an invention of Arrius his side, but there is very little appearance, seeing the Arrians of that time never objected it to S. Athanasius, as being a matter out of their knowledge. And although this great man in his Apologie hath said nothing of it, where he speaketh of his flights and retreats, this, notwithstanding, nothing at all lesseneth the truth of it, since there are many things may very innocently be done by prudent men, which are not necessary to be published to all the world.

And needs must he have had little judgement to have vaunted this accident before his enemies, whereof they would have taken but too much occasion to calumniate him. And as for that which Baronius saith, that it onely belonged to widows to wash the feet of Saints, it is true, according to the ordinary proceedings of the Church, and the liberty of its functions; but here the question is of an outragious persecution, and of an act out of common practice, and there is not any reason which can efficaciously prove this history to be invented, seeing it is faithfully set down by Sozomen and Palladius, two great admirers of the virtues of S. Athanasius; whereof the one giveth so evident proofs, that he witnesseth he had seen the same Virgin when she was seventie years old, and saith, this relation was confirmed to him by Priests of Alexandria. I hold it more admirable then imitable, and that although the Hebrew Children were once preserved in the fornace by miracle, one must not therefore desperately throw himself, through imprudence, among coles; but ever confess the hand of God is able to safeguard those in perils, who have not despaired in the peril, but who by necessity become therein engaged.

What shall we say of S. John Chrysostome? Is there a man more austere in his life, and more vehement in the matters of virtuous Amities? It is a strange thing to read the Letters he writes from the place of his banishment to his dear Olympias. He saluteth her with openness of most ardent affections,

he

he calleth her his Saint, and his venerable Lady; sometimes he instructs and incourageth her by sublime, grave discourses, addressing Epistles to her to be valued with whole Books. Another while he descendeth into particulars, he recounts unto her his voyages, his adventures, his comforts, his discomforts: He omits nothing of the condition of his health, of the disposition of his body, of his chamber, of his habit, of his ordinary exercises in this ugly place, whereunto he is banished. He protesteth he is much troubled he sees her not, he assures her, all his paines are nothing in comparison of the want of such an one whom he so tenderly loved, which he confirmed unto her by the example of S. Paul, who challenged Angels and Devils, who mocked at all persecutions, who was ready to carry all hell on his shoulders (had it been possible) out of the desire he had to suffer. And yet the separation of Titus, his well-beloved Disciple, afflicted him so much, that he could not give his thoughts any repose. He dilates much upon this affection of S. Paul, to excuse his own, which shewed it self at the heighth, when the news was brought him of the sickness of the same Olympias: For then it was, when the winters of Scythia, the countenances of Barbarians, the hideous roughness of some place where it seemed Nature had never been, the noise of war, and the incursions of souldiers fleshed in massacres & spoils, are nothing in comparison of the affliction he feels for the indisposition of this dear Virgin. He conjureth her by all things the most precious to tender her health, he sendeth her to skilful Physicians, he teacheth her medicinal drugs which help himself, he promiseth her long letters, which she infinitely loved, so that she take care of her health, he assureth her, as it were in the spirit of prophecy, that he must visit her again to comfort his cares, wipe away his tears, and replenish his heart with satisfaction. What can be more lovely, what more affectionate, then this whole discourse?

S. Paul tender in holy affections.

Saint Jerome is in the same passions for Saint Paula. All the splendour of Romes greatness, all the riches of the earth, are nothing with him in comparison of his little Bethleem, made resplendent by the virtues of this noble Lady. He telleth us, that Pilgrims who come from the remotest confines of the world cannot see any thing, in all the affluent wealth thereof comparable to her. When he goes about to praise her, he wisheth all the members of his body were changed into tongue, and that he were nought but voice, to be throughout the whole Universe the Trumpet of her praises. He describeth her life and death with extasies, he plaies the Poet in his old age to make her an Epitaph, and fetcheth out a pedigree for her from the ashes of old Troy, and the conquests of Agamemnon. He formerly had made himself a Secretary to her and her daughter, enditing their letters for them to invite Marcella their companion into the solitudes of Bethleem. When he thinks of her coming, all the holy land is turned topsie-turvey, the hillocks leap for joy, the fields deck themselves in their best beauties, the rivers carry the news thereof to the meadows, squadrons of religious, and virgins go before; there is nothing but salutations and transportations, and rejoycings incomparable: Out of which we may conclude, Saints have very lively affections towards all they love.

Great affection of S. Hierome toward Sancta Paula. S. Hierom. in epitaph. S. Paulæ.

That blessed Prelate, the Bishop of Geneva had the same spirit for his Philothea. For, behold how he speaks of her in the first letter of his second Book. When you unfolded your self to me more particularly, it was an admirable joy to my soul that I might more and more comfort yours; which made me believe that God had given me to you, not imagining any thing might be added to the affection I felt in my mind, and especially when I prayed for you. But now (my dear daughter) there hath upon it succeeded a new business, which to my seeming cannot be named, but the effect of it is only a great interiour sweetness, which I have, to wish you all the perfections of the love of God, and all other spiritual benedictions. In the 16 Epistle he saith, It is a dew which moisteneth his heart without blow or noise; I speak before the God of my heart and yours; every affection hath its particular difference one from another: That which I bear you hath a certain particularity which infinitely comforteth me, and to say all, it is infinitely available for me. I account this as an irrefragable verity, and do not you doubt it at all. Then he adds, when many particular persons recommended to him, come into his mind, she is alwaies the first or the last, who there longest abideth.

The affectionate Letter of my Lord Bishop of Geneva.

See how the wayes of the just are hidden, and leave no prints to follow them by the tracks. An ill informed Censurer would here have wrinckled the brow, he would have said with a supercilious countenance, a severe aspect, in the words of Cato: That it must needs be a manifest snare of Satan, to have a womans face in his mind in the midst of his prayers. And yet we know this worthy man lived in most perfect purity, in imitation of immaterial Angels. This teacheth us, there may be Amity between Sex and Sex, pure and ardent as the flames which enlighten hars. But this only belongeth to persons infinitely prudent, and absolute in virtue, who are therein more worthy of admiration, then imitation: yea indefatigable circumspection must be used, to contein them within their limits: And then is the time that they produce chaste and strong delights, when two spirits perpetually look one upon another, as the Cherubins of the Ark having continually the propitiatory of the living God in the midst of them: or when they resemble the Sun and Moon, who for these six thousand years have courted each other, and never touched.

Necessitudo Christi glutine copulata quam non utilitas rei familiaris, non subdola & palpans adulatio, sed Dei timor & divinarum scripturarum studia conciliant. S. Hieron.

Sect. 3. Of the entertainment of Amities.

AMity, in the world wherein we are, is a fire out of its sphear, which properly is heaven; where knowledges are without darkness, joyes without discomforts, and love without blemish. For which cause, it stands in need of precaution to defend it self, and of strength to abide in a place, where constancy is rare, change ordinary, errours natural, assaults violent, and resistance weak: The mind of a Lover is delicate, nice, and sensible in injuries. if you handle it slightly, it withereth like a Rose; if roughly, it fadeth like a Lilly. I then will briefly glance at those things which alter Amity, and shew you likewise the Antidotes that preserve it, to the end, remedies opposed the evils may with the more lustre appear.

Mollis est animus diligentis, & ad omnem sensum doloris angustus, si neglectus sentiat, cito marcet ut rosa, si duruit aspera, fluit ut lilia. Symmachus ep. 34.

The eight stains of Amity. 1. Forgetfulness of friends.

I hold, that among all the stains which Amity may contract, there is not any more tarnisheth it, then Forgetfulness, Negligence, Scorn, Dissension, Distrust, Inequality, Impatience, and Infidelity. We see so many Amities daily to dissolve by Forgetfulness, and want of frequentation, that it seems divers friends (especially when they be of eminent condition) make their way to the Elysian fields by the river of Forgetfulness. They no longer remember those whom they had courted, no more then a nightly dream, nor know they so much as whether they be in the world or no, and whether they Qualem cupis ut mittamus imaginem tibi, terreni hominis an cælestis? S. Paulinus ep. 8. ad Severum.

they yet have any part among the living. Severus demanded of S. Paulinus his picture to preserve his memory, but he asked him, whether he desired the image of a terrene, or celestial man, shewing we must rather remember friends by the figures of the mind, then the lineaments of the face.

2. Negligence.

Others want not memory, but they have a certain carelesnes which many times proceedeth from a nature lazy and indifferent, that cannot take a little pains to quicken the memory of a friend; another while it cometh from a narrow-straightned heart, which vouchsafeth not to oblige it self in an occasion, wherein it hath full power.

3. Contempt.

Some are not content to scorn, but do also make their scorn appear, by preferring men of no worth, and who were before unknown to them in antient Amities. They think a friend who is yet to be made, is ever better then he who is already wholly endeared.

Anslm. Jucundum amicum facere, quam habere. Nec tamen Ateam quamvis malè cogitet, odi.

This is it that causeth sharp convulsions in a generous heart which sees it self neglected, and abandoned in need, by one from whom all possible help was expected. Then arise loud out-cries, exclamations and complaints: Yea there are of them, who hide their wounds, yet fail not to love in the midst of these disfavours; which I suppose doth either proceed from a strong virtue, or from a great abjectnes of mind. If it come from virtue, it is an action truly Christian; But if from abjectnes of mind; then it is a lamentable thing to see a silly soul so profuse of love (the greatest treasure in the world) as to conferre it on the ingrate, disdainful; as if one took delight to feed and flatter owls. And were a man able to give us the heavens and stars; if he have not Amity and affection for us, must we make our selves slaves to a proud spirit, which is wholly employed within it self; and which can never distinguish what virtue or Amity is? Disdain is a thing not hard to be learned, when he, whom we honour most, giveth us a lesson of it in his ingratitude. One may pay scorn with scorn, and set a value upon nothing but God who gives estimation to all things.

4. Dissention.

There are others who begin the breach of Amity by diversity of opinions and judgements; they build but upon one ground in the exercise of the holy virtue; their understanding inclineth to one side, their will seems to propend to another; but in conclusion it is gained by judgement, and the continual diversity of reasons causeth the dissention of hearts. I do not say, one should play the Chamelion in Amity, and, without foundation, take upon him all colours which are presented; for, that would be rather to become a flatterer then a friend. The Seraphins of Ezekiel, though they clap themselves with the tips of their wings, yet fail not to make a heavenly Harmony: So, good friends, who at first somewhat differ in opinion upon subjects offered, and propose their reasons with sweetnes and modesty, thereby alter not concord: but when this dissention is very frequent and captious, it is an evident token, love is strucken at the heart.

Chamelem cir bestiole uite que de fabulis fa. mis colorem assumeq. 32. Ezek. 3. 13

5. Suspitions and distrust.

Others are easily transported with Suspitions and Distrust, and open their ears very wide to tale-tellers, who are the most dangerous plagues which the evil Genius can vomit forth to disturb concord.

Rabbi Salomon.

Antiquity telleth us that friends sent ear-rings to their dearest correspondents on their birth-day, to consecrate their ears to Amity, and preoccupate them against slander. We must judge (saith Seneca) before we love, but when once we have begun to love, we must believe a friend. We must not open a heart by halves; he is made faithful by the power of believing him to be such; and there are not any so worthy to be deceived as those, who upon all occasions fear to be deceived. It is an act proper to a spirit stupid and unworthy of the manage of affairs, to be ready at the first, to give credit to the venemous tongue of a calumniatour, opposed against the life and innocency of a friend; or of one in prime place, without useing diligently all the circumstances of his accusation. And what assuredness may we hope for in humane things, if all ears should become as credulous as tongues are licentious? Came not thence the frequent subversions of States, and calamities of Man-kind?

Is it not that which irrecoverably ruined the Roman Empire under Valentinian the third, when (as Maximus relateth who was his capital enemy) he with his own hand slew his chief General Aetius, the pillar and prop of his Empire? We must not believe any thing against an Amity long settled, unless the proofs thereof be written with the raies of the Sun. Alexander rather chose to put himself upon the hazard of swallowing poison, then to believe one, who made him a report against the loyalty of his Physician: He, with one hand, took the goblet without further information, and with the other, gave the accusers Letter to the accused; the one smiling drank down an apparent death, whilest the other implored heaven and earth against the calumny, which was notably repelled by the generosity of the great Monarch.

6, 7. Inequality and Impatience.

Lastly, they do not long preserve Amity, who are Unequal and Impatient: and as Moses makes no mention of the air in the history of the Creation, because it is inconstant, according to S. Gregory Nyssen's conceit: So we must let their names pass under silence in the Temple of Amity. They grow weary of all, they are displeased with a slight word spoken at random; with some innocent freedome they enter into Labyrinths of suspitions and perplexities, whence they never come forth; and Amity (which is the most delightful of all things) becomes their punishment.

Greg. Nyſſen Homm.

All, which hath pleased them, displeaseth: All, which hath contented them, discontenteth; one knows not into what posture to put himself, to give satisfaction: Good words vex them, services distaste them, submissions torment them, contradictions make them mad: It seemeth Sauls devil possesseth them, and that they know not themselves; They hate by humour, as if they had loved without consideration of merit.

1 Reg. 18. 10.

8. Infidelity.

But we must say, that of all the plagues of Amity, there is none so fatal to it, as the discovery of a secret by Treason and Infidelity: That is it which Petrus Blesensis called the blow without noise, under the shadow of Amity. It is that which Brutus gave to great Caesar, and which was the cause that the valorous Emperour (long tumbled to and fro among his murderers, and defending himself from every blow they gave him) covered his eyes with his garment, not enduring the treachery of a man whom he had loved, and obliged above all other: But saying, Ah son, art thou then one of these! He suffered himself as a victime to be butchered, ashamed to behold the day-light, which made him see so black a mischief. And what is there more to be deplored, then to behold a generous heart which dilates it self in the presence of a pretended friend, and powreth out unto him all he hath in his soul, whilst the wretch (shooting back envenomed shafts against all the raies of Amitie) maketh a prey of his goodnes, and a trophey of his sincerity, rity, abandoning him to the discretion of such as persecute him. There are some who suffer themselves to fall into these infidelities by the surprisal of some wicked spirits who wholly govern them, and who draw out of them all they have in their hearts, either by craft, or power, which rendreth them less culpable, but not innocent. Others run to it with the malignitie of a Devil, and joyfully triumph when they have prospered in an Act so base and barbarous. Do not these kind of people deserve to be accounted the horrour of nature, the scorn of Ages, the execration of mankind? And shall we not believe that if Pythagoras a Metempsychosis were in being, their souls would put on no other bodies but of Hyena's, Rats, or Owls, to fly in an eternal night, and never to be illustrated with one sole ray of the bright day of Amitie?

Petrus Blesensis l. de amic. c. 6. Plutarch. in Julio. Καὶ σὺ τέκνον;

Sicke novacula acuta fraudi dolum: properata Deus destruet in. Psal. 51. 4.

Now, if you desire to know the things which are of power perpetually to uphold Amity, I must tell you, it subsisteth in honesty, good disposition, communication, Bounty, Patience, and Fidelity. Assure your self, you will not long be a good friend, if you study not to be ever virtuous.

Six perfections which preserve Amitie.

Cor impiorum quasi mare fervens. Isa. 57.

The heart of a wicked man (saith the Prophet) is a turmoyled sea, which never rests, it hath as many changes as the waves in the Ocean, as many agitations as Tempests, which with Amity is incompatible, of its own nature peaceful, and which entertains the mind in a constant situation. What is the cause the blessed are never wearie of loving, but that they perpetually find in God new beauties and perfections? The body is finite, and quickly thrusts forth all its qualities, which with time, rather fade, then flourish; but our spirit is profound as an abyss, and our soul tendeth in some sort to Infinitie. Hence it comes, that two friends seriously disposing themselves to perfection, daily receive some new lustre, which rendreth them lovely, so, that increasing in goodness by degrees, they insensibly love some better thing. St. Hilary of Arles said of two good friends, that they sought to hide themselves in the shadow of one another, but that thence their humility was reflected, as from a solid bottom which made its lights the more resplendent.
